103531

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from internet archive

http://archive.org/details/nation163julnewy

THE Nation

A LIBERAL WEEKLY DEVOTED TO

POLITICS, ECONOMICS, SCIENCE, FOREIGN AFFAIRS, LITERATURE, DRAMA AND THE ARTS

FOUNDED, 1865

103531

VOLUME 163

July 6, 1946, to December 28, 1946

THE NATION ASSOCIATES, INC.
20 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK 7

312

INDEX TO VOLUME 163

July 6, 1946, to December 28, 1946

The following letters are used to indicate the type of article:

A	Art
Arc	Architecture
C	Correspondence
CH	Chart
Ct	Cartoon
D	Drama
E	Editorial Article
EP	Editorial Paragraph
M	Music
MP	Moving Pictures
P	Poetry
S	Signed Article

Book reviews and reviewers are indexed separately in the Book Review Section.

Pages		Pages
1- 28	July 6	365-392	October 5
29- 56	July 13	393-420	October 12
57- 84	July 20	421-456	October 19
85-112	July 27	457-484	October 26
113-140	August 3	485-512	November 2
141-168	August 10	513-540	November 9
169-196	August 17	541-568	November 16
197-224	August 24	569-596	November 23
225-252	August 31	597-632	November 30
253-280	September 7	633-676	December 7
281-308	September 14	677-712	December 14
309-336	September 21	713-740	December 21
337-364	September 28	741-768	December 28

A

PAGE

Abrams, Charles
Homeless America; S.....723, 753
Agee, James
Reviews of motion pictures:
Anna and the King of Siam..... 25
Best years of our lives, the.....672, 708
Big sleep, the 249
Black angel 305
Brief encounter 249
Caesar and Cleopatra 193, 251
Dark corner, the 305
Dark mirror, the 536
Dead of night..... 193
Henry V .....80, 136; see also 165
It's a wonderful life..... 766
Jolson story, the 536
Killers, the 305
Monsieur Beaucaire 249
Museum of modern art's movie anthology 536
Notorious 193
Notorious gentleman, the 361
Raider, the 417
Rhapsody rabbit 305
Searching wind, the 25
Till the clouds roll by..... 766
To each his own..... 25
Two years before the mast..... 249
Wanted for murder..... 766
Well-digger's daughter, the..... 482
Agencies, governmental. See United States; names of agencies Agriculture
Farmer states his problems, the. J. Hearst; S 318
Secretary Anderson orders increase in meat ceilings; E 256
Akers, Milburn P.
Illinois: McCormick and Kelly; S..... 498
Alabama
Amends its constitution to restrict Negro voting rights; EP..... 570
"Big Jim" Folsom. N. O. Davis; S..... 240
Alemán, Miguel. See Mexico
Allen, Edward S.
Comments on "Los Alamos, New Mexico" by A. Stevens; C....278; see also.... 127
Alvarez del Vayo, Julio
Arab league traffics in votes at the United nations; S 646
Center of support for Franco shifts to Washington; S.....581; see also E..... 572
Decline of the European socialists, the; S.. 726
Franco optimistic despite Spain's critical economic situation; S..... 408
French and Italian elections, the; S..... 616
French synarchist movement; S.....526, 557
Gonzalez Videla, Chile's new president; S.. 467
Intermezzo in Berlin; S.....232; see also C.....335; 435; C..... 454
Molotov shocks France; S.....72; see also E 60
Politics and the intellectual: the existentialist movement; S..... 346
Portrait of Pietro Nenni, a; S..... 501
Report from Moscow; S.....175; see also 172; C..... 391
Russia's new five-year plan; S..... 263
Salazar: Franco's junior partner; S..... 91
Spanish question before the U.N., the; S.....695; see also E..... 679
Vichy regime for Spain, a? S.....6; see also EP.....1; 746
"War before the first snow falls"; S..... 435
Will Russia break with the west? S..... 204
America. See United States
American action, inc.
Enters the election campaign to defeat liberal candidates; EP 421
American legion
Convention reasserts traditional reactionary policies; EP..... 395
Anderson, Clinton P. See Agriculture
Anna and the King of Siam. J. Agee; MP.. 25
Another part of the forest. J. W. Krutch; D. 671
Anti-trust laws. See Monopolies
Arab league. See Pan-Arab league Architecture
What kind of building for the United nations? F. Gutheim; S..... 755
Argentina
Disaffection within the ranks of Perón's followers; EP 199
Messersmith, G. S., recalled to the United States for discussion of policy; EP.. 742
Negotiates a commercial pact with Chile; EP 741
Perón pledges aid to the United States in the event of another world war; EP.... 143
Army, United States. See United States—Army
Art (articles by C. Greenberg)
Exhibitions:
Fourteen Americans 593
Pepsi-Cola's "paintings of the year"..... 593
Rousseau, Henri 109
State department's collection for showing in Latin America 593
Whitney annual 767
Painting and French existentialism..... 53
Atkinson, Brooks; his articles on the Soviet Union attacked by Pravda; EP.....59; see also E..... 60
Atomic energy
Civilian or military control? EP.....30; see also.....173; EP..... 513
Improving the bomb; EP..... 170
Institute on world control. A. Friendly; S. 90
Lilienthal, D. E., appointed head of the American atomic energy commission; EP.....513; see also EP..... 572
Science and man's fate. D. E. Lilienthal; S .....39; see also E.....116; 228; C .....250; E.....253; EP.....281; C ....362; EP....365; 423; EP....485; E .....635; 638; 680; EP..... 741
Strategic bombing survey reports on the Hiroshima and Nagasaki bombings; EP.....30; see also E..... 253
Tests at Bikini, the; EP.....2; see also EP.....29; EP.....170; 370
Third Bikini test postponed indefinitely; EP 281
United nations control commission. D. E. Lilienthal; S....39; see also E....116; 228; C....250; E....253; EP....281; C ....362; EP ...365; 423; EP...485; E .....635; 638; 680; EP..... 741
United nations report on the costs of nuclear power production; EP..... 281
Urey, H. C., urges effective international control; E 253
Attlee, Clement. See Great Britain
Auger, Pierre, discusses atomic energy control. A. Friendly; S..... 90
Australia
Evatt, Herbert Vere — a portrait. R. Bendiner; S 148
Austria
Faces the worst economic crisis of its history. G. E. R. Gedye; S..... 647
International rescue and relief committee appeals for aid to Austrians. L. H. Wood; C 26
Automobiles
Black market defies the OPA. T. Coffin; S 258
Azerbaijan. See Iran

B

Bacher, Robert, named to the American atomic energy commission; EP..... 513
Balkan states
Problem of the peace treaties, the. R. Vambery; S .....155; see also E.....199; 315; 469
Ballet russe de Monte Carlo. B. H. Haggin; S 482, 566
Ballet theater. B. H. Haggin; S.....482, 566
Barrett, Jack
Crossword puzzles 27, 55, 83, 111, 139, 167, 195, 223, 251, 279, 307, 335, 363, 391, 420, 456, 484, 512, 540, 568, 595, 632, 712, 740, 768
Beardsley, John, death; EP..... 59
Beichman, Arnold
Shakeout on the stock market; S..... 322
Bellanca, Dorothy J., death; EP..... 227
Bendiner, Robert
Along the Connecticut valley; S..... 373
Bay state politics; S..... 402
C.I.O. tightrope act; S.....601; see also 636
Evatt — the crusader from down under; S 148
New York's political spectrum; S..... 462
Pennsylvania portents; S..... 491
Retrogression in Ohio; S..... 493
Benedict, Ben
Voting at eighteen; C..... 222
Bentley, Eric
Comments on J. W. Krutch's review of "The iceman cometh"; C..596; see also.. 481
Berger, Oscar
Illustrated guide to George Bernard Shaw, an; Ct 98
New world's fair; Ct..... 468
Paris profiles; Ct..... 266
Berreta, Tomás. See Uruguay
Best years of our lives, the. J. Agee; MP 672, 708
Between the porch and the altar, R. Lowell; P 438
Bevin, Ernest. See Great Britain
Big sleep, the. J. Agee; MP..... 249
Bikini tests. See Atomic energy.
Bilbo, Theodore G.
Seen as a symbol of the American people's thinking. J. Illo; C..250; see also C.. 138
Senate committee on campaign expenditures to investigate irregularities in Mississippi primary; EP...225; see also EP...341; EP.....569; EP.....717; 718; 747
Black angel. J. Agee; MP..... 305
Blattner, Benjamin
Comments on "Report from Moscow" by J. Alvarez del Vayo; C.....391; see also 175
Blum, Léon. See France
Bolivia
Revolutionary group overthrows the Villarroel regime; EP.....85; see also EP 143
Books
New York city bans E. Wilson's "Memoirs of Hecate county"; EP..... 634
Of 1946: a selected list..... 704
Bowles, Chester A.
Defeated for governorship in the Connecticut primaries; EP.....309; see also EP.....341; 373
How to stop the depression; S..... 689
Brenner, Anita
Mexico: ballots without bullets; S..... 124
Brewster, Lionel
Comatose crosswords; C.....419; see also C 307
Bricks, North Carolina. A. Stevens; S..... 44
Brief encounter. J. Agee; MP..... 249
Britain. See Great Britain
British empire. See Great Britain
Broadcasting. See Radio
Budapest quartet, the. B. H. Haggin; M.... 630 Budget, public. See Finance, public
Bulgaria
Problem of the peace treaty, the. R. Vambery; S.....155; see also E..... 199
Business
Britain's export drive. K. Hutchison; S.. 696
British loan, the; E.....3; see also EP..... 57
Can the west do business with Russia? V. M. Dean; S..... 315
Capitalism's happy new year. R. S. Lynd; S 748
Depression round the corner? S. Harris; S.....290; see also.....490; 585; 689
International representatives convene in London to draft a charter for an international trade organization. K. Hutchison; S 436
Prices:
American inflation hits the world. K. Hutchison; S 73
And the freight-rate increases. K. Hutchison; S 729
Black market in automobiles, the. T. Coffin; S 258
Consumer resistance. T. Coffin; S..... 490

103531

PAGE

Decontrol and after. K. Hutchison; S.....473; see also EP..... 541
End of OPA places business on trial. K. Hutchison; S..... 45
King cotton in a balloon. K. Hutchison; S....129; see also EP.....459; 473; EP 514; 523
Meat decontrolled; E.....459; see also E.....256; EP.....341; EP .....366; E 424
New OPA extension bill, the; EP..29; see also EP.....57; E.....87; EP .....113; E 424
Truman asks the OWMR to work out a new wage-price formula; E..... 339
Truman's veto of the OPA bill. T. Coffin; S .....5; see also EP..... 1
Work of the OPA decontrol board. T. Coffin; S....202, 229; see also E.... 227
Production and profits. K. Hutchison; S 215, 527
Report of the President's council of economic advisers; E..... 744
Report on the national economy by reconversion director J. R. Steelman; EP... 394
Saving and spending. K. Hutchison; S... 17
Stock-market break, the. A. Beichman; S.....322; see also EP.....310; 353; 585
Byrnes, James F. See United States—State department

C

C.C.F. See Cooperative commonwealth federation
C.I.O. See Congress of industrial organizations
Caesar and Cleopatra. J. Agee; MP....193, 251
California
Central valley project, the. C. McWilliams; S 270
Dinuba, A. Stevens; S..... 351
Election derby, the. C. McWilliams; S.... 494
Political alignments. F. Kirchwey; S..... 369
Canada
Quebec moves against the Jehovah's witnesses and the Labor progressive party; EP 718
Revalues its currency to defend against inflation following end of OPA in the United States. K. Hutchison; S..... 73
Two years of CCF administration in Saskatchewan. J. K. Gordon; S.....180, 207; see also C.....306; C..... 308
Cartels. See Monopolies
Cartoons
America in China. G. Shane..... 379
German dance of death 399
Illustrated guide to George Bernard Shaw, an. O. Berger 98
New world's fair. O. Berger..... 468
Paris profiles. O. Berger..... 266
Cederberg, Arvid E.
Letter from a Finnish reader of The Nation; C 194
Censorship
Molotov-Byrnes dispute over freedom of the press; EP 169
New York city suppresses E. Wilson's "Memoirs of Hecate county"; EP..... 634
See also Freedom of the press
Central valley project. See Power, public
Chile
Gonzalez Videla, G., elected president. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....467; see also EP 282
Negotiates a commercial pact with Argentina; EP 741
China
American intervention; E.....115; see also EP...226; 236; E...284; 292; C.....390; EP.....366; EP.....422; EP...571; EP..... 742
Chiang Kai-shek announces his probable retirement from politics; EP..... 633
Counter-revolution, the. H. Deane; S..292; see also E..... 284
Government troops sustain heavy losses in drive against the Communists; EP..... 365
Madame Sun Yat-Sen's letter to the United States; E 115
National assembly convoked by Chiang Kai-shek; EP .....571; see also EP....633; E....680; EP.... 742
Peace negotiations break down. A. Smedley; S*...236; see also EP....226; EP.... 422
UNRRA scandal, the. I. R. Sues; S..70; see also C..... 138
Chisholm, G. Brock
Can man survive? S.....63, 93; see also C.....166; C.....279; C..... 306
Christopher Blake. J. W. Krutch; D..... 738
Churchill, Winston. See Great Britain
Clapp, Gordon, named director of the TVA; EP 513
Clark, John Davidson, appointed to the Council of economic advisers for the full-employment act. J. J. Corson; S..... 151
Cleveland, Harlan
Comments on "Elections every Sunday" by D. Downes; C..... 82

PAGE

Coal
Strike, the; EP.....487; see also 490; 558; EP.....569; E.....597; 602; EP.....633; 639; EP 677; 683
Coffee, John M., accused of accepting a bribe from a war-materials contractor. T. Coffin; S.....120; see also..... 496
Coffin, Tris
Bilbo on the griddle; S.....718, 747; see also EP..... 717
Coming economic recession, the; S..... 490
Confusion in the G.O.P.; S.....574, 605
Fight for the natural gas market, the; S... 286
In the light of Bikini; S..... 639
John L.'s last stand; S..... 639
Labor at the White house; S..... 313
Mead committee investigation, the; S..120; see also 33; EP.....85; EP..... 143
"Nobody's damn business"; S..... 425
Past recaptured, the; S..... 546
Record of the seventy-ninth congress; S... 173
Showdown on inflation; S.....5; see also EP..... 1
So you want a new car; S..... 258
Truman and American foreign policy; S.....342; see also..... 337
What price groceries? S..... 202
Work of the decontrol board, the; S..229; see also E..... 227
Commerce. See Business
Committee for the nation's health
Refutes the arguments of the National physicians' committee against the Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill; E.....367; see also C..... 567
Committee on un-American activities
Rankin and the Republicans. I. M. Engel; S 465
Rankin's attempt to cite H. Shapley for contempt is defeated; EP..... 569
Communist party
Communist penetration a major issue at the C.I.O. convention. R. Bendiner; S..601; see also 636 Conference of progressives, the; E..... 395
Congress
Dewey backs C. A. Halleck as majority leader of the House; EP..... 743
How to elect a progressive one. H. A. Wallace; S.....231; see also C..... 335
Probable committee appointments. T. Coffin; S.....546, 605; see also EP..... 717
Record of the seventy-ninth. T. Coffin; S.....173; see also EP..... 141
Reorganization bill passed; EP.....141; see also 173
Reorganization act proves an obstacle for the Republican party; EP..... 716
Congress of industrial organizations
And the communists. R. Bendiner; S..601; see also 636
Opens a wage drive; E..... 713
Connecticut
Pre-election picture. R. Bendiner; S..... 373
Primary elections, the; EP.....309; see also EP..... 341
Conscientious objectors; amnesty urged; EP.....310; see also C.....539; 694
Contracts, war. See Mead committee
Cooperative commonwealth federation
National convention, the. J. K. Gordon; S.....207; see also C.....306; C..... 308
Two years of CCF administration in Saskatchewan. J. K. Gordon; S..... 180
Copland, Aaron. B. H. Haggin; M..... 630
Corson, John J.
Men against unemployment; S..... 151
Cotton; inflation and speculation. K. Hutchison; S....129; see also EP....459; 473; EP 514; 523
Council of economic advisers. See Labor—Employment
Courier-Post, Camden
Newspaper guild on strike; EP..... 743
Crossword puzzles. See Barrett, J.
Crum, Bartley C.
Accuses State department of impeding American action to fulfill promises on Palestine; EP 225
Crump, Edward H. See Tennessee
Cunard, Nancy
Letter from the Spanish border; C..... 539
Cunningham, M. R., Jr.
Better pay for better teachers: the Glencoe plan; S 349
Czechoslovakia
Signs a commercial agreement with the United States; EP..... 598
United States cancels a loan previously offered; EP 485

D

D.L.C.
Back talk to The Nation; C.....307; see also C..... 419
D.P.'s. See Refugees
Dance, the (articles by B. H. Haggin)
Ballet russe de Monte Carlo.....482, 566
Ballet theater 482, 566
Dark corner, the. J. Agee; MP..... 305

PAGE

Dark mirror, the. J. Agee; MP..... 536
David to Bathsheba in the public garden. R. Lowell; P..... 649
Davis, Neil O.
"Big Jim" Folsom; S..... 240
Dead of night. J. Agee; MP..... 193
Dean, Vera Micheles
Clash of two systems: can the west do business with Russia? S..... 315
Nations at work:
Arms and Mr. Molotov; S.....638; see also 600
Issue is sovereignty, the; S..... 682
Opening debate, the; S..... 517
Trusteeship: military model; S..... 547
Tug of war over the D.P.'s; S..... 576
United nations' balance sheet; S..... 720
Deane, Hugh
Counter-revolution in China; S.....292; see also E 284
Death of the sheriff, the. R. Lowell; P.... 130
De Gaulle, Charles. See France
Del Vayo, Julio Alvarez. See Alvarez del Vayo, Julio Department of justice
Rogge, O. J., dismissed for making public a report on nazi fifth column in the United States; EP.....486; see also EP.....87; EP..... 634
Dewey, Thomas E.
Backs C. A. Halleck as House majority leader in preparation for presidential bid; EP 743
See also New York state
Dinuba, California. A. Stevens; S..... 351
Disarmament. See United nations
Displaced persons. See Refugees
Doctor will return, the. W. Kees; P..... 449
Drama. See Krutch, J. W., for reviews
Du Bois, W. E. Burghardt
Comments on "Britain's greatest gamble" by A. Roth; C.....166; see also..... 10
Crisis at Fisk university; S..... 269
Duchess of Malfi, the. J. W. Krutch; D.... 510
Duffin, James R.
Comments on "It's growing time in Georgia" by L. Smith; C.....222; see also..... 34
Dunn, James Clement, appointed American ambassador to Italy; EP..... 115
Dunner, Joseph
Jews that remain, the; S..... 15
Durany, Walter
Soviets clean house, the; S..... 499

E

East, far, middle, and near. See names of countries
Ebeling, Herman
Comments on "The western social democrats" by S. K. Padover; C..... 166
Education
Better pay for teachers: the Glencoe plan. M. R. Cunningham, Jr.; S..... 349
Fisk university faces a crisis in the selection of a president. W. E. B. Du Bois; S 269
Eggleston, George T. See Scribner's Commentator
Egypt
Anglo-Egyptian negotiations for a treaty break down. A. Roth; S..... 427
Institutes repressive measures against liberal institutions; EP....57; see also.... 427
Ehrenburg, Ilya. See United States—And the Soviet Union
Eisenstein, Sergei. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Elections
American action, inc., enters the campaign to defeat liberal candidates; EP..... 421
Conference of progressives issues a voting appeal; E 395
Confusion in the G.O.P. T. Coffin; S..574, 605
Gallup poll predictions; EP..... 458
How to elect a progressive congress. H. A. Wallace; S.....231; see also C..... 335
Opinion polls forecast Republican gains; EP 421
Pre-election U.S.A.:
Along the Connecticut valley. R. Bendiner; S 373
Bay state prospects. R. Bendiner; S .....402; see also..... 465
California derby, the. C. McWilliams; S 494
Illinois: McCormick and Kelly. M. P. Akers; S 498
New York's political spectrum. R. Bendiner; S 462
Pacific northwest, the. R. L. Neuberger; S 496
Pennsylvania portents. R. Bendiner; S.. 491
Retrogression in Ohio. R. Bendiner; S.. 493
Will Truman lose Missouri? E. Kirschten; S 430
Primaries, the; EP....2; see also....12; EP.....31; 34; 35; EP.....58; 68; EP....86; EP....87; EP....143; 147; EP.....169; E...200; EP.....226; EP .....309; EP.....341; 373

PAGE

Republican victory alarms Europe; EP..541; see also E..... 573
Shift in the Negro vote, the. W. J. J; C.....631; see also..... 462
Socialist party barred from the ballot in New York state; EP..... 514
Toward a new beginning. F. Kirchwey; S.....544; see also 582; 609; 636
Vote analyzed, the; E.....543; see also 544; 546; 609
Voters' turn, the; E..... 489
Ellis, David
Comments on "American liberals and British labor" by R. Niebuhr; C..... 82
Emerson, Rupert
Trusteeship takes shape; S..... 641
Employment. See Labor—Employment
Engel, Irving M.
Rankin and the Republicans; S..... 465
England. See Great Britain
Evatt, Herbert Vere. See Australia
Everybody's business (articles by K. Hutchison) 17, 45, 73, 101, 129, 157, 186, 215, 353, 381, 409, 436, 473, 527, 558, 585, 617, 696, 729, 759
Exner, Frederick B.
Comments on The Nation's editorial, "Their own petards"; C....567; see also E.... 367

F

FCC. See Federal communications commission
Far east. See names of countries
Federal communications commission
Its blue book on "Public service responsibility of broadcast licensees." C. A. Siepmann; S 644
Needs public support. L. Frankel; S..... 380
Station WBAL applies for renewal of its license. C. A. Siepmann; S..... 644
Federal power commission
Holds hearings on the natural gas industry. T. Coffin; S..... 286
Federation of American scientists
Appeals for funds to carry on fight for civilian atom control. J. H. Rush; C.... 631
Films. See Agee J., for reviews
Finance, public
Congress endorses American participation in the international bank fund; EP..... 141
Senator Taft's budgetary program. K. Hutchison; S 585
Truman proposes fiscal measures to balance the budget; EP.....114; see also EP..... 171
Finkelstein, Louis
Institute for religious and social studies announces an essay contest; C..... 455
Fisher, Dorothy Canfield
Amnesty for conscientious objectors, an; S.....694; see also C..... 539
Fisk university. See Education
Fitzgerald, Robert
Seaman's luck; P..... 761
Flint, R. W.
Comments on "Can man survive?" by G. B. Chisholm; C.....279; see also 63, 93; C..... 166
Is conscription necessary? C..... 483
Folsom, James E. See Alabama
Food
Farmer states his problem, the. J. Hearst; S 318
New world shortages expected in the spring; EP 543
Price of, for shipment abroad affected by the end of OPA. K. Hutchison; S..... 73
Reports on world harvests indicate a continuing shortage; EP..... 311
United nations seeks an organization to replace UNRRA; EP.....311; see also E.....516; 576; 600; EP.....677; 686; EP.....715; 720
Why India starves. M. R. Masani; S.... 66
Foreign ministers
Moscow conference:
Problem of Germany, the; E..... 715
New York conference:
Issue of Trieste, the; EP..... 571
Reach agreement on the peace treaties. F. Kirchwey; S....680; see also.... 686
Paris conference:
Disagreement on peace conference procedures; EP 29
Italian peace terms; E..... 31
Forest conservation. R. L. Neuberger; S.... 378 France
Anglo-French trade agreement; EP..... 340
Blum, L., named interim premier. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 726
Decline of the Socialist party. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....726; see also EP..... 255
De Gaulle marches backward; referendum on the constitution. G. Slocombe; S..397; see also EP.....365; EP..... 422
Existentialist movement, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 346

PAGE

French reaction to Russia's stand on a united Germany. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....72; see also 8; E..... 60
Paris looks at everyman's house. I. Treat; S 178
Results of the elections. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 616
Seeks to liberalize its empire. A. Roth; S.. 260
Synarchist movement, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 526, 557
Franco, Francisco. See Spain
Frankel, Lou (articles on radio):
In one ear:
British-American exchange programs.... 760
Convention of the National association of broadcasters 437, 502, 528
Covering the U.N. 410, 586
FCC and the public..... 380
His choice of musical programs questioned. B. H. Haggin; S..... 766
Hooper popularity ratings 474
Paley, W. S., calls for radio reform.502, 528
Questions from readers.....556, 697
Radio forums 730
Television 618
Freedom of the press
Molotov-Byrnes dispute at the peace conference; EP 169
Plans to safeguard, being considered by various United nations commissions. W. K. Reed, Jr.; S..... 684
Friedman, Michael
Comments on "The future of the Ruhr and Rhineland" by F. Sternberg; C....194; see also 8
Friendly, Alfred
Atoms and common sense; S..... 90
Frothingham, Channing; heads the Committee for the nation's health in fight to pass the Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill; E..367; see also C..... 567
Fulbright, J. William
Suggests that President Truman resign. T. Coffin; S..... 546

G

Gallup poll; predicts a sharp drop in the Democratic vote; EP 458
Gardner, O. Max, named ambassador to Great Britain; EP..... 678
Garsson, Henry
Implicated in war profits scandal. J. A. Wechsler; S .....33; see also EP.....85; 120; EP..... 143
Gaulle, Charles de. See France
Gedye, G. E. R.
Reaching the limit in Austria; S..... 647
Reflections in Trieste; S..... 375
George II, King. See Greece
Georgia
Arnall moves to outlaw the Ku klux klan. C. McWilliams; S..... 691
Negro vote, the. I. De A. Reid; S..... 12
Primary elections, the; EP..... 86
Talmadge, Eugene, death; EP..... 743
Talmadge's racist campaign. I. De A. Reid; S .....12; see also 34; 35; EP.....86; EP.....87; C.....222; 523
Two men and their wives lynched; EP... 113
Germany
Berlin municipal elections, the. EP....457; see also 577
Bevin proposes the socialization of heavy industry; EP 486
Byrnes outlines America's plan for the future of the reich. F. Kirchwey; S.....285; see also C..... 278
Comemnts on "The western social democrats" by S. K. Padover. H. Ebeling; C 166
Future of the Ruhr and Rhineland, the. F. Sternberg; S.....8; see also E.....60; 72; C..... 194
Going communist? R. Niebuhr; S..... 371
Intermezzo in Berlin. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....232; see also C.....335; 435; C 454
Main item on the agenda of the Moscow conference; E 715
McNarney, General J. T., sees Russia attempting to destroy the capitalist system. F. Kirchwey; S..... 228
Merger of the American and British zones. K. Hutchison; S..186; see also C..278; 469; EP.....677; EP..... 678
Molotov's statement on the future of the reich. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....72; see also E.....60; 285; 288
Nuremberg trial, the. R. Vambery; S..400; see also 396
Occupation of, should be continued. O. G. Winternitz; C 539
Surviving Jewish population, the. J. Dunner; S 15
Gerstel, Walter
Comments on "Los Alamos, New Mexico" by A. Stevens; C....278; see also.... 127
Gissing, George; his letters sought. J. Paterson; C 279
Gonzalez Videla, Gabriel. See Chile

PAGE

Gordon, J. King
Prairie socialism; S.....180, 207; see also C.....306; C..... 308
Primer for atomic politicians; S..... 423
Gordon, Leonard
Comments on the Palestine partition proposal; C.....279; see also C..... 363
Government agencies. See United States; names of agencies Government finance. See Finance, public
Graves, Robert
To Juan at the winter solstice; P..... 18
Great Britain
Anglo-American relations:
British loan, the; E.....3; see also EP..... 57
Gardner, O. M., named ambassador to the Court of St. James; EP..... 678
Anglo-Egyptian relations:
Negotiations for a treaty break down. A. Roth; S 427
Anglo-French relations:
New trade accord signed; EP..... 340
Anglo-Greek relations:
Plebiscite on the monarchy, the; EP.... 254
Anglo-Indian relations:
British government calls a conference of Indian leaders to discuss the political crisis; E.....636; see also EP..... 717
Moslem league reverses its decision to accept the plan on the constitution; EP.....141; see also.....213; EP.....255; 297; EP..... 457
Moslem league to join the interim government; EP .....457; see also EP.....599; 612
What the cabinet mission accomplished; EP.....3; see also 42; 213
Anglo-Iranian relations:
British troops to defend the Anglo-Iranian oil company; EP..... 169
Collapse of the Azerbaijan autonomous republic; E 745
Anglo-Palestinian relations:
Britain looks to the United States for help. F. Kirchwey; S.....88; see also 238
Britain's plan for partition. F. Kirchwey; S....117; see also E....145; EP.... 169
British bar the Mufti from the London conference. F. Kirchwey; S.....257; see also 551
British deport illegal immigrants to Cyprus; EP....197; see also EP.... 169
British troops launch drive against resistance movement; EP.....1; see also E.....32; 117
London conference, the; EP..... 281
Truman calls on British to permit immediate substantial immigration into Palestine; EP 393
Anglo-Soviet relations:
Churchill's figures on the size of the Russian army in eastern Europe; EP.....485; see also..... 577
Effect of the Wallace letter on public opinion. A. Vallance; S..... 405
Anglo-Spanish relations:
T.U.C. calls for severance of relations with Franco. F. Kirchwey; S..... 487
Vichy regime for Spain, a? J. Alvarez del Vayo; S....6; see also EP....1; E....312; 408; 581; E....679; 695; 746
Attlee attacks communist tactics in speech to trade union congress. F. Kirchwey; S. 487
Back-bench labor revolt against Bevinism; E 573
Bevin defends his foreign policy in Commons debate; EP 486
Bread rationing. A. Vallance; S..... 122
British role in Dutch-Indonesian negotiations. A. Roth; S..... 153
Churchill, W., calls for a United States of Europe; EP 340
Drives to increase its export trade. K. Hutchison; S 696
Government considers an inquiry into the newspaper trusts. K. Hutchison; S..157; see also EP..... 513
Issue of the "closed shop," the. A. Vallance; S 405
Labor at the crossroads. A. Vallance; S.....405; see also C..... 566
Labor government's first year, the. A. Vallance; S 122
Labor's colonial policy. A. Roth; S....10; see also C..... 166
Laski loses a libel suit; E..... 714
Nationalization of the coal mines. K. Hutchison; S 101
Squatter movement, the. A. Vallance; S.. 405
Greece
Background of the plebiscite. B. Vlavianos; S 344
Case raised by Russia in the U.N.; EP.....254; see also EP..... 309
Plebiscite gives victory to King George II; EP 254
United nations commission to investigate the border dispute; EP..... 741
White terror reigns as King George returns from exile; EP 365

PAGE

Green, Abner
American committee for protection of foreign-born urges passage of bills to aid alien seamen; C..... 26
Greenberg, Clement
Articles on art:
Painting and French existentialism..... 53
Reviews of art exhibitions:
Fourteen Americans 593
Pepsi-Cola's "paintings of the year".... 593
Rousseau, Henri 109
State department's collection for showing in Latin America..... 593
Whitney annual 767
Grossman, Kurt R.
Comments on the Byrnes proposal for Germany; C 278
Guffey, Joseph F. See Pennsylvania
Gumpert, Martin
Placebos in medicine — and elsewhere; S.....294; see also C.....411; 553
Research in happiness; S..... 185
What to do with neurotics; S.....553; see also C 675
Gutheim, Frederick
Planning the United nations building; S.. 755

H

Haggin, B. H.
Articles on music:
"Ariadne auf Naxos"..... 538
Budapest quartet 630
Copland's piano concerto performed by L. Smit 630
Evaluating musical performance..... 53
Hess, Myra 766
Jazz 80, 109, 222
"La Traviata" 766
New radio-phonographs.....334, 418, 453
"Pelléas et Melisande"..... 630
Telephone hour 766
Toscanini, Arturo 630, 766
"Vision and design" by R. Fry..... 136
Articles on the dance:
Ballet russe de Monte Carlo.....482, 566
Ballet theater 482, 566
Music, recorded.....25, 80, 109, 192, 222, 249, 334, 389, 418, 511, 538, 595, 674, 710, 737; see also C.....138; C..... 484
Halleck, Charles A. See Congress
Happy birthday. J. W. Krutch; D..... 565
Harris, Seymour
Depression round the corner? S..... 290
Health, public. See Medicine
Hearst, James
Horn of plenty, the; S..... 318
Henry V. Review by J. Agee; MP..80, 136; see also 165
Henry VIII. J. W. Krutch; D..... 593
Hersey, John, writes the story of the Hiroshima bombing for the New Yorker; E. 253
Hess, Myra. B. H. Haggin; M..... 766
Hillman, Sidney, death. F. Kirchwey; S..62; see also 61; C..... 250
Hlond, Cardinal. See Poland
Hoden, Marcel
Roots of discord in international relations, the; S 518
Holland. See Netherlands
Holy innocents, the. R. Lowell; P..... 731
Hook bill; provides for federal program of forest conservation. R. L. Neuberger; S. 378
Hooperatings. See Radio
Housing
Homeless America. C. Abrams; S....723, 753
House banking and currency committee holds up the Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill; EP.....115; see also EP..... 141
Landlords strike against rent ceilings; EP. 599
Obituary for veterans' housing. B. Putney; S.....722; see also EP..... 717
Rent controls and prices on new houses; EP 541
Wyatt, W., resigns as housing administrator; EP.....717; see also..... 722
Hungary
Political and economic tug-of-war. H. Spiel; S.....211; see also C..... 306
Problem of the peace treaty, the. R. Vambery; S 155
Husseini, Hai Amin el (Mufti). See Palestine
Hutchison, Keith
American inflation hits the world; S.... 73
Britain's export drive; S..... 696
British press trusts; S.....157; see also EP..... 513
Can we afford German capitalism? S..186; see also C..... 278
Competitors of coal; S..... 558
End of price control places business on trial; S 45
King cotton in a balloon; S.....129; see also EP....459; 473; EP....514; 523
Nationalization of Britain's coal mines; S. 101
New blow for consumers: freight-rate increases; S 729
Portal to portal pay; S..... 759
Price decontrol and after; S.....473; see also EP..... 541
Prices and tariffs; S..... 617

PAGE

Production and profits; S..... 215
Railroads plead poverty, the; S..... 409
Russia's food crisis; S.....381; see also E..... 368
Saving and spending; S..... 17
Starving the customers; S..... 527
Still around the corner; S..... 585
Trade barriers under attack; S..... 436
Wall street's nervous breakdown; S..353; see also EP.....310; 322

I

Iceman cometh, the. J. W. Krutch; D..481; see also C..... 596
Ickes, Harold L.
Attacks the appointment of D. E. Lilienthal as head of the atomic energy commission; EP 572
Resigns from the Independent citizens' committee; EP 572
Idaho
Taylor, G. H., the cowboy senator. R. L. Neuberger; S 209
Illinois
Better pay for teachers: the Glencoe plan. M. R. Cunningham, Jr.; S..... 349
McCormick and Kelly. M. P. Akers; S.. 498
Illo, John
Bilbo, a symbol of the American people's thinking; C 250
In one ear (articles by L. Frankel)....380, 410, 437, 474, 502, 528, 556, 586, 618, 697, 730, 760; see also..... 766
In the waxworks. K. Shapiro; P..... 74
In the wind.....43, 96, 152, 298, 380, 434; see also C.....596; 525, 580; 645; 758
India
British government calls a conference of Indian leaders to discuss the political crisis; E.....636; see also EP..... 717
Constituent assembly opens, the. S. Rao; S 757
Moslem league reverses its decision to accept the Cabinet mission's constitutional plan; EP .....141; see also 213; EP.....255; 297; 757
Moslem league to join the interim government; EP....457; see also EP....599; 612
Nehru heads all-Indian interim government; EP .....199; see also EP.....255; 297
Terminates trade agreement with South Africa because of latter's anti-Indian legislation; E 171
Unity or civil war? S. Rao; S..... 213
What the British cabinet mission accomplished; EP.....3; see also.....42; 213
Why it starves. M. R. Masani; S..... 66
Indonesia
Indonesian-Dutch agreement, the; EP..... 571
Dutch-Indonesian relations. A. Roth; S.... 153
Industry. See Business
Inflation. See Business
Injunction; its use by the government in the coal strike; E.....597; 602; EP 633; 639; 683
Institute for religious and social studies; announces an essay contest. L. Finkelstein; C 455
International bank for reconstruction and development
United States congress endorses participation in the fund; EP..... 141
International military tribunal. See War crimes
International refugee organization
To take over UNRRA activities in behalf of displaced persons; EP..... 197
International rescue and relief committee
Appeals for aid for Austria. L. H. Wood; C 26
Sponsors luncheon for trade unionists. S. Strunsky; C 566
International trade organization. See Trade agreements
International woodworkers of America
Demand federal program of forest conservation. R. L. Neuberger; S.....378; see also C..... 596 International youth congress, the. H. J. Laski; S 727
Iran
Britain defends the Anglo-Iranian oil company; EP 169
Collapse of the Azerbaijan autonomous republic; E.....745; see also..... 751
Italy
Dunn, J. C., appointed American ambassador; EP 115
Italian peace treaty, the; E.....31; see also E..... 199
Nenni, P., as minister of foreign affairs. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 501 Results of the municipal elections. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 616
Trieste issue, the; E.....31; see also 155; 172; EP.....225; 235; 375; 469; EP..... 571
It's a wonderful life. J. Agee; MP..... 766
Ives, Irving M. See New York state

PAGE

J

Japan
American occupation policy raises the hopes of Japanese capitalists. H. Strauss; S... 470
American occupation policy moves to the right. H. Strauss; S..... 606
Future of the mandated islands. F. Kirchwey; S.....515; see also.....517; EP 542; 547; 641
General MacArthur's land-reform program. H. Strauss; S..... 521
MacArthur and the elections. H. Strauss; S 606
Members of the allied council of occupation clash over American policies; EP....457; see also 470
Jarrell, Randall
Place of death, the; P..... 650
Jehovah's witnesses. See Canada
Jews
Survivors of Europe's Jewish population. J. Dunner; S..... 15
Joan of Lorraine. J. W. Krutch; D..... 671
Jolson story, the. J. Agee; MP..... 536
John Gabriel Borkman. J. W. Krutch; D.. 629
Journalism. See names of newspapers
Jugoslavia. See Yugoslavia

K

Kassin, William
Proposal for the economic betterment of southern workers; C..... 26
Kees, Welden
Doctor will return, the; P..... 449
Routes to headquarters; P..... 449
Kelly, Edward A. See Illinois
Keyserling, Leon, appointed to the Council of economic advisers for the full-employment act. J. J. Corson; S..... 151
Kilian, Colonel James A., receives fine and reprimand for brutality at Lichfield army prison camp; EP..... 255
Killers, the. J. Agee; MP..... 305
Kirchwey, Freda
Battle of Palestine, the. S.....117; see also E..... 145
Byrnes's speech on Germany; S..... 285
Challenge of Henry Wallace, the; S..337; see also 342; E..... 395
Decorated by the French government; EP.. 311
Doubled and vulnerable: the disarmament proposals; S.....515; see also.....517; 680
Hillman, Sidney, death; S..... 62
Issues at the Paris peace conference, the; S 145, 172
Liberalism at Los Angeles; S.....369; see also E..... 395
Molotov's olive branch; S.....680; see also 686
Mufti of Jerusalem, the; S..... 257
Obligations in Palestine; S..... 88
Politics and justice at Nuremberg; S..396; see also 400
Roots of suspicion; S..... 228
Second chance: meeting of the U.N. general assembly; S.....460; see also Ct 468
Security council vote on the admission of new members to the United nations; S.. 257
Third-party obstacles; S..... 636
Three problems for peacemakers; S..... 487
Toward a new beginning; S..... 544
Will the Arabs revolt? S..... 36
Kirschten, Ernest
MVA: stalled but not stopped; S..... 183
Will Truman lose Missouri? S..... 430
Klein, Paul
Democracy in Manhattan; S..... 268
Krutch, Joseph Wood
Reviews of plays:
Another part of the forest..... 671
Christopher Blake 738
Duchess of Malfi, the 510
Happy birthday 565
Henry VIII 593
Iceman cometh, the.....481; see also C..... 596
Joan of Lorraine 671
John Gabriel Borkman 629
Lady Windermere's fan..... 510
No exit 708
Park avenue 629
Playboy of the western world..... 536
Present laughter 565
What every woman knows..... 593
Years past 738
Ku klux klan
Post-war model. C. McWilliams; S..... 691

L

Labor Employment:
Depression round the corner? S. Harris; S 290
Report of the President's council of economic advisers; E..... 744
Truman appoints the members of the Council of economic advisers for the full-employment act. J. J. Corson; S.. 151

PAGE

How to make collective bargaining work. C. Bowles; S..... 689
Injunction; use by government in coal strike; E....597; 602; EP....633; 639; 683
Passage of the child labor amendment urged. L. W. Maffitt; C..... 631 Strikes:
Coal; EP.....487; see also 490; 558; EP .....569; E.....597; 602; EP .....633; 639; EP.....677; 683
Employees of J. D. Stern's Record and Courier-Post on strike; EP..... 743
Maritime workers; EP.....281; see also 313
Pittsburgh power workers; EP..... 458
Press wireless; EP..... 198
Wages:
Business counters wage demands with figures on rising costs. K. Hutchison; S 527
From portal to portal. K. Hutchison; S.. 759
Maritime strike shows the need for overhauling the stabilization program; EP .....281; see also..... 313
Nathan report, the; E..... 713
Truman asks the OWMR to work out a new formula; E.....339; see also EP 394
Ways of raising them. C. Bowles; S... 689
Woodworkers' union demands federal program of forest conservation. R. L. Neuberger; S.....378; see also C..... 596
Labor progressive party. See Canada
Lady Windermere's fan. J. W. Krutch; D... 510
La Follette, Robert M., defeated in the Wisconsin primaries; E..... 200
Lamula, John J., charges fraud in the primary elections in Manhattan's second assembly district. P. Klein; S..... 268
Laski, Harold J.
American political scene:
I. Case of Harry Truman, the; S..... 548
II. Bankruptcy of parties, the; S..... 582
III. Return to reaction, the; S..... 609
Loses libel suit; E..... 714
Students and politics; S..... 727
Lehman, Herbert H. See New York state
Lewis, John L.
And the coal strike; EP.....487; see also 490; 558; EP.....569; E.....597; 602; EP.....633; 639; EP 677; 683
Lichfield trials. See United States—Army
Lilienthal, David E.
Named head of the American atomic energy commission; EP .....513; see also EP.....572
Science and man's fate; S.....39; see also E.....116; 228; C.....250; E....253; EP....281; EP....365; 423; EP....485; E...635; 638; 680; EP.... 741
Literature
Books of 1946: a selected list..... 704
Existentialism. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S... 346
G.B.S. at ninety. K. Martin; S..... 97
Painting and French existentialism. C. Greenberg; S 53
Loewenheim, Francis L.
Toscanini recordings; C 138
Los Alamos, New Mexico. A. Stevens; S.....127; see also C..... 278
Lowe-Porter, H. T.
Comments on H. A. Wallace's speech; C.....390; see also E..... 311
Lowell, Robert
Between the porch and the altar; P..... 438
David to Bathsheba in the public garden; P 649
Death of the sheriff, the; P..... 130
Holy innocents, the; P..... 731
New year's day; P 216
Lynching. See Negroes
Lynd, Robert S.
Capitalism's happy new year; S..... 748

M

MVA. See Power, public
MacArthur, General Douglas. See Japan
MacNeice, Louis
Slow movement; P 324
Maffitt, Lloyd W.
Urges ban on child labor; C..... 631
Magazines. See names of magazines
Martin, Edward. See Pennsylvania
Martin, Kingsley
G. B. S. at ninety; S..... 97
Maryland
Primary elections, the; EP..... 2
Masani, M. R.
Why India starves; S..... 66
Massachusetts
Pre-election picture. R. Bendiner; S..402; see also 465
May, Andrew Jackson
Implicated in war profits scandal. J. A. Wechsler; S....33; see also EP....85; 120
McCormick, Robert R. See Illinois

PAGE

McMillan, George
Race justice in Aiken: the case of Isaac Woodard; S 579
McNarney, General Joseph T. See Germany
McWilliams, Carey
California election derby, the; S..... 494
California's Central valley project; S.... 270
Ku klux klan: post-war model; S..... 691
Mead, James M. See New York state
Mead committee
Patriotism and profits: the war contracts inquiry. J. A. Wechsler; S.....33; see also EP.....85; 120; EP..... 143
Meat. See Business—Prices Medicine
Committee for the nation's health refutes the arguments of the National physicians' committee against the Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill; E....367; see also C.... 567
Placebos. M. Gumpert; S.....294; see also C..... 419
Research in happiness. M. Gumpert; S... 185
What to do with neurotics. M. Gumpert; S.....553; see also C..... 675
Merrill, Gorth; American soldier fought with the Philippine guerrillas; EP..... 599
Messersmith, George S. See United States—And Argentina Mexico
Alemán defeats Padilla for the presidency. A. Brenner; S 124
Meyer, Bernard C.
Comments on "Placebos in medicine and elsewhere" by M. Gumpert; C.....419; see also 294
Mezerik, A. G.
Southern boom, cotton bust; S..... 523
UNESCO gets to work; S..... 614
Middle east. See names of countries
Millon, R. F.
Fascism, Philippine style; S.....320, 432
Minnesota
Primary elections, the; EP..... 58
Mississippi
Primary elections, the; EP..... 31
Senate committee on campaign expenditures to investigate irregularities in Bilbo primary; EP...225; see also EP...341; EP .....569; EP 717; 718; 747
Missouri
Primary elections, the; EP..... 169
Will Truman's candidates lose in November? E. Kirschten; S..... 430
Missouri valley authority. See Power, public
Mocharniuk, Nicholas
Bilboes defined; C..... 138
Money. See Finance, public
Monopolies
British government considers an inquiry into the newspaper trusts. K. Hutchison; S 157
Monsieur Beaucaire. J. Agee; MP..... 249
Montana
Primary elections, the; EP.....58; see also EP 86
Truman endorses B. K. Wheeler for renomination; EP....58; see also EP... 86
Monte Carlo ballet russe. B. H. Haggin; S 482, 566
Moore, Chester G.
Comments on "Can man survive?" by G. B. Chisholm; C...166; see also...63; 93
Moore, Marianne
Rosenfeld, Paul, death; S..... 192
Moriñigo, Higinio. See Paraguay
Moss, Bob
Announces formation of the paralyzed veterans' association; C..... 82
Mufti of Jerusalem, the. See Palestine
Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill. See Social security
Museum of modern art presents a movie anthology. J. Agee; MP..... 536
Music (articles by B. H. Haggin)
"Ariadne auf Naxos" 538
Budapest quartet 630
Copland's piano concerto performed by L. Smit 630
Evaluating musical performance..... 53
Hess, Myra 766
Jazz 80, 109, 222
"La Traviata" 766
New radio-phonographs 334, 418, 453
"Pelléas et Mélisande" 630
Telephone hour 766
Toscanini, Arturo 630, 766
"Vision and design" by R. Fry..... 136
Muste, A. J., and D. C. Fisher
Urge amnesty for conscientious objectors; C.....539; see also..... 694

N

N. A. M. See National association of manufacturers
Nathan, Robert N., prepares a wage report for the C.I.O.; E..... 713 Nation, The
British reader finds its criticisms of the Labor party's foreign policy too harsh. J. Tudor-Hart; C 307

PAGE

Suggestions for improvement from a reader. D.L.C., C.....307; see also C..... 419
Nation associates, the Pacific coast conference; E.....256; see also 337; 369; E..... 395
Presents a memorandum on Spain to the United nations general assembly; EP.... 598
National association of broadcasters. See Radio
National association of manufacturers
Fifty-first annual congress. R. S. Lynd; S 748
National income. K. Hutchison; S..... 17
National physicians' committee
Opposes the Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill; E.....367; see also C..... 567
Natural gas as a competitor of coal. K. Hutchison; S 558
Near east. See names of countries
Negroes
Alabama amends its constitution to restrict voting rights; EP..... 570
Case of Isaac Woodard, the. G. McMillan; S 579
Columbia, Tennessee, court acquits all but two of twenty-five Negroes held on charges arising out of a riot; EP..... 393
Fisk university faces a crisis in the selection of a president. W. E. B. Du Bois; S 269
Ku klux klan drives against Negro veterans. C. McWilliams; S..... 691
Nine lynchings in two months; EP..... 225
Shift in their 1946 vote, the. W. J. J.; C.....631; see also..... 462
Two men and their wives lynched in Georgia; EP.....113; see also..... 465
Voting strength in Georgia. I. De A. Reid; S 12
Nehru, Jawaharlal. See India
Nenni, Pietro. See Italy
Netherlands
Dutch-Indonesian relations. A. Roth; S 153; see also EP..... 571
Neuberger, Richard L.
Cowboy on our side; S..... 209
Election contests in the Pacific northwest; S 496
Woodmen and the trees, the; S....378; see also C..... 596
New Republic
Wallace, H. A., becomes editor; E..... 425
New year's day. R. Lowell; P..... 216
New York city
Chosen as site of permanent U.N. home; EP 716
New York state
Congressional contests. R. Bendiner; S.... 462
Democratic convention, the; EP..... 283
Gubernatorial election, the. R. Bendiner; S 462
Primary elections, the; EP.....226; see also 268
Republican convention; EP..... 283
Republicans choose Dewey and Ives as candidates for governor and senator; Democrats select Mead and Lehman; EP.... 283
Socialist party barred from the ballot; EP 514
Newborg, Agnes Morgenthau
Pioneer youth camp plans a memorial for Hillman; C 250
Newspapers. See names of newspapers; Freedom of the press
Niebuhr, Reinhold
Europe, Russia, and America; S.....288; see also C..... 455
Palestine: British-American dilemma; S.. 238
Will Germany go communist? S..... 371
No exit. J. W. Krutch; D..... 708
Norman, Dorothy
Seeks material on A. Stieglitz; C..... 363
North Dakota
Primary elections, the; EP..... 2
Norton, William J.
Praises the Workshop in intercultural education; C 631
Notorious. J. Agee; MP..... 193
Notorious gentleman, the. J. Agee; MP.... 361
Nourse, Edwin G., appointed to the Council of economic advisers for the full-employment act. J. J. Corson; S..... 151
Nuremberg trials. See War crimes

O

OPA. See Price administration, office of OWMR. See War mobilization and reconversion, office of O'Grady, Fred
Comments on "Europe, Russia, and America" by R. Niebuhr; C.....455; see also 288
Ohio
Depressing election campaign, a. R. Bendiner; S 493
Oil
Versus natural gas. T. Coffin; S..... 286
Operations crossroad. See Atomic energy

PAGE

P

Padilla, Ezequiel. See Mexico
Painting. See Art
Palestine
And Europe's surviving Jews. J. Dunner; S 15
Anglo-American obligations. F. Kirchwey; S.....88; see also E.....145; 238
Attitude of the Jews. F. Kirchwey; S.... 117
British bar the Mufti of Jerusalem from the London conference. F. Kirchwey; S.. 257
British deport illegal immigrants to Cyprus; EP.....197; see also EP..... 169
British plan for partition. F. Kirchwey; S.....117; see also E.....145; EP .....169; C 279
British troops launch drive against resistance movement; EP..... 1
see also E.....32; 118
Crum, B. C., charges that State department impedes American action to help the Jews; EP 225
London conference, the; EP..... 281
Mufti's new army, the. A. Roth; S..551; see also 646
Will the Arabs revolt? F. Kirchwey; S.... 36
Paley, William S., calls for radio reform. L. Frankel; S.....502, 528
Pan-Arab league
Traffics in votes at the United nations. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 646
Will the Arabs revolt? F. Kirchwey; S.... 36
Panhandle eastern pipelines company; fights the United light and railways company for the natural gas market; T. Coffin; S. 286
Paraguay
Morinigo liberalizes his government; EP.....143; see also EP..... 199
Paris peace conference. See Peace conference
Park avenue. J. W. Krutch; D..... 629
Parody, a. E. M. Forster; P..... 529
Paterson, James
Seeks material on G. Gissing; C..... 279
Peace conference
Balkan treaties, the. R. Vambery; S..155; see also E.....199; 469
Battle of the blocs; E.....199; see also 235
Clash of two economic systems, the. V. M. Dean; S 315
Dispute over the two-thirds vote rule. F. Kirchwey; S 172
Ends with major questions unsettled; EP.....421; see also.....460; 469
Issues at Paris, the. F. Kirchwey; S.... 145
Italian peace treaty, the; E.....31; see also E.....199; 235
Molotov-Byrnes dispute over freedom of the press; EP 169
Opens in Paris; EP..... 113
Paris profiles. O. Berger; Ct..... 266
Roots of suspicion. F. Kirchwey; S..... 228
Trieste issue, the; E....31; see also 155; 172; EP.....225; 235; 375; 469
Pearl Harbor
Report of the congressional investigating committee; EP 85
Peizer, Maurice
Comments on B. H. Haggin's record review; C.....484; see also..... 418
Pennsylvania
Guffey versus Martin; election portents. R. Bendiner; S 491
People's front, the (articles by J. Alvarez del Vayo) 408, 435, 467, 501, 526, 557, 581, 616, 646, 695, 726
Perón, Juan Domingo. See Argentina
Perry, Jennings
Rebellion in Tennessee; S..... 147
Philippine islands
Fascism under Roxas, R. F. Millon; S 320, 432
Merrill, G., American soldier, fought with the Philippine guerillas, EP..... 599
Phonograph records. See Haggin, B. H.—Music, recorded Pike, Sumner T., named to the American atomic energy commission; EP..... 513
Piza-Mendes, R.
Comments on L. Gordon's proposal for the purchase of Palestine; C.....363; see also C..... 279
Place of death, the. R. Jarrell; P..... 650
Playboy of the western world. J. W. Krutch; D 536 Poems*
Between the porch and the altar. R. Lowell 438
David to Bathsheba in the public garden. R. Lowell 649
Death of the sheriff, the. R. Lowell..... 130
Doctor will return, the. W. Kees..... 449
Holy innocents, the. R. Lowell..... 731
In the waxworks. K. Shapiro..... 74
New year's day. R. Lowell 216
Parody, a. E. M. Forster..... 529
Place of death, the. R. Jarrell..... 650
Routes to headquarters. W. Kees..... 449
Seaman's luck. R. Fitzgerald..... 761
Slow movement. L. MacNeice..... 324
To Juan at the winter solstice. R. Graves.. 18
Unison, a. W. C. Williams..... 649

PAGE

Poland
Hlond, Cardinal, justifies the Kielce pogrom; EP 59
Porter, Paul A. See Price administration, office of Portugal
Salazar: Franco's junior partner. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 91
Potter, Edwin S.
Comments on "Science and man's fate" by D. E. Lilienthal; C....250; see also.... 39
Power, public
California's Central valley project. C. McWilliams; S 270
MVA: stalled but not stopped. E. Kirschten; S 183
Present laughter. J. W. Krutch; D..... 565
Press. See names of newspapers
Press wireless
Strike disrupts major services between the United States and foreign countries; EP 198
Price administration, office of Decontrol and after. K. Hutchison; S..473; see also EP..... 541
End of, places business on trial. K. Hutchison; S 45
New OPA extension bill, the; EP.....29; see also EP.....57; E.....87; EP .....113; 173; E..... 424
Porter, P. A., overruled by Secretary of agriculture Anderson on meat ceilings; E 256
Truman signs revised OPA bill; EP..... 113
Truman vetoes emasculated OPA bill. T. Coffin; S.....5; see also EP..... 1
Work on the decontrol board. T. Coffin; S .....202, 229 ; see also E..... 227
See also Business—Prices
Prices. See Business
Primary elections. See Congress; names of states
Profits. See Business: Mead committee
Public finance. See Finance, public
Progressives, conference of; E..... 395
Purdy, Richard
Comments on "How to elect a progressive congress" by H. A. Wallace; C....335; see also 231
Putney, Bryant
Obituary for veterans' housing; S....722; see also EP..... 717

R

Radio
British-American exchange programs. L. Frankel; S 760
Convention of the National association of broadcasters. L. Frankel; S....437, 502, 528
Covering the U.N. L. Frankel; S....410, 586
F.C.C. and the public. L. Frankel; S.... 380
F.C.C.'s blue book. C. A. Siepmann; S.... 644
Forum broadcasts. L. Frankel; S..... 730
Hooper popularity ratings. L. Frankel; S.. 474
Paley, W. S., calls for reforms. L. Frankel; S 502, 528
Questions from Nation readers. L. Frankel; S 556, 697
Radio-phonographs. B. H. Haggin; S..334, 418, 453
Station WBAL applies for renewal of license. C. A. Siepmann; S..... 644
Television. L. Frankel; S..... 618
Voice of America—who listens? J. Q. Riznik; S 295
Raider, the. J. Agee; MP..... 417
Railroads
I.C.C. grants an increase in freight rates; EP.....679; see also 409; 729
Rainey, Homer P.; seeks Democratic nomination for governorship of Texas. H. Young; S.....68; see also EP..... 143
Rankin, John E. See Committee on un-American activities
Rao, Shiva
India in travail; S.....612; see also EP..... 599
India: unity or civil war? S.....213; see also EP..... 199
Nehru takes control; S..... 297
Republic of India, the; S..... 757
What the British cabinet mission to India accomplished; S....42; see also EP.... 3
Raw materials; measure for stockpiling of strategic commodities passed by Congress; EP 114
Record, Philadelphia
Newspaper guild on strike; EP..... 743
Recorded music. See B. H. Haggin—Music, recorded Reed, William K., Jr.
Free press in a free world; S..... 684
Refugees
For an international refugee organization; EP.....197; see also..... 576
United States should open its doors to European Jews. F. Kirchwey; S..... 88
Reid, Ira De A.
Georgia's negro vote; S..... 12
Rendueles, Robert
Christmas in Seville; C..... 739

PAGE

Rents. See Housing
Republican party
Conflict over congressional committee appointments; EP 716, 717
Presidential candidates; EP 743
Taft, R. A., outlines 1948 strategy; EP.....309; see also EP..... 743
Too many generals, too little program. T. Coffin; S.....574, 605
Rhapsody rabbit. J. Agee; MP..... 305
Riggs, Thomas, Jr.
Seeks material on T. Stickney; C.. 222
Riznik, J. Q.
Voice of America—who listens? S..... 295
Robinson, Jethro
Comments on "Can man survive?" by G. B. Chisholm; C.....306; see also 63, 93; C.....166; C..... 279
Rockefeller, John D., offers New York site to the United nations; EP.....716; see also 755
Rogge, O. John
Dismissed from the Department of justice for making public a report on the nazi fifth column in the United States; EP....486; see also EP....87; EP.... 634
Rosenfeld, Paul, death. M. Moore; S..... 192
Roth, Andrew
Behind Egypt's crisis; S..... 427
British Labor's colonial policy; S.....10; see also C 166
Can France's empire survive? S..... 260
Holland's last chance; S..... 153
Mufti's new army, the; S..... 551
Rousseau, Henri, exhibition. C. Greenberg; A 109
Routes to headquarters. W. Kees; P..... 449
Roxas, Manuel. See Philippine Islands
Ruhr, the. See Germany
Rumania
Problem of the peace treaty, the. R. Vambery; S.....155; see also E..... 199
Rush, John H.
Federation of American scientists appeals for funds to carry on fight for civilian atom control; C..... 631
Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics

S

Sachs, E. S.
U. N. and the people of Africa; S..... 554
Salaries. See Labor—Wages
Salazar, Antonio de Oliveira. See Portugal
Sammons, Wheeler, Jr.
Comments on an item in "In the wind"; C.....596; see also 434
Sartre, Jean-Paul: his existentialist philosophy. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 346
Science
Atomic energy. See Atomic energy
National science foundation bill, the; EP.. 142
Scribner's Commentator
Department of justice refuses to reopen the grand-jury investigation of publishers D. M. Stewart and George T. Eggleston; EP 486, 634
Rogge report reveals new evidence that the magazine was subsidized by the German government; EP 486, 634
Seaman's luck. R. Fitzgerald; P..... 761
Searching wind. J. Agee; MP..... 25
Semenov, Gregori. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Shane, G.
America in China; Ct..... 379
Shapiro, Karl
In the wax works; P..... 74
Shapley, Harlow. See Committee on un-American activities
Shaw, George Bernard
At ninety. K. Martin; S..... 97
Illustrated guide to his life, an. O. Berger; Ct 98
Shipping
American committee for protection of foreign born urges passage of bills to aid alien seamen. A. Green; C..... 26
Maritime workers' strike, the; EP....281; see also 313
Shipstead, Henrik L.; defeated in the Minnesota primaries; EP..... 58
Siepmann, Charles A.
Radio's operation crossroads; S..... 644
Slocombe, George
De Gaulle marches backward; S..... 396
Slow movement. L. MacNeice; P..... 324
Small-town America. A. Stevens; S....44, 127, 242; see also C.....278; 351
Smedley, Agnes
We're building a fascist China; S....236; see also EP 226
Smit, Leo. B. H. Haggin; M..... 630
Smith, Lillian
It's growing time in Georgia; S.....34; see also C..... 222
Snelling, Paula
It's election time in Georgia; S..... 35

PAGE

Social security
Committee for the nation's health refutes the arguments of the National physicians' committee against the Murray-Wagner-Dingell bill; E....367; see also C..... 567
Socialist party
Barred from the ballot in New York state; EP 514
Declines in Europe. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 726
South, the Southern boom, cotton bust. A. G. Mezerik; S 523
South Africa
Anti-Indian legislation; E..... 171
Seeks to annex Southwest Africa; EP..542; see also 554; 641
South America. See names of countries
Soviet Russia. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Spain
American plane attacked in Spanish Morocco in 1943; EP..... 283
Before the United nations. F. Kirchwey; S....487; 515; see also E....572; 581; EP.....598; E.....679; 682; 695; EP.....716; 746
Britain intrigues for a Vichy regime. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....6; see also EP.....1; E.....312; 746
British trade unionists call for severance of relations with Franco. F. Kirchwey; S.....487; see also..... 746
Christmas in Seville. R. Rendueles; C.... 739
Five more Republicans condemned to death in new wave of terror; EP..... 394
Franco is optimistic despite critical economic situation. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..408; see also C 539
Franco reported negotiating a loan through private American banks; E..... 312
Salazar: Franco's junior partner. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 91
Soviet Union opposes admission of Spain to the narcotics commission of the UN economic and social council; E..... 312
Sperling, Otto E.
Comments on "What to do with neurotics" by M. Gumpert; C....675; see also.... 553
Spiel, Hilde
Hungarian holocaust; S.....211; see also C 306
Stalin, Joseph. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Stassen, Harold E., announces himself a candidate for the presidency in 1948; EP.. 743
State department, United States. See United States—State department Steelman, John R. See War mobilization and reconversion, office of Stein, Gertrude, death; EP..... 142
Stern, J. David. See Labor—Strikes
Sternberg, Fritz
Future of the Ruhr and Rhineland, the; S.....8; see also C..... 194
Stevens, Alden
Small-town America:
Bricks, North Carolina; S..... 44
Dinuba, California; S..... 351
Los Alamos, New Mexico; S.....127; see also C..... 278
Wharton, Texas; S..... 242
Stewart, Douglas M. See Scribner's Commentator
Stickney, Trumbull; material on his life sought. T. Riggs, Jr.; C..... 222
Stieglitz, Alfred; material and letters sought. D. Norman; C..... 363
Stilwell, Joseph W., death; EP..... 459
Stockpiling. See Raw materials
Stocks. See Business
Straus, Nathan
Praises The Nation's radio page; C..... 484
Strauss, Harold
Big business in Japan; S..... 470
MacArthur in the paddy fields; S..... 521
Right face in Japan; S..... 606
Strauss, Lewis L., named to the American atomic energy commission; EP..... 513
Strauss, Patricia
Comments on "British labor at the crossroads" by A. Vallance; C.....566; see also 405
Strikes. See Labor
Strunsky, Sheba
IRRC luncheon; C..... 566
Sues, Ilona Ralf
UNRRA scandal in China, the; S....70; see also C..... 138
Synarchists. See France

T

TVA. See Tennessee valley authority
Taft, Robert A. See Republican party
Talmadge, Eugene. See Georgia
Tamiment social and economic institute; announces an essay contest. L. Waldman; C 631

PAGE

Tariffs
United States to negotiate for reduction of trade barriers. K. Hutchison; S..... 617
Taxation. See Finance, public
Taylor, Glen H., Idaho's cowboy senator. R. L. Neuberger; S..... 209 Television. See Radio
Tennessee
Columbia court acquits all but two of twenty-five Negroes held on charges arising out of a riot; EP..... 393
Primary elections, the; EP..... 143
War veterans oust the Crump machine in pitched battle. J. Perry; S.....147; see also EP..... 143
Tennessee valley authority
Clapp, Gordon, named director; EP..... 513
Texas
Primary elections, the. H. Young; S...68; see also EP..... 143
Textiles
Slump in the cotton market. K. Hutchison; S.....129; see also EP....459; 473; EP 514; 523
Theater. See Krutch, J. W., for reviews
Tilove, Robert
Comments on The Nation's editorial on atomic-energy control; C.....362; see also E..... 253
Till the clouds roll by. J. Agee; MP..... 766
To each his own. J. Agee; MP..... 25
To Juan at the winter solstice. R. Graves; P 18
Toscanini, Arturo. B. H. Haggin; M....630, 766; see also C..... 138
Trade. See Business
Trade agreements
International representatives convene in London to draft a charter for an international trade organization. K. Hutchison; S 436
Treat, Ida
Paris looks at everyman's house; S..... 178
Trieste
Problem for the peace conference; E....31; see also 155; 172; EP....225; 235; 375; 469; EP 571
Truman, Harry S.
Administration:
Calls for immediate substantial immigration into Palestine; EP.....393; see also 548
Disclaims indorsement of Wallace's views on foreign policy; E.....311; see also C..... 390
Dismisses H. A. Wallace from the cabinet. F. Kirchwey; S.....337; see also 342; 548
Endorses B. K. Wheeler for renomination; EP .....58; see also EP..... 86
Fulbright, J. W., suggests that he resign. T. Coffin; S..... 546
His record evaluated. H. J. Laski; S.... 548
Opposes the lifting of meat ceilings; EP.....366; see also E..... 424
Orders meat decontrol; E..... 459
Personnel problems. H. Zon; S..... 404
Proposes fiscal measures to balance the budget; EP....114; see also EP.... 171
Selects the members of the Council of economic advisers for the full-employment act. J. J. Corson; S.....151; see also E..... 744
Signs revised OPA bill; EP..... 113
Speech to the United nations general assembly. F. Kirchwey; S..... 487
States American policy on China; EP... 742
Vetoes emasculated OPA bill. T. Coffin; S.....5; see also EP..... 1
Trusteeships. See United nations
Trusts. See Monopolies
Tudor-Hart, Julian
Answers The Nation's criticisms of British foreign policy; C..... 307
Turkey
Russia proposes revision of the Montreux convention; EP 198
Two years before the mast. J. Agee; MP.. 249

U

U. N. See United nations
UNESCO. See United nations educational, scientific, and cultural organization
UNRRA. See United nations relief and rehabilitation administration
USSR. See Union of soviet socialist republics
Unemployment. See Labor—Employment
Union of soviet socialist republics
And Greece:
Supports Bulgarian territorial claims. B. Vlavianos; S 344
And Iran:
Collapse of the Azerbaijan autonomous republic; E.....745; see also..... 751
And Turkey:
Russia proposes revision of the Montreux convention; EP 198

PAGE

And the United States:
Goodbye, Ilya Gregorevich; E..... 4
Wallace, H. A., outlines a program for friendly relations; E.....311; see also 337; 342
Bans domestic showings of "Ivan the terrible" by S. Eisenstein; E..... 60
Can the west do business with Russia? V. M. Dean; S..... 315
Churchill's figures on the size of the Russian army in eastern Europe; EP....485; see also 577
Differences between European and American opinion on Russia. R. Niebuhr; S... 288
Disarmament proposal, the. F. Kirchwey. S.....515; see also.....517; 600; E 635; 638; 680; 686; 741
Food crisis. K. Hutchison; S.....381; see also E..... 368
Foreign policy. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 204; see also 228
Freedom of the press; EP..... 169
Needs UNRRA help. A. Werth; S..... 686
New five-year plan, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S 263
New trends in literature. A. Werth; S 686, 751
Plans the expansion of cooperatives. A. Werth; S 577, 751
Pravda attacks articles by B. Atkinson; EP.....59; see also E..... 60
Report from Moscow. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S.....175; see also 172; C..... 391
Soviets clean house, the. W. Duranty; S. 499
Stalin's letter on war and peace; E...368; see also EP..... 393
Trial of G. Semenov and other counter-revolutionaries, the; EP..... 256
Winter theater and musical season. A. Werth; S 751
Writers' union expels two leading authors; EP 310
Unions, labor. See Labor
Unison, a. W. C. Williams; P..... 649
United light and railways company; fights the Panhandle eastern pipelines company for the natural gas market. T. Coffin; S.. 286
United nations
Arab league traffics in votes, the. J. Alvarez del Vayo; S..... 646
Assembly to hear dispute over South Africa's anti-Indian legislation; E..171; see also 487
Atomic-energy commission, the. D. E. Lilienthal; S ....39; see also E....116; 228; E....253; EP....281; C....362; EP.....365; 423; EP.....485; E.....635; 638; 680; EP..... 741
Balance sheet, the. V. M. Dean; S..... 720
Free-press issue, the. W. K. Reed, Jr.; S. 684
General assembly's task, the. F. Kirchwey; S.....460; see also Ct..... 468
Issue is sovereignty, the. V. M. Dean; S.. 682
New members: admissions and rejections. F. Kirchwey; S 257
New York chosen as site of permanent home; EP.....716; see also..... 755
Problem of the refugees. V. M. Dean; S 576, 720
Radio coverage of its meetings. L. Frankel; S 410, 586
Roots of discord, the. M. Hoden; S..... 518
Russian proposal for disarmament; American counter proposal. F. Kirchwey; S...515; see also .....517; 600; E.....635; 638; 680; 686; 720; 751
Security council names a commission to investigate the Greek border dispute; EP..741; see also EP..254; EP..309; 344
Shall South Africa annex Southwest Africa? E. S. Sachs; S.....554; see also EP.....542; 641; 720
Soviet Union opposes Spain's admission to the narcotics commission of the economic and social council; E..... 312
Spanish question, the. F. Kirchwey; S.487, 515; see also E....572; 581; EP....598; E.....679; 682; 695; EP.....716; 746
Trusteeships, the. F. Kirchwey; S....515; see also 517; EP....542; 547; 554; 641; 720
UNESCO gets to work.. A. G. Mezerik; S. 614
United States senate votes adhesion to the world court; EP.....141; see also..... 173
Veto, the. F. Kirchwey; S.....487; see also 517; 518; 720
United nations educational, scientific, and cultural organization
Drafts plan for freedom of press and information. W. K. Reed, Jr.; S..... 684
Opens its work at Paris. A. G. Mezerik; S. 614
United nations relief and rehabilitation administration
Scandal in China. I. R. Sues; S..... 70
To be liquidated on schedule and its duties taken over by other United nations organizations; E .....144; see also EP.....197; EP.....543; 576; EP .....677; 686; EP.....715; 720

PAGE

United States
And Argentina:
Messersmith, G. S., recalled for discussion of policy; EP 742
And China:
American intervention in Chinese affairs; E.....115; see also EP.....226; 236; E .....284; 292; Ct. .....379; C .....390; EP .....366; EP .....422; EP.....571; E..... 680
Nationalist government to receive surplus United States army property; E..284; see also 292
Truman states American policy; EP.... 742
And Czechoslovakia:
American - Czechoslovakian commercial agreement signed; EP..... 598
State department cancels loan previously offered; EP 485
And Germany:
Byrnes, J. F., states American policy. F. Kirchwey; S..... 284
And Great Britain:
British loan, the; E.....3; see also EP..... 57
Gardner, O. M., named ambassador to the Court of St. James; EP..... 678
And Palestine:
American obligations. F. Kirchwey; S.88; see also E.....145; EP.....169; see also 238; 548
Crum, B. C., charges that State department impedes action to fulfill American promises; EP..... 225
Truman calls on British to permit immediate substantial immigration; EP.... 393
And Spain:
Franco reported negotiating a loan through private American banks; E.....312; see also 408
State department's policy toward Franco, the; E.....572; see also.....581; EP .....598; E.....679; 695; EP 716; 746
And the Soviet Union:
Byrnes's speech at the American club in Paris; EP 393
Goodbye, Ilya Gregorevich; E..... 4
Proposed round-the-world flight of the B-29's. T. Coffin; S..... 425
Stalin's letter on war and peace; E..368; see also EP 393
Wallace, H. A., outlines a program for friendly relations; E.....311; see also 337; 342; 405
And Yugoslavia:
Attack on an American transport plane precipitates a diplomatic crisis. F. Kirchwey; S....228; see also EP.... 283
Army:
And policy toward Russia. T. Coffin; S. 425
Congress passes a bill for stockpiling of strategic raw materials as part of preparedness program; EP..... 114
Lichfield trials, the; EP..... 255
Military expenditures to be cut under Truman's economy order; EP....171; see also 585
New military training plan; EP....395; see also C..... 483
Proposed round-the-world flight of the B-29's. T. Coffin; S..... 425
Release of conscientious objectors urged; EP.....310; see also C.....539; 694
Congress. See Congress
State department:
Accused by B. C. Crum of impeding action to fulfill American promises on Palestine; EP 225
Byrnes, J. F., states American policy on Germany. F. Kirchwey; S..... 285

PAGE

Byrnes vs. Wallace on foreign policy. F. Kirchwey; S.....337; see also E.....311; see also 342; C.....390; 548
Byrnes's speech at the American club in Paris; EP 393
Dunn, J. C., appointed ambassador to Italy; EP 115
Exhibits collection of paintings gathered for showing in Latin America. C. Greenberg; A 593
Its international broadcasting program. J. Q. Riznik; S..... 295
Urey, Harold C., urges effective international control of atomic energy; E..... 253

Uruguay
Berreta, T., elected president; EP..... 633

Utilities
Struggle over natural gas, the. T. Coffin; S 286

V

Vallance, Aylmer
British labor at the crossroads; S....405; see also C..... 566
British labor's first year; S..... 122
Four-part dissonance in Paris; S..... 235
Postscript on the Paris conference; S.... 469
Vambery, Rustem
Comments on "Hungarian holocaust" by H. Spiel; C.....306; see also..... 211
Nuremberg trials, the; S.....400; see also 396; C..... 631
Of peace and the Balkans; S..... 155
Vandenberg, Arthur H.; seeks Republican nomination for the presidency; EP..... 743
Varga, Stephen
Action needed on China; C..... 138
Veterans, war
Paralyzed veterans' association formed. B. Moss; C 82
Revolt against the Crump machine in Tennessee. J. Perry; S..... 147
Villarroel, Gualberto. See Bolivia
Virginia
Primary elections, the; EP..... 169
Vlavianos, Basil
Greece and its allies; S..... 344

W

W.J.J.
Segregation in the south; C..... 419
Shift in the Negro vote, the; C..... 631
Wages. See Labor—Wages
Wagner-Ellender-Taft bill. See Housing
Waldman, Louis
Tamiment social and economic institute announces an essay contest; C..... 631
Wallace, Henry A.
Becomes editor of the New Republic; E.. 425
Dismissed from the Truman cabinet. F. Kirchwey; S.....337; see also.....342; 548
Hillman, Sidney, death; S..... 61
His letter to Truman on foreign policy. F. Kirchwey; S.....337; see also 342; 405
How to elect a progressive congress; S.231; see also C..... 335
Speech on foreign policy; E.....311; see also C.....390; 460
Wanted for murder. J. Agee; MP..... 766
War crimes
Nuremberg trial, the. R. Vambery; S..400; see also 396; C..... 631

PAGE

War mobilization and reconversion, office of
Asked by Truman to work out a new wage formula; E.....339; see also EP..... 394
Report on the national economy by J. Steelman; EP 394
Warburg, James
Comments on "Intermezzo in Berlin" by J. Alvarez del Vayo; C.....454; see also 232; 435
Warren, Lindsay C., urges that the general accounting office be given authority to recheck war contracts settlements; EP... 143
Waymack, W. W., named to the American atomic energy commission; EP..... 513
Wechsler, James A.
Lewis's unconditional surrender; S....683; see also EP..... 677
Patriotism and profits; S.....33; see also EP.....85; 120; EP..... 143
Showdown on Lewis; S..... 602
Well-digger's daughter, the. J. Agee; MP.... 482
Wells, H. G., death; E..... 201
Werth, Alexander
Mobilizing Russia's cooperatives; S..... 577
What Russia wants; S..... 686
Winter season in Moscow; S..... 751
Wesley, Charles Harris, opposed as candidate for president of Fisk university. W. E. B. Du Bois; S 269
West Virginia
Primary elections, the; EP..... 169
Wharton, Texas. A. Stevens; S..... 242
What every woman knows. J. W. Krutch; D. 593
Wheeler, Burton K.; receives Truman's endorsement for renomination; EP....58; see also EP 86
Whitney annual, the. C. Greenberg; A..... 767
Williams, William Carlos
Unison, a; P 649
Wilson, Edmund
New York city bans his book, "Memoirs of Hecate county"; EP..... 634
Winternitz, Otto G.
Warns against discontinuing the occupation of Germany; C..... 539
Wisconsin
La Follette, R. M., defeated in the primaries; E 200
Wood, L. Hollingsworth
International rescue and relief committee appeals for aid for Austria; C..... 26
Woodard, Isaac; Negro veteran blinded by southern policeman. G. McMillan; S ... 579
Workers' defense league
Seeks to help prisoners unjustly convicted; C 676
World bank and fund. See International bank for reconstruction and development World court. See United nations
Wyatt, Wilson. See Housing

Y

Years past. J. W. Krutch; D..... 738
Young, Harold
New deal for Texas, a? S..... 68
Yugoslavia
Attack on an American transport plane precipitates an American-Yugoslav crisis. F. Kirchwey; S....228; see also EP.... 283
Trieste issue, the; E.....31; see also 155; 172; EP.....225; 235; 375; 469; EP..... 571

Z

Zon, Henry
Personnel problem in Washington; S..... 404

BOOK REVIEWS

Books are indexed under author and title, and in some cases under subject.

The following explanatory letters are used in the index:

B Book review
AN Brief annotation
R Reviewer

PAGE

A

Abaya, Hernando
Betrayal in the Philippines; B..... 732
Abbie. D. Chandos; B..... 23
Absolute weapon, the. F. S. Dunn and others. Edited by B. Brodie; B.....104; see also C..... 194
Act of faith. I Shaw; B..... 358
Adamic, Louis
Dinner at the White House; B..... 386
Aleichem, Sholom
Old country, the. Translated by J. and F. Butwin; B..... 158
Alexander Hamilton. N. Schachner; B..... 22
Alexander, Raymond Pace; R..... 18
All the king's men. R. P. Warren; B..... 220
American, the: A middle western legend. H. Fast; B..... 134
American foreign policy in the making, 1932-1940; A study in responsibilities. C. A. Beard; B..... 244
American scene, the. H. James. Edited with an introduction by W. H. Auden; B... 650
Animal farm. G. Orwell; B..... 273
Antheil, George
Bad boy of music; B..... 165
Aragon, poet of the resistance. Edited by H. Josephson and M. Cowley; B..... 76
Arciniegas, Germán
Caribbean, sea of the new world. Translated by H. de Onís; B..... 49
Arendt, Hannah; R.....300, 447
Arnall, Ellis Gibbs
Shore dimly seen, the; B..... 620
Arsenal of democracy. D. M. Nelson; B... 587
As he saw it. E. Roosevelt; B..... 506
Atomic energy in cosmic and human life. G. Gamov; B..... 163
Autobiography of William Allen White, the; B..... 217
Ayres, C. E.
Divine right of capital, the; B.....560; see also C..... 739

B

B. F.'s daughter. J. P. Marquand; B..... 590
Bad boy of music. G. Antheil; B..... 165
Barrett, William; R.....46, 132
Bates, Ralph; R.....22, 357, 658, 703
Baykov, Alexander
Development of the Soviet economic system, the; B..... 102
Bazelon, David T.; R.....386, 504, 620
Beard, Charles A.
American foreign policy in the making, 1932-1940: A study in responsibilities; B. 244
Beatrice Webb. M. Cole; B..... 74
Becker, George J.; R..... 414
Belloc, Hilaire
Servile state, the. With an introduction by C. Gauss; B..... 664
Bemelmans, Ludwig
Hotel Bemelmans; B..... 529
Bendiner, Robert; R..... 217
Benedict, Ruth; R..... 656
Bentley, Eric
Playwright as thinker, the; B..... 274
Berge, Wendell
Economic freedom for the west; B..... 190
Berryman, John; R..... 733
Betrayal in the Philippines. H. Abaya; B.. 732
Beyond supply and demand. A reappraisal of institutional economics. J. S. Gambs; B..... 413
Big clock, the. K. Fearing; B..... 479
Bishop, Elizabeth
North and south; B..... 354
Bitter season, the. R. M. Coates; B..... 702
Black book, the. The nazi crime against the Jewish people; B..... 162
Blake, William, biography. M. Schorer; B.... 382
Blanc-Roos, René; R..... 76
Blesh, Rudi
Shining trumpets: A history of jazz; B.... 761
Blood in the streets: The life and rule of Trujillo. A. C. Hicks; B..... 18
Blum, Léon
For all mankind; B..... 507
Bodenheim, Maxwell
Selected poems; B..... 189
Bogomolets, Alexander A.
Prolongation of life, the; B..... 106
Bolton, Isabel
Do I wake or sleep; B..... 625

PAGE

Bonsal, Stephen
Suitors and suppliants; B..... 562
Books of 1946: a selected list..... 704
Borzoi book of ballets, the. G. Roberts; B... 165
Boulding, Kenneth; R 102
Bower, Anthony; R..... 562
Brave new world. A. Huxley; B..... 445
Brewsie and Willie. G. Stein; B..... 383
Broch, Hermann
Death of Virgil, the. Translated by J. S. Untermeyer; B 300
Brown, Ralph Adams; R..... 22
Brown, W. Norman; R.....47, 354
Buckman, Gertrude; R..... 163
Bullitt, William C.
Great globe itself, the; B..... 413
Burke, Kenneth
Grammar of motives, a; B..... 106
Burke, Kenneth; R 666
Burning mountain, the. J. G. Fletcher; B.... 189

C

Caribbean, sea of the new world. G. Arciniegas. Translated by H. de Onís; B.... 49
Carr, Edward Hallett
Nationalism and after; B..... 275
Cassirer, Ernst
Myth of the state, the; B..... 666
Carthaginian peace, or the economic consequences of Mr. Keynes. E. Mantoux; B 588
Chadwick, H. Munro
Nationalities of Europe and the growth of national ideologies, the; B..... 275
Chandos, Dane
Abbie; B 23
Chase, Stuart
For this we fought; B..... 625
Chase, Stuart; R 587
Chen, Stephen, and R. Payne
Sun Yat-sen, a portrait; B..... 187
Chernowitz, Maurice
Proust and painting; B..... 246
Chinese family and society. O. Lang; B.... 563
Christopher Marlowe. P. H. Kocher; B..... 444
Churchill, Winston, secret session speeches. Compiled with introductory notes by C. Eade; B 623
Clifford, William Kingdon
Common sense of the exact sciences, the. Edited with an introduction by J. R. Newman; B 19
Coates, Robert M.
Bitter season, the; B..... 702
Cohen, Morris R.
Faith of a liberal, the; B..... 163
Cole, Margaret
Beatrice Webb; B..... 74
Coleman, McAlister; R.....162, 190, 507
Collected poems. H. Treece; B..... 160
Color and conscience. B. G. Gallagher; B.... 477
Color blind. M. Halsey; B..... 562
Common sense of the exact sciences, the. W. K. Clifford. Edited with an introduction by J. R. Newman; B..... 19
Composer and critic: Two hundred years of musical criticism. M. Graf; B..... 328
Concentration of economic power, the. D. Lynch; B 132
Concord and liberty. J. Ortega y Gasset; B.. 46
Coondemned playground, the — Essays: 1927-1944. C. Connolly; B..... 130
Connolly, Cyril
Condemned playground, the — Essays: 1927-1944; B 130
Cox, James M.
Journey through my years; B..... 763
Critical study of English poetry, a. H. J. Grierson and J. C. Smith; B..... 733 Crow, John A.
Epic of Latin America, the; B..... 530

D

Daniels, Josephus
Wilson era, the: Years of war and after, 1917-1923; B 78
Dark wood, the. C. Weston; B..... 479
Da Vinci, Leonardo, drawings. With an introduction by A. E. Popham; B..... 503
Davis, H. David; R..... 625
Davis, Robert Gorham; R..... 411
Death of Virgil, the. H. Broch. Translated by J. S. Untermeyer; B..... 300 Development of the Soviet economic system, the. A. Baykov; B 102
Devlin, Denis
Lough Derg and other poems; B..... 160
Dewey, John
Problems of men; B 447
Dinner at the White House. L. Adamic; B.. 386
Discovery of India, the. J. Nehru; B..... 354
Divine right of capital, the. C. E. Ayres; B.....560; see also C..... 739
Do I wake or sleep. I. Bolton; B..... 625
Dolivet, Louis
United nations, the: Handbook on the new world organization; B..... 543
Downer, Alan; R 274

PAGE

Drawings of Leonardo da Vinci. With an introduction by A. E. Popham; B..... 503
Dunn, Frederick S., and others
Absolute weapon, the. Edited by B. Brodie; B.....104; see also C..... 194
Dyche, Durwood H.
Comments on G. R. Walker's review of "'The divine right of capital' by C. E. Ayres; C.....739; see also R..... 560

E

Eastern Europe between the wars 1918-1941. H. Seton-Watson; B 275
Ebeling, Herman; R 78
Economic freedom for the west. W. Berge; B 190
Empson, William; R 444, 652
End over end. N. Giddings; B..... 386
Epic of Latin America, the. J. A. Crow; B.. 530

F

Faith of a liberal, the. M. R. Cohen; B.... 163
Fall of valor, the. C. Jackson; B..... 450
Fanfare for Elizabeth. E. Sitwell; B..... 303
Farrell, Charles B.; R.....328, 763
Fast, Howard
American, the: A middle western legend; B 134
Fearing, Kenneth
Big clock, the; B..... 479
Fechner, Gustav Theodor
Religion of a scientist. Edited and translated by W. Lowrie; B..... 478
Feibleman, James
Theory of human culture, the; B..... 668
Fischer, Louis
Great challenge, the; B..... 658
Fitts, Dudley; R 247
Fitzgerald, Robert; R .....475; see also C..... 675
Fletcher, John Gould
Burning mountain, the; B..... 189
Flint. R. W.; R.....161, 478
For all mankind. L. Blum; B..... 507
For this we fought. S. Chase; B..... 625
Forsey, Eugene; R.....413, 477, 622
Fowler, Gene
Solo in tom-toms, a; B..... 162
Frank, Waldo
Island in the Atlantic; B..... 386
Freedom under planning. B. Wootton; B.... 622
From Max Weber: Essays in sociology. Translated, edited, and with an introduction by H. H. Gerth and C. W. Mills; B.... 102
Fry, Roger
Vision and design; B..... 136
Full production without war. H. Loeb; B... 477

G

G. B. S. — 90. Edited by S. Winsten; B.. 356
Gallagher, Buell G.
Color and conscience; B..... 477
Gambs, John S.
Beyond supply and demand. A reappraisal of institutional economics; B..... 413
Gamov, George
Atomic energy in cosmic and human life; B 163
Germany in defeat. P. Knauth; B..... 78
Giddings, Nelson
End over end; B..... 386
Gifford, William Alva
Story of the faith, the; B..... 587
Glazer, Nathan; R..... 561
Gold, W. J.; R..... 413
Gorky, Maxim
Reminiscences of Tolstoy, Chekhov, Andreyev; B 560
Graf, Max
Composer and critic: Two hundred years of musical criticism; B..... 328
Grammar of motives, a. K. Burke; B..... 106
Graves, Robert
King Jesus; B.....475; see also C..... 675
Great challenge, the. L. Fischer; B..... 658
Great globe itself, the. W. C. Bullitt; B.... 413
Great walls of China, the: stories and reflections. F. Kafka. Translated by W. and E. Muir; B..... 731
Greenberg, Clement; R.....246, 503
Greenslet, Ferris
Lowells and their seven worlds, the; B.. 624
Gregory, Charles O.
Labor and the law; B..... 762
Gregory, Horace, and M. Zaturenska
History of American poetry, a, 1900-1940; B 660
Grierson, Herbert J., and J. C. Smith
Critical study of English poetry, a; B.... 733
Growth of constitutional power in the United States, the. C. B. Swisher; B..... 159
Guérard, Albert
Comments on G. Kirk's review of "The absolute weapon" by F. S. Dunn and others; C.....194; see also R..... 104
Guérard, Albert; R.....78, 299, 384, 508, 560, 587, 623
Gustav Mahler: Memories and letters. A. Mahler. Translated by B. Creighton; B.. 326

PAGE

H

Haggin, B. H.; R.....136, 165, 324; see also 453
Hall, Walter Phelps
Iron out of calvary; B..... 703
Halsey, Margaret
Color blind; B 562
Hamilton, Alexander, biography. N. Schachner; B 22
Handel, H. Weinstock; B..... 763
Harrow, Benjamin; R.....106, 163, 703
Henry, George; R..... 332
Hersey, John
Hiroshima; B 656
Hicks, Albert C.
Blood in the streets: The life and rule of Trujillo; B 18
Hiroshima. J. Hersey; B..... 656
History of American poetry, a, 1900-1940. H. Gregory and M. Zaturenska; B.... 660
Hitler's professors. M. Weinreich; B..... 414
Hobson, Wilder; R..... 761
Hoffman, Frederick J., and others
Little magazine, the: A history and bibliography; B 245
Holden, Raymond
Selected poems; B 589
Honorable titan, an: biographical study of Adolph Simon Ochs. G. W. Johnson; B. 507
Horned pigeon. G. Millar; B..... 163
Hotel Bemelmans. L. Bemelmans; B..... 529
Howe, Helen
We happy few; B..... 50
Howe, Irving; R..... 764
Humphries, Rolfe; R.....133, 189, 303, 356, 415, 624
Hutchison, Keith; R 74, 624
Hutton, Graham
Midwest at noon; B..... 48
Huxley, Aldous
Brave new world; B..... 445

I

Idea of the Christ in the gospels or God in man, the: A critical essay. G. Santayana; B 412
India today. An introduction to Indian politics. R. Parkin; B 47
Iron out of calvary. W. P. Hall; B..... 703
Island in the Atlantic. W. Frank; B..... 386

J

Jackson, Charles
Fall of valor, the; B..... 450
Jacoby, Annalee, and T. H. White
Thunder out of China; B..... 619
James, Henry
American scene, the. Edited with an introduction by W. H. Auden; B..... 650
Janowsky, Oscar I.
Nationalities and national minorities; B... 275
Jeffers, Robinson
Medea, freely adapted from the Medea of Euripides; B 246
Johnson, Gerald W.
Honorable titan, an: biographical study of Adolph Simon Ochs; B..... 507
Johnson, Harry M.; R..... 102
Journey through my years. J. M. Cox; B.. 763

K

Kafka, Franz
Great walls of China, the: Stories and reflections. Translated by W. and E. Muir; B 731
Metamorphosis; B 652
Kardiner, Abram; R 668
Kees, Weldon; R 245
Kierkegaard, Soren
Works of love; B..... 132
King Jesus. R. Graves; B.....475; see also C..... 675
Kirk, Grayson; R .....104; see also C..... 194
Knauth, Percy
Germany in defeat; B..... 78
Kocher, Paul H.
Christopher Marlowe; B..... 444
Koestler, Arthur
Thieves in the night; B..... 530
Kreymborg, Alfred
Man and shadow; B..... 189
Kuczynski, Juergen
Comments on M. Starr's review of his book, "Labor conditions in Great Britain, 1750 to the present"; C.....391; see also C 676

L

Labor and the law. C. O. Gregory; B..... 762
LaFarge, Christopher
Sudden guest, the; B..... 386
Lang, Olga
Chinese family and society; B..... 563
Legal almanac series; B..... 106
Letters of composers: An anthology, 1603-1945. Edited by G. Norman and M. L. Shrifte; B 330
Liberators, the. W. Towner; B..... 702
Life of Richard Wagner, the. Volume four: 1866-1883. E. Newman; B.....324; see also 453
Lincoln, Victoria
Wind at my back, the; B..... 590
Little magazine, the: A history and bibliography. F. J. Hoffman and others; B.. 245
Little treasury of modern poetry, a. Edited by O. Williams; B..... 703
Local measures. J. Miles; B..... 247
Loeb, Harold
Full production without war; B..... 477
Logan, Spencer
Negro's faith in America, a: B..... 190
Lough Derg and other poems. D. Devlin; B.. 160
Lowells and their seven worlds, the. F. Greenslet; B 624
Lynch, David
Concentration of economic power, the; B.. 132

M

Macdonald, Dwight; R 664
Mahatma and the world, the. K. Shridharani; B 47
Mahler, Alma
Gustav Mahler: Memories and letters. Translated by B. Creighton; B..... 326
Man: an autobiography. G. R. Stewart; B.. 561
Man and shadow. A. Kreymborg; B..... 189
Manifold, John
Selected verse; B..... 302
Mantoux, Etienne
Carthaginian peace, or the economic consequences of Mr. Keynes; B..... 588
Marlowe, Christopher, biography. P. H. Kocher; B 444
Marquand, John P.
B. F.'s daughter; B..... 590
Mass psychology of fascism, the. W. Reich; B 764
McLaughlin, Richard; R..... 589
Medea, freely adapted from the Medea of Euripides. R. Jeffers; B..... 246
Meeting of east and west, the: An inquiry concerning world understanding. F. S. C. Northrop; B 161
Metamorphosis. F. Kafka; B..... 652
Mezerik, A. G.
Revolt of the south and west, the; B..... 186
Micaud, Charles A.; R..... 507
Midwest at noon. G. Hutton; B..... 48
Miles, Josephine
Local measures; B 247
Millar, George
Horned pigeon; B 163
Waiting in the night; B..... 163
Millon, R. F.; R..... 732
Mirror, mirror. E. Rice; B..... 590
Mirsky, Jeannette
Westward crossings, the — Balboa, Mackenzie, Lewis and Clark; B..... 624
Mistress Masham's repose. T. H. White; B.. 479
Mitford, Nancy
Pursuit of love, the; B..... 23
Mizener, Arthur; R.....48, 160, 246, 302, 703
Moore, Marianne; R 354
Morris, Charles; R 106
Munitz, Milton K.; R..... 163
Myth of the state, the. E. Cassirer; B..... 666

N

Nagel, Ernest; R 19
Nationalism and after. E. H. Carr; B..... 275
Nationalities and national minorities. O. I. Janowsky; B 275
Nationalities of Europe and the growth of national ideologies, the. H. M. Chadwick; B 275
Nature of poetry, the. D. A. Stauffer; B.... 48
Negro's faith in America, a. S. Logan; B... 190
Nehru, Jawaharlal
Discovery of India, the; B..... 354
Nelson, Donald M.
Arsenal of democracy; B..... 587
Nerber, John
Spectre image, the; B 302
New city patterns. S. E. Sanders and A. J. Rabuck; B 508
New directions 9. Edited by J. Laughlin; B. 188
Newman, Ernest
Life of Richard Wagner, the. Volume four: 1866-1883; B .....324; see also 453
North and south. E. Bishop; B..... 354
Northrop, F. S. C.
Meeting of east and west, the: An inquiry concerning world understanding; B..... 161
Not by bread alone. V. Stefansson; B..... 703
Not so wild a dream. E. Sevareid; B..... 504
Not with the first. R. D. Tuck; B..... 563
Nothing is a wonderful thing. H. Wolfert; B 589

O

Ochs, Adolph Simon, biography. G. W. Johnson; B 507
Old country, the. S. Aleichem. Translated by J. and F. Butwin; B..... 158
Ortega y Gasset, José
Concord and liberty; B..... 46
Orwell, George
Animal farm; B 273

P

Parkin, Raleigh
India today. An introduction to Indian politics; B 47
Partisan reader, the, 1934-1944. Edited by W. Phillips and P. Rahv. Introduction by L. Trilling; B 411
Paterson (Book 1). W. C. Williams; B.... 216
Payne, Robert, and S. Chen
Sun Yat-sen, a portrait; B..... 187
Perilous fight, the. N. Swanson; B..... 22
Perkins, Frances
Roosevelt I knew, the; B..... 620
Perry, Jennings; R 620
Playwright as thinker, the. E. Bentley; B.. 274
Problems of men. J. Dewey; B..... 447
Prolongation of life, the. A. A. Bogomolets; B 106
Proust and painting. M. Chernowitz; B..... 246
Pursuit of love, the. N. Mitford; B..... 23

R

Rabuck, A. J., and S. E. Sanders
New city patterns; B..... 508
Ransom, John Crowe; R..... 650
Reich, Wilhelm
Mass psychology of fascism, the; B..... 764
Religion in the struggle for power. A study in the sociology of religion. J. M. Yinger; B 299
Religion of a scientist. G. T. Fechner. Edited and translated by W. Lowrie; B..... 478
Reminiscences of Tolstoy, Chekhov, Andreyev. M. Gorky; B..... 560
Restless India. L. K. Rosinger; B..... 47
Revolt of the south and west, the. A. G. Mezerik; B 186
Rice, Elinor
Mirror, mirror; B 590
Robert, Grace
Borzoi book of ballets, the; B..... 165
Roosevelt, Elliot
As he saw it; B..... 506
Roosevelt I knew, the. F. Perkins; B..... 620
Rosenberg, Harold; R..... 700
Rosenberger, Coleman; R..... 22
Rosenfeld, Isaac; R.....216, 273, 445, 762
Rosinger, Lawrence K.
Restless India; B 47

S

Sanders, S. E., and A. J. Rabuck
New city patterns; B..... 508
Santayana, George
Idea of the Christ in the gospels or God in man, the: A critical essay; B..... 412
Scarlet tree, the. Sir O. Sitwell; B..... 415
Schachner, Nathan
Alexander Hamilton; B..... 22
Schillinger system of musical composition, the. Edited by L. Dowling and A. Shaw; B 332
Schlesinger, Arthur M., Jr.; R.....48, 187, 244, 506, 559, 763
Schorer, Mark
William Blake: The politics of vision; B.. 382
Schwartz, Delmore; R..... 660
Seagle, William; R..... 159
Selected poems. M. Bodenheim; B..... 189
Selected poems. R. Holden; B..... 589
Selected verse. J. Manifold; B..... 302
Seligman, Ben B.; R..... 762
Servile state, the. H. Belloc. With an introduction by C. Gauss; B..... 664
Seton-Watson, Hugh
Eastern Europe between the wars 1918-1941; B 275
Sevareid, Eric
Not so wild a dream; B..... 504
Shaw, George Bernard, at 90. Edited by S. Winstein; B 356
Shaw, Irwin
Act of faith; B..... 358
Sheean, Vincent
This house against this house; B..... 22
Shining trumpets: A history of jazz. R. Blesh; B 761
Shishkin, Boris; R 132
Shore dimly seen, the. E. G. Arnall; B..... 620
Short novels of Tolstoy, the. Translated by A. Maude. Selected by P. Rahv; B.... 700
Shridharani, Krishnalal
Mahatma and the world, the; B..... 47
Sitwell, Edith
Fanfare for Elizabeth; B..... 303
Sitwell, Sir Osbert
Scarlet tree, the; B..... 415

PAGE

Smedley, Agnes; R 187, 619
Smith, J. C., and H. J. Grierson
Critical study of English poetry, a; B.... 733
Solo in tom-toms, a. G. Fowler; B..... 162
Soviet Asia mission. H. A. Wallace; B..... 384
Spectre image, the. J. Nerber; B..... 302
Starr, Mark
Replies to J. Kuczynski's letter on his review of "Labor conditions in Great Britain, 1750 to the present"; C....676; see also C 391
Stauffer, Donald A.
Nature of poetry, the; B..... 48
Stefansson, Vilhjalmur
Not by bread alone; B..... 703
Stein, Gertrude
Brewsie and Willie; B..... 383
Stewart, George R.
Man: an autobiography; B..... 561
Story of the faith, the. W. A. Gifford; B... 587
Study of history, a. Volumes I, II, III, IV, V, VI. A. J. Toynbee; B..... 440
Sudden guest, the. C. LaFarge; B..... 386
Suitors and suppliants. S. Bonsal; B..... 562
Sun Yat-sen, a portrait. S. Chen and R. Payne; B 187
Swanson, Neil
Perilous fight, the; B..... 22
Sweezy, Paul M.; R..... 440
Swisher, Carl Brent
Growth of constitutional power in the United States, the; B..... 159
Sypher, Wylie; R.....130, 188, 330, 382, 731

T

Theory of human culture, the. J. Feibleman; B 668
Thieves in the night. A. Koestler; B..... 530
This house against this house. V. Sheean; B 22
Thunder out of China. T. H. White and A. Jacoby; B 619
Tillich, Paul; R..... 412
Tolstoy, Count Leo
Short novels. Translated by A. Maude. Selected by P. Rahv; B..... 700
Too early to tell. J. Weidman; B..... 702
Towner, Wesley
Liberators, the; B..... 702
Toynbee, Arnold J.
Study of history, a. Volumes I, II, III, IV, V, VI; B..... 440

PAGE

Treece, Henry
Collected poems; B..... 160
Trilling, Diana; R 23, 50, 134, 220, 358, 386, 450, 479, 530, 590, 625, 702
Trujillo, Rafael, biography. A. C. Hicks; B.. 18
Tuck, Ruth D.
Not with the fist; B..... 563
Two worlds. W. B. Ziff; B..... 57

U

United nations, the: Handbook on the new world organization. L. Dolivet; B..... 543

V

Vambery, Rustem; R.....106, 275, 562
Vandercook, John; R..... 49
Victorian doctor. T. G. Wilson; B..... 133
Vision and design. R. Fry; B..... 136

W

Wagner, Richard, biography. E. Newman; B 324
Waiting in the night. G. Millar; B..... 163
Walker, G. R.; R.....560, 588; see also C 739
Wallace, Henry A.
Soviet Asia mission; B..... 384
Warren, Robert Penn
All the king's men; B..... 220
Warshow, Robert S.; R.....158, 383, 529
We happy few. H. Howe; B..... 50
Webb, Beatrice, biography. M. Cole; B..... 74
Weber, Max
Essays in sociology. Translated, edited, and with an essay by H. H. Gerth and C. W. Mills; B..... 102
Weidman, Jerome
Too early to tell; B..... 702
Weinreich, Max
Hitler's professors; B..... 414
Weinstock, Herbert
Handel; B 763
Welles, Sumner
Where are we heading? B..... 559
Werner, Alfred; R.....162, 190, 477, 563

PAGE

Weston, Christine
Dark wood, the; B..... 479
Westward crossings, the—Balboa, Mackenzie, Lewis and Clark. J. Mirsky; B..... 624
Where are we heading? S. Welles; B..... 559
White, E. B.
Wildflag, the; B..... 762
White, T. H.
Mistress Masham's repose; B..... 479
White, Theodore H., and A. Jacoby
Thunder out of China; B..... 619
White, William Allen
Autobiography; B 217
Wild flag, the. E. B. White; B..... 762
Wilde, Sir William, biography. T. G. Wilson; B 133
Wilder, Elizabeth; R 530
William Blake: The politics of vision. M. Schorer; B 382
Williams, William Carlos
Paterson (Book I); B..... 216
Wilson, T. G.
Victorian doctor; B 133
Wilson, era, the: Years of war and after, 1917-1923. J. Daniels; B..... 78
Wind at my back, the. V. Lincoln; B..... 590
Winston Churchill's secret session speeches. Compiled with introductory notes by C. Eade; B 623
Wolfert, Helen
Nothing is a wonderful thing; B..... 589
Wootton, Barbara
Freedom under planning; B..... 622
Works of love. S. Kierkegaard; B..... 132

Y

Yang Kang; R..... 563
Yinger, J. Milton
Religion in the struggle for power. A study in the sociology of religion; B..... 299

Z

Zabel, Morton Dauwen; R..... 326
Zaturenska, Marya, and H. Gregory
History of American poetry, a, 1900-1940; B 660
Ziff, William B.
Two worlds; B 357

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JULY 6, 1946 NUMBER 1

The Shape of Things

THE NATION APPLAUDS PRESIDENT TRUMAN for his courage in vetoing the Price Control Extension bill. As he rightly said in his message, Congress had presented him with a choice "between inflation with a statute and inflation without one." Now Congress must decide whether to leave prices to the mercy of the free market or to write a new bill which will afford genuine price control. Public opinion must be mobilized to insist on the second alternative, and to block any attempt to enact a modified version of the vetoed measure. No control at all is better than an invitation to speculators to hold back goods pending price increases which OPA could have delayed but not denied. That would have been the result of the Taft amendment which made it mandatory to allow manufacturers their 1941 profit margins plus all subsequent increases in costs. As the President pointed out, 1941 was the year when manufacturers enjoyed greater margins than in any year in history. This year, with volume in many lines mounting to new records, such margins would mean an unprecedented profits boom. Replying to Mr. Truman, Senator Taft (who never, never plays politics) complained that he was the victim of an unfair political attack. But he was very much on the defensive when he asserted that: "Any increase in prices of manufactured goods brought about by the Taft amendment would be of minor importance compared with the importance of actually being able to buy them." A crushing answer to this claim is provided by an article in Business Week of June 29, written before the veto, which declares: "Failure of Congress to act long ago on OPA extension has meant withholding of goods as we neared the June 30 deadline; now the compromise bill promises to cause a new round of holdbacks. The Taft amendment, for example, will encourage such practices."

*

THE SPANISH PLOT UNFOLDED BY DEL VAYO in this issue presents a sharp challenge to the State Department. It is one thing to stick grimly to past mistakes; it is a much worse thing deliberately to implicate oneself in new ones. From the beginning our policy on Spain has been a travesty of the principles we profess so loudly in international relations. If we compound our error by accepting a substitute Spanish regime contrived by dissident army men in Madrid to satisfy the squeamish tastes of the Vatican and the Foreign Office—and perhaps of General Franco, too—where shall we find an excuse to hide behind? Del Vayo suggests that American complicity is already a fact, but as long as Franco remains in office, enjoying the confusion into which the Spanish issue has thrown the Security Council, we have time to extricate ourselves. After Pétain and Badoglio, one would think the State Department must have lost its old appetite for regimes of "order." Here at last is a chance to end a shameful chapter in our dealings with fascism, to establish an independent democratic position. If this seems breaking the threads which have entangled us with Britain's policy from one end of the Mediterranean to the other, few Americans will mourn.

*

IN SPITE OF THE SOBER LANGUAGE USED BY Sir Alan G. Cunningham, in announcing the British military drive in Palestine, there is a sharp note of hysteria in the whole operation. To put the country into a virtual state of siege, conducting hundreds of raids, arrests, and searches in the chief cities and many of the communal settlements and invading the headquarters of the Jewish Agency itself, is to ask for trouble on a big scale. And to what end? Do the British authorities seriously expect to put down terrorist elements by turning their armed might against those responsible Jewish leaders who have steadily refused to continence acts of terror? So absurd is this pretense that one must look elsewhere for an explanation. What the British are apparently trying to do is to break up the Jewish defense force, the Hagana, as Mr. Atlee proposed in his speech in London after the publication of the report by the Joint Committee of Inquiry. If this is the purpose, we warn them that they will fail. The Hagana will become invisible, its arms will go underground—literally—but it will not disband. For the organization has become the resistance army of Jewish Palestine, and nothing can put it out of business except a new British policy there. The country-wide offensive against the Jews is an act of

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things 1
Letter to Congressional Liberals 3
Goodbye, Ilya Gregorevich 4

ARTICLES

Showdown on Inflation by Tris Coffin 5
A Vichy Regime for Spain by J. Alvarez del Vayo 6
The Future of the Ruhr and Rhineland by Fritz Sternberg 8
Britain's Greatest Gamble by Andrew Roth 10
Georgia's Negro Vote by Ira De A. Reid 12
The Jews That Remain by Joseph Dunner 15
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 17

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

To Juan at the Winter Solstice. A Poem by Robert Graves 18
Murder, Inc, by Raymond Pace Alexander 18
A Classic of Popular Science by Ernest Nagel 19
Briefer Comment 22
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 23
Films by James Agee 25
Records by B. H. Haggin 25

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 26

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 168 by Jack Barrett 27

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon — Washington Editor I. F. Stone — Literary Editor Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch — Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editor: Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

reckless provocation which will succeed only in building new barriers of hate and resentment, reducing still further the chance of a peaceful settlement. Such tactics will win little sympathy in America as long as the Joint Committee's report remains stalled in London.

*

THE GREATEST SHOW ON EARTH IS OVER. Or is it? After months of fanfare and trumpets, public relations efforts and public expenditures running into hundreds of millions, the fourth atom bomb in history was dropped over Bikini atoll. It will be months before the results of the test are all in, years before they are all released by the Navy. It is, therefore, out of a sense of obligation to our public that we present now our own findings based on radio reports from a yacht moored to a Long Island pier at which we were buying fresh lobsters. First, the test itself has probably done considerable damage to international good will by emphasizing that the atom bomb is part of our active war equipment and an integral part of our future military strategy. The Russians may well view with some suspicion those who talk about the immediate destruction of our bomb supply. Second, and following immediately on the first, the government-subsidized propaganda placed behind this giant Fourth of July explosion contrasts sadly with that behind the whole effort, domestic and international, to bring the development of atomic energy under control for the purpose of eliminating atomic weapons and releasing atomic energy for peacetime uses. Third, the test demonstrates the Imperial arrogance induced by possession of this weapon when the American Navy could block off some hundreds of thousands of square miles of the Pacific and warn that any uninvited foreign ship or plane entering the area would be blown out of existence. Finally, the meager results of the test allowed to filter out may lull popular fears as to the potency of man's latest plaything. Apparently the 200,000 fairly innocent Japanese who died at Hiroshima and Nagasaki will have died in vain.

*

RETURNS FROM THE PRIMARIES CONTINUE to be mildly satisfactory. While the light vote indicates that the public is not awake to the need for a drastic clean-up in Congress, the minority who have taken the trouble to go to the polls have done reasonably well. In Maryland, Senator George L. Radcliffe, who was among those marked for defeat by the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, lost to Governor Herbert R. O'Conor. Little is known of Governor O'Conor's views on national issues, but the voters could not be far wrong in assuming a change would be for the better. At the same time, W. Preston Lane, with the backing of the P. A. C., defeated the Tydings candidate, J. Millard Tawes, for Governor. Mr. Tawes made Moscow's alleged domination of his opponent the main issue in his campaign. Especially heartening were the results in North Dakota, where Gerald P. Nye, arch-isolationist, ran a poor third in the short-term election for United States Senator. The victor, Milton P. Young, Republican, is by no means a progressive, but his record has been consistently better than Nye's. The Democratic candidate, P. W. Lanier, a World War II veteran, waged his campaign on a straight foreign-policy issue and received twice the votes of Nye. Although Senator Langer, who cast one of the two ballots against American participation in the United Nations, was renominated on the Republican ticket for the full-term Senate vacancy, his margin was unexpectedly small. Since Langer is personally popular in the state and has well-established political backing, the North Dakota results can hardly be reassuring to those who have staked their political future on a post-war revival of isolationism.

*

THE BRITISH CABINET MISSION TO INDIA is returning home with its task unfinished but not entirely empty handed. After months of gruelling labor it has induced both the major Indian political organizations, the Congress Party and the Moslem League, to accept the proposals for a United States of India which it brought forward when agreement on a joint plan between these two parties proved impossible. This achievement, unfortunately, does not necessarily mean that any basic unity of purpose has been established. Negotiations between the two parties with a view to setting up an interim government, pending the construction of a constitution, broke down, and this time the alternative scheme sponsored by the Cabinet Ministers and the Viceroy proved acceptable only to the Moslems. Congress rejected it because it involved nominal parity between the two groups, for Congress claims to speak for the vast majority of Indians, while the Moslem League admittedly represents a minority. In order to carry on the government the Viceroy is now proposing to name a "caretaker Cabinet" of officials, an obviously unsatisfactory expedient in a time of political and economic crisis. However, preparations for the election of a Constituent Assembly are going forward. The polls will provide a new test of political sentiment in the country, and when they are concluded it may prove possible to make a new approach to the problem of a representative interim government. In any case India is moving toward freedom, even though progress seems painfully slow. The British Labor government has shown that it means business and is not going to be discouraged by setbacks. The only remaining obstacles to independence are those which the Indians must roll away themselves. We hope their leaders will rise to the opportunity, refusing to allow factional differences to keep them from their goal.

Letter to Congressional Liberals

GENTLEMEN: In a few days the House will be called upon to give one of the most momentous votes in its history—the vote on the British loan. Our advices are that it will be a near thing, even though the issue is a non-partisan one. Since the conservatives on both sides are split, the action of the liberals may prove decisive. That is why we address this appeal to you to weigh with the utmost care the effects of a defeat for the loan.

Last year, when the agreement with Britain was being negotiated, most liberals were in favor of helping our recent ally to get back on its economic feet, but since that time the climate of opinion has changed. Some of you have been disgusted by arguments of reactionaries who have given their support to the loan solely because they think it is a good way of hitting at Russia. We consider these bad and stupid arguments, but to vote against the loan just because some crusted tories hail it as an anti-Soviet move would be to compound their error. The denial of help to Britain may worsen our relations with that country, but it does not follow that it would improve them with Russia. On the contrary, the defeat of the loan would surely serve to strengthen the isonationalist forces in this country, the vanguard of the anti-Soviet crusade.

Again there are some among you who feel that the behavior of the British government in regard to Palestine is a reason for voting against the loan. An adverse vote on that ground would be a gesture of protest, but would it be more than a gesture? Would it bring one Jewish D. P. one foot nearer the promised land? On the contrary, we believe that the rejection of the loan will make the British government less inclined to change its Palestine policy. The unwillingness of the British to implement the report of the Anglo-American Commission—and we do not say this in extenuation—arises in part from the fact that their resources are being stretched to the limit. They fear that abrogation of the White Paper might involve them in new commitments for man-power and foreign exchange, and they are desperately short of both. The denials of financial assistance will not make them bolder.

Apart from such considerations, we should like to suggest that the use of American financial and economic power to secure political ends is a dangerous policy. In some cases we may be able to buy complaisance, though not friendship, by means of loans to which irrelevant conditions are attached. But that is hardly likely in this instance. We beg you, therefore, to put aside your just criticisms of British imperial policy, criticisms which we have made ourselves on many occasions, and consider this matter of the British loan purely on its economic merits. We must not forget that this is not an isolated proposition. It is part and parcel of the post-war international economic program which owes its inception to the farsighted idealism of Franklin D. Roosevelt. The loan, and the all-important agreement attached to it by which Britain undertakes to cooperate with the United States in plans for securing freedom of world trade, is one of a series of integrated measures which will serve to make effective the economic clauses of the Atlantic Charter.

That program cannot be carried out without British cooperation, simply because Britain plays so large a part in world trade. Those of you who have examined its post-war balance-of-trade problem will realize that, even with the aid of the loan, Britain will be hard pressed to restore its international trade to a level which will make possible the attainment of its pre-war standard of living. And without American assistance it will be compelled to fall back on remedies which will be detrimental to American interests and nullify all hopes of a multilateral extension of world commerce. As Secretary Byrnes has said, if the loan is defeated, the British will have to "buy what they need almost exclusively from countries which buy equal or larger amounts from them," or from countries "which are willing to accept payment in pounds and spend the pounds for goods in Great Britain or some other part of the sterling area." Because we have consistently sold more goods abroad than we have bought, and because of our national prejudice in favor of private trading, we should find it very hard to compete in a world where unilateral barter trading was commonly practiced.

With the current shortage of goods for domestic consumption, it is easy to underestimate the importance of foreign trade for our economy. But you at least are fully aware that in the long run we are much more likely to be plagued with overproduction than underproduction. In a few years we are likely to have an urgent need for foreign markets if we are to maintain domestic employment, particularly in our feast-and-famine heavy industries. As responsible men you cannot let the tears of rage that Mr. Bevin inspires blind you to the vital connection between the loan and America's own economic interests.

Beyond that you are compelled to consider this question in its relation to world peace. Many of the international tensions which we now find so alarming would be immensely reduced, if they did not vanish altogether, were hunger banished from the world and the nations given a better opportunity to concentrate on improving living standards. That objective cannot be achieved while the exchange of necessary goods is impeded at every turn; it will become an even more visionary ideal if we encourage a new era of economic warfare. So again we urge you: weigh this issue carefully, examine it with minds and consciences. It is not only to your present constituents that you must answer for your vote but to future generations.

Yours sincerely,

THE EDITORS OF THE NATION

Goodbye, Ilya Gregorevich

ILYA EHRENBURG has left our country for his own. His somewhat rhetorical and disingenuous letter of farewell, though it represents fairly enough the "realism" we have learned to accept as the official attitude of the U. S. S. R., hardly does justice to Ehrenburg himself —a more engaging and impressive figure than one would guess from the mixture of specific objections and general affection that constitutes his message to us.

His itinerary—suggested, no doubt, by Senator Bilbo, and lovingly itemized by Samuel Grafton, whose communiqués of Ehrenburg's Raid must have reminded readers of a little boy tagging breathlessly along behind his big brother—specialized in places like Dogpatch, Skunk Hollow, and Van Buren, Arkansas. There the surprised Ehrenburg saw bad things and, by questioning the older inhabitants, heard of worse—the Scopes trial, for instance; and he returned to New York able to refute any objection to an unfortunate feature of the Soviet Union by a quick counter-objection to some analogous evil in the United States. But though he finds the United States an adolescent country full of contradictions, he recognizes that we and the Russians are "two great and noble peoples," who are kept apart only by the "curtain of fog" which has been drawn by slanderers, rabble-rousers, fascists, and correspondents who have come to Moscow, Russia, without the clean hands and pure heart which Ehrenburg brought to his trip to Moscow, Alabama.

How pleasant it would be if one could leave one's head at the nearest checkroom, and accept the views of this talented but transparent propagandist! It is not editorials about Russia in the Chicago Tribune or New York Daily News which disquiet Americans, but the actions of the Soviet Union itself; and it will take deeds from Stalin, not words from Ehrenburg, to change their feelings. In the last year few foreign correspondents except those of the Daily Worker have been able to say anything about Russian policy that could please Russians or reassure Americans; if Horace Greeley were alive still, and could summon from the grave his regular European correspondent, Karl Marx, to write a series of articles on Russia, it is a safe bet that within a few months there would be one more slanderer and rabble-rouser whose articles Ilya Gregorevich Ehrenburg would be deploring.

Showdown on Inflation

BY TRIS COFFIN

Commentator for the Columbia Broadcasting System

THE Midwestern voice of President Truman has just finished. The furious rain storm that broke over Washington this afternoon has left the night air fresh and cool. The halls of the Capitol are silent and still until Monday. The hands of the clock are moving closer to the end of price control.

The words spoken in the halting twang of Harry Truman have a bold, familiar ring. They sound like the fighting talks of Franklin Roosevelt, throwing the responsibility for inflation back to Congress— "Now every member has a clear-cut opportunity to show whether he wants price control or not." The battle had been taken to the people . . . "Your determination must be made known."

It was a bold stroke, planned, written and executed by the President, Chester Bowles and Paul Porter. Bowles and Porter mapped this strategy two weeks ago—whether it wins the battle for price control rests now with the people. Congress will have at least two days, probably longer, to hear from the country and decide.

This final, uproarious chapter on price control began last Wednesday. Alben Barkley, the majority leader, rose in the Senate to make a discouraging report. "We present to the Senate," he said, "a bill which does not altogether satisfy anyone, but which, in the democratic processes of give and take, is the result of considering every viewpoint expressed to Congress. I say earnestly that notwithstanding its imperfections, notwithstanding that no one would have written the bill just as it is, we have produced the best possible bill under the circumstances."

Senator Downey, one of the few champions of strong price controls, said gloomily, "I personally shall cast my vote for the conference report, although I do so most unhappily and with a deep sense of reluctance. I feel that it may result in a rapid and marked inflation and establish an entirely unworkable system."

Of the Taft amendment, the clever now-you-see-it, now-you-don't device for raising profits, Downey commented, "We will establish a base period of from October 1 to October 14, 1941, to measure the right of business to prices and profits. We will give them the same profits and costs which they had then and add to this all the accumulating costs. I ask, why do we take this particular base period? Is it because at that time corporate profits were the greatest they have been in history?"

The Senator cried out a dark prophecy to indifferent ears. "This amendment, by subjecting industry to a continuing series of price increases, will result in withholding goods from the market. This amendment is a monstrosity. It will be explosive in its effect on our economic stability. The value of the dollar will steadily decline; disabled veterans, dependents of men in the services, pensioners and all other persons on fixed incomes will be put in a terrific squeeze." But Senator Wherry, the small-town undertaker who entered the Senate by defeating George Norris, shouted scornfully, "Production is the only answer to inflation. We have been under the Bowles plan now for four years."

Toward the end of the troubled session young Senator Fulbright of Arkansas made one of his rare and statesmanlike speeches. He reminded his colleagues that economic stability had been wrecked last fall when Congress so blithely tore up the excess profits tax, and wage controls under the War Labor Board were dropped. Fulbright said, "Only three or four Senators opposed repeal of the excess profits tax. [Editor's note—He was one of them.] Many of those who now complain of the ineffectiveness of the OPA supported the repeal of the tax." He added that he would vote for the conference report "simply as a symbol." The young Senator said earnestly, "The greatest danger is that in adopting the conference report we shall lead the people to believe that we have done something effective."

A Senate tired of wrangling, tired of the sticky Washington heat, passed the conference committee report without enthusiasm Friday afternoon. Senator Barkley and Representative Spence, chairman of the House Banking Committee, plodded to the White House and pleaded with Mr. Truman to sign the bill. The atmosphere was clouded with storms of pressure. Western cattlemen and packing plants went on a sit-down strike and bombarded Congress with demands to end OPA. They put it bluntly—no price increase, no meat. Millers and grain elevator operators sent furious telegrams to Capitol Hill. Real estate operators were licking their chops and writing new rent increases into contracts.

But behind the scenes, one of the smartest organizers and strategists since Franklin Roosevelt was working fast. Chester Bowles was rounding up all the liberal support in the Administration to influence President Truman and his two advisers, John Snyder and John Steelman, to veto the bil, and thus force Congress into saying, "yes" or "no" to economic stability. Bowles' letter of resignation and his final press conferences were an appeal to the nation and to the President not to give up the fight.

Saturday morning was hot and humid in Washington. Shortly after 10 o'clock, President Truman's message on price controls reached Congress.

The bold words of the veto message echoed over the crowded House. . . . "The Taft amendment promises peak profits. . . . It is a sorry jest which would wholly destroy wage stabilization. . . . This is a choice between inflation with a statute and inflation without. . . . The bill legalizes inflation. . . . Bonanza formula. . . . Enrich industry at the cost of the public."

Spence rose and in a low, almost inaudible voice said, "A great danger confronts the people of the United States. The conferees brought forth a bill. We did the best we could. I urged the President to sign the bill because I hoped it might work. But he has the responsibility for enforcing it. I will vote to sustain the veto." There was a burst of applause from half of the Democrats. The Republican side was silent. Spence went on. He would introduce a joint resolution to extend price controls until July 20. That would give Congress another chance.

The halls and cloakrooms of the Capitol were filled with confused, angry, and despairing talk. A young House secretary wailed, "I guess I'll have to write home for money if prices go up." A reporter told her grimly, "You sure will, honey. They'll be charging us for a glass of water." A sweating Capitol policeman told my five-year-old boy: "Sonny, I bet you could do a better job than Congress." He mopped his forehead and added, "It looks like a bad summer.'

The Congressmen were faced with a painful dilemma which they had hoped the conference report would avert. They could let OPA die and try to explain to the voters this fall, or pass a strong bill and face the wrath of the special groups—the N. A. M., the Farm Bureau, the retailers, the real estate boards. The conference committee report had been a skillful evasion. The voters could be told: Sure, we voted for price control. And the lobbyists could be told: But look at the openings we gave you.

The vote sustaining the veto brought together strange bedfellows. Both the diehard enemies and the best friends of OPA voted to uphold the President and kill the conference bill, though they had different motives. But that was just the beginning. Using a parliamentary maneuver the diehards blocked immediate action on a joint resolution extending OPA three weeks. Wolcott in the House and Pappy O'Daniel in the Senate blocked the unanimous consent necessary for consideration of the resolution. Then Congressmen and Senators walked out until Monday morning, face to face with a real issue —inflation or a stable economy.

The nation will know the answer in a few days.

A Vichy Regime for Spain?

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Paris, June 28

AN INTRIGUE with many ramifications to sell out the cause of the Spanish Republic may come to a head before the end of July. In origin it is a British-American intrigue, and it goes far to explain the stubborn refusal of both nations to accept any decent proposal in the Security Council. Whether the plan is identical with the Vatican-inspired scheme revealed at the start of the Council session is not known. What is certain is that the British representative in the Council was under instructions to oppose any move which might prove an obstacle to the intrigue now in the making. It may also explain Gromyko's veto of the compromise proposal finally put to a vote.

The existence of this plan does not contradict in the least what I reported from London in my article, Why Britain Supports Franco, on June 1. The British government will continue to support Franco as long as possible, but it knows that this policy has a deadline. The Spanish issue may have been respectfully interred by the Security Council, but at the same time the World Federation of Trade Unions ended its meeting in Moscow with a resolution calling for a worldwide boycott of Franco. The Spanish issue will not be liquidated until fascism is liquidated in Spain.

It is in the tradition of British foreign policy to have an alternative ready in case of failure. The alternative to Franco is the plan I shall now describe. It has two parts: first, the replacement of Franco by a military directorate which will assume power for a brief period, and then the transfer of power to a provisional government made up of both military and civilian elements. The names of two of the most probable members of the directorate are already circulating in official quarters in Madrid, where the "coup of July" is being discussed as a settled affair. They are General Aranda, whose name has often been connected with rumors of a monarchist restoration, and Colonel Ungria, who during the Spanish war was chief of Franco's intelligence service. I see no objection to publishing these names because I have the feeling that Franco is fully informed of the work in which they are engaged. For the plan, although instigated by the British, was discussed last month in the Casino Militar of Madrid, the famous officers' club where so many plots have been hatched during the last twenty-five years. There was not even any particular effort at secrecy. In contrast with Republican rebels who still end their lives before a firing squad, these amiable plotters could sit around a dinner table and openly drink to the success of their plans. All this would suggest that Franco is not blind to the operation and that he may even be hoping to remain the power behind the new regime if it is actually formed.

At that meeting in the Casino Militar agreement was reached on three points. The first was the constitution of a mixed government whose main task would be the maintenance of public order during the period of transition. The second was limited amnesty for political offenders. The Republicans in exile would be invited to come back to Spain, but a severe control at frontier and ports would prevent the return of those whose presence might be a menace to public order—a restriction which would exclude every militant Republican. The third was a plebiscite on the single question, "Do you want the monarchy?" Voters must say yes or no; not even the alternative "monarchy or republic?" would be offered. The plebiscite, it was agreed, should take place as quickly as possible; in other words, before the Republican forces could regroup themselves after seven years of persecution and exile.

The plan, as anyone can see, is simply a betrayal of the republic. While it originated among dissident Franco elements with British and American encouragement, it could never have been set in motion without the complicity of certain Republican leaders. The most active group on the Republican side in facilitating this maneuver is the Socialist faction of Indalecio Prieto, represented in the Giral Cabinet by two ministers, Trifon Gómez and De Francisco. Trifon Gómez is a member of the executive of the Transport Workers' International Organization and thus an old friend of the former head of Transport House, Britain's Foreign Minister. Having established contact with Mr. Bevin in Paris, Trifon Gómez arranged a private meeting between him and a very important Republican official. At that meeting, held last Sunday in Orléans, the Republican official was able to convince himself of the existence of a carefully articulated plan which completely ignores the republic as a possible alternative to Franco.

Señor Giral must also be well informed about the plan. Addressing the Permanent Committee of the Cortes in Mexico a fortnight ago, he said that during the summer a new—not his own—government would be set up inside Spain and that it would be recognized by Britain and the United States. But he mentioned this in such an offhand, gentle manner that the other members may have failed to realize the gravity of the announcement. I do not believe Señor Giral is implicated in the plot, but he is none the less compromised by the incredible fact that, knowing what is going on, he retains in his Cabinet men who openly favor sacrificing the republic. Perhaps in view of this development those people who urged Negrín and me to join the Giral government will now understand why we refused. The present plot had not yet been launched, but men capable of countenancing such a maneuver, men who during the Spanish war were always in favor of capitulation, have had a hand in the government from its inception. Even in November, 1945, when Giral's newly formed Cabinet presented itself to the Cortes in Mexico, Indalecio Prieto clearly announced that he would support the Republican government only so long as it presented no obstacle to some other solution of the Spanish problem. Immediately after this statement Negrín, myself, Gonzales Pena, chairman of the Socialist Party, and other Socialist members of the Cortes wrote to President Martínez Barrio calling his attention to the danger and impropriety of permitting a member representing the Prieto position to continue in the government.

Franco

This policy of capitulation is not new. It went on during the entire Spanish war and found its most terrible and shameful expression in the Casado coup of March, 1939, which delivered Madrid and the rest of the Republican territory to Franco and which was, by the way, also the result of British pressure. We are facing now a probable repetition of the Casado coup engineered by the same people—among them Socialists of the Paul Faure type, ready to sell out the republic just as Faure and his friends sold out France in 1940. The recent congress in Toulouse of the Prieto Socialists reaffirmed this dangerous tendency.

I know that many good friends of the Spanish Republic in the United States and elsewhere will say that, after all, the main thing is to get rid of Franco; that once Franco is out, the door will be open for a new drive to restore the republic. This is the most unrealistic kind of thinking. In the end the republic will be restored whatever happens, but the establishment of an interim regime of "order" insures a long process of violence in which thousands of Spaniards will be slaughtered and which might easily develop into a new civil war. Let no one be taken in by the proposal of a plebiscite. During three years the Spanish people registered their faith in the republic with blood. But even if the idea of a plebiscite were today tolerable, no vote taken under the plan invented in the Casino Militar could be anything but a farce. To begin with, every exile who really wants to fight for the republic will be refused admission to Spain, and those who go back in defiance of the restrictions will be suppressed. But supposing the provisional government of officers and civilians which is to replace Franco should be the most honest, liberal government in the world, the plebiscite would still be a fake because throughout Spain the Falange and the clergy hold the real power in every village and every town. A simple decree on paper will not abolish years of fascist control. That is why when Prieto launched in Mexico his campaign in favor of the plebiscite, Negrín, who does not like to use strong words in criticizing the acts of other Republicans, pronounced the name of Laval. That is why it is necessary to oppose with uncompromising vigor the proposal of a plebiscite, together with the entire plan to replace Franco, when his hour strikes, by a Vichy regime of capitulators and reactionaries.

The Future of the Ruhr and Rhineland

BY FRITZ STERNBERG

German economist now living in this country; author of "The Coming Crisis," to be published in November

THE future status of the Ruhr and the Rhineland will indubitably have a decisive influence on the future of all Europe; but it is a very complicated problem, with economic and political aspects inseparably interwoven. One of the first questions requiring settlement is an economic one—how much production shall be permitted in the two provinces, especially in the Ruhr. A second is political—whether or not the Ruhr and Rhineland shall remain a part of Germany. A third, which seems to me the most important, is whether the key industries, notably coal and steel, shall be socialized and the basis thus laid for a change in the structure of German society in the western zones.

Before the Second World War the Ruhr was the greatest coal- and steel-producing area of continental Europe. For a long time it was one of the greatest coal-exporting areas. Today it is nowhere denied that the speed of European reconstruction depends on the speed with which the Ruhr can resume its peace-time production of coal for the supplying of Europe's industries. For a long time this was not recognized in the United States. Strangely enough, it was not recognized by the men who to a large extent were responsible for the Potsdam agreement. They were still too much under the influence of Morgenthau's ideas.

The memorandum summarizing the Morgenthau plan which President Roosevelt took with him to the historic conference at Quebec read in part as follows (see "Germany Is Our Problem," by Henry Morgenthau, Jr.):

> The Ruhr Area: Here in the Ruhr area lies the heart of German industrial power. This area should not only be stripped of all presently existing industries but so weakened and controlled that it cannot in the foreseeable future become an industrial area. The following steps will accomplish this. Within a short period, if possible no longer than six months after the cessation of hostilities, all industrial plants and equipment not destroyed by military action shall be completely dismantled and transported to Allied nations as restitution. All equipment shall be removed from the mines and the mines closed (italics mine).

More than a year has passed since the cessation of hostilities, but no one now considers closing down the Ruhr mines. On the contrary, the present problem is how coal production in the Ruhr can be raised. The world is crying for coal today almost as loudly as it is crying for food. The international coal conference in Paris reported that Europe faced a coal deficit of 46,000,000 tons in the coming year.

After the end of the war, coal production in the Ruhr under British administration slowly revived; in February it became about 1,100,000 tons a week, that is, 55,000,000 to 60,000,000 tons a year—barely half of the peace-time output. At the beginning of this year the British still hoped that by the end of 1946 the peace-time figure would be achieved, and that the Ruhr would be able to meet the needs of France and Western Europe and also of German industry. But, instead, production has decreased in recent months by more than 20 per cent.

The principal reason for this is hunger. It is true that the miners receive preferential treatment in the matter of food, but they are none the less undernourished, partly because they give some of their special rations to their hungry children. Hunger, however, is not the only cause of the Ruhr's diminished production. If output is to be raised above a certain level, the many totally destroyed pits and the even larger number which suffered heavy damage in the war must be rebuilt and reequipped. For that purpose the Ruhr requires great quantities of steel. But the amount of steel manufactured in the Ruhr today is far smaller in comparison with peace-time output than the coal production. Not even 10 per cent of the peace-time amount is being produced. Under the Potsdam agreement Germany was permitted to manufacture 5,800,000 tons of steel a year—4,000,000 tons in the Ruhr—but only half of this quota is actually being produced.

One reason, of course, is the lack of coal. The German steel industry receives so little coal that it cannot manufacture the machinery necessary to raise the coal production—a vicious circle. That is why the British announced recently that they must reduce the export of Ruhr coal to France. The London Tribune commented correctly:

> Ruhr coal is needed not only today and tomorrow; it is a permanently essential factor in the economic recovery of Europe. In spite of the tremendous coal shortage, therefore, nothing would be more shortsighted and would more surely lead to a self-perpetuating catastrophe than to give in to the clamor for larger coal exports from the Ruhr now. Even the humblest peasant knows that if he is left with no alternative he must go hungry for a time rather than consume the seed from which alone future harvests can grow. This is the hard logic of the situation.

To increase coal production in the Ruhr two measures are necessary. First the miners must be given sufficient food. In this respect the situation may improve somewhat in the coming months; after the harvest all food rations will be increased slightly, and with recognition of the crucial significance of coal in the reconstruction of Europe the miners may receive still more favored treatment. Secondly, German steel production must be brought at least to the level decided upon in the Potsdam agreement, which means doubling production in the Ruhr.

At this point we see how inseparable are the political and economic aspects of the problem. The exceedingly low steel production of the Ruhr today is the result not only of insufficient coal supplies but of uncertainty about the future of the entire German steel industry, which will remain unclear until we know how the question of ownership is to be settled. The ownership of the coal mines is already settled. The decision of the British Labor government to dispossess the German owners without compensation, and to put their mining properties under public ownership with Britain as custodian, attracted little notice in this country although it may be of decisive importance for Europe. Since nobody knows whether or not the great steel works will remain in private hands, the present owners and managers are not interested in increasing production. More than that: in this transition period no plan for the development of the steel works without consideration of private interests is really possible. Clearly, the British Labor government should step in and socialize the steel industry in the British zone.

Socialization of all German heavy industry in the Ruhr should facilitate a sensible solution for the problem of the political status of the region. On this point agreement has hitherto not been possible between England and America on the one hand and the French government on the other. The French government demands not only that a part of the Ruhr production be made available for the reconstruction of Western Europe and France, but that the Ruhr and the Rhineland be separated politically from Germany. The chief argument in favor of the French proposal is that Germany, if left in possession of this great industrial area, may become strong enough to start another war of aggression. This argument is advanced by certain elements in America as well as in France and has a superficial cogency, but it is essentially fallacious. The danger of a third world war does not lie in any future aggressiveness on Germany's part but in a sharpening of the enmity between the United States, Britain, and the Soviet Union. Moreover, in this age of the atomic bomb new aggressive activities in Germany will not depend on the capacity of its industries but on who owns them—in other words, on what class holds the reins of power.

The French Socialists have clearly recognized this. Recently Léon Blum declared explicitly:

> We Socialists demand the appropriation and international direction of the mines and factories of the Ruhr. We demand the prolonged occupation of the left bank of the Rhine. But on the other hand we are hostile to the political dismemberment of Germany. This distinction is capital. The amputation proposed by De Gaulle and maintained against us by the Popular Republicans and the Communists is illusory and even fallacious, because it is of a nature to revive all the old imperialist instincts.

If in accordance with the wishes of the French Socialists and the policy of the British Labor government the Allies decide not to cut off the Ruhr and the Rhineland from Germany, that need not mean that the entire output of the region will be at Germany's disposal. A considerable part of it should be applied to the reconstruction of the devastated areas of Europe. For a long time the production of this great industrial center should be internationalized: that is, for a long time the Western powers should say how it is to be divided among Germany and other countries. During this transition period it can be determined to what extent the socialization of heavy industry, added to the destruction of the German middle classes consequent to the loss of the war, is altering the structure of German society; and whether the expropriation of the properties of the industrialists, the core of German reaction, will so strengthen the democratic and socialist forces that they will be able to thwart all aggressive tendencies.

To sum up: for the whole of Europe an increase of production in the Ruhr, especially of coal production, is essential—reconstruction depends on it. An increase of coal production in the Ruhr will most easily be attained if the socialization of the coal industry is followed by the socialization of the steel industry and its systematic restoration. Measures in that direction taken by the Labor government in the British occupation zone can be expected to change the structure of German society and render tremendous service to the democratic elements there. They would parallel the policy begun by the Labor government in England with the nationalization of the English coal industry and continued with its nationalization bill for steel. And they would of course strengthen the trend toward the nationalization of heavy industry in France, where the coal industry has already been taken over by the state.

By such measures the economic, and therefore the political, strength of the monopolistic-reactionary forces throughout Europe would be decisively curtailed. Moreover the consequent increase of production would so improve the economic situation that the Germans would feel some hope for the future. France, however, need not fear such a development, for the democratic, socialistic forces in Germany would be encouraged at the same time.

This and only this is the answer to Russian expansionist efforts in all parts of Germany. It would demonstrate to the Germans—not with empty phrases but with deeds, that is, with production figures—that they will have an economic future by retaining a German state, political democracy, and personal freedoms.

Britain's Greatest Gamble

BY ANDREW ROTH

Author of "Dilemma in Japan," Mr. Roth is now on his way to India and the Pacific for a first-hand view of developing events in the Far East. He will embody his observations in a series of articles for The Nation.

London, June 25

LONDON—still shabby, pockmarked, and underfed a year after the war's end—is awaiting the outcome of one of the greatest gambles in the history of imperial politics. The Labor government is gambling that by loosening the reigns of political domination and military occupation in seriously disaffected areas it will be able to keep these areas within the British economic and power bloc.

At the prospect of troop withdrawals from Egypt, independence for India, and dominion status for Burma the Tories have raised shrill screams of anguish. Retired colonial officials fume in their clubs and write indignant letters to the Times echoing Churchill's charge that an empire "built with great labor" is being "cast away with great shame and folly." They forget that 1946 is not 1896. The people of the dependent and colonial areas are today not only militant and well-organized but, in Palestine, Burma, Malaya, and Indonesia, armed as well. And Britain is not the first world power it was fifty years ago. With its factories undermanned it cannot spare soldiers to suppress colonial uprisings, nor does its economic situation, which now dictates a life of shabby austerity for the mass of its people, permit the financing of such undertakings. These facts are recognized by enlightened Conservatives like the editors of the Times, who therefore support the government's attempts to reach a settlement with the nationalist leaders and hope that these leaders can control the more radical demands of their followers.

It is ridiculous to think of the Labor Cabinet as made up of men who would unnecessarily risk losing the Empire; by temperament and belief they are cautious, "sure-thing" players, and they are only taking the gamble in their Egyptian and Indian policies because otherwise they know they are in imminent danger of losing all.

Labor Party thought on colonial matters is predominantly "gradualist," stemming from the Fabian Society and more particularly from the Fabian Colonial Bureau. Until recently the chairman of the bureau was Arthur Creech-Jones, for years one of the few members of Parliament who took a serious interest in colonial matters. Today Creech-Jones, a sincere but timid man, is Parliamentary Under Secretary of the Colonial Office, and the activities of the bureau, increased by the demands of the Labor government, are being carried on by the vigorous, able, and earnest Rita Hinden.

Dr. Hinden gave me a very clear view of Labor's attitude toward the colonies. It calls for their gradual conversion into self-governing equals within the British Commonwealth but considers it "irresponsible" to fix dates for the completion of the process. She was enthusiastic about the measures now being applied. All the colonial constitutions are being revised and liberalized. In Malaya the Chinese and Indians will soon become citizens and participate in the Legislative Council; the Burmese electorate is being tripled; Ceylon will have virtual self-government in internal affairs; in East Africa Negro representation is being increased; and in the Gold Coast there will be a majority of natives in the legislature for the first time in Africa.

These constitutional advances are underpinned by economic reforms. Allocation of taxes is being altered so that more wealth stays in the colonies, where it is produced, and less goes to London. Orders have gone out to establish consumers', credit, and marketing cooperatives in order to protect colonial peoples from native usurers and foreign monopolists. Labor attachés have been sent to Malaya, Burma, and East Africa to help in the establishment of trade unions.

These measures are concrete indications of the undoubted good intentions of the Labor government, but unfortunately they will take a decade or two to bear fruit and when read in the context of the nationalists' demands seem grudging rather than generous. Colonial nationalists resent the fact that the government's attitude is largely paternalistic—"we know what's best for you"—rather than a recognition of equality. The Labor Party's prestige in the colonial world would have been tremendously enhanced if it had invited to the recent Bournemouth conference not only the French Socialist Léon Blum but the Indonesian Socialist Premier Sjahrir and Socialists from India, Africa, and the West Indies.

In reading the texts of the proposed reforms—with the possible exception of those for Ceylon—it is difficult to escape the impression that a great opportunity was lost by too much concentration on retaining as many guaranties as possible for British interests. In Malaya, for example, the unification of the country, the reduction in the powers of the feudal sultans, the extension of citizenship to Chinese and Indian residents, and the establishment of a Legislative Council are all excellent and progressive measures. But these are amply counterbalanced: about half the Legislative Council is to be appointed, and how the others—who will have to be "proficient in the English language"—are to be elected is not indicated. The Governor will have reserved powers enabling him to do without the Legislative Council's consent in matters affecting defense, foreign relations, and even taxation. And the Secretary of State for Colonies can disallow any law passed by the Legislative Council even if the Governor has given his assent. Surely this is no bold play to capture the loyalty of a rich colony.

Dr. Hinden and others in touch with colonial peoples have advocated a policy of greater boldness and generosity but have been rebuffed repeatedly on grounds of strategic necessity. Only on such grounds can one explain conditions in Cyprus, a main pivot of the British position in the Mediterranean. Cyprus has been a virtual police state since the riots in 1931, when Cypriots burned down Government House. Civil liberties are almost unknown, hundreds of leaders have been imprisoned or exiled, and the church has not been allowed to hold elections for its own bishops. The reason for British hesitancy in correcting these conditions is that most Cypriots want to be united with Greece, and although Greece is now safely in the British sphere, pro-Soviet forces are strong there and the British want to be doubly sure by holding on to Cyprus separately.

It should be noted that the Labor government's sensitivity about strategic positions is shared by the British people. In a poll held in June by the British Institute of Public Opinion the public was asked: "Do you approve or disapprove of the decision to remove British troops from Egypt?" Of those with an opinion in the general population three out of five disapproved; among Labor voters two out of five.

Among the most powerful factors tending to drag Labor's colonial policy to the right is its close association with such giant foreign-trade monopolies as Dutch Oil, Imperial Chemicals, and Unilever. It should be remembered that in Labor's program for gradual socialization only 20 per cent of the British economy is due to be nationalized by 1950, and industries engaged in foreign trade are way down at the end of the list. Furthermore, because of Britain's present desperate need for foreign exchange, the government encourages those firms which can improve the country's economic position. In Burma, for example, Steel Brothers, Ltd., which dominated Burma's cotton, rice, and teak industries before the war, has now reestablished itself there with government assistance and has been able to pay two years' arrears on its 6 per cent first-preference shares. A substantial portion of the £87,000,000 loan to Burma will go to Steel Brothers and other English concerns in payment for their losses and very little to impoverished Burmese cultivators.

The machinery for dealing with the colonies which Labor took over on assuming office was vast, complicated, and antiquated. Although it is planned to recruit many more members from colonial peoples and non-upper-crust Britons, the overwhelming majority now in the colonial services look backward toward the nineteenth century. Labor men have been appointed governors of Malta and Bengal, but the New Statesman tells of an able candidate for District Officer in Palestine, a man risen from the ranks to become a lieutenant colonel in the army, who was turned down by the chairman of a selection board because he had not attended a public school and was therefore not quite right socially.

Neither of the Cabinet ministers in charge has shown any inclination toward a rapid purge of diehard elements in his department. In Burma, at least, the influence of these diehards has created a wide gap between the government and the young nationalists at a time when they should be cooperating to restore the devastated country. The dominant notion among senior Burma colonial officers was revealed by Governor Sir Reginald Dorman-Smith in an unguarded moment: "You have to get tough with the nationalists or they don't respect you."

British army circles, still very influential in Southeast Asia, are similarly unsympathetic to the desires of colonial peoples, partly because a considerable number of the middle-rank officers are former colonial officials and business men. One of the things that most inflamed Britons against the Indonesians was the report, from army sources, that Brigadier Mallaby was killed by Indonesians while negotiating a truce. The actual fact is that he was killed after he had himself broken the truce by ordering Indians to fire on a turbulent mob near Union Square in Surabaya. Even now it is not known whether he was killed by Indonesians or by a grenade thrown by an Indian officer at some Indonesians who were approaching his car.

The real story of Mallaby's death was revealed in the House of Commons by Tom Driberg, one of the small group of Labor back-benchers who stand to the left of the government on colonial matters and have striven energetically to counter right-wing influences. These back-benchers want full and equal cooperation with the colonial peoples. Their thought derives from that of the English economist J. A. Hobson, whose searing analysis, "Imperialism: A Study" (1902), was later adopted in large part by Lenin. This group has been augmented by a number of young Laborites who have done military service in various parts of the Empire and returned determined to right the wrongs they observed. Their chief spokesmen in the Commons are Tom Driberg and Harold Davies.

Driberg, tall, brilliant, charming, and a skilled debater, was for many years the star columnist of the Daily Express and now writes for Reynolds' News. He won a by-election as an Independent in 1942 in Maldon, a conservative rural constituency, and was reelected in 1945 as a Labor candidate. Harold Davies, a pleasant, intelligent, and very earnest man, is serving his first term as a Labor M. P. from a South Wales mining district after seventeen years as an extension lecturer for Oxford University in workers' education. Both men traveled extensively in Southeast Asia last year, met most of the nationalist leaders, and have been kept up to the minute by correspondence and returning service men.

About the best attraction the House of Commons can offer these days is a debate on the Asiatic colonies between Captain Gammans, the blustering spokesman for the commercial interests, and Driberg and Davies. In the recent Burma debate Gammans favored arresting General Aung San as a murderer, while Driberg suggested that cooperation with Aung San would speed Burma's recovery. In the February debate on Indonesia, Davies, who had just returned from Asia, summed up the feelings of the back-benchers when he said: "Because a Labor government at this moment is in power, there is still faith in the Far East . . . Had a Labor government not been in power at the present moment, the Far East would have been on fire from one end to the other. They believe in us. Let us see that because they believe in us they will not be betrayed."

Georgia's Negro Vote

BY IRA DE A. REID

Professor of sociology at Atlanta University; to be visiting professor of education at New York University next year

Atlanta, Georgia, June 25

IN GEORGIA today a Caesarian operation is being performed on democracy in an effort to save its newest offspring, the primary. The mother has been so mauled about and bruised by her men folks in the state that she is having a difficult time. The delivery on July 17 is not going to be an easy one, what with none too skilful attendants and the incantations being cast upon the child by those who would like to have it still-born. The only hope is that the child comes of such good stock that it will survive all these adverse conditions. Supreme Court decisions have given Negroes the right to vote in the only elections that actually matter in Georgia—the primaries. Whether that right is going to become a living privilege will depend on the Department of Justice, the local registrars, the political machines, and the colored voters themselves.

In a state where the ratio between Negroes and whites in the population is one to three, it is one to seven in the registered voting population. The number of registered Negro voters has risen from 15,000 to approximately 116,000 in the past year, an increase of 673 per cent, but during the same period white registrants have increased by a number greater than the total number of persons who voted in the 1942 elections for governor. While outside the state this increase may be regarded as a victory for the democratic process, Georgians interpret it as meaning that the Democratic Party, and the elections, will remain in the hands of the white voters. In reporting the registration figures both the Atlanta Journal and the Atlanta Constitution featured the fact that the whites outnumbered the Negroes seven to one.

The only issue, if it can be called an issue, in the present campaign is what former Governor Eugene Talmadge, in his less impolite moments, calls "the race issue." The two other candidates, former Governor E. D. Rivers and James V. Carmichael, are trying to refute this by saying "It aint so!" in a variety of ways. No candidate has publicly uttered a good word for the Negro. In fact, no candidate has addressed a Negro group at any public meeting. Not even Governor Arnall, a staunch supporter of Carmichael, has ever spoken to a Negro group in Georgia. In the past it has not been politically necessary to do so; the present candidates, by refraining, protect themselves from the Talmadge scalpel and pertinent questioning. Therefore what makes up the Negro voter's mind in Georgia is what he hears whispered over the scraggly grape vine, what he thinks is the lesser of the many political and social evils that affect his citizenship status, and who is being backed by the people he respects.

The last Negro representative left the Georgia legislature in 1908. Not until February, 1945, did the votes of colored citizens again become a force in Georgia politics. In a Congressional by-election held in Atlanta at that time the votes from a Negro neighborhood shifted the victory from the machine candidate, Tom Camp, secretary to former Congressman Robert Ramspeck, to Mrs. Helen Mankin. The racial reaction to that blow was Georgia's heavy registration. Later, the Negro vote was shown to have played a minor part in the defeat of the Cracker Party in Augusta, and the "threat" of "Negro domination" seemed less formidable. But Eugene Talmadge's Georgia is taking no chances.

Approximately half of the 116,345 Negro votes in Georgia are concentrated in the five "big-city" counties containing the cities of Atlanta, Macon, Augusta, Savannah, and Columbus. Yet these counties contain less than 10 per cent of the state's Negro population. In these same counties Negro registered voters form approximately one-fourth of the voting list. In 16 of the state's 159 counties the Negro citizen has had little trouble in becoming a registered voter. Here are to be found two-thirds of the Negro votes. It is in the small rural counties that the free primary will meet its real test.

In 46 of Georgia's 159 counties—each of the 46 is a two-vote county under the unit-voting system—Negroes form more than 50 per cent of the population. In no one of these counties does the proportion of Negro voters at all approach the proportion of Negroes in the population. The number of Negroes registered was generally reported to be 10 per cent of the total. But in Webster County, where 612 of every 1,000 people are Negroes, there is not a single registered Negro voter; in Burke County, which has a Negro population of 19,000, there are only 160 Negro voters. And if the trend now being noted by the Georgia Association of Citizens' Democratic Clubs, an organization of colored Democrats, continues, it is certain that there will be a very high rate of disqualification among Negro voters everywhere by election day.

Caricature by Seligson

Ellis Arnall

The Association of Citizens' Democratic Clubs is trying to expose these conditions throughout the state, but the restrictive devices in each county are limited only by the ingenuity of the registrars and their advisers. In one county "the colored books aren't ready." In another the registrar is never in when a colored voter comes around. More than 400 Negroes stood in line an entire day in one community without getting a chance to register. Sometimes the printed qualifications for voters are interpreted as meaning that they must pass both property and literacy qualifications: the "and/or" is treated as "and" only. One Negro was disqualified because he did not know the name of the sixteenth President of the United States. Another was asked: "Who elects the judges?" Another: "What is a document?" At a recent meeting of the association, investigators reported that Negroes were being asked either to recite the Preamble to the Constitution or to listen to the registrar read it and then write out verbatim the part read. A young college graduate, now a second-year theological student in a Northern seminary, has just come to Atlanta from his home in Fayette County to protest against the way the Negroes there were not permitted to register. He came at the behest of one of the county's Negro ministers, who has tried again and again to get the registrar's books opened to his flock. When I mentioned these abuses to one of Georgia's most widely known public men he admitted that in the "Talmadge campaign" registrars were being instructed in ways to handle the "nigger voters."

No other Southern campaign in recent years has so blatantly exploited the race issue. Talmadge announced at the outset that he would take his stand with "white folks." He has told all the usual race-baiting stories, including highly imaginary ones about Negro Congressmen, mixed schools, and the like. His radio speeches have been so inflammatory that some Negroes have considered asking the FCC to curb him. Yet Talmadge has his Negro supporters. A former president of a state college returned to the state to aid his campaign. When this man went to a meeting of the colored Democrats in Albany, the Atlanta Daily World, the nation's only Negro daily, reported that he apparently sensed "the extreme displeasure of the delegates over his presence, together with his purported espousal of the Talmadge cause, [and] was persuaded to leave without incident."

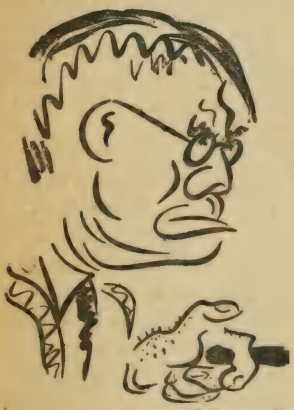
The Supreme Court's decision on racial separation in interstate bus travel furnished Talmadge with new talking points. He promised listeners in southern Georgia that if he were elected he would have a law passed requiring all Negroes to buy new tickets at the state line in order to ride through the state. To Candidate Talmadge the Negroes want "social equality," and their aspirations are favored by the Supreme Court, Northerners, the Julius Rosenwald Fund, Governor Arnall, and, in particular, his opponents Messrs. Rivers and Carmichael. Talmadge, says Talmadge, is the one candidate who would dare to speak out against "social equality" and to do something about it.



Caricature by Seligson

Eugene Talmadge

There is no doubt that his emphasis on the race issue has caused his opponents great concern. That is about all they too have talked about. Mr. Carmichael has said, and with a straight face, "The race issue is nothing more than a smoke screen to elect Gene." Carmichael isn't for "social equality." He has said so. Rivers says he isn't for "social equality" either. But Talmadge has put both men so on the defensive that neither has been able to make any public statement at all favorable to the hundred thousand new Negro voters.

Behind the scenes, however, interesting machinations are going on. The Rivers forces are definitely working to get the Negro vote. Carmichael's headquarters have been less overt in their solicitations, but the "smart operators" in that camp have "talked it over" with Negro leaders. This Negro vote, it must be remembered, is different from any other known in fifty years of Georgia politics. It is interested in issues and welfare; its leaders are not to be tempted by the promise of spoils. Georgia's politicians are novices in this kind of campaigning. Only once in forty years has a candidate for a state or national office come to a Negro group in Georgia and talked over the political issues of the moment. That candidate was elected.

As a result of Mrs. Mankin's victory the Democratic committees of Fulton, DeKalb, and Rockdale counties decided to employ the county unit-voting system in the coming Congressional primary election. This means that the heavy popular vote which Mrs. Mankin received in Atlanta (Fulton County) will be offset by her weakness in the two other counties, where Judge James Davis is a leading contender for the Congressional designation. Thus Mrs. Mankin could carry Fulton County, with its 112,000 voters and six unit votes, and lose to a candidate who carried DeKalb and Rockdale counties, which have a combined registration of fewer than 50,000 voters but six and two unit votes respectively. Negroes in the three counties, especially in Atlanta, have been working for a heavy registration in the outlying districts in the hope of preventing the nomination of Judge Davis, who is regarded as a Negro-hater. But their efforts may be ineffective since the Judge's enemies are said to be willing to kick him upstairs in order to get him off the bench. All this makes Representative Mankin's victory problematical.

Only three things are certain about the Negro vote, whatever its size, in the July election. First, it will not be a bloc vote; the candidates and the leaders have seen to that. Second, every previously elected official in Georgia has a black mark against him so far as the Negro voter is concerned. Former Governor Rivers, for example, will have to explain his alleged past affiliation with the Klan as a lecturer. Third, it will not vote for Eugene Talmadge of its own free will, a qualification understood only by those who know rural Georgia.

A not too quiet political revolution is taking place in Georgia. Involved in it are home rule for the big cities, labor's coming of age, and the differentials of religion, sex, education, and race. The situation can perhaps be explained by citing Mrs. X, the wife of a minor public official, and a churchwoman and leader of some importance in her community. Mrs. X was quite concerned over the social-action program of the denomination to which she belongs. She protested against the group's being addressed by Mrs. Roosevelt, its stand on labor, its attitude toward minorities (they ought to remain where God placed them), its general position on public issues. If only the women of her denominational connection in Georgia would go back to the teachings of the Old Testament and serve God in that manner, she and the women of her local church would see to it that the Honorable Eugene E. Cox, representative from Georgia's Second Congressional District, would introduce in Congress all the social legislation this country needs.

That being too far-fetched a solution, democracy will struggle on in Georgia—until July 17, at least.

The Jews That Remain

BY JOSEPH DUNNER

During the war Mr. Dunner was chief of the Intelligence Department of the London Office of War Information; after V-E Day he was in charge of the Munich Press Control Detachment of the Information Control Division, United States Army

CONSIDERING the intensity of anti-Semitic propaganda in Germany during the past twelve years, the German people are showing surprisingly little rancor, at least on the surface, toward the few returning Jews. Indeed, in many cases Jews enjoy a singular popularity, for some claim to pro-Semitism is considered one of the best safeguards against the impact of the denazification order. Every Military Government officer in Germany has known dozens of applicants for licenses or jobs who insisted that they were the illegitimate children of a Jew. For the last year two cartons of cigarettes, valued at 3,000 marks, the equivalent of $300, would buy in Berlin a certificate proving that its owner had a Jewish grandmother. However, anti-Semitism in Germany is not dead. And it is likely to revive as soon as the socio-economic and psychological factors which were its major causes reappear in fuller measure.

Some Jews never left Germany but were hidden away by German anti-Nazis willing to risk their lives and the lives of their families by protecting them. A few German Jews have returned from the concentration camps, in particular from Bergen-Belsen and Theresienstadt. But of the 30,000 Jews who lived in Frankfurt-am-Main before 1933, only 300 are still there. An additional 300 in Frankfurt today came originally from other German communities. Of the 4,500 Jews of Stuttgart only 180 remain. Munich before 1933 had a Jewish population of 13,000; today there are but 450 German Jews in the city.

With the help of the new German administrations, which are staffed largely by anti-Nazis, a Jew returning to his home community or coming out of hiding is usually able to find adequate housing. If his old residence has been destroyed, the apartment of a former Nazi Party member is placed at his disposal. With respect to food and fuel German Jews are, officially, slightly better off than the majority of the people. For a few months after V-E Day many of them received double rations. This allowance was later reduced to that of "heavy workers," which was also given to Social Democrats, Communists, and clergymen who had been in concentration camps. Actually, however, since the returning Jews are utterly destitute and unable to supplement their allowance of rationed goods by barter, their per capita consumption is no greater than that of non-Jews, many of whom add to their official diet from the stocks of food they have laid up.

With rare exceptions, Jews are able to find some sort of remunerative work. The provincial governments in the American zone, following the lead of the Social Democratic Minister-President of Bavaria, Dr. Wilhelm Högner, have appointed state commissioners for Jewish affairs whose tasks include the placement of Jews in the German civil service and in the few private enterprises that are operating. Jewish physicians and lawyers are resuming the practice of their professions, from which they had been barred by the Nürnberg laws; they report a plethora of clients, the vast majority of whom are non-Jewish Germans.

Bright as this picture may seem, it is not without dark spots. One of the fundamental errors in our occupation policy is its failure to discriminate clearly enough between Nazis, non-Nazis, and anti-Nazis in the social and economic sphere. To the average American officer the German who served six or more years in Dachau because of his courageous resistance to Nazism is not much different from the German who prospered under the Hitler regime. To him both of them are "Krauts who have to be put in their place." So far there has been no restoration of property stolen from the Jews since 1933. Younger Jews, who were denied all educational opportunities under the Nazis, often lack the necessary training for a specialized position. All Jews are fearful of competing with the non-Jews for the bits of debris left by the storm lest anti-Semitic feeling break out again.

This fear is shared by the so-called part-Jews, products of intermarriage who adhere to the Protestant or Catholic faith. During the Nazi regime they were treated somewhat better than the full Jews. Some, especially if their name and appearance were not too obviously Jewish, escaped persecution altogether. Today they usually enjoy the same benefits as full Jews, but like most of the full Jews they find it impossible to think of Germany as their permanent home. They cannot free themselves of the Hitler nightmare. The full Jews look forward to migrating eventually to Palestine, but the part-Jews hope to find a haven in the United States or some other hospitable land.

Of the almost three and a half million Jews in pre-war Poland, fewer than 160,000 survived the gas and torture chambers of Lublin, Oswiescim, and the other death traps for Eastern European Jewry. Most of the survivors are today D. P.'s in Germany. Some were liberated by the Allied armies from concentration camps; many have filtered in since. Among the latter are Jewish guerrillas who fought with the Russian and Polish partisans during the war only to discover that all their sacrifices had not made them any more welcome in the land of their birth. A census taken on January 23, 1946, showed that there were 56,556 Jewish D. P.'s in the American zone—47,867 in Bavaria and 8,689 in Greater Hesse and Baden-Württemberg. There are approximately 35,000 Jews in the British zone, very few in the French and Russian zones.

Most of the D. P.'s are collected in camps, where they are housed in former barracks or stables of the German army. The rest live in private homes requisitioned for them by the Military Government or UNRRA. They enjoy the extra food ration and a few other privileges such as occasional free tickets for theaters and concerts. When one thinks of the price they have paid, the assistance given to them seems a mere pittance. I have talked with more than two hundred Jewish D. P.'s who saw their wives raped and tortured, their little children smashed against the walls until the blood flowed from their broken bodies. I could name Jewish boys of seventeen and eighteen who for months ate nothing but the flesh of their comrades executed or worked to death by their S. S. guards. Dr. Z. Grinberg, a Jewish physician from Poland, said at a conference of the Jewish D. P.'s in Munich on January 27: "With the money, the possessions stolen by the Nazis from us and from the millions of Jewish dead one could finance UNRRA and every other relief agency in the world. If only a small part of what was taken from us were now returned, all the Jewish D. P.'s could live in luxurious palaces instead of being forced to sleep on hard cots in unsanitary and overcrowded barracks and to eat from tin plates the meager soup given to them as an act of charity."

Now that they have been liberated, the Jewish D. P.'s want to be treated like allies and not like parasites or prisoners. The riots and other disturbances of which one hears these days should be blamed less on them than on the M. G. officials' callous indifference and complete lack of understanding of D. P. psychology. In May, 1945, the G-5 section of the Third Army, then under Patton, began to move the D. P.'s like cattle from one camp to another. Husbands and wives, fathers and sons, who after years of enforced separation had at last found each other were separated again and sent in different directions. On June 11, 1945, I submitted to the headquarters of the Psychological Warfare Division a detailed account of seventeen D. P. centers with an aggregate of 14,000 Jewish inmates. At Turkheim, I reported, they lived in a barbed-wire inclosure still equipped with the deadly electrical apparatus that was designed to keep the ambitious from escaping to life outside. In none of the camps did I find soap, toothbrushes, or laundry facilities. At Freimann, near Munich, I lived for two days with D. P.'s who had arrived at the camp after a march of 200 kilometers. They found the former S. S. barracks in which they were installed infested with vermin, and filthy beyond description. Weak as they were from their years in concentration camps, they managed to clean the place up in a few days and to make it a model camp. But they could not get the tools they needed to build bathrooms, a camp kitchen, and a laundry.

In spite of the official extra ration, the food in the camps is not sufficient for people who have been undernourished for years and are suffering from various diseases. Moreover, since the camps have no proper kitchen facilities, food has to be prepared in makeshift fireplaces in the doorways and rooms of the buildings. The D. P.'s who rioted at Mittenwald claimed that they had more and better food under Nazi rule.

Until recently G-5 refused to regard the Jews as Jews and classified them as Poles, Lithuanians, Yugoslavs, and so on. When the national committees of these groups recalled their D. P.'s, G-5 thought that the Polish, Lithuanian, and Yugoslav Jews would naturally return with the non-Jews to their countries of origin. The refusal of the Jews to return to Eastern Europe made American officials less sympathetic to their cause than ever. When I told a high officer in the Third Army's G-5 section of the fist fights between Polish Jews and non-Jews in the camps, and that the Jews were afraid to return to Poland, his answer was, "I'll put them on trucks together and I'll teach them how to behave." He imagined that he could magically eradicate the age-old anti-Semitic tradition of Eastern Europe—by giving an order.

A number of American officers have German mistresses, mostly Nazi women conditioned by the Nazi regime to sexual libertinage. These Nazi women have a pernicious influence on our occupation policy, for they not only protect their Nazi kin whenever possible but foster in the men who should carry out the denazification order a resentment against people who, not having a guilty conscience, refuse to behave as subserviently as the Nazis do—German anti-Nazis and Jewish D. P.'s. Because the Jewish D. P.'s hate the Nazis fiercely and have different mores from the indigenous German population, the average American officer regards them as troublemakers. "Why don't these Jews go back to Poland if they don't like it here?" is a remark often heard in army circles and even among UNRRA workers.

Actually the Jewish D. P.'s do not want to stay in Germany. In answer to a questionnaire circulated in D. P. camps 95 per cent of the Jewish inmates said Palestine was the country in which they would like to live permanently. Europe, for them, is the continent of crematoriums and gas chambers where the lives of their loved ones were snuffed out mercilessly. Germany is only a waiting-room where they stand in line before a ticket office which they hope will open one day and issue passes to Palestine.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Saving and Spending

THERE has been a great deal of argumentative theorizing about the economic consequences of the huge total of liquid assets that individuals accumulated during the war. Some public officials have repeatedly called attention to its inflationary potential; other have hailed these savings as a sheet-anchor in some future deflationary storm. It is conceivable that both opinions are right or both wrong. In any case it was impossible to make a judgment as long as discussion was based on the simple fact that individual holdings of currency, bank deposits, and government securities had risen from $40,000,000,000 at the end of 1939 to $130,000,000,000 at the end of 1945.

Thanks to a survey made by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, the results of which are summarized in the June Federal Reserve Bulletin, it is now possible to discuss the problem of savings more realistically. By means of interviews the survey obtained information on the income, savings, and liquid-assets holdings of a representative sample of "spending units"—defined as "all persons living in the same dwelling and belonging to the same family who pool their incomes to meet their major expenses."

One major fact emerging from this investigation was that the war has done little to lessen the heavy concentration of incomes and wealth in the hands of a minority of the population. The top 10 per cent of "spending units," it appears, received 29 per cent of the money income in 1945, accounted for 53 per cent of gross savings, and held 60 per cent of total liquid assets, excluding currency. The bottom 50 per cent, by contrast, received 22 per cent of the income, made 3 per cent of the savings, and held 3 per cent of the liquid assets.

These figures should dispel a lot of ideas based on hunches rather than exact information. It is clear that the supposed leveling-up effect of the war economy is a myth and that the much-touted "swollen" earnings left a very minute margin for savings so far as the bulk of wage-earners are concerned. Thus the survey shows that while the average holding of liquid assets amounted to $1,750, the average amount per spending unit in each percentage class was as follows:

Top 10 per cent	$10,500
Next 20 per cent	2,350
Next 30 per cent	700
Bottom 40 per cent	40

On the basis of these results we must conclude that at least half the population, which means a much larger proportion of wage-earners, have no nest eggs of significant size. So far as they are concerned, we do not have to worry about the dissipation of their savings in an ill-considered rush to buy cars and refrigerators, for they have practically no savings to dissipate.

The question of how potent an inflationary effect the present record total of liquid assets may exercise turns therefore very largely on the spending intentions of the top 30 per cent who own 87 per cent of the whole. Information provided by the survey indicates that there is no general disposition among these top-bracket savers to go on a buying spree: 3,800,000, or 11 per cent of all spending units, are definitely intending to buy new cars in 1946 or will probably do so; 12,600,000, or 28 per cent, plan to purchase other consumers' durable goods; 3,100,000, or 7 per cent, hope to buy houses. If all plans, both definite and probable, for spending on these objectives are actually carried through, it will mean an outlay of some twenty to twenty-five billion dollars on the basis of planned average expenditure on each category. But by no means all this sum will come from savings. In the case of cars, for instance, the survey suggests that about two-fifths of the cost will be met from current income, one-quarter by drawing on liquid assets, and the rest borrowed. Actually, of course, many intended purchases are likely to be postponed owing to lack of production. Allowing for this factor, adding in estimated drafts on liquid assets for other purposes, and deducting current savings, the Federal Reserve Bulletin article suggests that the net reduction in liquid assets as a result of consumption expenditure might amount to from five to seven billion dollars in 1946.

It would appear that plans for spending accumulated savings are more modest than has been generally supposed. During the war people in the higher income brackets tended to put aside a larger proportion than usual of their current incomes but not with the idea of providing the wherewithal for a post-war splurge. Some saving, of course, is always inspired by the desire to obtain a specific object, but more often its aim is the achievement of a permanent fund which will be drawn upon with reluctance except in cases of emergency. With most people there is a strong psychological resistance to the use of savings for purposes of current consumption, which means that the so-called liquid assets of individuals are under normal circumstances distinguished by a considerable degree of illiquidity.

Can we assume, then, that the present record volume of savings has no serious inflationary potential? That does not follow. It all depends on the response of holders of liquid assets to a further rise in prices. If that occurs, and particularly if the rise is sudden and dramatic, it might well arouse the fear that money, and assets with a fixed money value, such as government bonds, were becoming increasingly unsafe as a store of purchasing power. There could be a panic rush to turn money into goods, which, in the absence of controls, might send prices into the stratosphere. In view of the fact, however, that a large proportion of all savings are held by the well-to-do, part of this inflationary pressure would spill over into the stock and real-estate markets as people sought to conserve their assets by investing them in equities. In either case the price of government bonds would tend to fall, unless supported by massive purchases by the Federal Reserve banks, which would mean an increase in the money supply and new fuel for the inflationary fires. Our conclusion must be, then, that the mass of liquid assets wil remain comparatively inert as long as prices are kept under control, but should prices be allowed to break loose, a chain reaction might be started which would convert this mass into an economic high explosive.

KEITH HUTCHISON

BOOKS and the ARTS

To Juan at the Winter Solstice

There is one story and one story only
That will prove worth your telling,
Whether as learned bard or gifted child;
To it all lines or lesser gauds belong
That startle with their shining
Such common stories as they stray into.

Is it of trees you tell, their mouths and virtues,
Of strange beasts that beset you,
Of birds that croak at you the Triple will?
Or of the Zodiac and how slow it turns
Below the Boreal Crown,
Prison of all true kings that ever reigned?

Water to water, ark again to ark,
From woman back to woman:
So each new victim treads unfalteringly
The never altered circuit of his fate,
Bringing twelve peers as witness
Both to his starry rise and starry fall.

Or is it of the Virgin's silver beauty,
All fish below the thighs?
She in her left hand bears a leafy quince;
When with her right she crooks a finger, smiling,
How may the King hold back?
Royally then he barters life for love.

Or of the undying snake from chaos hatched,
Whose coils contain the ocean,
Into whose chops with naked sword he springs,
Then in black water, tangled by the reeds,
Battles three days and nights,
To be spewed up beside her scalloped shore?

Much snow is falling, winds roar hollowly,
The owl hoots from the elder,
Fear in your heart cries to the loving-cup:
Sorrow to sorrow as the sparks fly upward.
The log groans and confesses
There is one story and one story only.

Dwell on her graciousness, dwell on her smiling,
Do not forget what flowers
The great boar trampled down in ivy time.
Her brow was creamy as the long ninth wave,
Her sea-blue eyes were wild
But nothing promised that is not performed.

ROBERT GRAVES

Murder, Inc.

BLOOD IN THE STREETS: THE LIFE AND RULE OF TRUJILLO. By Albert C. Hicks. Creative Age Press. $2.75.

TRUTH, indeed, has a hard time of it. Never has this statement had more force or meaning than in the effort of writers to tell the world the truth of what goes on inside the Dominican Republic. Now the story is told. In this excellently documented account of the life and rule of Raphael Trujillo, the dictatorial ruler of that once respected Latin American country, Albert C. Hicks has done a job for which, I dare say, hundreds of thousands of terrorized Dominicans at home and in exile will be everlastingly grateful.

This is no ordinary biography. This is not simply a collection of stories about the wild and reckless life of an irresponsible criminal, suddenly risen to power in some distant land which we neither care about nor can be affected by. This is a stirring account, authenticated by names, dates, and places, of the rise of a man who in early life was a cattle thief and gangster—a man who rose through successive stages of criminal conspiracy in both civilian and army life, wholesale murder of friend and foe alike, until in 1930 he became President of the Republic of San Domingo. From this high office he has controlled commercialized prostitution and gambling, from which his take is estimated to be one million dollars a year; the sale of vital food stuffs, such as milk, salt, rice, and meat, from which four articles alone it is reported that he receives more than five and a half million dollars a year in graft; a 10 per cent levy on all government employees, most of which goes to his personal treasury; all imports and shipping facilities. From all these sources of graft it is estimated that he nets fifty thousand dollars a day, most of which he deposits in the National City Bank in New York. (It is reported that his account is the second largest of the foreign clients of that great banking institution.) Albert Hicks says that more than 3,000 Dominicans have been murdered by Trujillo; he says further that 15,000 Haitians were killed in one of the world's most deliberate slaughters of human beings—the so-called Haitian-Dominican border massacre. Both of these estimates, says Hicks, are very conservative. (I was in Haiti at the time. If anything I believe his estimate an understatement.) In his last chapter he names the most prominent of these victims of Trujillo. The standing of these victims in San Domingo is the most amazing thing about the list. In our own country a similar group would include the highest generals of our army, several Presidential candidates in the past two or three elections, many United States Senators and Representatives, and numerous writers, authors, students, and newspaper correspondents.

All through this book the reader is at a loss to understand why, with most of this information available and familiar to our State Department and its representatives in the Dominican Republic, we have not at least withdrawn our ambassador, thus giving notice to the world that we refuse to recognize such a tyrant as Trujillo. This is the one thing that he fears more than anything else in the world. But with full knowledge of his crimes, of the oppression of two million of his subjects, of this constant threat to security in the American hemisphere, our State Department condones his every action, receives him and lavishly entertains him both in San Domingo and in this country. All this honor goes to a man who has openly stated that he intends to annex the Republic of Haiti and, as soon as it obtains its independence, Puerto Rico as well.

"Blood in the Streets" is an amazing document. It is more than interesting reading; it is as valuable a contribution to the cause of peace and democracy in Latin America as any of the conferences held during the last decade. In my opinion it is more valuable, because Hicks has exposed the worst dictator existing in the world today—a man who lives right here at our very doorstep, one whose criminal example and success others in the Americas may well attempt to emulate. With the exposure of this tyrant dictator widely publicized throughout the world, and particularly in Latin America, we may hope to live in a day when such names as Vargas of Brazil, Machado of Cuba, Lescot of Haiti, Perón of Argentina, and Trujillo of the Dominican Republic will be but a hazy memory.

The United States can neither keep the respect of the rest of the Americas nor hope for a real and lasting peace there as long as it continues to recognize the world's most criminal dictator. No country, whatever its size, is too small to be important in tomorrow's peace.

RAYMOND PACE ALEXANDER

A Classic of Popular Science

THE COMMON SENSE OF THE EXACT SCIENCES. By William Kingdon Clifford. Newly Edited and with an Introduction by James R. Newman. Preface by Bertrand Russell. Alfred A. Knopf. $4.

PHYSICISTS have been recently giving overt expression to their sense of the moral import of scientific inquiry. But while their current activity as practical moralists is unusual because of its organized political character, such activity is no isolated event in the history of modern science. There have been few scientists of first rank who did not assume that the outcome of scientific research has far-reaching implications for the basic attitudes and beliefs of men; and few of them were not profoundly convinced that the habits of mind formed in such research have a moral significance not confined to the laboratory or to the study. Wisdom in private and public policy is possible only if competent knowledge and a reliable intellectual method are at the command of those who determine that policy. Accordingly, outstanding scientific workers in every age have sought to make accessible to lay audiences both the findings and the logic of scientific inquiry in popular form.

It is a truism that a democratic society cannot afford to let scientific knowledge and the scientific temper of mind be the exclusive possession of any special group. Current discussions

"I am a Negro American. All my life I have wanted to be an AMERICAN"

Thus Spencer Logan begins his book, which tells frankly what one Negro thinks about America. With the perspective that comes from his experiences as a civilian and a soldier, he analyzes the handicaps and advantages with which he and other members of his race face life in America today. He makes some penetrating observations on the type of leadership which the Negro in this country has had, on the Negro's attitude toward miscegenation, on the Harlems of America, on the Negro soldier. He ardently champions a more democratic way of life for both whites and Negroes.

Mr. Logan is a veteran who served in France, Luxemburg, Germany, and the Pacific, and rose to the rank of Staff Sergeant in the Army. His manuscript was selected, from hundreds submitted by members of the armed forces all over the world, as first prize winner in non-fiction of the Macmillan Centenary Award.

"I have seldom read a more concise and reasonable statement of the principles of democracy than the one set forth in this book."—Edwin A. Peeples, Atlanta Journal.

Spencer Logan's

A NEGRO'S FAITH IN AMERICA

$1.75 at your bookstore MACMILLAN

of education are in general agreement on this central point, however much they may be in conflict over the specific ways by which the common goal may be best realized. But no system of formal education can hope to keep the vast majority in a society satisfactorily informed about fundamental advances in knowledge. Most adults must obtain their ideas on such matters from the literature of popularized science. It is therefore a genuine public misfortune that in this country the need for an adequate literature of science for the layman has received but scant attention from educational theorists or from competent scientists with a gift for popular exposition.

England has been more fortunate in this respect than the United States, and Clifford's deservedly famous account of the experimental foundations of applied mathematics is a brilliant example of what eminent British scientists have so often managed to achieve in the way of communicating lucidly the theoretical basis of modern science to a wide audience. Sixty years have passed since the book was first published, but no part of its contents is out of date, in spite of the great changes that have occurred in physics. The fact that Clifford was a man with prophetic vision and that the recent revolutions in science, contrary to a widespread view, have left untouched the fundamentals of its procedure explains the continued modernity of the book only in part. Its enduring value as an introduction to the natural sciences is in large measure the outcome of the manner in which Clifford envisaged the task of popularization.

This perennial task can be conceived and executed in several ways. A writer can emphasize the immediately practical consequences of scientific discovery to the exclusion of the general ideas underlying new inventions, and so generate in his reader no more than an uninformed wonder at the ingenious gadgets of science. He can deliberately attempt to bolster hallowed moral dogmas or a speculative philosophy by citing in evidence the latest alleged findings of scientific inquiry. He can direct attention to some of the sociological determinants of scientific advance, pointing out the influence of social needs upon the direction of research but leaving his reader no wiser as to the contents of theoretical innovations. Or finally, he can undertake the central educational job of making clear the major ideas involved in research, together with the general methods in terms of which the conclusions arrived at are warranted.

Clifford's book belongs to the regrettably small number of popularizations in this latter group. It deals entirely with technical matters, but he wrote it in the firm belief that the logic—though not necessarily the techniques—developed in the natural sciences is capable of extension to everything that pertains to man's interests. With Mach and Pearson, Clifford shared the positivist faith of so many in his age that with proper instruction in responsible intellectual methods men would abandon traditional dogmas and direct their blind impulses into reasonable channels of activity. It has become fashionable to revile this positivism as the primary source of contemporary moral chaos. In fact, however, integral to this philosophy is the classic view that what is good for man can be determined and realized only through the progressive employment of the rational methods of the sciences. Clifford and his contemporaries doubtless were unduly optimistic concerning men's willingness to take a scientifically disciplined reason as their guide in the choice of values; and they certainly underestimated the power of deep-seated emotions as springs of human action. But they cannot be fairly accused of lacking moral vision or moral fervor. Indeed, it still seems to many that the alternative to Clifford's conception of the moral significance of scientific method is an irresponsible romanticism in values coupled with the use of brutal force.

However, the moral motivations of positivism appear explicitly nowhere in Clifford's book. The chief evidence in it of his general outlook is his consistent application of the principle that scientific ideas are most clearly understood in terms of the operations involved in using them. Clifford's discussions are in consequence illuminating throughout, while at the same time they demand close attention from his readers. Indeed, the reader is offered no glib survey of spectacular conclusions in the sciences, nor does he become equipped to discuss with an appearance of learning the latest turns of thought in physics. But whoever does master the lucid expositions of the nature of number, geometry, and motion will have acquired a penetrating understanding of the unitary structure of mathematics, and will also be prepared to grasp the theoretical foundations upon which more recent scientific developments are built. Such a reader will be able to evaluate for what they are worth the widely current anti-intellectual critiques of science, and to judge whether these represent, as is often claimed, the profoundest wisdom.

A warmly appreciative preface by Bertrand Russell and

H. G. WELLS— Prophet of the Atomic Bomb

Read his latest book:

"CRUX ANSATA — An Indictment of the Roman Catholic Church."

A historical summary of the Catholic Church's political intrigues leading to its tie-up with the Nazi-Fascist-Shinto Axis. Cloth Binding $1.75

Also get a copy of

"BEHIND THE DICTATORS," by L. H. Lehmann. A fully documented analysis of Vatican-Fascist collaboration. Cloth Binding $1.75

COMBINATION OFFER — Both Cloth Bound Books $3.00

New Pamphlet

"VATICAN POLICY IN THE SECOND WORLD WAR"

48 pages of Documented Facts . . . . . 25¢

Free to those who return this ad with their order for the above books

Order From:

AGORA PUBLISHING CO., Dept. 751

229 WEST 48TH STREET NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

FOUR BOOKS BY UPTON SINCLAIR JUST OFF THE PRESS!

• Vol. 1. THE BOOK OF THE MIND
• Vol. 2. THE BOOK OF THE BODY
• Vol. 3. THE BOOK OF LOVE
• Vol. 4. THE BOOK OF SOCIETY

These 4 volumes constitute Upton Sinclair's THE BOOK OF LIFE.

Vol. 1 contains 100 pages, about 50,000 words. Vol. 2 contains 96 pages, about 45,000 words. Vol. 3 contains 96 pages, about 45,000 words. Vol. 4 contains 115 pages, about 50,000 words.

These four books contain practical counsel discussing the conduct of life from modern standards. They answer the question: What do present day men and women need to know in order to live wisely? Another question Sinclair asks and answers: What are the paths to happiness, the laws of health both of mind and body? Upton Sinclair, in these four books, discusses these questions in simple language and a spirit of good fellowship.

During the first 42 years of his life, says Upton Sinclair, he made many painful mistakes, but he learned much from them. Looking about him, he sees others making these same mistakes, suffering for lack of that same knowledge which he has so painfully acquired. This being the case, it seems a friendly act to offer his knowledge, minus the blunders and the pain. That explains the reason for writing the four books listed above.

Upton Sinclair writes as follows on the claims that may be made for the four books listed in this announcement:

"First, they are modern books. Their writer watches hour by hour the new achievements of the human mind, he reaches out for information about them, he seeks to adjust his own thoughts to them and to test them in his own living. Second, they are, or try hard to be, wise books; their writer is not among those too-ardent young radicals who leap to the conclusion that because many old things are stupid and tiresome, therefore everything that is old is to be spurned with contempt, and everything that proclaims itself new is to be taken at its own valuation. Third, these are honest books; their writer doesn't pretend to know what he only guesses, and where it is necessary to guess he says so frankly. Finally, they are kind books; they were not writen for their author's glory, nor for his enrichment, but to tell you things that may be useful to you in the brief span of your life."

In these four books Upton Sinclair attempts to tell you how to live, how to find health and happiness and success, how to work and how to play, how to eat and how to sleep, how to love and to marry and to care for your children, how to deal with your fellow men in business and politics and social life, how to think, what art to enjoy, what books to read. A large order, as the boys phrase it!

You will get a good idea of what Upton Sinclair covers in these four volumes by studying each book's chapter headings, as follows:

THE BOOK OF THE MIND. 1. The Nature of Life. 2. The Nature of Faith. 3. The Use of Reason. 4. The Origin of Morality. 5. Nature and Man. 6. Man the Rebel. 7. Making Our Morals. 8. The Virtue of Moderation. 9. The Choosing of Life. 10. Myself and My Neighbors. 11. The Mind and the Body. 12. The Mind of the Body. 13. Exploring the Subconscious. 14. The Problem of Immortality. 15. Survival. 16. The Powers of the Mind. 17. The Conduct of the Mind

THE BOOK OF THE BODY. 1. The Unity of the Body. 2. Experiments in Diet. 3. Errors in Diet. 4. Diet Standards. 5. Foods and Poisons. 6. More About Health. 7. Work and Play. 8. The Fasting Cure. 9. Breaking the Fast. 10 Diseases and Cures.

THE BOOK OF LOVE. 1. The Reality of Marriage. 2. The Development of Marriage. 3. Sex and Young America. 4. Sex and the "Smart Set." 5. Sex and the Poor. 6. Sex and Nature. 7. Love and Economics. 8. Marriage and Money. 9. Love versus Lust. 10. Celibacy versus Chastity. 11. The Defense of Love. 12. Birth Control. 13. Early Marriage. 14. The Marriage Club. 15. Education for Marriage. 16. The Money Side of Marriage. 17. The Defense of Monogamy. 18. The Problem of Jealousy. 19. The Problem of Divorce. 20. The Restriction of Divorce.

THE BOOK OF SOCIETY. 1. The Ego and the World. 2. Competition and Co-operation. 3. Aristocracy and Democracy. 4. Ruling Classes. 5. The Process of Social Evolution. 6. Industrial Evolution. 7. The Class Struggle. 8. The Capitalist System. 9. The Capitalist Process. 10. Hard Times. 11. The Iron Ring. 12. Foreign Markets. 13. Capitalist War. 14. The Possibilities of Production. 15. The Cost of Competition. 16. Socialism and Syndicalism. 17. Communism and Anarchism. 18. Social Revolution. 19. Confiscation or Compensation. 20. Expropriating the Expropriators. 21. The Problem of the Land. 22. The Control of Credit. 23. The Control of Industry. 24. The New World. 25. Agricultural Production. 26. Intellectual Production. 27. Mankind Remade.

In all, these four volumes contain 425 large pages, 5½ x 8⅛ inches in size, printed in readable type.

All 4 volumes may be had for $2, prepaid. If you order less than the complete set of 4 volumes, please remit at the rate of 75¢ per book, prepaid. At that rate the 4 books would cost $3, but buying all 4 books at one time for $2 means a saving of $1. Please mail your order today. These books are ready for immediate delivery.

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS, Box 1532, Girard, Kansas

ORDER BLANK FOR SINCLAIR'S 4 VOLUMES

E. Haldeman-Julius, Box 1532, Girard, Kansas

Enclosed please find $2, which is payment in full for all four volumes by Upton Sinclair, as follows: 1. The Book of the Mind. 2. The Book of the Body. 3. The Book of Love. 4. The Book of Society. Prepaid. (If you order fewer than the four volumes that constitute this set of Sinclair's Book of Life, remit at the rate of 75¢ per volume, prepaid. There is a marked saving when all 4 books are ordered for $2.

Name.....

Address.....

City.....

State.....

an excellent account of Clifford's general philosophy, together with some notes on the text, by James R. Newman, the editor of the present reissue, add further value to a valuable book.

ERNEST NAGEL

BRIEFER COMMENT

Alexander Hamilton

THE NIGHT BEFORE HIS FATAL DUEL with Aaron Burr, Alexander Hamilton wrote of "our real disease, which is democracy." If the disease was spreading—Hamilton's Federalist Party was falling to pieces, and Jefferson, that "atheist in religion, and a fanatic in politics," was in the White House—it was not because Hamilton had failed to fight it through twenty years of public life.

As Nathan Schachner's able biography "Alexander Hamilton" (D. Appleton-Century Company, $4) makes abundantly clear, the erratic Hamilton was the most brilliant apologist for reaction yet to appear in America. In the continuing struggle between the special interests of the few and the common interests of the many the democratic ideals of Jefferson have in succeeding generations found their champions in Lincoln and Franklin Roosevelt; the ideas of Hamilton have found champions aplenty, but never of the same caliber.

Jefferson, with more objectivity than Hamilton could muster, epitomized the difference between them: "One feared most the ignorance of the people; the other the selfishness of rulers independent of them." But Hamilton, who wrote scornfully that "I am not much attached to the majesty of the multitude," often served them better than he knew. As an author of the Federalist he fought hard for a Constitution in which he had little faith. As Secretary of the Treasury he enlisted the self-interest of the wealthy in creating a strong financial structure for the young nation. Because the poison of democracy "by a subdivision will only be the more concentrated in each part, and consequently the more virulent," he supported a strong central government.

Hamilton, however, was frustrated throughout his life in his greatest ambition. Though Schachner does not emphasize the point, Hamilton was ever ready to become the man on horseback in America. As a precocious youth in a West Indies counting-house he dreamed of military glory. That dream never deserted the Federalist who told Jefferson: "The greatest man who ever lived was Julius Caesar." As a youthful aide to Washington he fretted for a more dashing assignment, which he obtained, only briefly, under Muhlenberg at Yorktown. As a member of Washington's Cabinet he insisted upon the use of force against the "Whiskey Rebellion" and placed himself at the head of the militia which marched against the despised democrats. He dreamed of leading the United States in a war against France, the fountain of Jacobin ideas, and in a war of conquest against South America.

Schachner, the biographer of Aaron Burr, has written an excellent biography of Hamilton. He has made extensive use of unpublished material, and presents his findings judiciously and with care. If there is a fault to be found with the biography, it is that it is almost too judicious; there is almost an antiseptic quality about it. It is as if Schachner, for eighteen years a practicing attorney, had said: here are the facts, the evaluation of them is for the jury.

COLEMAN ROSENBERGER

The World of Vincent Sheean

IT WOULD BE EASY to set down one's agreements and disagreements with the political views expressed in "This House Against This House," by Vincent Sheean (Random House, $3.50). The author will have no part of the liberal criticism of our North African policy; but like any liberal critic he is discouraged almost to the point of despair by our Italian policy. And yet to concern oneself with these things in a review as brief as this would be to slight the real and singular value of this book, which lies in what I can only describe as the easy force and relaxed seriousness of its impressions. It is earnest and vivid and at times caustic; yet there is nothing of the revolting "high-octane" school of writing and nothing of dogmatism. Nor does the book fall into the other extreme of a spurious urbanity. Systems of politics have little attraction for Mr. Sheean, but his values are deeply and naturally believed. They are not beliefs of the head but of the whole man, and the record here set down has a consequent largeness and warmth.

That, I say, is the general tenor of this good book. Sometimes the author's power to set down the essence of an experience shocks one: the impressive pages on India illustrate his merits and demerits better than any others. The prostrate humility, the incredible and intolerable sensitivity within the abjectness of the Indian man and woman have rarely been described with such a sense of painful recoil. One is compelled to contradict Mr. Sheean when he says the British have done nothing in or to India. They have, one retorts, introduced an impossibly inappropriate system of private ownership of land. And so terrible is his account of Indian poverty and dejection that one is forced to ask why in God's name Mr. Sheean thinks it odd that so many Indians should have been indifferent to what they were bound to regard as Britain's defense of its empire against Japanese and German imperialism. Yet when the most violent debate is over, it must be admitted that no political formulation could be a reliable guide if it were not accompanied by an absolute recognition of the spiritual characteristics the author describes.

RALPH BATES

The Battle of Godly Wood

NEIL SWANSON is a newspaperman who has written a number of historical novels. In his recently published "The Perilous Fight" (Farrar and Rinehart, $3.50) he has written some superb history, combining scholarly research with skill in description, characterization, and incident.

The defense of Fort McHenry has become a part of the American legend because it was the inspiration for our national anthem. Mr. Swanson tells the story of an equally important but forgotten battle. But for the American victory at Godly Wood, won by the same militia who had been routed at Bladensburg but who were now commanded by General Sam Smith, an old soldier who also has been forgotten, Fort McHenry and Baltimore would have fallen, the "Star Spangled Banner" might not have been written, and the Treaty of Ghent might have been far different.

Mr. Swanson has established the importance of a neglected incident in our history. He has done it in a competent, scholarly fashion. Best of all, his history is vibrantly alive.

RALPH ADAMS BROWN

FICTION IN REVIEW

IT WOULD seem, from the two novels I read this week, that the vogue for extravagant family reminiscence has hit our English cousins too. There is Nancy Mitford's popular "The Pursuit of Love" (Random House, $2.50), whose main burden is romantic, but whose first half, at least, can be read as an English "Life with Father." There is also Dane Chandos's "Abbie" (Putnam, $2.75), a series of orthodox anecdotal recollections of the author's eccentric aunt.

The tyrannical patriarch of "The Pursuit of Love" is Uncle Matthew (also known as "Fa," also Lord Alconleigh), a great patriot and xenophobe—he particularly hates Germans—a believer in horses and home cooking, and a gentleman of such rages that he grinds down several pairs of dentures a year. According to Miss Mitford, the whimsical graces of English upper-class children flourish mightily in such rocky soil. Valiant little riders and hunters though they may be, the Radlett youngsters are also given to a morbid sensibility about pet mice, to cute spontaneous verse-making, to dreams of love in an attic linen closet. The only warm spot in the great country house, this closet is called the Hon Cupboard. It is the place where the children play their favorite game of parceling the world into Hons and non-Hons. Hons are the offspring of Lords; a non-Hon is anyone the children dislike. Honorary membership in the Hons is bestowed upon a favorite stable boy, and we are little surprised when, in later years, the Spanish Loyalists can also be referred to as "terrific Hons." But some time before this natural widening of the Alconleigh horizon, Miss Mitford's conscious humor has begun to thin; from childhood reminiscence her novel has progressed to the emotional history of Linda, most beautiful and delicate-minded of Uncle Matthew's daughters, who after two unsatisfactory marriages, to a banker and a Communist, finds true love with a French duke who picks her up in the Gare du Nord. Miss Mitford has quite a few good things to say for French nobility—as lovers, as keepers of women (teaching Linda how to dress properly, the Duke throws her nasty English mink into the wastepaper basket), as doers of their Free French duty. Such fun as you will find in the so-to-speak adult sections of "The Pursuit of Love" is largely unintentional.

Attention should be called to one episode in Miss Mitford's novel which is so genuinely witty that one would expect a great deal more from its author—the meeting between Uncle Matthew and his new brother-in-law, a mild-spoken, rather wan literary man, as learned as he is hypochondriacal. The family is rather afraid to introduce this new relation, convinced that Uncle Matthew will despise him with all the vigor of his own non-intellectuality. Quite the contrary, however, Uncle Matthew conceives a deep respect and affection for the newcomer, based on the latter's refusal to discover the least value in any of the Alconleigh household treasures. A much-cherished bronze is pronounced Japanese and not Chinese, and therefore worthless; a collection of minerals, legendarily "good enough for a museum," is diagnosed as diseased and not worth keeping. "I never saw such a fella," says Uncle Matthew in delight before a scholarship of such destructive proportions.

Like Miss Mitford's Uncle Matthew, Mr. Chandos's Aunt Abbie also loves England, especially her flowers and animals, and hates foreigners, particularly Boches; similarly, she is a person of titanic passions, energies, and egocentricity—it seems to be a national-class characteristic. One of the wealthiest women in England, Aunt Abbie is shamelessly penurious; a born aristocrat, she is also without the sentiment of fear of her fellow-man—which may be perfectly all right so long as she confines her activities to making an ex-king pay her bridge losses or taking Bill Tilden on at tennis, but rings a different note when it moves her to cheat porters and taxi-drivers of their tips and to bully waiters and gardeners. Mr. Chandos's "Abbie" is described as "the wickedly witty portrait of an appalling and delightful female." Myself I found it more grisly than amusing, and not (I hope) as authentic a recollection as it purports to be.

DIANA TRILLING

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE Nation Money-Saving Magazine Combinations

with Harper's Magazine $7.50
You save $2.50

with Consumers Union $8.00
You save $1.50

with Harper's Magazine and Consumers Union $10.00
You save $3.50

with Free World $8.50
You save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION by itself:

☐ One Year $6 ☐ Two Years $10 ☐ Three Years $14

☐ Servicemen's Rate $4 a Year
Canadian and Foreign Postage—$1 a year extra

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

_____

_____

_____

☐ Remittance enclosed. ☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

7-6-46

STAGE PLAYS

THEATRE GUILD'S PRODUCTIONS
THE MUSICAL HIT
CAROUSEL
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
with Harold Keel — Iva Withers
Jean Darling • Erie Mattson • Christine Johnson • Jean Casto
AIR-COND. MAJESTIC Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT
OKLAHOMA!
Based on Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs"
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
Jack Kilty • Joseph Buloff • Betty Jane Watson • Ruth Weston
AIR-COND. ST. JAMES Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." — Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents
BORN YESTERDAY
The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40. AIR-COND.

"MERMAN'S A WOW."—Chapman, News
RICHARD RODGERS and OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd Present
ETHEL MERMAN in
"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"
Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON
Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN
IMPERIAL THEA., 45th St. W. of Bway. Mats. Wed. & Sat. Air-Cond.

Buy Your Books through THE Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price, post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible.

•

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
The Nation
20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"Spreads a wild gayety flavored with Gallic impudence"
—N. Y. World-Telegram
GINGER ROGERS
in SAM WOOD'S
'HEARTBEAT'
JEAN PIERRE AUMONT
Adolphe Menjou • Basil Rathbone
—AND—
'BEDLAM' WITH BORIS KARLOFF

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL B'way & 62 St.

"Entertainment at its subtle best!"
—N. Y. World-Telegram.
DARRYL F. ZANUCK Presents
GENE TIERNEY • VINCENT PRICE
'DRAGONWYCK'
From ANYA SETON'S Novel
—AND—
'DING DONG WILLIAMS'
MARCY McGUIRE • GLENN VERNON

EUGENE O'NEILL says:
"The finest picture I have ever seen. I enjoyed it so much I went a second time... and I am going to see it again."
The THEATRE GUILD presents
LAURENCE OLIVIER
in William Shakespeare's
"HENRY V"
IN TECHNICOLOR • Released Thru United Artists
PRICES: Evgs. (at 8:30) $2.40, $1.80 Mats. daily (at 2:30) $1.80, $1.20
ALL SEATS RESERVED
NOW! N. Y. CITY CENTER 131 West 55th St.

HAL WALLIS Presents
ROBERT YOUNG • SYLVIA SIDNEY
ANN RICHARDS
"THE SEARCHING WIND"
From the Broadway play by LILLIAN HELLMAN
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

—IN PERSON—
ANDY RUSSELL
PLUS
ALAN CARNEY
•
THE PIED PIPERS
•
Extra Added Attraction
RAYMOND SCOTT
And His New 1946 Band

NOW PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

Films

JAMES AGEE

LILLIAN HELLMAN'S "The Searching Wind" is a study of the characteristic inability of Americans of good family and responsible position to admit what stares them in the face or, admitting it, to try to do anything about it. The personal and political aspects of the drama get in each other's way and, perhaps inevitably, lose in drive and shape by being staged to cover practically every major political crisis between the March on Rome and the immediate past. But the people themselves and the way they talk and think reveal many painful variations of our particular national brands of well-bred cowardice—political, emotional, and moral; and those who are more conscious and brave are given the limitedness, self-righteousness, and monotony which, unfortunately, are so often typical of them. People as highly civilized as these are seldom seen in the movies, and are still more seldom played with understanding. They are very firmly played here—though with touches perhaps of highly civilized ham—by Dudley Digges, Robert Young, Sylvia Sidney, Ann Richards, and Albert Bassermann. Their actions are very sumptuously and very well set, lighted, and dressed. And they are directed with his usual controlled intensity by William Dieterle. I can't feel that the picture will do any good, at this late hour, any more than it might have at an earlier one; nor, I fear, would any kind of dramatized self-criticism, no matter how deeply searching. But it is a careful, angry, honest film, and nothing it says is less apposite now than it would have been ten years ago, or twenty.

I did not read "Anna and the King of Siam"; after seeing the movie I am, to my pleased surprise, tempted to. I am not among those who take to Irene Dunne—as a rule she makes my skin crawl; nor do I wholly enjoy Rex Harrison's highly skilled, generally restrained horsing as the naively intelligent monarch whose good intentions enthrone him in a prattfall between his ancient and our modern world. There is indeed a good deal of high-polished and expensive cuteness about the whole production which stands, I suppose, as an apology for venturing to film a story that fits none of the formulas. But in spite of and through all this, the relationship between the rattled, irascible king and the English widow is often real, clear, and delightful, and occasionally very touching.

I cannot recommend "To Each His Own" highly enough to those who can still bear to be interested in what goes on in the cerebral powder-rooms of middle-class American women; or who still care to measure the depths to which some professionals will dive, self-deluded or otherwise, in the effort to profit by the pathological appetites of such women. In these terms it is an extraordinarily illuminating and skilful movie. It is skilful, in fact, however you look at it. But if you lack my all but necrophilic kind of interest in such stuff, you have fair warning. As for skill, any scientist can tell you what that is good for, irresponsibly employed.

Of course it is still possible to put it to work honorably; the results of that are so admirable in Laurence Olivier's production of "Henry V" that I must postpone any attempt to do the film honor until I have more space.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

ON Victor's July list is a recording of Randall Thompson's "Testament of Freedom" made by Koussevitzky with the Boston Symphony and the Harvard Glee Club (Set 1054; $3.85). The work, composed in 1943 to commemorate the two hundredth anniversary of Jefferson's birth, is a setting of four passages from his writings. Perhaps music could be written that would have an expressive relation to statements like "The God who gave us life gave us liberty at the same time; the hand of force may destroy but cannot disjoin them," or "We have counted the cost of this contest, and find nothing so dreadful as voluntary slavery," or "Our cause is just. Our union is perfect. Our internal resources are great." But Thompson has not written it. Instead the words are fitted to a piece of patriotic musical oratory that involves them in moods, structural devices, and climaxes with which which they have no real relation; and the incongruous musical contexts rob the words of their own impressiveness and even make them ridiculous. The recorded sound of the performance is good.

It has been amazing to hear what popular pieces like the Overture to "Zampa" and Sousa's marches have sounded like when Toscanini has played them in recent years; and I once pointed out that a musically unsophisticated person listening to these performances of works that he knew well might be struck by the things that were different about them this time, and in this way might get an idea of the differences possible in performances, and of the particular qualities of Toscanini's performances, which previously he may have been inclined to think people only pretended to hear in order to show their superior understanding. Victor, which issued the performance of Waldteufel's "Skaters" Waltz last winter, now gives us a single record (11-9188; $1) with Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever" and Strauss's "Tritsch-Tratsch" Polka, recorded by Toscanini with the N. B. C. Symphony. The first performance of the march three years ago that was put on an army V-disc was better (it had, for example, a delicious lightness and lilt in the contrasting soft part of the opening passage, a breadth in the concluding passage, that the present performance does not have), but the present one is exciting enough; and the verve, sharpness, and buoyancy of the polka make it a breath-taking delight. The recorded sound of the march hasn't all the brightness of that of the polka.

The result justifies Toscanini's playing of a popular waltz or march; but there is no such result to justify Eleanor Steber's application of her cultivated style to Hoagy Carmichael's "Star Dust" or even to "Summertime" from "Porgy and Bess" (11-9186; $1). The voice sounds lovely; and Robert Merrill's baritone is richly sonorous in "Drink to Me Only with Thine Eyes," which would seem to me to call for something else than the chiffon and rhinestone strings and harps and what not that swirl around the singing on a record (10-1218; $.75) that offers "In the Gloaming" on the reverse side. Stokowski's transcriptions of Tchaikovsky's "Solitude" and "Humoresque," which he has recorded with the Hollywood Bowl Orchestra (11-9187; $1), are something to skip. And the remaining items of this kind on Victor's July list can go without comment.

After my last article had gone to press I received from another reader—a Viennese now in this country—the letter he writes me when I express a low opinion of some highly regarded work or composer. Each time he rebukes and corrects me by quoting at me the all too familiar phrases of the official opinion that I have rejected; and his perplexity and indignation when I continue to reach my own conclusions are evident in his latest letter. "I really don't know what to think of you, reading your lines about the Brahms First: 'the worst of this dreadful work' (The Nation of June 8). Are you serious about it? Because that work always was (and is) considered to continue where Beethoven's Ninth left off. And the "Cyclopedia of Music and Musicians," edited by O. Thompson, says on page 225: 'The four symphonies [of Brahms] have taken their places among the masterpieces of their class and the world accords Brahms the symphonist a rank second only to Beethoven. The First Symphony is distinguished especially by its Olympian grandeur.' Is this not enough for you? I should be surprised at you..." And not—I foresee—for the last time.

A score of America's distinguished leaders — statesmen, authors, educators, scientists, industrialists — tell in personal terms: "Why I Believe in Advancing Unitarianism and Religious Liberalism." Read the personal statements of celebrated modern men who are devoted to the church that meant so much to Presidents Jefferson, John Adams, John Quincy Adams, Fillmore, Taft; to Scientists Darwin, Priestley, Steinmetz; to Authors Dickens, Longfellow, Holmes, Emerson, Hale, Hawthorne, Thoreau; Educators Horace Mann, Peter Cooper, etc.

MAIL WITH 10¢ TO:
American Unitarian Assoc., 25 Beacon Street, Boston 8, Mass. I enclose 10¢. Please send above publication.

*Name*_____

*Address*_____ N66

BOOKS FOUND FREE!

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK REPORTS
22 East 17th Street, New York City

GOOD USED BOOKS
History, Philosophy, Art, Biography, Fiction, etc., etc.
Free Catalogs on Request
H. H. EVANS, Bookseller
3319 Sacramento • San Francisco 18

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Report from Austria

Dear Sirs: One of our representatives in Vienna recently wrote us that G. I.'s are stealing food from American canteens to feed Austrians. "The bread ration is 350 grams a week," he wrote. "There are no potatoes, no cereals. Meats and fats have been non-existent for the past year. The official ration is 900 calories a day, but for many it is actually only 700. The Belsen ration was 800. And in Wiener Neustadt the ration is about one-third of what it is in the capital. For the first time in my life I have seen people die of hunger. In the streets of Vienna it is a common spectacle to see someone collapse from general weakness. Yet in Vienna, as well as in the United States Zone of Austria, there is hope, an item completely lacking in Germany. Please rush delivery of fats, egg powder, powdered milk, cereals, canned meat and fish. . . ." We all applauded the heroism with which the Viennese defended the Workers' Homes built under the Socialist administration. Now we have our first opportunity actually to help the survivors of that struggle maintain a stronghold of democracy in Europe. All aid should be sent them through the International Rescue and Relief Committee, 103 Park Avenue, New York 17, N. Y.

L. HOLLINGSWORTH WOOD, Chairman

New York, June 13

A Debt Is Due

Dear Sirs: We wish to bring to the attention of Nation readers the serious problem facing more than 10,000 non-citizen members of the American merchant marine. These alien seamen—of all nationalities—served heroically during the war. They were torpedoed and wounded. They helped deliver the goods to our armies and to our allies all over the world. Today, they face dismissal from their jobs and deportation. Despite their heroic service, they have no status in this country. With the resumption of peace-time restrictions, crews on merchant ships will be limited to American citizens.

The American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born is campaigning for legislation to grant citizenship to alien seamen with three years' war-time service in the American merchant marine (as provided by S. 659 introduced by Senator George Radcliffe and H. R. 4956 introduced by Representative Hugh De Lacy) and to grant legal entry to alien seamen with one year's war-time service (as provided by S. 1040 introduced by Senator Claude Pepper).

We ask readers of The Nation to write their Congressmen in support of the bills mentioned above. Further information on the campaign can be obtained by writing to us at 23 West Twenty-sixth Street.

ABNER GREEN, Executive Secretary, American Committee for Protection of Foreign Born

New York, May 22

Suggestion for the South

Dear Sirs: I have recently read of two important social and economic problems facing the marginal Southern share-croppers and the entire needlework industry: First, the colored share-croppers are being gradually displaced by mechanical cotton-pickers; second, the needlework trades need new workers to replace the older group of immigrants who were the principal source of the industry's labor pool.

It is my impression that the needlework trades could logically absorb the marginal share-cropper, giving him a much better standard of living and possibly giving the South a new industry.

If this proposal has any merit, an industry leader like Sidney Hillman and a committee of colored vocational leaders could plan a program including both immediate and long-range training for the industry. Such training could include employer-union sponsored apprentice courses in cities and vocational school training in the Southern states; thus a graduate could, immediately upon graduation, step into a job.

This proposal does not involve displacing any present workers, does not require too long training periods, and is suitable to both men and women of all working age groups.

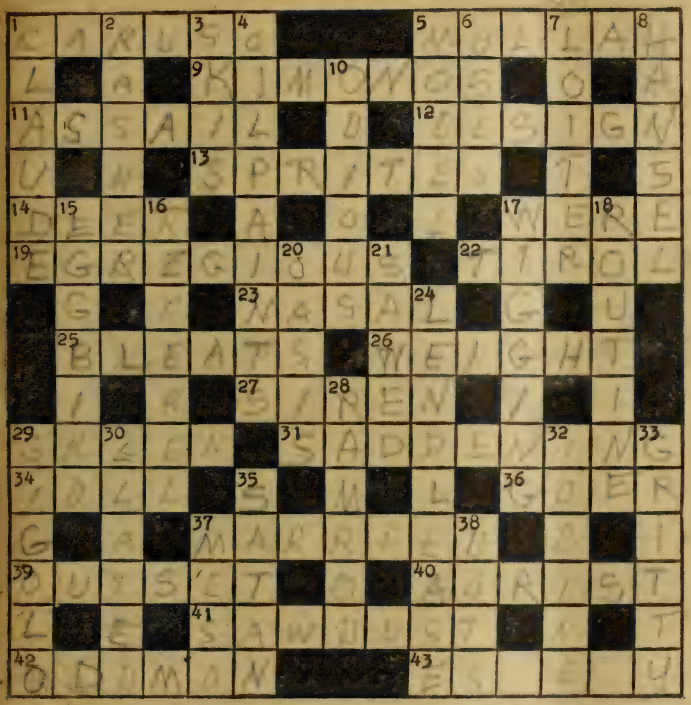
WILLIAM KASSIN

Maywood, Ill., May 13

Classified Advertisements
62 cents a line (six words)
Minimum — three lines
$6.16 per inch
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y
BArclay 7-1066

Crossword Puzzle No. 168

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Famous tenor whose voice could shatter a wine glass (?)
5 One who stirs up rebellion in the East
9 Men, too, wear them in Japan
11 Attack at the end of a Wassail
12 An idea that has taken shape
13 Fairy-like creatures
14 It sounds a costly animal
17 We are contracted
19 What an ass!
22 Alpine crownland in West Austria
23 This organ makes a trumpeting sound when blown
25 Baas
26 A matter of concern to women and boxers
27 Fair charmer with a strident voice
29 A classic race
31 Depressing
34 Not in employment
36 The departing one
37 Wedded and bedded
39 Beginning
40 "Rats? OIL" (anag.)
41 Doll has it in her
42 Third person singular? (3 and 3)
43 The eldest's right to first choice

DOWN

1 French landscape painter
2 Slice so called because it's quickly fried
3 Winter footwear
4 Artistic canvas cover (3 and 6)
5 The inventor hopes it is a working one
6 Practices
7 Hang about
8 One of the babes in the wood in the Humperdinck opera
10 Hateful
15 A sooty tern resolves the age-old problem of which came first
16 He sees that both sides get fair play
17 A good talking-to should effect a transformation
18 The daily round, the common task
20 It makes the desert habitable
21 Cut with a toothed tool
24 An improvement on hire purchase (4 and 5)
28 Became obsolete when breech-loading firearms were introduced
29 An un-American dancing partner
30 Puffed up
32 An application for cuts
33 Full of sand perhaps
35 A fallen angel
37 Plateau
38 Specks

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 167

ACROSS:—1 CYMBALS; 5 THURBER; 9 ARRANGE; 10 ASCETIC; 11 GRILL; 12 BED; 13 TULLE; 14 RESPECT; 16 EXCUSES; 18 DRESDEN; 21 OTTOMAN; 24 GIVES; 26 NYE; 27 BODES; 28 IDOLIZE; 29 BURGLAR; 30 HASBEEN; 31 DECORUM.

DOWN:—1 CHARGER; 2 MERCIES; 3 ANNUL; 4 SHERBET; 5 TWADDLE; 6 UNCUT; 7 BOTTLES; 8 RICKETS; 15 END; 17 CAT; 18 DOGFISH; 19 ENVIOUS; 20 NANKEEN; 21 OVERBID; 22 MEDDLER; 23 NOSTRUM; 25 SEINE; 27 BORIC.

POSITIONS WANTED

SOUTHERN COLORED DOMESTIC and Hotel Workers Desire Jobs. Write today, Quality Employment Service Assn., 214 Clay St., Richmond 19, Va.

WILL TYPE and/or PROOFREAD manuscripts, reports, documents. Accurate, intelligent, speedy homework. Moderate fee. Box 1622, c/o The Nation.

TYPING SERVICE—Novel-length manuscripts a specialty. Carbon copy. Neat; prompt; work proofread. 55¢ per thousand words. ADCO, Station P, Box 131, Brooklyn 12, N. Y.

THE NEW YORK TIMES (November 1st, 1943) reported that the British dropped forged money and food cards over Germany to create confusion. The idea-man who, in an article published eleven months before, suggested this and other devices is stagnating as foreign language press analyst: Would like a stimulating, responsible job anywhere, or to travel for selling, purchasing, scouting, surveying missions. Forty-ish, foreign M.A. degree, broad background, quick learner, resourceful, varied and business experience, high connections abroad.
Dear Reader: Do you know a prospective employer? Call his attenion to this advertisement. Rich returns not only in gratitude. Box 1627, c/o The Nation.

ATTORNEY (Veteran), desires position in field of labor law. Harvard 1937. Four years' experience general practice, New York City. Army counter-intelligence. Box 1628, c/o The Nation.

YOUNG MAN, M. A. Economics, administrative experience, fluent Hebrew, Yiddish, desires part or full time position in research projects. Other employment considered. Box 1630 c/o The Nation.

BOOKS

OUT-OF-PRINT and hard-to-find books located free of charge. Send list of wants to J. Thompson, 1 Hillside Ave., Pelham, N. Y.

WE SPECIALIZE in supplying out-of-print books. Catalogues sent on request. University Book Reserve, 12 Hewins St., Dorchester 21, Mass.

LANGUAGES

ALL LANGUAGES easily and quickly learned by phonograph records. LINGUAPHONE, other makes. New, used—rented. A. Alin, 475 Fifth Avenue, New York 17. MU. 3-1093.

MERCHANDISE FOR SALE

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.40 per carton, postpaid. Send check or money order. Ace Mail Order Co., East Orange 1, N. J.

The New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

•

Yearly subscription
$6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

FARMS AND ACREAGE

40 MILE VIEW; one acre garden; six-room house with new cellar; new white paint; freshly plastered walls; 16 miles Tanglewood; electricity; well. Asking $3,000. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

FALL RENTAL

FALL RENTAL IN PICTURESQUE BERKSHIRES. Rural New York seven-room modernized colonial home on 150 acre property with brook, pond, rolling meadows, birch and pine woods, complete privacy. Opportunity fishing and skiing. Ideal spot for creative work. House furnished and equipped for housekeeping. Accessible Pittsfield and Albany. Box 1629, c/o The Nation.

SUMMER RENTALS

GRANITE LAKE CABINS for adults. Swimming, boating, fishing, good food. Private baths. June 27th to September 16th. From $80.000 weekly double. American plan. Box 77, Munsonville, N. H.

THREE-ROOM COTTAGE on beautifully located farm 50 miles from N. Y. Modern conveniences. Swimming Pool. Phone SLocum 6-6250.

RESORTS

Silver Brook House
PINE HILL NEW YORK
Catskill Mts., light, airy rooms, running hot-cold water, excellent cooking. Cultured homelike atmosphere. Beautiful mountain scenery. Bathing, fishing. All sport facilities.
MAKE RESERVATIONS NOW
Tel.: PINE HILL 3836, or N. Y. Phone RI. 9-7053
RATES: July and August, $50 up

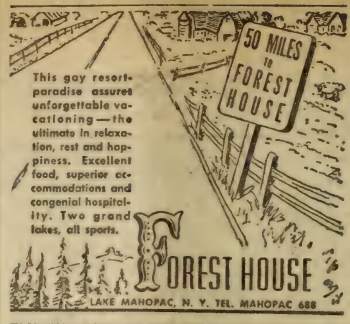
BYRAM LODGE
ARMONK, N. Y. Tel. Armonk Vill. 906
Only 35 miles from N. Y. C. in Westchester. Completely remodeled, all conveniences, new furnishings. Beautiful mattresses, all sports, bowling.
Rates $60 weekly; $10 daily. American Plan.
American-Jewish Cuisine
N. Y. Office 11 West 42nd Street PE 6-3243

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.
ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

This Adult Camp...
Sheltered cove near picturesque Gloucester. Salt water swimming, sailing, boating and fishing on premises. Dancing, tennis, trips and all sports.
Gloucester, Mass.
ABRAM RESNICK
Director
Write for booklet and rates.

An Invitation to carefree vacation. We take pride in announcing the opening of
DEUEL HOLLOW HOUSE
in beautiful, historic Dutchess County. 70 miles from New York. Delicious food served on terrace overlooking our private lake, tennis, handball, swimming. Recreation in antique Quaker hall. A completely informal atmosphere.
DEUEL HOLLOW HOUSE
Wingdale, N. Y. Phone 2568

RESORTS



50 MILES to FOREST HOUSE
This gay resort-paradise assures unforgettable vacationing — the ultimate in relaxation, rest and happiness. Excellent food, superior accommodations and congenial hospitality. Two grand lakes, all sports.
FOREST HOUSE
LAKE MAHOPAC, N. Y. TEL. MAHOPAC 688

Return from a Vacation
Looking Fine — Feeling Fine
From
WESTERN VIEW FARM.
high in the Connecticut Hills, you can return tanned, glowing and invigorated, and with happy memories of the warm hospitality of an Inn which is in its Twenty-seventh season under the same ownership and management.
Rates per person, $12.00 a day, $70.00 a week
Week-ends, Friday evening to Sunday evening, $24.
TED OHMER
New Milford, Connecticut Tel.: New Milford 440

SCHROON Crest
"In the Adirondacks"
POTTERSVILLE NEW YORK
Private Beach, Canoes, Boating, All Sports, Recordings, Playhouse, Bar, Dancing, Entertainment Nightly. Jules Adolphe & His Group. Harry Aishin & Orchestra. Excellent Cuisine. • Make Reservations Early.
N. Y. City Off.: PHONE, MAin 4-8570
LEAH OKUN — IRV. SCHOENBERG, Mgt.
An Adult Resort — On SCHROON LAKE

SACKS FARM
Saugerties, N. Y. Tel. 590-J
Unusually beautiful countryside, pine woods, good, homey Jewish-American cooking. All conveniences. Intimate and restful. Swimming, horseback, tennis and other sports. Adults. Booklet.

Ridgefield, Conn. • Phone 820
A resort of distinction fashioned from a country estate. Water sports, hiking trails, tennis. Library, open fireplaces, Congenial atmosphere. Famous cuisine.

LAKE VIEW LODGE
BOLTON LANDING on Lake George, N. Y.
A delightful, secluded spot for a quiet, relaxing vacation, intimate, informal. Near all sports, including golf — tennis — boating — riding — fishing. Newly furnished—modern appointments. Excellent home cooking and baking.
RATES FROM $40
For Free Illustrated Folder
write F. MARTIN, Mgr. at above address

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N.Y.
35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.
OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

RESORTS

★STAR LAKE CAMP★
In the Glorious Adirondacks
Between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground, 1,800 feet elevation and right on the lake with plenty of gorgeous woodland walks. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Canoeing, Swimming, Handball, Baseball, Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Interesting one-day trips arranged. Delicious wholesome meals. Dietary Laws. Rates: $45, $50, $55 per person.
Send for Booklet — New York Office
320 BROADWAY Room 704 CO 7-2667
Sundays, Evenings, Holidays — PR 4-1390

WOODED ESTATE ON JERSEY SHORE
THE OAKS
INTIMATE ATMOSPHERE, COCKTAIL PARTIES
BEACH CLUB MEMBERSHIP, ALL SPORTS
ADULTS 30 MILES FROM N. Y.
5 MINUTES FROM GARDEN STATE ARTHUR, N. J. Tel.: LONG BRANCH 1433

Stonegate LODGE
On LONG LAKE, N. Y.
NEW ADULT RESORT IN THE ADIRONDACKS
Limited Accommodations. Rates $65 to $85.
Open in September
GEORGE KLEINSINGER, Musical Activities Director
Fishing • Motor Boating • Tennis • Golf
New York Office: 150 Nassau Street, WO. 2-2900
LOUIS A. ROTH Director

Timberland
POTTERSVILLE, N. Y.
AN ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS
LIMITED TO 100
ALL SPORTS • PRIVATE LAKE
DANCING • LECTURES • CONCERTS
N. Y. OFFICE: 33 W. 42nd St. LOngacre 5-3674
The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group

MERRIEWOODE
A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.
FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT: Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoes; interesting hiking objectives thru woodland trails; fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riflery, croquet, ping pong, square dancing.
$45 and $50 weekly. OLIVE H. G. BARON, Director

HUNNS LAKE HOUSE
STANFORDVILLE NEW YORK
Charming Lake and countryside, rustic, restful. Directly at lake, bathing, boating, fishing and other sports. Beautiful walks on own grounds. Excellent American cuisine. Ideal for weekends and vacations. Adults only. Rates, $35.00 week; $7.00 day.
POPPER & McNAMEE Phone
(Formerly Shadybrook, Mahopac) Stanfordville 2931

CASA MANOR
On Beautiful LAKE COSSAYUNA
COSSAYUNA, NEW YORK
Only 20 miles from famed Saratoga 50-guest limit to preserve comfortable, restful, informal atmosphere. Excellent cuisine. Swimming, boating, fishing, table tennis, etc. From July First. Write or call.
JACOB M. OLSHANSKY
93 State Street, Albany, New York. Phone: 5-0363

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JULY 13, 1946 NUMBER 2

The Shape of Things

ONCE AGAIN COMMUNIQUES FROM THE PARIS Council of Foreign Ministers can best be summed up by the GI expression "snafu." At the end of the July 4 session all seemed plain sailing; outstanding differences on the Italian treaty had been composed and it had been agreed to summon the 21-nation peace conference for July 29. But next day new controversies broke out. Molotov insisted that the Big Four must agree on procedures to be followed by the conference before sending out invitations and that China be excluded as a sponsor. Byrnes and Bevin took issue with both contentions. Exclusion of China, they said, was an insult to that nation; the conference must be allowed to draw up its own rules as all such conferences had in the past. The Byrnes-Bevins arguments indicate a respect for smaller nations and make a bow to majority rule. But it is not unfair to suggest that righteousness in this instance is buttressed by the knowledge that America and Britain will be able to count on the support of the majority of the 21 nations. Russia's recalcitrance reflects its minority position. Knowing that the odds are against them on any straight vote the Soviet representatives must exploit their veto power when and where they can and always play for time. Byrne's impatience to get on with the job of peacemaking has already earned dividends for Russia's delaying tactics. Small wonder then that Molotov should seek by a new stall to tie up conference procedures in a way that will enable the Soviet delegation to checkmate any attempt to introduce such questions as freedom of Danubian navigation into draft Balkan treaties. This, however, is a matter on which Byrnes and Bevin can hardly compromise unless they are prepared to recognize the Danubian lands as an unmitigated sphere of Russian interest.

*

NEARER HOME MOLOTOV TACTICS ARE BEING employed by the Republican minority in the Senate, bent on blocking or emasculating an effective OPA extension bill. Senator Taft and his lieutenants know that the longer they can hold up action, the harder it will be for the Administration to regain control of the situation. In particular, every day's delay makes the problem of rolling back commodity prices to the June 30 level increasingly complicated. Senator Wherry, with Taft's backing, proposes to solve this one by exempting meat, poultry, and dairy products from the reimposition of ceilings while other senators want to exempt petroleum, tobacco, and pulpwood. In support of these proposals it is being argued that last week's experience of free markets shows that the danger of a violent rise in prices has been exaggerated. But it is to be noted that only meat prices have shown any considerable recession from the sharply higher levels established July 1, and this is probably due to the emergence of supplies that had been held back awaiting the June 30 deadline. With major foods and other important cost-of-living items decontrolled, the pressure for increased prices for manufactured goods and for higher wages would be multiplied. We hope, therefore, that consumers, who gave evidence of strong support for the President's veto, will let their Congressmen know that they are not being fooled by Taft's maneuvers. Log-rolling combinations are still busy on Capitol Hill and the bill Senator Barkley is trying to push through is in for a rough passage even though it makes many concessions to the anti-OPA crowd. Unless citizens are persistent in making their views known, the President may be confronted with another measure little, if any, better than the one he rejected.

*

OPERATION CROSSROADS IS LARGELY THE Navy's show, and by the sheerest coincidence only the Navy appears to be happy over the results so far. Some foreign governments, particularly the hyper-sensitive Soviets, look upon the Bikini project as an offensive display of power. Promoters of world unity, counting rightly on the terror value of the atomic bomb, are nonplussed by the results of the first test, which were not as sensationally devastating as people had been led to expect by the scientists of the Sunday supplement. And the sober scientists who did all the work of developing the bomb, but were not invited to take part in the Bikini experiments, are inclined to look upon the whole affair as a circus. But the naval men are highly pleased with themselves and their results. "There will still be navies in the future," was the good word flashed from the South Pacific by Navy Secretary Forrestal. Vice Admiral Blandy, in command of the operation, has already concluded that "We had carriers and destroyers sunk in the war

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things 29
Italy Pays the Price 31
Terror in Palestine 32

ARTICLES

Patriotism and Profits by James Wechsler 33
It's Growing Time in Georgia by Lillian Smith 34
It's Election Time in Georgia by Paula Snelling 35
Will the Arabs Revolt? by Freda Kirchwey 36
Science and Man's Fate by David E. Lilienthal 39
The End of a Mission by Shiva Rao 42
In the Wind 43
Small Town America IV. Bricks, North Carolina by Alden Stevens 44
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 45

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Life, Thought, Liberty by William Barrett 46
India by W. Norman Brown 47
A Victorian Utopia by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. 48
Poetry Explained by Arther Mizener 48
Grandfather Carribean by John Vandercook 49
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 50
Music by B. H. Haggin 53
Art by Clement Greenberg 53

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 169 by Jack Barrett 55

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon — Washington Editor I. F. Stone — Literary Editor Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch — Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editor: Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

with Japan but we didn't stop building them. . . . That's what we will do in the future." And Sir John Cunningham, Britain's First Sea Lord, goes so far as to suggest that "it may be—I do not say it will be—that the safest place in the next war will be on board a ship." When the shock of disappointment wears off for those who looked forward to a crack in the ocean-bed and tidal waves that would wash away the state of California, they may find terror enough in the latest tally. A single bomb, of no higher potency than the one used a year ago on Nagasaki—and dropped with considerable inaccuracy—sank five ships, including a cruiser and two destroyers, heavily damaged two battleships and seven other vessels, and did lesser damage to at least 45 other craft. The thought of what a cluster of these projectiles might do, not merely to ships but to people, should serve to re-establish the atomic bomb in the awesome perspective appropriate to it.

✶

THE HOUSE MILITARY AFFAIRS COMMITTEE seems bent on wrecking all the good work in atomic control done by the MacMahon committee, the atomic scientists, and the American people as a whole. Throughout the long debate the crucial issue has been civilian versus military control. Now, the House committee has reintroduced military representation into the proposed atomic commission, specified that the director of the division of military application of atomic energy shall be a military officer, and handed over to the army and navy unrestricted control over atomic bomb manufacture. We are back to the days when, with the help of panic and General Groves, Congress was all set to jam through the May-Johnson bill. The American people have come a long way in their thinking since then. They have been educated by the constructive and courageous thought that has gone into the MacMahon bill, the Lilienthal report, and the Baruch plan now before the United Nations Atomic Commission. The two groups that appear to have remained static, biding their time, are the brass hats and the House Committee on Military Affairs. Undoubtedly the state of tension in the post-war world, the suspicion between the Western Powers and the Soviet Union, has strengthened their hand. But the road to greater security can never be blazed by the diehards of this or any other country. In the immediate issue of atomic control American democratic leadership must once more assert itself.

✶

WHAT TO DO ABOUT THE NEXT ATOMIC war is suggested by the recently released report of the Strategic Bombing Survey which, having surveyed the wreckage of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, draws some pertinent conclusions for the edification of dwellers on this continent. Apparently most buildings over here are as vulnerable to bomb attack as those in Japan. "The overwhelming bulk of the buildings in American cities could not stand up against an atomic bomb bursting a mile or a mile and a half from them." Since our urban population is more concentrated than in Japan—46,000 per square mile in the center of Hiroshima as against 145,000, by day, in Manhattan—casualties are bound to be higher here. (One bomb in Hiroshima killed 80,000, injured 80,000.) The report concedes that "reshaping and partial dispersal of national centers of activity are drastic and difficult measures," but it suggests, nevertheless, that "they represent a social and military ideal toward which very practical steps can be taken once the policy is laid down." It goes on to recommend the accumulation of reserves of critical materials and medical supplies, the organization of civilian defense on a national scale, and the "dispersal, concealment, protection and constant readiness" of our military installations for retaliatory bombing. As a prayerful afterthought the report concludes: "One final measure of safety must accompany the others. To avoid destruction the surest way is to avoid war." Perhaps the surest way to avoid putting these counter-atomic defense measures to a test is to back up the work of the UN atomic control commission by placing atomic development in this country in charge of civilians pledged to eliminate its use in war by eliminating war itself.

*

SOUTHERN WHITE WOMANHOOD HAS BEEN saved again. The cause is worthy but the price is high: six more years of Bilbo and two of Rankin. We have no patience with Northern fuddy-duddies who insist that Bilbo was elected because we Yankees were not polite enough to mind our business. Far from having been elected by a commonwealth outraged at "outside interference," Bilbo was not elected by Mississippi at all. He can be regarded as the choice of his state only in the sense that Hamilton Fish might be regarded as the choice of New York in a balloting confined to the Union League Club. Mississippi has roughly 1,250,000 potential voters, but fewer than 200,000—16 to 17 per cent—showed up at the polls. (New York usually reports something like 77 per cent in a Senatorial campaign.) Of more than a half-million potential Negro voters, not more than two thousand thought it wise to put in an appearance at the election booths. Their reluctance was due in part to the poll tax. In larger part it was due to Senator Bilbo's loud and insistent advice to Mississippi whites to keep their black fellow-citizens from voting by types of persuasion that go with night-riding and misused sheets. Bilbo's ugly threats were a probable violation of law and entitle him to immediate attention from the Department of Justice. Even pending such action, there is no need for the Senate to disgrace itself by his presence. The Constitution provides that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns and qualifications of its own members." It should have no trouble proving Theodore G. Bilbo unfit for membership on all three counts

Italy Pays the Price

CHIEFLY because the results of a complete deadlock would have been so serious, we can view the Big Four's composition of their differences regarding the Italian peace treaty with a certain amount of satisfaction. That does not prevent us from regretting that so many of the compromises by which agreement was achieved were at the expense of Italy. That unfortunate country, already beset with the gravest political and economic difficulties is paying a heavy price for succumbing to fascism. It is to lose territory to the French and the Yugoslavs; it must sign away all its colonies which represent a vast investment in money and emotion; it is to hand over almost all the navy it saved from the Germans; it is to be saddled with a bill for reparations despite the fact that it faces an almost insoluble problem of finding ways to finance imports of food and raw materials necessary to its existence. No wonder the Italians feel bitterly that they are without a friend in the world. Ironically the one point decided in their favor at Paris was that the South Tyrol should remain Italian. As they well know their claims to this overwhelmingly Austrian territory were weak and they might have been wise to waive them with the idea of fortifying the ethnic principles on which the case for Italy's retention of Trieste rested.

Of all the compromises reached at Paris that which settled the destiny of Trieste and Venezia Giulia is likely to create the greatest uproar. It leaves both Italians and Yugoslavs thoroughly dissatisfied. Marshal Tito has gone very far out on a limb in promising his people Trieste and a large part of the province to the west of it and all Russia's influence will be required to persuade his government to accept the award negotiated in Paris. Yet Yugoslavia is not to retire empty-handed. Its future boundary with Italy is to be the one proposed by the French which is considerably more favorable than those suggested by the Americans and the British. It probably provides for the fairest possible division along ethnic lines of the very mixed-up population of the area and it gives Yugoslavia practically the whole of the Istrian Peninsula, including valuable coal, bauxite, and mercury mines, and the important naval base of Pola.

The Italians, on the other hand, see themselves stripped of this district, all the more important to them because of their poverty in minerals, and compelled to acquiesce in the internationalization of Trieste, a city which is two-thirds Italian. Economically, it is true, Trieste is less important to Italy than has been claimed. As a port it is poorly located in relation to centers of population and its chief value to Italy was derived from its shipbuilding and allied industries. However, cold calculation has little to do with the matter; the real point about Trieste is its appeal to nationalist sentiment as the last irredenta to be recovered from the hated Austrian Empire.

Sentiment aside, there is a good deal to be said for the Paris compromise. However much the Triestini may have come to dislike alien rule, the fact is that their city was built on the commerce provided by its Austrian connection. Before 1914 it was the international gateway for a considerable part of central Europe and the trade that flowed through its port provided prosperity for shipping and insurance. When it was restored to Italy after the first World War, new frontiers cut off its old customers and much of its trade was lost to Baltic and North Sea ports. But, if economic geography can be freed from the tyranny of political geography, the city can again perform its former function. Writing in The World Today of October, 1945, a British observer on the spot says of the Triestini: "They would rather be Italian than Yugoslav but best of all they would like to be a really free port at the service of Central Europe, with their freedom guaranteed by an international administration and international force." If this is really an accurate report of sentiment in Trieste, the inhabitants, at least, should be pleased with the Paris decision to make the city and its environs a "free territory" under the protection of the United Nations. It is only to be hoped that the tension of the last fourteen months, culminating in the recent riots has not so embittered relations between the various sections of the population as to make peaceful acceptance of their new status impossible.

Terror in Palestine

PRIME Minister Attlee has promised the House of Commons to produce "as soon as possible" evidence of a triple link connecting the respected Jewish Agency for Palestine; Hagana, which is the moderate and highly popular Jewish Resistance Movement; and Irgun Zvai Leumi, an extreme Zionist organization admittedly based on terror. Mr. Attlee's evidence will have to be extremely convincing to justify the high-handed raids of his army in Palestine, the internment of distinguished Zionist leaders, and the imposition of what several of his own followers in Parliament describe as a "police state."

The irony of the Prime Minister's position is that even if he succeeds in producing such evidence, he will in that very act reveal the failure of his government to handle the Palestine question with courage and intelligence. Hagana, born forty years ago as a kind of home guard for Jewish settlers, has been largely trained by the British, has always been defensive in character, has until now enjoyed an unchallenged record of opposition to terrorism, and is an integral part of Jewish life in Palestine. If even this organization has, in fact, been won over to violent methods, Mr. Attlee need not look far for an explanation. He can find it in his own initial reaction to the report of the Anglo- American Committee on Palestine and even more pointedly in the speech delivered by his Foreign Minister at Bournemouth last month.

Without a word on the merits of the Anglo-American Committee's recommendation to admit 100,000 Jews to Palestine at once, Mr. Bevin in that address said flatly that such a move at this time would require another British division and that he was not prepared to put a division to that purpose. The inescapable meaning of his words was that however much the British government might pretend to go on studying the Committee's report, it had already decided against its principal proposal plainly and simply because the Arabs had threatened to meet such action with violence. What could be more natural in the circumstances than for many Jewish moderates to conclude that they had been mistaken, that the British could be moved not by reason or justice, but only by blackmail and a show of force?

Our sympathies have never been extended to terrorist groups, in Palestine or elsewhere, but for all our willingness to give a Labor Party government the benefit of every doubt, we cannot avoid the belief that Messrs. Attlee and Bevin bear a heavy responsibility for the present tragic impasse in Palestine. Bevin in particular has resented what he apparently regards as the undue impatience of Jews to leave those parts of Europe that must forever remain stamped in their minds as scenes of death and horror.

Aside from the futility, not to mention the amorality, of the Labor Government's approach to Palestine, there is good reason to question it even on the "realistic" ground Mr. Bevin has taken. As Freda Kirchwey points out elsewherre in this issue, Arab League politicians may publicly rant of the Holy War to come, but the direst threat that emerged from that extraordinary session in June was to set up a new coordinating committee to stop land sales to Jews and boycott Jewish products. Disorders and a period of unrest would undoubtedly follow the forced immigration of another 100,000 Jews, but such is the relation of forces in the Moslem world that a raging jehad appears to be the strictly private nightmare of Mr. Bevin.

The British may well—and many of them do—point with scorn to the role of the United States in the Palestine muddle, particularly to our well-known tendency to seek influence without responsibility. And the plain truth is that we do not come off at all well, adopting as we do a lofty moral tone without offering either to accept an appreciable number of Europe's desperate Jews or to back Britain with troops in the highly improbable event that a show of force is necessary to execute a plan agreed upon. But Palestine, it should be remembered, is a British mandate. If the London government is unable to carry out its trust, there is nothing to prevent it—granting its purity of intention—from depositing its charge on the doorstep of the United Nations.

Patriotism and Profits

BY JAMES A. WECHSLER

Washington, July 9

THE opening scenes of the Mead Committee hearings on war profiteering resembled a movie you had seen before. Toward the end of the first day somebody at the press table shook his fist in mock solemnity and intoned: "We won't let this kind of thing happen in the next war."

It took Gerald Nye nearly two decades to expose some of the less altruistic phases of World War I; Jim Mead, his eye on the executive mansion in Albany, was in no mood to wait. But the accused profiteers were comparatively little fellows in the big business of war production. Their corporate intrigues did not seem too original and their "take," however substantial, scarcely approached the highly respectable balances of those revered institutions which pledged in government-subsidized ads to "keep things the same" for our valiant boys abroad.

The slow start, however, was deceptive. As the week ended the Mead hearing was the best air-conditioned show in town. What began as the tale of an Illinois munitions ring had become the case of Andrew Jackson May, venerable chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee.

May is a member of the obstructionist fraternity. His most recent efforts have been dedicated to resisting civilian rule of the atomic energy program. The clue to his role in this new local drama was furnished early when the committee presented a chart showing the interlocking directorates which controlled sixteen arms plants, fifteen of which were located in Illinois. The sixteenth was called the Cumberland Lumber Company, identified simply as a Delaware corporation which received $48,000 from the Erie Basin-Batavia combine for lumber that was never delivered. This was cryptically introduced into the record on opening day and ignored until Saturday.

Meanwhile a parade of past and present procurement officials took the stand to describe their dealings with the Illinois group. The candor of their testimony varied with their army status: those already discharged talked freely, while those still in uniform—with a couple of exceptions—acted as if loss of memory were an occupational disease. Some able generalship by the committee attorneys—George Meader and Francis Flannigan—minimized these difficulties. The story was skillfully pieced together. An ambitious promoter named Henry Garsson, who was ousted from the Internal Revenue service some years ago after being tried and acquitted for extortion, got a $3,000,000 contract from the chemical warfare procurement service with the adept use of a borrowed letterhead. He and his brother Murray, immortalized in an FBI report as an ex-associate of Dutch Schultz, established contact with some Illinois manufacturers who were producing cigarette cases and other basic necessities. They created a couple of "phantom" corporations—Erie Basin and Batavia—for tax saving, multiple-salary payments, and other purposes. Then they pitched in for Uncle Sam. They got $78,000,000 worth of war business and paid over $2,000,000 in salaries to a handful of executives.

War contractors needed friends in Washington. There were intermittent troubles: manpower ceilings, production cutbacks, lost business. "Andy" May became the other man in a beautiful friendship. We are indebted to the recording devices widely used in the War Department (and erroneously denounced in some dispatches as wire-tapping) for the record of his services. Seldom, if ever, has any Kentucky Congressman labored so long and so earnestly for an Illinois enterprise sponsored by a couple of New Yorkers, the Garssons. Busy as he was with his manifold duties on the House Military Affairs Committee, he never forgot the Erie Basin boys. He protested to the chief of ordnance when their contracts were reduced; he protested to then Under-Secretary of War Patterson when the War Manpower Commission cut their labor force; he raised hell in general to secure an E-award for them over the objections of Chicago ordnance officials. He didn't wire. He telephoned. It gradually became apparent to even the dullest brass that Representative May was "interested" in the affairs of the combine. It got the jobs, despite some occasionally heroic resistance in lower echelons.

The blow-up came on Saturday. On that day the committee suddenly reverted to the subject of the Cumberland Lumber Company. A government auditor, testifying in a low, phlegmatic voice, reported he could find no books for the company. All he could find was evidence of "advance payments" from Erie Basin and Batavia for the undelivered lumber. Six of those checks, he added expressionlessly, were indorsed "A. J. May." One of the indorsements read: "A. J. May, President." They totalled more than $18,000. The company had also listed May as its official agent in a certificate filed with Kentucky authorities.

May, who had earlier called the hearings "hooey" now issued two statements in one Saturday afternoon.

At this moment he is vigorously maintaining that his interest in the affair was a blend of patriotism and sentiment. Most of the "advance payment" has been returned (after the Mead inquiry began, the committee contends). May vaguely recalls some telephone conversations but insists that his relationship with the Garssons grew out of their mutual interest in war production. The Cumberland venture, he asserts, was designed to "aid a constituent" with some of the loose Garsson change. The Congressman declares he never pocketed any personal profit; he was just doing company business.

JAMES A. WECHSLER is Washington correspondent for the New York Post.

The story isn't over. May, who testified last month in a secret committee session, has coyly avoided the public hearings. But it is doubtful that he can wage this battle with a mimeograph machine alone. The case against him is overwhelming even if he demonstrates that his bank balance did not ultimately benefit from the transactions. As one correspondent put it, "He was certainly robbed if he didn't get anything for all that work." His abuse of his role as House Military Affairs chairman has been spelled out in such gory detail that his views on the atom-bomb may no longer warrant page-one headlines.

Before the latest revelations May protested bitterly that all he had done was "just what every Congressman has done." This lament offers a fairly vast field to the Mead Committee. Every correspondent knows some of the dimensions of war profiteering, advertised at Washington cocktail parties throughout the war. How much money was passed under tables remains to be shown. The current probe has indicated there were many responsive fellows in the War Department; two chemical procurement officers, for example, graduated from the army to Erie Basin's payroll after approving one of its lush contracts.

"Price was no factor in contracts" one honest ex-officer testified. "We had to get the materials."

I am not concerned about profit control in the next war but the Mead Committee can augment our national wisdom by looking into the wartime operations of bigger and more self-righteous outfits than Erie Basin. After all, we spent a good deal of wartime energy denouncing coal miners who wanted two dollars more a day—wages, not expense account.

It's Growing Time in Georgia

BY LILLIAN SMITH

Clayton, Georgia

WE ARE busy in our county today, plowing. For rain has slowed down the planting. Though good for trees and laurel and ferns, it's been bad for the gardens. Some fields even yet are not turned. But today folks are busy. Across the valley you can hear them. The air is full of fine promise.

Sitting here on the mountain, high up in Rabun, I have been turning old memories. I am remembering the county where I was born—where big oak trees hang heavy with moss, and sand is gray and hot to bare feet, and always that old enemy of childhood, the sandspur, is nestling in paths to slow down your running. I was born where green scum creeps over ponds in springtime, and mocking birds sing themselves crazy on warm nights, and alligators crunch their way through swamp water, shaking waterlilies out of their slow careless paths. I was born where the earth is flat and stretches endlessly... until the eyes of a child grow glazed as he looks, unable to bend his mind around the horizon.

Today I am remembering—as you must sometimes stop and remember—the old days: swimming in cold springs in the summer, and fried channel cat...hunting with big brothers on cold winter days...hog-killing and the old smoke house...my mother, with white and colored folks helping her, stuffing sausage casing while slow hickory fires smoked the hams.

I am remembering—Georgia. Hopping-John, and backbone and rice, and roast oysters, and scuppernongs, and figs, and boiled pinders...and corn pones and cracklin' bread, and going barefooted. Who can forget? Who can forget the wide, curving, sweeping fields of middle Georgia? Who can ever forget a thousand peach trees in bloom or the sweet tang of a sugar-cane grinding, or the pressing of apple cider on warm autumn days? Who can forget the sharp bay of hounds across hills when nights are good for fox hunting, or the tracks of rabbit in a deep mountain snow? Who can forget the ten thousand things that make Georgians love Georgia? The things that make a lump come in the throat when you've been away too long—that make you always want to come back, no matter how far you travel.

Yet today folks are forgetting. There are people in Georgia who are willing to trample and spit on all the good memories that Georgia folks have, leaving us with only the bad things. There is plenty that is bad about Georgia. All of us know that. We know, even as we love it and defend it, that there is plenty about Georgia that does not make for good memories. There are too many Georgians who are poor, too many who are ignorant, too many who are sick. There are too many homes without sweetness and love and laughter in them, too many children who do not know how to play. Too many grown folks not busy enough with work that they like, who turn for excitement to things like tying a can to a dog's tail or building fires on Stone Mountain, pulling pillow-cases over faces, as if with pillow-cases they can cover their consciences! Doing things worse than pulling pillow-cases over heads. And we know that also.

LILLIAN SMITH, author of "Strange Fruit," is now in India as a member of the American Famine Mission. PAULA SNELLING and Miss Smith are co-editors of South Today.

Folks are forgetting. For this is election year. A governor must be elected. To get elected, some folks will do anything. Some folks are willing to turn loose upon our land microbes of hate and fear that will spread and multiply and sweep our state from Rabun to Glynn with a disease that struck Germany once—and ruined it.

All that a man like Gene Talmadge wants is to get elected. Like irresponsible sick men before him, he is willing to use hate and fear as his henchmen. He is willing to fan the little flame that flickers no larger now than a candle and blow on it and spread it to the size of a forest fire. He is willing to destroy the sweet things, the nobility and good-will that are here, destroy the sane and Christian efforts that have been made by the people of Georgia to treat each other like human beings, to give every Georgian a chance to be a good citizen, to give every Georgia child a chance to grow.

No one asks for more than that in Georgia today. No one wants more. This is growing time in Georgia, and we want our crops and our children to grow. That is all.

But Gene Talmadge, to get elected, would trample children in Georgia. He will deny it, but he is doing just that when he spreads hate and fear, when he declares that some children are not human, when he tries to turn man against man, when he states that the Constitution of our United States is wrong and it is not good to believe that all men are citizens, that all children have the same right to grow.

Perhaps he does not know what he is saying. Sometimes I have thought that he does not understand the terrible words he uses.

It's Election Time in Georgia

It's election time in Georgia and the air is heavy with hate. One small sick man, blowing upon those embers of insecurity and fear which never die out in a culture so impoverished and ill as ours, has spread a conflagration that is licking now into every life.

No one knows which way the election will go. Those who will cast their first ballot on July 17—World War II veterans, eighteen-year-olds, whites formerly disfranchised by the poll tax, and Negroes hold the balance of power. They may divide along the old lines, making the outcome a gamble, or they may line up solidly against Talmadge's anachronistic rantings. Certain it is that thousands upon thousands of Georgians are working hard and long to save the superstructure of respectability and decency which Arnall has built and which Carmichael may reasonably be counted on to retain. One hopes and believes that their efforts will swing the election away from Talmadge.

One recognizes, however with a kind of chronic heart sickness, that much of the opposition to Talmadge is basically opposition to his manners and techniques, not opposition to what he stands for. Too many Georgians today (too many Americans today) still want what Talmadge wants, but, God helping us, are not as willing as he to pay the price of physical and spiritual bankruptcy to get it. But the thing that chills the marrow is the realization that many other Georgians, who know and are glad that there is no place in today's world for "master race" theories, still feel that it is more important to defeat a candidate than to defeat his principles, and that in our state both cannot be defeated simultaneously. Some of us believe their judgment is wrong, but we cannot doubt their sincerity.

As a graphic illustration of this dilemma and the way certain Georgians are meeting it, I offer you the above article which was written by Lillian Smith as a part of her effort to rid the air of some of the poison Talmadge is spreading. This piece was submitted to two influential dailies in the state which are battling Talmadge. One editor expressed polite appreciation for Miss Smith's desire to help defeat Talmadge, but, after "considering from every angle the wisdom and effectiveness of publishing it," he decided against using it. The editors of the other paper, men of proven courage and integrity and vision, wrote letters of heartbreaking apology for their difficult decision. One of them said: "By all rules of duty and conscience it should have the widest possible circulation. . . . It's Growing Time is one of the most beautiful things Miss Smith has ever written. It must not be lost. One of these days we shall come into our own and truth will not fear to stand in the full light of the sun." Rightly or wrongly, this man is convinced that "conditions being as they are in this vicious campaign being carried on by Talmadge, the article would help the master demagogue rather than aid the cause of decency and democracy in Georgia"—the inference being that this was true whether or not Lillian Smith's by-line was used.

But somehow, though I too am a Georgian, I do not believe that even Gene could find anything inflammable in It's Growing Time. To make sure of my criteria, I re-read the Sermon on the Mount. And I stand by the conviction that there's enough in each of these bits of writing to quiet the flames sweeping Georgia—and the world—today.

PAULA SNELLING

The world is fast changing. As the earth shrinks, man's heart and imagination must expand to a size to meet the world's needs. But Gene's heart cannot expand; he has no world-size imagination; his mind long ago stopped growing.

Gene Talmadge is obsolete in modern Georgia and modern Georgians know it.

In the heat of summer, we shall have an election. A man will be chosen governor. Whether a good man or bad man wins, we will still live here. Even if that man is Talmadge we can protect ourselves with our Constitution, for we are not only Georgians—we are Americans also. But there is no way that a Constitution can protect our children now from the microbes of hate and fear that he has spread on them during this campaign. There is no way a Constitution can protect these children from reaping crop after crop of pain and bitterness and violence which his hate words are sowing in their minds. Unless you and I get busy.

We who love this state, who cherish its children, have work to do now.

This is growing time in Georgia for children. Everywhere you can see them growing sanely and sturdily toward a maturity that Georgia needs, that all the world needs. And now, like hailstones beating on tender plants, come Talmadge's words, beating on the minds of children, tearing their pride and hope and decency from them, making some of them arrogant and bullying little Nazis, leaving others bewildered and shamed. We must give back to Georgia's children the pride and self-esteem and hope and good-will that Talmadge is stripping away. We must reach down and lift up and make straight again the minds and spirits he is crippling with his words.

There are ways to do it. Each of us must find our own way. But no way is better than by enunciating quietly and clearly the teachings of Jesus, who said again and again, with beauty and simplicity and tenderness, that "even the least of these" is His.

Will the Arabs Revolt?

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE FEROCITY of the British military attack on the Jewish establishments in Palestine can be explained only by panic or by a desire to prove that the situation is too tense and unstable to permit the admission of 100,000 new immigrants. Perhaps both emotions are involved.

When I was in Palestine last month, panic was plainly observable in British reactions. Official alarm seemed out of proportion even then to the isolated acts of violence committed by Jewish extremists. And the authorities were unwilling to acknowledge any distinction between terrorist acts, condemned by all but a small minority of Jews, and those other illegal operations, such as the smuggling of immigrants and the organization of defense forces, which had the support and approval of the whole Jewish community. The British in Palestine behaved as if they went in deadly fear of the Jews; the provocative warnings of Glubb Pasha mentioned in my last article,* although more hysterical in tone than the comments of ordinary officials, were otherwise typical. Their composite attitude was something like this: "We must at all costs put an end to Jewish resistance and if possible prevent any new immigration; otherwise we shall have war arising out of the justified resentment of the Arab majority."

How realistic are these fears? Would the admission of more Jews into Palestine actually touch off civil war or, even more terrifying, start a general Islamic revolt? Such questions must be answered before one passes final judgment on British behavior.

From the day the Joint Inquiry Committee's report was issued, Arab leaders and the Arab press have carried on a steady campaign of threats and protests. They have promised everything from local acts of terror to a Holy War. A collection of newspaper headlines over the last three months indicates that the city room of an Arab newspaper has no lessons to learn from Mr. Hearst. One of the most imaginative appeared above the story of Truman's first statement on the Palestine report: "Hitler Has Been Found Alive—In The White House!"

It is instructive, however, to contrast the fury of the press, and of leaders aiming their words at public opinion, with the reserve displayed in private conversation as well as in the decisions reached at the recent Arab conferences at Incnass and Bludan. In Jerusalem I talked to the two most influential Arab leaders then in the country. The first, Auni Bey Abdul Hadi, is a man whose volcanic flood of oratory conceals genuine patriotic feeling. He is an old hand at the nationalist game, having attended the

* "Palestine and Bevin," June 22, 1946

FREDA KIRCHWEY has just returned from a two-months trip to Europe and the Middle East. Her analysis of Arab strength, organization and intentions is particularly timely in view of current developments in Palestine and throughout the Moslem world.

Paris Peace Conference in 1919 with Feisal and participated in various subsequent negotiations with the British. He knows the documents by heart and lays the pertinent passages before you. The mandate Auni Bey does not recognize; it was illegal, since the Arabs were promised independence. But even granting the validity of the mandate, its execution by the British has been in violation of the League Covenant. Whereas Iraq and later Transjordan had their own governments under Britain, and Syria and Lebanon theirs under France, Palestine has been ruled directly by the British like a crown colony. "This, of course, is because the Jews were colonized in our country for Britain's imperialist purposes and they had to be protected by British arms."

But Britain is the old adversary, accepted and almost tolerated—like Satan in the Christian theology. The whole explosive fury of Auni Bey's invective was aimed at the United States. He shook his finger under my nose and asked what business the United States had coming into Palestine and running its affairs, installing a plan that would "kill the Arabs?" "Kill?" I asked. "Will 100,000 additional Jews kill the Arabs?" He did not stop to explain but from the general direction of his talk I gathered that more Jewish immigration would, in his opinion, squeeze the Arabs off their land, create a non-Arab life in Palestine, and end age-long established customs and relationships. "You can do this," he said. "With money, with the atom bomb, America can kill every Arab who protests because the promises have all been broken and the foreigners have been forced into this country. Is that what you wish?" I could not have offered a defense of the Committee's report or of America's role if I had tried, for Auni Bey's questions were strictly rhetorical. I only asked, because this was what I had hoped to hear from him, whether he and the other Arab leaders had agreed on a specific plan of action in case the Committee's report was accepted in London. I got no real reply but only deflected a little the direction of the flow. "What can we do? You can kill us. We can die. What else? We are not prepared to wage war against Britain and the United States and the Jews. But in time, we will be vindicated. If it takes a thousand years, justice will finally be done." And then, a little abruptly he mentioned Russia. "We don't wish to call upon Stalin for help. But if necessary we can do so." "What about the United Nations?" I asked. "Will the Arab League lay the Palestine issue before the Council or the Assembly?" To this question Auni Bey gave no answer. What was evident from his conversation was the uncertainty that lay behind his genuine indignation.

From one of the other leaders, a very different man, I got the same impression. Dr. Hussein Khalidi, formerly Mayor of Jerusalem, is a successful lawyer and a member of the Arab Higher Executive. He is as quiet and smooth as Auni Bey is violent. He talks with you, meets objections, appears to weigh arguments. He, too, leans heavily on documents, and uses them well. He showed me the verbatim testimony, never published, taken at the London Conference in 1939 which resulted in the White Paper. He was there as one of the Palestine Arab delegates. At this meeting Malcolm MacDonald promised, without the slightest equivocation, in answer to detailed questions by himself and another delegate, that the Arabs would have permanent and final control over Jewish immigration after five years; during that period 75,000 Jews would be admitted under the British plan. If the quota were not filled during the alloted time, the remainder would not be admitted after the period ended. It was there, black on white, question and promise. On the record the Arabs have an unanswerable case. (And so, of course, have the Jews; and the issue therefore cannot be decided on the record at all, but must be dealt with, as the Joint Committee honestly attempted to do, on its political and human merits.)

Khalidi, like Auni Bey, having proved his point and expressed his profound distaste for American interference, became vague as to Arab policy. He predicted trouble—but how much and what sort, he didn't say. Would the other Arab states help the Palestinian Arabs?, I asked. He wouldn't commit himself on that either. Both leaders were restrained by their knowledge that the meeting at Inchass of the Arab kings and chiefs of state, then in progress, was debating this very problem, and by the more intimate fact that the Palestinian Arab parties had just split into two "higher" committees over the question of appealing to the United Nations.

The decisions reached at Inchass were never fully disclosed, but when the Arab League met in extraordinary session at Bludan on June 8 to consider the Palestine issue, the press announced that it was acting, not as an independent policy-making body, but under directives from the Arab rulers. In fact, the secretary-general of the Arab League, Abdul Rahman Azzam, himself declared that the League had become the "executive agent" of the Arab chiefs of state. After a series of defiant and deafening speeches, the League went into closed session and at last emerged with a program which must have disappointed the pan-Arab fire-eaters. Talk of a Holy War had disappeared altogether; so had the expected demand for Palestine independence. No mention was made of an appeal to the United Nations for action against the Committee's report. The resolutions adopted merely called for the creation of a committee representing all the Arab states to "supervise all questions concerning Palestine"; the setting up in Palestine of a new Arab Higher Executive to supercede or unite the two competing "higher" committees; the demobilization and disarming of all Jewish troops (no mention of Arab military organizations); and various proposals to end land sales to Jews and strengthen the boycott of Jewish goods.

Arab nationalism is a real force. No one who has been in Egypt and the Levant can deny it. It does not go as deep as its leaders want you to think but it has enough popular backing so that foreigners, and non-Moslems, foreign or native, face growing hostility in Moslem countries. The poor masses in the villages are probably almost unaware of the issue; in the cities there is plenty of explosive material for the politicians to use. Nationalist feeling backed up and inflamed by religious fanaticism is unquestionably growing.

Will it explode in Palestine? This is the question raised in acute form by British action there. To me the answer seems so obvious that I find it hard to take seriously the feverish warnings of British officials and Arab propagandists. The caution displayed by the Arab leaders when they sit down to consider policy is far more convincing. Unless all political signs fail, no general rising of Arabs would result from the application of the Committee's proposals. Doubtless there would be sporadic attacks and local disorders, though even these would, I am convinced, be reduced by the general respect in which the Jewish defense organization is held. But no Holy War, no invasion from neighboring countries, not even civil war in Palestine.

Britain may be executing a slow retreat in the Middle East: its economic hold may be threatened by American competition, its ultimate political control by Russian penetration. But the Empire has enormous staying power and up to the present time it has been able to manipulate the ambitions of Arab leaders, and especially the divisions among them, to buttress its strategic positions.

No Arab state or combination of states can start a war in Palestine without British connivance. The Arab leaders know this well; they may bark loudly, but they have very few teeth to bite with. Egypt will never endanger its present negotiations with Britain by seriously involving itself in Palestine. King Farouk has huge ambitions, encompassing the whole Arab world. But his present need is to win a diplomatic triumph through the withdrawal, on favorable terms, of British forces from Egypt. Farouk is playing a cagey game and doing everything politically possible to minimize—while using—the growing Xenophobia of oppostion parties and fanatic organizations like the Moslem Brotherhood. No Holy War will start in Egypt in the early future.

Transjordan's newly crowned king, Abdullah, is in Britain's pocket—not only because the whole independence farce was staged and run off by the British; not only because the treaty with Britain secures that power's predominant interest; but above all because Transjordan's army is officered by Britishers and is in fact an integral part of Britain's armed forces in the Middle East. To imagine an incursion from Transjordan into Palestine without Britain's consent is a little difficult. In Iraq, British control is only a little less overt. Since the overthrow of Rashid Ali in 1941, the Iraqi government and army have operated under strict British supervision.

There remain Syria and Lebanon. Ostensibly independent since the French were evicted, these countries might possibly cause trouble across the border. Syria is now militantly pan-Arab and has taken the lead in boycotting Jewish goods from Palestine. Lebanon, torn between Arab propaganda and the fears of the Christian population, is more inhibited. But both are deeply beholden to the British. The liquidation of French control was accomplished by a series of maneuvers which have never been fully exposed. In the process, local politicians, bought and paid for, were established in power by their new overlords. The financial by-products of office are great in the Levant and it will be some time, I imagine, before these officials will think it discreet to kick over the traces. If they did, their ability to make trouble in Palestine would be severely restricted by the almost complete collapse of the Levantine armies since the French moved out.

Apart from direct British influence, however, there are all sorts of minor pressures at work to prevent united Arab action in Palestine. The Arab states may adopt a common attitude on Jewish immigration, but they can never stage a general revolt as long as they continue to be split by cross-currents of interest and feeling. King Farouk's ambition to dominate an inclusive Arab union —even to revive the Caliphate—is in direct conflict with King Abdullah's ambition to rule over a Greater Syria comprising Syria, Lebanon, Iraq, and Transjordan, a plan supposedly encouraged by the British. Both projects are opposed by Ibn Saud, absolute monarch of Arabia, who looks upon himself as the legitimate leader of the Moslem world and nourishes an ancient feud with the Hashimite family, to which Abdullah belongs. Even within the Greater Syria orbit, the interests of Abdullah clash with those of many Syrian politicians who benefit from their country's role as an "independent" republic with a seat in the United Nations.

If an Arab revolt on a big scale is out of the question, as I believe these facts indicate, how can one explain the fears of British officials in Palestine and the ugly events of the past week? The answer is to be found in the history of Arab blackmail and British appeasement. During the years before the outbreak of war, Nazi agents in every Arab country spread the charge that the British intended to subject the Moslems to Jewish domination. Arab attacks on Jewish settlements in the late '30's were largely the product of this untiring propaganda, and by the end of 1938 the Colonial Office had pretty well convinced the government that the loyalty of Jewish Palestine would be more than offset, in case of war, by the hostility of the Arab chieftains. Quite abruptly, and without regard for past commitments, the British instituted a sweeping program of appeasement. For the first time Arab notables were invited to join in discussions of the Palestine problem. Then the whole policy based on the Balfour declaration and embodied in the Mandate was reversed by the provisions of the White Paper. Through these moves the British hoped to counter Axis propaganda and insure the loyalty of the Arabs.

The results of this maneuver are well remembered. With very few exceptions Arab leaders in Palestine and outside were either openly pro-Axis or unreliable and shifting in their allegiance. The behavior of the Mufti—today again at large and ready to resume his dominant role in the Middle East—was only a dramatic expression of the general Arab attitude.

But the failure of appeasement during the war did not discourage the engineers of Britain's colonial policy. Victory wiped out the power of the Axis; it did not guarantee the security of the Empire. In the offing they see the looming threat of Soviet power pressing toward the warm-water ports and oil resources of the Middle East. A bloc of Arab states linked to Britain by concessions, favors, and a well-grounded fear of communism still seems to the conventional colonial mind the best available bulwark against Russia's penetration.

Such hopes would be frustrated by the growth of Jewish strength in Palestine. For the energy and progressive social program of the Jews menace, far more imminently than does Russia, the hierarchic feudalism of the Moslem world from which the Arab ruling class derives its wealth and power. To encourage the Jews would be to plant dynamite under that decadent system. It would make further appeasement impossible. If the Arab leaders cannot stage a revolt, they can make plenty of trouble of other sorts. They might even, as a maneuver in power politics, carry out their threat and call upon Russia for help. The frightened colonial official sees these possibilities crowding in on him, and his single impulse is to step on the Jews. Heaven knows he does not want social change any more than the Arabs; he wants the old system and men on top with whom he can make satisfactory deals. If military force can do it, and if Mr. Bevin continues to back him up, he will wipe out the Jewish defense forces while there is still time and stop the smuggling of D. P.'s from Europe. And with his last breath he will oppose the recommendations of the Joint Committee of Inquiry.

[Miss Kirchwey's next article on the Middle East will analyze the Jewish position in the struggle over Palestine.]

Science and Man's Fate

BY DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

THE dominant fact of our time is the towering place of the machine, of applied science, in the lives of mankind. And the great issue of our time, with which the peoples of the whole world will be at grips day in and day out for the rest of our lives, is simply this: Are machines and science to be used to degrade man and destroy him, or to augment the dignity and nobility of humankind? How can men use and direct science and the machine so as to further the well-being of all men?

From this issue no one who lives today can escape. It reaches into the lives of every one of us, old and young, rich and poor; it must be faced by the clergyman, the professor and the physician no less than by the businessman and public official. Standing always at the elbow of each delegate at Security Council meetings, always present and voting at the conference tables of this troubled world is this same issue: for whose benefit the machine? Cross the seas and the shadow of the question has preceded you—to the valley of China's Yangtze River, to the oil fields of Iran, the tractor-powered wheat farms of the Ukraine. Geography and language differ, but the question is everywhere in essence the same.

Is science good, is the machine good—or is it evil? To some people modern technology is plainly evil. To them the more gadgets, the more unpalatable is life. The more things we produce, the faster we can travel, the more complex machines we invent, the nearer—they assert—we move to the edge of a bottomless pit. They are homesick for the simpler life of the days before man produced so much and knew so much. They cry out against science and the machine and call them evil; but their voices are those of despair and defeat.

There are others of our contemporaries who have an

DAVID E. LILIENTHAL is chairman of the Tennessee Valley Authority. He recently headed the Board of Consultants to the Secretary of State's Committee on Atomic Energy, playing a leading role in preparation of the so-called "Lilienthal Report" upon which U. S. atomic policy is founded. This article is based upon Mr. Lilienthal's recent address to the American Library Association, in Buffalo, N. Y.

almost opposite view of the machine. Exuberant and uncritical, they worship the machine. Efficiency is their god and the managerial elite are their high priests. They broadcast radio programs full of the romance of gadgets and fill the slick-paper magazines with odes to a chromium bathtub. Technology, they seem to say, is above good and evil. If the spirit of man balks, if being human increases the cost of production—well, then man must be redesigned to fit the assembly line, not the assembly line revised for man. The super-technologists of the world are quite prepared to recreate man in the image of the machine.

I venture to say that neither of these views—of the defeatist nor the technolater—will appeal to most of us. The machine is neither good nor evil in itself. It is good only when man uses it for good. It is evil only if he puts it to evil uses.

The machine can, of course, be so used as to degrade and enslave man. It can be used to exhaust the land and the dignity of those who live on the land. It can poison the air, foul the streams, devastate the forests, and thereby doom men and women and children to the degradation of great poverty. On the other hand, it can nourish the spirit of men, eliminate filth and congestion and disease, strengthen the soil and conserve the forests, humanize man's environment. The machine can be so used as to make men free as they have never been free before.

We have a choice—that is the shining fact of our time. If we are but wise enough and determined, if we have the knowledge and the facts on which to base our choices, we can control the machine and make it serve for good. We need not be carried irresistibly into the abyss by forces beyond our control.

That modern man can completely change and improve his environment is a matter of common observation. Perhaps as well known an illustration as any is the Tennessee Valley since Congress set up TVA as a public development corporation. In a single decade a region larger than England has been substantially altered. The great Tennessee River now is changed: twenty-six huge dams make it do what it's told to do. The land is changed. There are factories, barges on the new river channel, and yards building seagoing ships. Slopes once dead and hideous with gullies are now fruitful and green to the sun. And new life is stirring in the roots of local community institutions, a new initiative to promote the people's common interest. Locally financed rural libraries are springing up, public health services, town planning boards, county fire protection units, state conservation boards concerned with stream pollution and public parks, and so on. All of this is just an example of what can be done.

We have a choice—whether the machine or man comes first. But that choice will not be exercised on a single occasion, surrounded by spectacle and drama. We must move from decision to decision, from issue to issue, and we will be in the midst of the struggle for the rest of our days.

In such a setting there is one generalization that I believe is basic. It is this: we cannot master the machine in the interest of the human spirit unless we have a faith in people. The rock upon which all these efforts rest must be a deep and abiding faith in human beings, a faith in the supreme worth of life. Technology must have a moral, an ethical purpose; that purpose and the methods pursued in carrying it out determine whether technology furthers human well-being or threatens it.

Great schemes of development are now being unfolded for China and India and Siberia and Latin America and the Near East—regions technology and science have hardly touched. And we are asked: But does it really matter what means are adopted to bring science to the countless millions in these undeveloped lands? Does it really matter that the purpose of such development may not be human welfare? Does it matter really whether the people concerned have information with which to make their own choices, whether they have a genuine voice in this new destiny that science and the machine can bring? In brief, does it matter whether the purpose and the means are moral and ethical? Matter? Indeed it matters! Nothing matters more profoundly.

The very act of faith in the essential goodness of men furthers that goodness, just as disbelief in men will of itself make men less worthy of faith. This is not mere rhetoric; these are the ultimate realities. It is by putting to practical use these realities that science and technology, by our deliberate choice, can bring a new era of fraternity among the peoples of the earth.

All of the foregoing has its immediate and critical application in the field of atomic energy. Our task, in practical terms, is to turn the awful strength of atomic power away from destruction and toward a new era of peace and well-being.

On March 28 the State Department made public a report on the international control of atomic energy, written by a five-man Board of Consultants on which I had the privilege of serving as chairman. The proposals that report advanced for a world Atomic Development Authority were approved by the President of the United States and the Secretary of State. On June 14 they were presented to the world as the basis of American policy by Bernard Baruch, American delegate to the United Nations Commission on Atomic Energy.

The task of seeking agreement that faces Mr. Baruch and the other members of the International Commission is a supremely difficult one. They can succeed only if there is an understanding of the essentials of the problem by the peoples of the world, reached through the widest public discussion of the alternatives with which they are wrestling. This is an issue that directly affects every man, woman, and child in the world. We all share in the responsibility for a wise, a humane, and a morally sound conclusion.

The American proposals, if put into effect through the United Nations, could provide security against the evil uses of atomic energy. At the same time, our proposals also point a way to the almost limitless beneficial applications of atomic energy in the alleviation of human suffering, the uncovering of new knowledge about this beautiful and complex world, the harnessing of new sources of energy for the relief of drudgery and poverty. The plan seeks to eliminate the surprise use of atomic weapons; it seeks to create deterrents to aggression, and to develop patterns of cooperation between men in which lie the only lasting hope for the elimination of war itself. It has been widely recognized that our proposal seeks to reach these ends not merely through suppression or punishment by an international armed force, but by calling forth and utilizing the constructive impulses of men.

There is nothing more dewy-eyed, naive and ignorant of the realities of human nature than to urge (seriously and sincerely) that the world rest its hopes for eliminating the atomic bomb entirely upon making possession and use of the bomb illegal—"outlawing" it is the common phrase—and providing machinery for drastic punishment of violations.

This comment is general; it is not directed specifically to the initial proposals of the Russians put forward by Mr. Gromyko. It refers to the principle, wherever it may appear and by whomsoever urged.

That this preoccupation and reliance upon the negative aspects of war is naive and unworkable is illustrated, to my mind, by a wireless press account which appeared in the New York Times. A distinguished British lawyer was quoted as saying that under international law, war has already been "outlawed"—ever since the Kellogg Pact of 1928. The League of Nations, he went on to say, was "an admirable mechanism," and war came again "not because of any deficiency in the law. The war took place because of the inactivity of international police." But why were international police inactive just when they were needed and the peace of the world was being threatened? Is not that the real question? Could it be because when the crisis comes we discover that suppressive and police-like activities, taken alone and relied upon exclusively, are no foundation for peace—that something more affirmative is required? It seems clear to me that we must, if we would survive, seize upon, emphasize, and make use of the creative opportunities. It seems clear that it is these very constructive possibilities in respect to atomic energy that make this such a great and unique opportunity for the building and maintenance of peace.

My associates and I were explicit about this in our report. We do not share the feeling that to build the edifice of peace upon such a foundation is unrealistic. In describing the criteria we laid down to guide us in devising a plan for international control of atomic energy we said: "To be genuinely effective for security, the plan must be one that is not wholly negative, suppressive, and police-like. We are not dealing simply with a military or scientific problem but with a problem in statecraft and the ways of the human spirit. Therefore the plan must be one that will tend to develop the beneficial possibilities of atomic energy and encourage the growth of fundamental knowledge, stirring the constructive and imaginative impulses of men rather than merely concentrating on the defensive and negative. It should, in short, be a plan that looks to the premise of man's future well-being as well as to his security."

We cannot think of atomic power as apart from those who direct its course and use, and define the purposes for which it is put. That is a towering responsibility which may safely be entrusted only to those who have a deep faith in the human spirit, to whom the interests of human beings come first. That responsibility is not safe with men, in public life or private undertakings, to whom people are only a market—a market for new gadgets, a labor market with which to make the gadgets, a political market to be cajoled and organized and voted. To them the people of a democracy have little capacity to choose wisely; the people are to be circumvented, not consulted; tolerated, not trusted.

We do have a choice. On the one hand it is clear that science in evil hands can make us slaves—well-fed perhaps, but more pathetic for that fact. On the other hand it is plain that men can use science to further human freedom and the devolpment of human personality. But how it shall be used will be determined by choices made by the people, choices that are genuine only when based on a knowledge of alternatives. And the means whereby the people exercise a real choice depends upon a sacred and inviolable process, the dissemination of knowledge.

For faith in people must have as its corollaries faith in facts, faith in knowledge, faith in the free flow of ideas—in short, faith in education and the processes of education.

The people must know what they can make science do for them. They must have access to more than the slick literature of synthetic "build-ups." The cynics, the book-burners, the disbelievers in the divine and spiritual nature of men, the wise guys and smart hombres, the advocates at home and abroad of compulsion and force—they will never willingly permit the people to know what science can do for them.

Those who have a faith in people must take upon themselves this responsibility to keep the well-springs of knowledge clear, to keep them open to all who come with a thirst to know.

The End of a Mission

BY SHIVA RAO

New Delhi, July 3

THE British Cabinet Mission has returned to London after three months of negotiations with Indian leaders expressing satisfaction that at least partial success has been achieved. The mission had a two-fold purpose in coming out to India: first, to evolve a long-term plan for framing India's permanent constitution acceptable to both major parties in the country, namely, the Congress and the Moslem League; second, to establish, for the interim period while the Constituent Assembly is busy shaping the final structure, a provisional government under the British Viceroy.

About the middle of May the Cabinet Mission published its long-term proposals which in fact were an award, the acceptance of which was obligatory in view of the fact that leaders of the Congress and the Moslem League had been unable to reach a compromise by themselves. The former were passionately opposed to the complete division of India, the latter equally determined to achieve Pakistan. Ruling out the fission of India as dangerous from the standpoint of defense, as well as otherwise impracticable, the Labor ministers proposed a single central authority charged with three subjects—defense, external affairs, and communications—and autonomy for the provinces, grouped together into three sections each free to devise a common administration of such matters as the provinces might surrender.

Congress leaders were the first to formulate a tentative opinion. They welcomed the British rejection of Jinnah's fantastic scheme for splitting India into two sovereign states but criticized the compulsory grouping of the provinces into three sections. They wanted assurance that the Constituent Assembly would have sovereign status and described their objectives thus: "Independence for India with a strong, though limited, central authority; full autonomy for the provinces; establishment of a democratic structure in the center and units to guarantee the fundamental rights of each individual."

Congress leaders saw many omissions and defects in the British plan but decided to keep an open mind and wait to see the entire picture before reaching final conclusions. Of particular importance for such a judgment was the establishment of a provisional national government (which had not been disclosed at that stage). Would it, they asked, function in practice as a Cabinet responsible to the legislature with the British Viceroy deprived of his veto power and reduced to the same constitutional position as the Governor-General of Canada or Australia? Would the status, powers, and composition of the provisional government be such as to lead to "a free, great, independent India?"

A fortnight later came the decision of the Moslem League. Most surprisingly Jinnah recommended acceptance of the British long-term plans despite the strong condemnation therein of his scheme for Pakistan. Only a handful of the nearly 300,000 Moslem Leaguers voted against the recommendation.

On June 16, the British ministers and the Viceroy, after prolonged negotiations with the leaders of both parties, produced their proposals for an interim government. Congress leaders were extremely dissatisfied with them but seemed prepared to compromise when Jinnah published an unauthorized summary of his correspondence with the Viceroy demanding certain assurances which would have rendered democratic administration almost impossible. Congress, during its sixty years of existence, has always prided itself on its national character, membership being open to all Indians who support independence. Among its presidents there have been Hindus, Moslems, Sikhs, Parsis, Christians, even Englishmen. Throughout the six years of the war its president was a distinguished Moslem scholar, Abulkalam Azad. With such a record and outlook Congress leaders could not possibly accept the condition that members of the provisional government selected in behalf of the Congress party could not be Moslems. The Viceroy had not only appointed all five Moslems from Jinnah's party but virtually pledged himself to recognize only the Moslem League as competent to represent the Moslems. Further, he had conceded Jinnah's preposterous demand that on major communal issues even three Moslems out of those five could veto decisions of the Executive Council consisting of fourteen.

The final picture (meaning both the long-term and interim government proposals) Congress leaders regarded as disappointing. They expected a plan which would hold out the promise of "immediate independence and the opening out of avenues leading to a rapid advance of the masses economically and socially so that their material standards may be raised and poverty, malnutrition, famine, and the lack of necessities of life may be ended and all people in the country may have the freedom and opportunity to grow according to their genius." Such a promise Congress leaders found almost completely absent from the British proposals. Nevertheless, they agreed to join the Constituent Assembly while rejecting the scheme for the interim government as loaded with too many limitations and handicaps. They stipulated at the same time that their interpretation of certain parts of the British long-term plans must prevail against that of the Cabinet Mission and, further, that the Constituent Assembly could not function "without a satisfactory provisional government."

SHIVA RAO is an editorial writer for the Hindu of Madras and correspondent in India for the Manchester Guardian. His dispatches from India appear regularly in The Nation.

The election of delegates to the Constituent Assembly —nearly three hundred—takes place this month and the first session of the Constituent Assembly is due for the middle of August. Negotiations for the establishment of an interim government are not at an end, the Cabinet Mission declared before leaving India, but will be shortly resumed by the Viceroy.

There are, however, two formidable difficulties in the way. Without the knowledge of Congress leaders Lord Wavell somewhat rashly gave Jinnah certain undertakings which cannot be fulfilled. Jinnah has now revealed that the Viceroy authorized him several weeks ago to tell the Moslem League's executive that the reward for acceptance of the British long-term proposals would be the constitution of an interim government with the Moslem League and Congress accorded five places each out of the total of twelve. Jinnah's statement means that he attached far greater importance to the immediate concessions than to the acceptance of Pakistan as an ultimate objective; in other words, that the demand for Pakistan was only for bargaining purposes and was never seriously meant as anything more than a slogan to enlist the emotional support of the Moslem masses. What has alarmed Congress leaders is that the Viceroy, who had ample warnings that they would never accept equal representation with the Moslems, should have encouraged Jinnah in such a belief.

The second difficulty is more baffling. The Cabinet Mission and the Viceroy declared on June 16 that they would proceed with the formation of an interim government even if the Congress Party or the Moslem League, or both, declined the offer, the only condition being acceptance of the long-term proposals. The Moslem League has accepted the entire British plan while Congress leaders endorse the long-term proposals, subject to certain conditions, and reject the interim government scheme. Jinnah now demands that the British promise should be carried out regardless of the consequences. Yet the formation of an interim government with the assistance of the Moslem League, if the Congress Party was excluded, would imperil the long-term plans and invite the hostility of nine of the eleven provincial governments which are under Congress ministries. With threats of famine and large-scale labor strikes looming ahead, defiance of the authority of the central government by the great majority of the provincial governments would result in a disastrous situation. Why then did the Cabinet Mission and the Viceroy make that declaration without carefully weighing the consequences?

Now that they have fallen back on the expedient of a "caretaker" government, Jinnah accuses them of a breach of their pledged word, and it is difficult, up to a point, not to agree with his analysis. But it is only fair to add that he maneuvered the Congress Party into rejecting the interim government proposals by publishing at the psychological moment a summary of his correspondence with the Viceroy, confident that the Viceroy would then invite him to form a government without Congress. He was not prepared to have his maneuver boomerang. The suspicion of British motives, formerly nourished only by the Congress Party, has now spread to the Moslem League also and further negotiations have therefore become immensely more difficult.

In the Wind

HOW FAR CAN YOU STRETCH A DOLLAR? Heading on a classified ad in the Portland Oregon Daily Journal, of June 21: "$6,000 Family Home! Only $8,350."

HATS OFF TO HAYWARD: A Council for Democratic Action has been formed in Hayward, California, to stimulate intercultural and interracial relations and to combat anti-democratic forces in the surrounding area. The board of directors includes persons with Mexican, Portuguese, Negro, Japanese, Filipino, Chinese, Jewish, and Caucasian heritages. Community, school and civic groups are also represented in the Council. An active fall program is planned, including a town forum on the problems of democracy.

WHY NOT A TEST FOR EDITORS? Clayton T. Rand, newspaper editor from Gulfport, Miss., declared at an Independent Bankers Association meeting in St. Paul: "The trouble with this country is over-education of the unintelligent. I am convinced that nobody should be taught to read or write that can't think."

ONE BOOK, ONE WORLD: Dart, an advertising trade publication, tells a story about President Roosevelt and Morris Ernst discussing the popularity in Russia of the O. W. I. magazine, America. Ernst urged the importance of getting more books and radio broadcasts inside Russia to promote American-Soviet understanding. The President agreed, but added, "When the right time comes, there is just one book which will win over the Russian people." "What is that?" asked Ernst. "The Sears Roebuck catalogue," replied Mr. Roosevelt.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Small-Town America

BY ALDEN STEVENS

IV. Bricks, North Carolina

"I'VE just been chasing some cows that got over the fence," said Neill McLean, dusting off his impeccable gray herringbone. He looked more like a city business man than a rural schoolteacher. "We've got some champion pole-vaulting stock here," he smiled. His wife, who had greeted us while he was chasing cows, excused herself to look after a child, and he walked along with us toward a row of gnarled crêpe myrtle trees.

"I understand you have a new kind of education here," I said. "And that you started the first rural credit union for Negroes in the state. I'd like to hear more about it."

"The credit union was started in 1936, but it was the people around here that really made it work," he said. "Anyway, it's only a small part of what we do." It was, perhaps, a small part of the Bricks Rural Life School Project, but it was the inspiration for twenty-seven other rural credit unions in the state. Twenty-five of them were started in the past four years, and some are larger now than the original.

He told me about the early days. The Negroes in the little community at Bricks and on the surrounding farms couldn't see how they could possibly save any money. They didn't have any. Every year they took their peanuts and their tobacco and cotton to the storekeeper, who gave them credit on which to buy flour and supplies. They couldn't argue about his bookkeeping, partly because they didn't understand it and partly because it wouldn't have been wise. They were always in debt.

When the credit union was organized, the storekeepers objected, and when Negroes began to come in with credit-union money and pay up, they accused McLean of taking their people away from them. When, a little later, McLean opened a cooperative store at Bricks, his enemies threatened to wreck the whole program. It was a long time before this opposition was overcome.

The credit union played no bookkeeping tricks on the farmers who built it up with nickels and dimes. They borrowed from it at 6 per cent instead of at the 30 to 50 per cent, and even higher, they had been paying. Every year some families borrowed from it to finance the purchase of land of their own. Eight families borrowed down payments last year.

McLean was right when he told me it was only a small part of his work at Bricks. For the people in the neighborhood, and especially for a selected group of families signed up for five years each on the school's 1,100-acre farm, he is providing a new and better education for rural life. The children learn about vitamins and health as they learn to read, write, and figure. Very early they learn how to have a vegetable garden; in North Carolina they can grow greens of some kind all the year round. They learn about the need for rotation and soil-building feed crops, as well as about the best methods for getting good money crops like peanuts, tobacco, and cotton.

Bricks has a much-used, battered, but spotless canning plant, and more than 17,000 quarts of fruits, vegetables, and meat went into tin cans and glass jars last year. Families come in groups and make quick work of putting up their peas, tomatoes, pork, and beef. McLean urges his people to keep cows and hogs, which furnish natural fertilizer. With this, and proper compost heaps, the need for commercial fertilizer can be sharply reduced. This is the big yearly cash purchase and the item which most often drives small farm families into debt.

A rural health program is carried on at Bricks; there is a clinic with a nurse on the job and a doctor who comes in at stated times. Emphasis is on preventive medicine—775 typhoid shots were given in 1945. Pre-natal and child care are other specialties.

Bricks is not a large project. It works only with the people within about fifteen miles of the settlement. But it is one of a rapidly growing chain of educational centers for Negroes in the South. It is a demonstration project, and people from all around come to look and learn. The families who go out from it to their own places often become demonstrators themselves. Like the centers at McIntosh, Georgia, and Athens and Marion, Alabama, it was originally sponsored and is now partly supported by the American Missionary Association.

I asked McLean about the Southern Conference for Human Welfare and other organizations which are trying to gain a better political position for his people. He said they were important and that he was for them. He had long been urging his people to vote at Bricks, and most of them did. "Such organizations are good," he said, "but I think people have to work for things themselves to get anything lasting out of them. If we can get poor people to work together, as families and as communities, I think we've accomplished something. Others then see that it is possible for them to get what they all want—a place of their own."

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Business on Trial

DEMISE of OPA No Great Blow to U. S. Economy," proclaimed the headline over one of those editorializing news-stories in which the arch-Republican New York Sun specializes. The story, a dispatch from Washington dated July 3, alleged that Administration officials were terribly embarrassed because prices had not immediately soared into the stratosphere, thus scaring Congress into reinstating stringent controls. "Forty-eight hours after the demise of price control," it asserted, "it is now clear beyond question that the emergency created by President Truman's veto of the OPA extension bill has been met with patriotic confidence and restraint."

I have no authority to speak for the Administration but, as a strong supporter of continued price control, I shall be extremely happy if the consequences of its removal prove less serious than I expect. But I would like to suggest that the Sun's radiant optimism is a trifle premature. The fact that wholesale commodity prices receded in some cases from the highs reached the first day after the expiration of OPA proves absolutely nothing. Speculative markets always move jerkily and a mild reaction as quick-turn operators take profits is only natural. But I note that on Wednesday, the day the Sun's article appeared, hog and beef prices at Omaha were again trending upwards despite a very heavy run of animals. Cotton, too, after losing part of its big Monday gains, turned strong at the close on Wednesday.

One factor tending to check exuberance in commodity markets is the tendency of the big processors to restrict their buying pending a clarification of the situation. They fear that, if a new OPA bill is passed, they will be forced back to their June 30 ceilings and not permitted to include in prices higher material costs they have incurred meanwhile. On Tuesday, according to the Journal of Commerce, wholesale business in finished cotton goods was practically at a standstill. A few scattered sales for immediate delivery were made at 15 to 20 per cent above former ceilings but, for the most part, dealers in the market were "watching all others for a possible price jump," with each firm hesitant to make the first move lest it be marked as "a gouger."

Protestations by business organizations to the effect that they will combat inflation at all costs do not offer much reassurance about the future course of prices. No doubt many of them express a sincere intention but in any case business would be very foolish to take any other line pending final Congressional decision on the fate of OPA. An immediate rush to hoist prices would invite irresistible public pressure for the renewal of price controls with additional teeth in them. The obvious strategy for the N. A. M. and other enemies of OPA is to lie low for the moment and do everything possible to allay public alarm. Then Congress, anxious to adjourn, may be induced to pass a bill similar to the vetoed one, or even to leave the situation as it now is.

Another thing that business has to take into account is the fact that Mr. Truman's dramatic action has made consumers extremely inflation-conscious. Any sudden rise in the general price-level would create a lot of sales-resistance and might lead to a buyers' strike. There are, therefore, good reasons for immediate caution but, if Congress fails to take effective action and public excitement dies down, I am prepared to bet that we shall see prices for every article in short supply quietly moving forward while business continues to distract public attention with loud anti-inflationary fanfares.

Let us not forget that the bill Congress passed and the President vetoed would have produced very similar results, for the amendment planted by Senator Taft was a delayed action inflation bomb which would have exploded ceilings in all directions. It is true that some of the striking examples of price increases mandatory under the bill, which Mr. Truman quoted in his radio speech of June 29, have been challenged. Arthur Krock, in one of his insinuating columns in the New York Times, suggests that had the President consulted men with technical experience of production, he might have revised his views about the Taft amedment.

On this point, therefore, it is well to note what representative organs of business opinion had to say about the effects of the bill before it was vetoed. The Journal of Commerce for June 27 declared:

> For a time, there will be little or no resistance to higher prices for most products. Literal application of the Taft amendment formula would permit increases in prices all along the line, for products that can be produced at reasonable profits at existing prices as well as for others that can now be manufactured only at a loss.

Business Week of June 29 was even more emphatic:

> The Taft-Wherry line on non-agricultural products is not a line, it's a staircase. And under the new law wage controls go phut. . . . With prices constantly stepping upward there will be the strongest temptation to hold back deliveries of goods at every stage in the production cycle.

Finally, describing the OPA's position under the bill, the Wall Street Journal of June 29 pointed out:

> With its legal authority to fix prices hedged about, and its expense and subsidy appropriations reduced, the agency's ability to enforce its orders would be worse than doubtful.

If the President had yielded to clamor and signed the Price Control Extension bill, the OPA would have become a lightning rod for public anger. It could have done little to prevent rising prices and lagging production but it would have relieved business of the blame for both. Consequently, if this bill really represents the best Congress can do, there is much to be said for letting all controls go, except for those on rents which Congress dare not leave to the laws of supply and demand. The abolition of ceilings will, at least, enable consumers to pin responsibility for inflation where it belongs and it may arouse them to exert a restraining influence on prices by boycotting merchants and manufacturers who take advantage of the situation. As the Journal of Commerce puts it: "The end of price control places American business on trial before public opinion."

KEITH HUTCHISON

BOOKS and the ARTS

Life, Thought, Liberty

CONCORD AND LIBERTY. By José Ortega y Gasset. W. W. Norton and Company. $2.75.

IF ORTEGA'S is not a first-rate mind—and I use the word in its most restrictive sense—it is at least a mind of first-rate sensitivity and of first-rate philosophic culture. It is just to observe this at the start, since whatever strictures one makes on this book should not obscure its remarkably stimulating value in laying hold of major and subtle themes. The very range of the subjects covered by these four essays is an indication of their virtues of philosophic culture and sensitivity: the title essay, "Concord and Liberty," a discussion of the political significance of the Roman Republic; "Notes on Thinking," a commentary on the historical dimension of human thought; "Prologue to a History of Philosophy," in which Ortega carries this historical point of view farther, maintaining that philosophy is inseparable from the history of philosophy; and, finally, a very useful essay on Wilhelm Dilthey, "A Chapter from the History of Ideas," which perhaps affords the best key to Ortega's thought as a whole.

In the nineteenth century, working under and yet away from the influence of Hegel, Kant, and German idealism generally, Dilthey seized upon one great Idea—and Ortega insists that this idea is worth capitals—the Idea of Life. Life, in Dilthey's sense, is not the definite concept of biological science nor the biologico-metaphysical concept of Bergson, but simply the notion of historical development applied to human reason and its achievements. Man has no nature but only a history, Dilthey said, and he set out to understand philosophy from this point of view. Yet, according to Ortega, he never managed to work out this idea satisfactorily, but remained a "halting and stammering genius," his written output disappointing—which explains why his influence has been so much less than he merits. The unfortunate thing is that Dilthey never became familiar with Marx and Kierkegaard, who were also revolted progeny of Hegel and traveling in much the same direction as he, though over different roads. In fact, taking the three together, we are able to offer one definition of Hegel's greatness: he was so great that in the nineteenth century one had to be a really creative mind simply to escape him.

Ortega also uses Dilthey to criticize Husserl in a remarkable postscript to his essay, Notes on Thinking. Husserl in his very conception of phenomenology as a completely rigorous, self-grounded, and self-justifying discipline—and the only one—would attempt to escape from the historical relativism which Dilthey asserts to be inescapable. The confrontation of Husserl with Dilthey provides the possibility of a first-rate philosophic dialogue, and I wish Ortega had exploited this possibility exhaustively instead of merely raising the issue in a footnote. Nevertheless, we are grateful for his perception of this rich theme. There is no doubt that in this rather anti-historical aspect of this thought Husserl is outside the tradition of modern thought: his aspirations really belong with the eighteenth century, or even with more classical periods. Ortega makes against Husserl the capital point that philosophy begins from a pre-theoretical stage of thought to which it must incessantly return; I do not know whether this argument would be fatal to Husserl's claims, but if Ortega is right in using Dilthey against Husserl, then certain later German attempts—Heidegger, for example—to work out the insights of Kierkegaard on a purely phenomenological basis are doomed to carry a major internal contradiction. This too is a question worth exploring further.

But the fundamentally questionable issue raised by this book is whether Ortega's insight has really attained any greater completeness than Dilthey's. Ortega still sees history basically from the point of view of the Geisteswissenschaften, the historical humanities: the forces that make ideas and philosophies historically relative are for him largely ideal phenomena, the cultural and intellectual environment, rather than the rough raw edge of material fact and historical contingency. Dilthey's insight can be completed only by being carried forward into the more radical points of view of Marx's historical materialism and Kierkegaard's notion of the inescapable contingency of the individual existing thinker. (For my own part, I should like to make use of both points of view, and I see no conclusive reason for not doing so.) The failure to make use of either Marx or Kierkegaard is of course less excusable in Ortega than in Dilthey, who was closer to them in time.

The reason for this failure is, I think, that Ortega remains above all a passionate and unreconstructed aristocrat. The intellectual tradition to which he remains faithful is the high Brahmanism of German academic thought, with all its great merits and its shortcomings. This becomes clearest when Ortega deals with a specific social theme, in his interpretation of "concord and liberty" within the Roman Republic. True liberty, he maintains, came to an end in Rome at the time of Cicero's death, and the latter's treatise, "The Republic," was in fact an epitaph on its subject. But this overlooks such facts as Catiline's conspiracy, with its obvious social meaning that, if Cicero's class did enjoy liberty during the late Republic, there were also oppressed classes in Rome for whom liberty meant very little and concord even less. The end of Roman liberty has to be placed at least a century earlier: the unsuccessful revolt of the Gracchi was the last effort to recapture the original meaning of the tribunate of the people; and the economic and military realities consequent upon Rome's expansion, which had severed Cicero's class from organic communion with the plebes, also buried this class eventually under the dictatorship. True, Cicero's expressed ideals are those of the old Republic, but this is a lag of superstructure behind substructure, a case of nostalgia in a far deeper sense than Ortega—who is misled here by reading history too exclusively in terms of its ideal aspects—realizes. That, in fact, is why Cicero is so attractive a figure for him: like Cicero, Ortega is nostalgic for a vanished order that can never be restored. Shakespeare, in "Coriolanus," has a more cynical and far more truthful view of the conflicts of class within the Roman Republic.

WILLIAM BARRETT

India

INDIA TODAY. AN INTRODUCTION TO INDIAN POLITICS. By Raleigh Parkin. The John Day Company. $3.75.

RESTLESS INDIA. By Lawrence K. Rosinger. Henry Holt and Company. $2.

THE MAHATMA AND THE WORLD. By Krishnalal Shridharani. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $3.50.

OF THE three volumes on India noticed here by far the most informative is that by Mr. Parkin. It is an explicit and well-documented collection of facts and narrative of events, likely by reason of its style to be a little dull to any large number of American readers but rewarding to those who have grown weary of vague statements that India's political problem is too complex for generalizations and conclusions and who would like for once to hear about the elements that produce the complexity. This remark does not mean that Mr. Parkin has "explained" the whole Indian situation or even appears to think he has. His account of the Indian social structure occupies only some twenty pages, and that of the economic structure only twenty-seven, while the larger cultural background, with an indication of the values which India or varying Indian groups have sought in civilization, is not treated at all. What Mr. Parkin does give is a description of the present constitution and government accompanied by brief data concerning their recent evolution; the present system of administration and defense, including the cost; the political groups now active, with some remarks on their origin and development; the character of the Indian (native) states; the relations of India with other countries, especially those within the British Commonwealth of Nations; and Indian nationalism before and during the First World War, between the two wars, during the Second World War, and afterward down to the end of the summer of 1945. The discussion naturally focuses chiefly on the struggle of nationalism to achieve independence from Britain and to preserve the country as a unit, in spite of the Moslem League's program of Pakistan. The author sides with no party, writes without heat, though with occasional irritation at Gandhi—a feeling shared by a fair number of Indians—and studiously refrains from asserting opinions. The work is objective throughout, even though it seems at times that the author has not quite enough Indian background to present all the Hindu or Moslem feeling on a subject—for example, in discussing Gandhi's doctrine of non-violence (ahinsa) and soul-force (satyagraha), or, in a different field, the complications of the Hindu-Moslem situation as affected by Jinnah's former association with the Congress. Both British and Nationalist claims are viewed critically—for example, British charges that Congress is dominated by Gandhi as a dictator and Congress claims of membership. Events since Cripps went to India in 1942 to make an offer of two or more separate Indias—if anyone (say the Moslem League) could get a province to want such a division—are well treated, and the last words of the book state that the Labor Government, just come to office, is following a policy such that "a new chapter in Indian political history was about to open." This is being proved true, now that Cripps, with others, has returned to India with a new offer, reversing the former one and requiring that India remain a single nation.

Mr. Parkin's book developed from a small but also good beginning made by him and two associates in 1941, revised and enlarged in 1942, and now remade a second time. Each reincarnation has been an improvement. It is not unreasonable to expect the work to have some day a fourth existence which will treat aspects of the Indian situation not yet well covered. One of these would be that of radical labor and peasant movements and the activities of the Communist Party in India. Discussion of these seems a bit vague in the present volume—can one really call Nehru a "Marxian," and how can Gandhi be a "radical" on page 93 and a "right-wing leader" on page 96? The issues interesting such groups do not even command mention in Mr. Parkin's bibliography, which omits such a well-known work as R. Palme Dutt's "India Today." A difficult but important subject which might repay more extended treatment is the effect upon British policy toward India of internal British affairs and British policy toward other nations. Another point is the relation of Near East Moslems and Indian Moslems—the former seem definitely uninterested in, if not actually hostile to, the Pakistan idea. Some correction of detail is needed for material already included. For example, in treating caste Mr. Parkin makes no mention of the Shudra castes and implies that they belong to the Untouchables. This is an error of serious political and social proportions, especially for southern India. But these various remarks are not meant to detract from the real merits of the book as it stands.

Mr. Rosinger's little book is written in a brighter style than Mr. Parkin's and is meant to tell the busy Foreign Policy luncher what he ought to know about India. It is a fair and objective work also, but it leaves out documentation and the detail that might make it of some use three or four years from now. Originally it was a pamphlet published by the Foreign Policy Association in its Headline Series at a price of 35 cents, and sanctified by an introductory statement from the Earl of Halifax. It is now issued by Henry Holt, apparently printed from the same plates, at a price of $2, and without the sanctification. There seems to be an implication that it is worth $1.65 to a non-member of the Foreign Policy Association not to read Lord Halifax on India.

Mr. Shridharani, who has a smooth and lively flow of words, has written an idealized appreciation of Gandhi, discussing his personal qualities from the point of view of a devoted disciple. His work, with its series of descriptions of moments in the Mahatma's life, does not add to our knowledge of Gandhi in the sense of presenting new factual material or of relating Gandhi to the issues before India today. Neither does it reveal the national significance to India of Gandhi. But it does show details of Hindu thought, strange to Westerners but logical in India's culture, which help to give India the moral strength which informs its nationalism.

W. NORMAN BROWN

A Victorian Utopia

MIDWEST AT NOON. By Graham Hutton. University of Chicago Press. $3.75.

GRAHAM HUTTON had the delicate job during the war of directing the activities of the British Information Service in Chicago. He has taken the subtlest possible revenge —which was to write a book about the Middle West which does not mention the Chicago Tribune.

The omission of the World's Greatest Newspaper was probably a triumph of malice over perspective, for Mr. Hutton has omitted very little else in his sympathetic and fact-laden study of America's inland empire. The author took to the country, studied its history, traveled extensively across it —more than 100,000 miles—and talked with its people. His book reports in detail on agriculture, urbanization, folkways, scenery, schools, and almost anything you can think of. He appears to have ended by liking about everything except the climate. Baking under the scorching Illinois sun, freezing in the icy blasts off Lake Michigan, he stored up a profound hatred which makes the long and funny diatribe against Midwest weather the liveliest passage in the book. Mr. Hutton concludes that maybe Midwesterners were isolationists because their aggressive instincts were exhausted in the process of coming to terms with the climate.

His tolerance seems to have been extended less happily to the Midwestern style, and the customary British economy and lucidity have fallen behind. You will find here none of the clipped and trenchant wit of such British visitors as Mr. Brogan or Mr. Crowther, but instead a voluble, repetitious, and rather unaccented prose, which accepts words like "enthuse" and tends to drench the subject with the mere outpouring of verbiage.

Hutton's basic view is that "Midwesterners are a youthful and romantic people . . . a self-reliant, self-assertive, but extremely kindly folk," out of the first flush of optimism, however, and somewhat insecure—"they know they are still 'going places' and are not sure whither." Their optimism—their certainty that anything can be solved permanently, quickly, and easily—reminds him wistfully of the optimism of Victorian Britain; and he warns that it runs the same risks of disappointment and frustration. "Happily with all their idealism and perfectionism, which often tends to make the best the enemy of the good, they are realistic, matter-of-fact, self-critical, and adaptable. If they were not, Americans and many others might view their future more gloomily."

These remarks are tinged, not with patronage, but with envy. The whole tone of the book shows vividly how perspectives have changed in two decades. What would the author of "Main Street" have thought if he had been told that in 1946 a traveled and sophisticated Englishman would write, "The Midwest is the greatest repository of individualism and of respect for the individual in America, which means the world"? But Babbitt—like Mr. Pontifex—is an amiable tyrant when compared to Himmler or Vishinsky. Mr. Hutton's nostalgia is probably correct: the Midwest is the closest thing today to Victorian England, with much the same weaknesses and much the same strength, as placid, as smiling, and as remote. ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.

Its irreverent yet tender story, its nostalgic picture of the turn-of-the-century West, its hilarious anecdotes of Fowler's celebrated cronies, have made it just the kind of book thousands seem to have been looking for—probably the kind you have been looking for, too.

Gene Fowler's
A SOLO IN TOM-TOMS

At all booksellers $3.00 • THE VIKING PRESS

Poetry Explained

THE NATURE OF POETRY. By Donald A. Stauffer. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.

THIS is a professor's book rather than a critic's. It is a good professor's book. The argument is arranged in a clear, if somewhat mechanical, pattern with its points grouped under the seven main heads of exactness, intensity, significance, concreteness, complexity, rhythmicalness, and formality. The exposition is admirably clear, and Professor Stauffer is not afraid to repeat or to stop at regular intervals to advise the reader of just where he is in the argument. Professor Stauffer is thoroughly acquainted with standard theory, and out of his wide, professional knowledge of poetry he is always able to quote the right people at the right time, to quote them with good sense, and, on occasion —for example, Housman or Arnold—to analyze them brilliantly. In short, this book has all the virtues of an extremely competent instructor's course of lectures for undergraduates on the nature of poetry.

It is inevitable that such a book should have certain limitations precisely because of the audience it aims at. What are virtues, granted this audience, become drawbacks for another. Far too often, for other than undergraduate purposes, the too familiar argument or illustration turns up in the foreseen place: Sidney is quoted for the didactic theory of poetry, Cowper—this is, I believe, a mistaken commonplace—illustrates the flat use of detail, and "Antony and Cleopatra" organic form. Indeed, there are places where the reader suspects Professor Stauffer has not revised his lectures since his return from the Pacific, as when he remarks, as if we were still in the '30's, that "the critical problem that promises to engage the present century centers on the relation between art and propaganda." There are even a few instances of what may appear to be the professional attitude in the bad sense, as when Dryden comes in for the usual easy and unfair dressing down or when the partial contradiction in the name "free verse" is used to dispose of the whole idea. (Poor Mr. Winters, whose "Primitivism and Decadence" has a fine discussion of the rhythms of free verse, is passed over in Professor Stauffer's Book List, which, however, finds space for Alden's somewhat antiquated handbook of versification.)

There may, however, be a better reason for these oversimplifications, and, in view of Professor Stauffer's general intelligence, it is probably the more likely reason. It is inevitable in a book of this kind that the really difficult questions of poetic theory will come up, and it is the nature of the case that the expositor must not get involved in them. It is certainly dubious theory, for example, to say that a poet's exactness consists in the reader's conviction that "his words mirror his mind fully, clearly, and without distortion" and to argue for "individual utterance" and against "elegant uniformity." (Is it the poet's mind which counts? Does this attitude not open up all sorts of irrelevant psychological bypaths? What is the technical skill which Professor Stauffer so ably analyzes elsewhere but a display of elegance among verbal uniformities?) Yet the expositor of poetry, unless he is prepared to plunge into the complex question of the relation to the value of the poem of the poet's personality, must take either this line or the "objective" line—an equally dubious piece of theory in its simple form.

Thus the unavoidable necessity for setting limits to the complexity of the argument, which is what gives Professor Stauffer's book its great virtue of clarity of exposition, sets limits to the general value of his argument. Within these limits he has done an admirable job, and his book must certainly be the best available introductory book on the subject.

ARTHUR MIZENER

Grandfather Caribbean

CARIBBEAN, SEA OF THE NEW WORLD. By Germán Arciniegas. Translated from the Spanish by Harriet de Onis. Alfred A. Knopf. $3.75.

SEVERAL times during the rare peaceful interludes of our distracting century we North Americans have been on the verge of "discovering" the Caribbean. The intention—never quite fulfilled—has been touched with patronage. It is a little as if, in one's brash 'teens, one proposed to discover one's grandfather; an amazing grandfather, battle-scarred, of vast distinction and infinite experience in good and evil. For the Caribbean, its lapidary bow of islands and the encircling Main, were already old, with a brocaded, golden, splendid age, when our forbears of the cooler Continent were humbly

Does your morning newspaper give you "the sensation of dry leaves rustling in your stomach"?

READ

HARRISON SALISBURY'S

RUSSIA on the WAY

"Your morning newspaper will give you less of the sensation of dry leaves rustling in your stomach," says Joseph Barnes in the New York Herald Tribune, "if you read what Harrison Salisbury has written . . . What would be at any other time a modest, interesting and useful book about the Soviet Union acquires a special importance in the spring of 1946. There are great gaps in every American's knowledge of the changes war brought to Russia. Filling some of these gaps may not eliminate suspicion and fear for every reader, but it will take a large part of the hysteria out of the feelings with which we watch our war-time ally."

Harrison Salisbury, one of the few correspondents to accompany Eric Johnston on his visits across the Soviet Union, provides an excellent picture of the land and the people behind the much-publicized "iron curtain."

$3.50 at your bookstore MACMILLAN

whittling spinning wheels and were still excited by the white potato.

Germán Arciniegas is a Columbian, a scholar and writer of distinction both in his own country and in ours. Geographically speaking, Señor Arciniegas has spent the better part of his life looking up to the Caribbean; we in the United States have looked down on it. It seems to make a difference.

At length, and after what must have been enormous and rewarding reading, he has undertaken to tell the whole of the lusty, violent, and heroic story, from that immortal instant in the quiet October night when the lookout on the Pinta sighted the first landfall in the west, to the faro-dealers politics of Roosevelt I by which we acquired the Panama Canal Zone. (Still, one gathers, a sore point with a Colombian.) He has succeeded, probably as well as any writer ever can in the space of a single volume.

History—(if I may be permitted so unfashionable and romantic a belief)—is made by men. Inevitably, the story of the Caribbean becomes the tale of the incomparable company of actors who played their fiercely romantic, often tragic roles upon that hotly sunlit stage. Inasmuch as mass biography is peculiarly difficult, Señor Arciniegas is not always successful. Christopher Columbus, to my view, remains elusive, of far too small a stature. But in their velvet and their rags, their armor and their sweat-stained uniforms, they all march past, a memorable procession. Cortés; Balboa; Drake; Toussaint the gentle conqueror, and Bolivar; the first, worst, yet most endearing of the New World's Morgans; French, Dutch, Spaniards, Danes, blacks, whites, and—as the usually admirable translator so mysteriously calls the sorely trampled aborigines—the "parrot hued"; all take form.

The past, like the picturesque, is another's discomfort. In "Caribbean" one journeys vicariously, with skilled pilotage, through four centuries of life, change, splendor, of Olympian adventure, with an ease, a relish—and perspective—denied the participants. That is what books are for. And this book is a very solid and a very worthy one indeed.

JOHN VANDERCOOK

Buy Your Books through THE Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price, post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

The Nation

20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

FICTION IN REVIEW

HELEN HOWE'S new novel, "We Happy Few" (Simon and Schuster, $2.75), is about a Boston girl who learns to be an American woman. Bred in the isolate culture of Boston and its environs, Dorothea Natwick is priggish and self-absorbed, over-sensible of the social and intellectual values which are her birthright, a flagrantly inconspicuous consumer of very expensive advantages. The process of her education is the process of opening out her horizons beyond herself and her immediate society until her spirit includes all the multitudes that are democratic America.

The chief point, that is, of Miss Howe's novel is the equation it makes between parochialism and infantilism, between maturity and the ability to encompass the multitudinousness of life beyond the borders of one's own parish. But curiously enough, it is in the first half of her book, when Miss Howe is concentrating on the embattled culture of her small section of New England, before she introduces her heroine to the enlarging experience of the great West, that she manages not only to be most entertaining but also to suggest the most mature and universal meanings. It is in the early portions of "We Happy Few," laid in Constable where Dorothea's father is master of a boys' school and where her mother has such a happy field for her eccentricities of pride, or in Cambridge, where Dorothea, as the wife of a Harvard instructor, continues the Natwick tradition, that Miss Howe, for all that she is dealing with such highly specialized individuals, yet tells us most about our least specialized selves. This is of course the genius of satire, that, with the exaggeration of humor, it extends the particular into general truth. In the second half of her novel, however, Miss Howe deserts Boston, to have Dorothea discover the American range and American humanity. The selflessness that neither marriage, motherhood, adultery, war work nor death has been able to teach Dorothea, an experience of ordinary Americanism does teach her. It is the lesson of democracy that finally cuts Dorothea down to size. The only flaw is that, with her, democracy itself also gets cut down to size—Miss Howe's firmest intentions to the contrary notwithstanding. "We Happy Few" ends with the wide American panorama presenting itself as little more than a series of small-spirited, harassed, and unhappy people who in their uneducated fashion are just as egotistical as the well-educated Dorothea. The commonalty of man, therapy for a poorly balanced emotional nature, shows itself to be largely a matter of helping make sandwiches with the other ladies or holding a neighbor's crying child. Miss Howe's novel falls apart in the middle and the break, it seems to me, is the result of a fault not so much of narrative structure as of basic idea.

The idea is of course a popular one. Miss Howe is scarcely alone among current novelists in regarding democracy—or the proletariat, or the fight against fascism, or a sweeping view of the multitudinousness of American life—as if it were a medicine especially prepared to cure the sick soul of the modern individual. One recalls, as an extreme instance, the novel of a few years ago in which a young woman was cured of neurosis by giving visas to refugees; or the more recent example in which the heroine was saved from nervous collapse by joining the movement for cooperatives. As a matter of fact, asked to name, on the evidence of the novels I read, the one dominant trend of our progressive literary culture, I would probably specify this mechanical notion that the individual finds himself by losing himself in some larger social manifestation.

That, despite her sincere belief in this idea of social therapy, Miss Howe herself aborts it by giving us, alongside the certification of Dorothea's health, such a dreary picture of indiscriminate American society speaks, I think, very well for her deeper novelistic endowments; and I mean this quite without irony. It is as if the eye and ear that can catch the subtle nuances of the first sections of "We Happy Few" cannot but go on to betray Miss Howe's formulation of conscience. While Miss Howe's program calls for Dorothea's regeneration through contemplation of some vast body of corporate virtue called the United States of Democracy, her literary senses feel out all the petty snobberies and prides that are bound to inform a nation of human beings. One can only hope that her writing future will trust these senses, that Miss Howe will try to proceed not by good works but by her large gifts of grace.

These gifts of grace are Miss Howe's satiric powers, which she herself evidently respects very little or she would not try to drown them in favor of a soft "affirmation" of life; and it is a judgment supported, I fear, by the dominant literary culture of our time. I daresay that the majority of Miss Howe's readers and critics, if they approve the satiric portions of her novel at all, will approve them only as preparation of the sound and wholesome moralism that follows. That there is more moral realism and therefore more true morality of every kind in the brief high-comic descriptions of Mrs. Natwick's cheery barn funerals or in Miss Howe's chart of priorities on Henry James among the Harvard faculty or in her anatomy of the picnic basket than there is in all Dorothea's long passages over the American frontiers is, I suppose, as difficult of comprehension today as the idea that criticism can still be constructive even if it fails to announce a positive platform. Of all our morality, but especially of our social-political morality, we demand that it be given straight and bitter, undiluted with fun. Because draughts of solemnity taste so bad, we deceive ourselves that they are our eye-openers instead of our newest opiates.

DIANA TRILLING

Join BOOK FIND CLUB...Now!

It costs you nothing to join the BOOK FIND CLUB. Every month you receive FREE a copy of the literary magazine BOOK FIND NEWS, which tells all about the forthcoming Selection and other important book news. You need only purchase a total of 4 Book Find Selections during each year of your membership, at the SPECIAL MEMBERSHIP PRICE of only $1.35 a book (plus postage and handling), regardless of publishers' list prices which may range from $2.50 to $5. Begin your membership with Abel Plenn's WIND IN THE OLIVE TREES, dramatic personal history combined with a startling analysis of developments inside Franco Spain since 1937. Abel Plenn served during World War II as Chief of Propaganda Analysis attached to the U.S. Embassy in Madrid. His book, WIND IN THE OLIVE TREES, is one you will want to read. Start your membership in the BOOK FIND CLUB NOW with WIND IN THE OLIVE TREES by Abel Plenn FOR ONLY $1.35 (plus postage and handling). You will receive an extra BONUS BOOK as a FREE gift for joining. Simply mail the coupon below.

BOOK FIND CLUB 401 BROADWAY NEW YORK 13, N. Y.

Start my membership with WIND IN THE OLIVE TREES by Abel Plenn. As my FREE book for joining NOW, send me the past Book Find Club Selection checked below:

☐ THE BULWARK By Theodore Dreiser ☐ NORTH STAR COUNTRY By Meridel Le Sueur ☐ CROSS SECTION 1945 New American Writing ☐ FOCUS By Arthur Miller

NAME

ADDRESS

N 2

STAGE PLAYS

THEATRE GUILD'S PRODUCTIONS
THE MUSICAL HIT

CAROUSEL

Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
with Harold Keel — Iva Withers
Jean Darling • Eric Mattson • Christine Johnson • Jean Casto
AIR-COND. MAJESTIC Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT

OKLAHOMA!

Based on Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs"
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
Jack Kilty • Joseph Buloff • Betty Jane Watson • Ruth Weston
AIR-COND. ST. JAMES Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." — Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40. AIR-COND.

"MERMAN'S A WOW."—Chapman, News
RICHARD RODGERS and OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd Present

ETHEL MERMAN in "ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"

Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON
Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN
IMPERIAL THEA., 45th St. W. of Bway. Mats. Wed. & Sat. Air-Cond.

★ ★

GIVE

U S O

It still means a lot to them

★ ★

The
New Statesman and Nation
England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through
THE Nation
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
•
Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"Amusing."—N. Y. Sun
ANN SHERIDAN • DENNIS MORGAN
'One More Tomorrow'
—And—
"Exciting Film Fare."—N. Y. World-Telegram
DANE CLARK • JANIS PAIGE
'HER KIND OF MAN'

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
ALDEN
Jamaica
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

"Spreads a wild gayety flavored with Gallic impudence"
—N. Y. World-Telegram

GINGER ROGERS

in SAM WOOD'S
'HEARTBEAT'
JEAN PIERRE AUMONT
Adolphe Menjou • Basil Rathbone
—AND—
WITH
'BEDLAM' BORIS KARLOFF

EUGENE O'NEILL says:
"The finest picture I have ever seen. I enjoyed it so much I went a second time...and I am going to see it again."

The THEATRE GUILD presents

LAURENCE OLIVIER

in William Shakespeare's
"HENRY V"

IN TECHNICOLOR • Released Thru United Artists
PRICES: Evgs. (at 8:30) $2.40, $1.80 Mats. daily (at 2:30) $1.80, $1.20
ALL SEATS RESERVED
NOW! N. Y. CITY CENTER 131 West 55th St.

HAL WALLIS Presents
ROBERT YOUNG • SYLVIA SIDNEY
ANN RICHARDS
"THE SEARCHING WIND"
From the Broadway play by LILLIAN HELLMAN
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

—IN PERSON—
ANDY RUSSELL
PLUS
ALAN CARNEY
•
THE PIED PIPERS
•
Extra Added Attraction
RAYMOND SCOTT
And His New 1946 Band

NOW PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

OCCASIONALLY I am also reminded of people's notions about performance. Thus, a reader questioned my May 4 reference to Caruso's art as "a vocal, not a musical one": it seemed to him that if one heard a great vocal art one heard a great musical one—that the free flow of beautiful sound was musical.

In my article I had explained "vocal art rather than a musical one" as "an art in singing, not in musical phrasing," and had said that Caruso's emotion "did not express itself in inflection of the musical phrase that employed his voice, but in manipulation of his voice that sometimes produced a beautiful legato phrase and sometimes tore the phrase to pieces." But evidently this distinction had no meaning for my reader, as it has none for most people—the people, for example, who are surprised, bewildered, or even outraged by my criticisms of musicians like Heifetz, Horowitz, and Koussevitzky. I am not referring now to those for whom the performance of any celebrated musician is good, and all the performances by celebrated musicians are equally good in their various ways. I am referring to those who reason that to perform a piece of music is to produce the required sounds, and to produce beautiful sounds is to perform the piece well, and who, dazzled by the tonal splendors produced by Heifetz or Horowitz or Koussevitzky, ask what can be wrong with them, what indeed could be better. They neither perceive nor can understand the distinction between the sensuous quality of a violinist's tone and the phraseological inflection of the tone, and the fact that the dazzling beauty of Heifetz's tone amounts to superb playing of the violin but his fussy, wailing inflection of the tone most often produces a sentimentalizing, cheapening performance of the music.

A letter from another reader made this distinction about Koussevitzky. "The sound was marvelously fine; and the Eroica was a real performance, which carried a certain conviction because it was all so consistent and carefully worked out. There were, of course, the characteristic distortions of the quiet melodies of the first movement; and comparing it with Toscanini's performance revealed exactly what you have always pointed out in Toscanini's playing—the alive flow, the rhythmic continuity, which carries the music forward always with a kind of inevitability, so that the huge intensities come about naturally yet with greatest effect, nothing is distorted or over-emphasized, and the piece adds up to a tremendous intensity and force. The Koussevitzky first movement did not build up at all. Everything was played beautifully but it didn't make a large whole; as a result the climaxes seemed tame and without the exciting meaning Toscanini gives them... But the sound of the orchestra is one of the refinements of civilization."

But a great musician I know surprised me recently by dismissing Koussevitzky as "no conductor, only a dilettante." I was surprised because it turned out that he was thinking of the rhythmic slovenliness, distortion of phrase, and other musical defects that had caused him to leave the concert before the end; and I would have expected him to distinguish Koussevitzky the musician from Koussevitzky the conductor. But then he surprised me further by insisting that he meant the conductor too, contending that the orchestra played marvelously because it was a group of wonderful musicians; and I would have expected him to know better than that. The orchestra that Koussevitzky conducted at his first concert in New York, in November 1924, was the same group of players that Monteux had conducted the preceding April; but its sonority and style were astonishingly changed to what—despite all subsequent changes in personnel—has remained the characteristic sonority and style of the Boston Symphony ever since; and clearly what changed them and then kept them unchanged—except to polish and refine and perfect them—was Koussevitzky. It is the years of work with him that make it possible for the orchestra to play with the same fabulous beauty and finish without him, as it did, for example, when Nadia Boulanger beat time for it at the Harvard Fauré Festival.

The continuity in a Toscanini performance is produced by a continuous activity—a moment-to-moment exercise of concentration, attentiveness, effort, control—which is fascinating and moving to watch in its relation to the moment-to-moment flow of the performance. These two geared continuities are what the OWI film of his performances of Verdi's Overture to "La Forza del Destino" and Hymn of the Nations should have given us by keeping him in uninterrupted view throughout each performance—relating him visually to other participants possibly by changing the angle of the camera to include them, possibly by piecing their images into the background of his, possibly in some other way. Instead the film uses the technique that is conventional in films of orchestral performances—of shifting back and forth between the conductor and members of the orchestra. This technique gives us a number of close-range shots of Toscanini in action—but each time only a few moments of this action broken off for the blowing of the clarinettist or the sawing of the cellists or the singing of a section of the chorus. The moments are impressive and exciting, but not as the uninterrupted sequence would be.

While I am speaking of Toscanini I should mention that throughout the past year I continued to feel the tenseness in his performances that I spoke of in December—a lack of the natural flow described by my reader. I mentioned an example of this in my review of the recorded performance of "The Stars and Stripes Forever" last week: in the earlier performance on the army V-disc there was a relaxed, spacious broadening out for the concluding passage; in the performance on the Victor record there is a tense driving ahead in this passage. It may be the result of emotional strain; and perhaps the performances next fall will show a relaxation of the tension.

Art

CLEMENT GREENBERG

I BELIEVE that the art of Jean Dubuffet—three examples of which I discussed two weeks ago—has been related to French Existentialism. As the brightest new hope of the School of Paris since Miró, it is quite fitting that Dubuffet should rise to notice on the wave of the first new aesthetic movement in Paris since Surrealism, which similarly inspired Miró. (The point would be that French painting since 1925 has become directly dependent as never before on literary and philosophical movements.)

It is easy to perceive the affinities between Dubuffet's painting—which attacks the human form with graffiti

BOOKS FOUND FREE!
WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?
We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.
SEARCHLIGHT BOOK REPORTS
✉ East 17th Street, New York City

HELP WANTED

WRITER WANTED

by organization engaged in popular education for democracy. College degree desirable. Top-notch record essential in mass-appeal fields of journalism, advertising, etc. Excellent salary to A-1 person.

Write full particulars

(Our writers know of this ad.)

BOX 1631, c/o THE NATION

SITUATION WANTED

WRITER, available for new assignments. Expert in preparation of speeches, reports, articles, publicity and research. Box 1632 c/o The Nation.

AUTO TOUR WANTED

YOUNG ATTORNEY, driver, desires to join man or couple having automobile for trip around United States. 4-6 weeks. Share expenses. Box 1633 c/o The Nation.

CLASSIFIED
ADVERTISING RATES

•

62c a line (six words)
Minimum 3 lines
$6.16 per inch

Attractive discounts for multiple insertions

•

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N.Y.
BArclay 7-1066

modeled on children's drawings and with linear schemes in the manner of Klee (influenced by the blueprint and map)—and the world-hating attitudes revealed by French Existentialism in such works as Jean-Paul Sartre's La Nausée. On the assumption that the highest truth is always hidden, one has the impulse to deny the ultimate importance of a connection so obvious to the first comer. But one would be wrong here. And the problem is not even to ascertain the connection but to date it.

La Nausée was published in 1938 and Dubuffet has come into prominence only with the war. (I gather from an article in Art News by Aline B. Louchheim that he is in his forties, began painting shortly after the last war as a disciple of cubism, gave it up in frustration to become a successful wine-dealer, and returned to it only during the recent war.) Dubuffet's devalorization of the human image, the hatred he concentrates on public faces in public places would appear to have been motivated by events in France under the Vichy regime. And the same events are popularly made responsible for the vogue of Existentialism among French intellectuals. But Sartre adopted his philosophy before the war, and it seems to me that it would have attained a certain popularity even without the disasters of the war, while I am sure that Dubuffet's pessimism derives from an experience antedating and underlying that of the most recent history. Such nihilism, embodied as cogently and as successfully as it is in paint, could not have been improvised on the moment's notice of a war that lasted five years. The very quality of Dubuffet's art make it plain that it rests on the experience of a lifetime and on a deep-seated and constant view of the world.

What we have to do with here is an historical mood that has simply seized upon Existentialism to formulate and justify itself, but which had been gathering strength long before most of the people concerned had ever read Heidegger or Kierkegaard. Pessimism has become appropriate since 1918, and it only remained for the late 1930's to replace the exuberant and, in a sense, frivolous, hedonistic pessimism of dada and surrealism (the latter of which was at least optimistic enough to enroll itself behind the revolution) with the radical and logically responsible pessimism of Existentialism. So consequent is Existentialism that, although it pretends to discriminate between the stuffed shirts, the tricheurs or "stinkers," and the truly honest men, in actual fact it consigns all of humanity, regardless of status or function, to contempt and despair. The shrinking possibilities of bourgeois society in Western Europe, the hypocrisies it requires in order to keep it stable, seem no longer to leave room for anything else.

One cannot deny the historical justification of this attitude, and to see it bodied forth in such a strong work of art as Dubuffet's "Promeneuse au parapluie" is to realize its even profounder justification as far as daily life is concerned. Whatever the affectations and the philosophical sketchiness of Existentialism, it is aesthetically appropriate to our age, and may make up in art for what it lacks as a complete philosophy. Precisely for this reason it may be able to reach a fuller expression in painting than in fiction—which is a less opaque medium and therefore more liable to expose the flimsiness of any formal philosophical support.

What we have to do with here, I repeat, is not so much a philosophy as a mood; and just as painting, after 1900, became the greatest and most satisfactory expression of the moods of Paris—perhaps more cogent even than Apollinaire's and Valéry's poetry—so may it continue to express her moods after 1940.

CONTRIBUTORS

WILLIAM BARRETT, associate editor of Partisan Review, contributes frequently to it and to the Kenyon Review.

W. NORMAN BROWN, professor of Sanskrit at the University of Pennsylcania, is Curator of Indian Art at the Philadelphia Museum of Art and President of the American School of Indic and Iranian Studies. During the war he was with the Office of Strategic Services, where his work was concerned primarily with India.

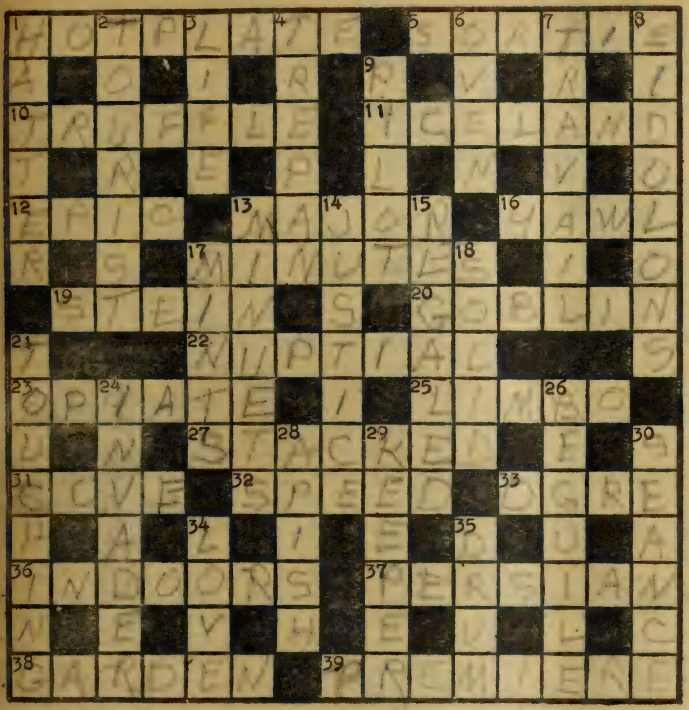
ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR., is the author of "The Age of Jackson." He is at present working on a history of the New Deal.

ARTHUR MIZENER, professor of English at Carleton College, is a contributor to the Kenyon Review, the Partisan Review, and the Southern Review.

JOHN VANDERCOOK, well-known radio commentator, is the author of "Black Majesty," "Dark Islands," "Caribbee Cruise," and other books.

Crossword Puzzle No. 169

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Used for teaching performing bears to dance (3 and 5)
5 Sally
10 An underground fungus used in cookery
11 A country without an army
12 Heroic poem
13 Rank between captain and lieut.-colonel
16 The smack that went to the bottom
17 They sometimes seem like hours
19 Beer mug
20 A frightful fairy
22 Tin, Paul, is needed for this occasion
23 Keats felt as though he had drunk it
25 Destination of lost consignments
27 Made up cards for cheating
31 A bloke at bay
32 Exhilarating, isn't it?
33 Fearsome fellow
36 The best place in wet weather
37 A pen, sir? (anag.)
38 A lovesome thing, God wot
39 She who formed a cabinet?

DOWN

1 One, moonstruck, who helps to prevent one getting sunstruck
2 A sight-seeing traveler
3 Can only be understood backwards, but must be lived forwards
4 Surgical saw
6 Baking cell
7 Labor in childbirth
8 Phantoms showing an idol in great ages
9 An aviator
13 Graceful old dances
14 Many who ask for it would howl for mercy if they got it
15 Entertained sumptuously
17 Coins
18 Substantial
21 Parting may be sad, but it is pathetic to be together
24 An unwelcome guest
26 To lead up the garden
28 Imitative
29 Animals' attendant
30 Where people go to get up their spirits
34 They say it's unlucky to marry for this
35 When the order came to retire, the drummer boy beat it

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 168

ACROSS:—1 CARUSO; 5 MULLAH; 9 KIMONOS; 11 ASSAIL; 12 DESIGN; 13 SPRITES; 14 DEER; 17 WERE; 19 EGREGIOUS; 22 TIROL; 23 NASAL; 25 BLEATS; 26 WEIGHT; 27 SIREN; 29 GREEK; 31 SADDENING; 34 IDLE; 36 GOER; 37 MARRIED; 39 OUTSET; 40 AORIST; 41 SAWDUST; 42 ODD MAN; 43 ESNECY.

DOWN:—1 CLAUDE; 2 RASHER; 3 SKIS; 4 OIL PAINTS; 5 MODEL; 6 USES; 7 LOITER; 8 HANSEL; 10 ODIOUS; 15 EGGBIRD; 16 REFEREE; 17 WIGGING; 18 ROUTINE; 20 OASIS; 21 SAWED; 24 LEND LEASE; 28 RAMROD; 29 GIGOLO; 30 ELATED; 32 IODINE; 33 GRITTY; 35 SATAN; 37 MESA; 38 DOTS.

BOOKS

C. P. A. Questions and Concise Answers

AUDITING—THEORY—LAW

By L. MARDER, LL.B., C.P.A.

is designed for the final review, that period before the examination when voluminous texts contribute little but worry and confusion. It will teach the C.P.A. candidate to answer questions in a style preferred by Examiners —briefly and to the point.

1300 Questions with Answers Auditing and Theory. Cloth bound—448 pp. $5.00

600 Questions and Answers in Law 1.00

Free Descriptive Circular

Concise Text Press DEPT. N P.O. Box 811 Church St. Annex New York 8, N. Y.

OUT-OF-PRINT and hard-to-find books located free of charge. Send list of wants to J. Thompson, 1 Hillside Ave., Pelham, N. Y.

WE SPECIALIZE in supplying out-of-print books. Catalogues sent on request. University Book Reserve, 12 Hewins St., Dorchester 21, Mass.

MAGAZINE SUBSCRIPTIONS

SUBSCRIBE to all your favorite magazines and newspapers with one order. One bill to pay after orders or renewals are accepted. Catalog free. John Crehore, Postbox 2329-N, Washington 13, D. C.

GUIDANCE

DEPENDABLE evaluation of character, personality, aptitudes and counseling for career, education, human relations. By appointment or by mail. For information write Alfred Reiss, Ph.D., 680 Fort Washington Avenue, New York 33.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis. Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA. 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocational, psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

LANGUAGES

ALL LANGUAGES easily and quickly learned by phonograph records. LINGUAPHONE, other makes. New, used—rented. A. Alin, 475 Fifth Avenue, New York 17. MU. 3-1093.

MERCHANDISE FOR SALE

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.40 per carton, postpaid. Send check or money order. Ace Mail Order Co., East Orange 1, N. J.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

10 ROOM HOUSE; 12 ROOM HOUSE; 3 barns; garage; 380 acres; brook; woods; bridle paths; excellent for private homes or collective use. Bargain at quick sale. $12,500. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

VACATION CABINS

CREATIVE VACATION CABINS (moveable) designed built for you. Describe requirements, tastes. Inexpensive. Box 1621 c/o The Nation.

RESORTS

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.

ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

RO-ZEE LODGE
CENTRAL VALLEY, N. Y.

43 MILES from N.Y.C.

A 200-acre estate, friendly, informal retreat for vacationing. Fine American-Jewish food, comfortable accommodations. Horses, water sports, Hiking, Tennis, Skeet Archery, Handball. Movies. Square and Modern Dance Band. Open Year 'Round. Write or phone Highland Mills 7895.

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N.Y.

35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY

"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"

The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.

OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

MAUD'S
SUMMER-RAY

North Branch Sullivan County, N. Y.

Telephone: Callicoon 95 or 148

MUSIC, DRAMA, DANCE, SPORTS, ARTS AND CRAFTS, LAKE, ORCHESTRA, LIQUOR BAR

Gala Festivities

For travel information and rates, call City Office:
Daily, ORchard 4-0970 • Sunday, PResident 4-6290

?

EXECUTIVES...
STENOGRAPHERS...
HOUSEWIVES...
HONEYMOONERS...

Where will they spend their vacations this year?

Why not tell them about your resort in the pages of

THE NATION

Resort Classified Display

$6.16 per inch

Write or phone today for further information

Advertising Department

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street, New York City 7

BArclay 7-1066

RESORTS

The JOYS of JULY
JOIN THE GAY DOINGS AT

Camp LOG TAVERN

TENNIS • GOLF • RIDING • HANDBALL • SWIMMING • CANOEING • SHOWS • MOVIES • CONCERTS • COZY BUNGALOWS • DELICIOUS FOOD

Write or phone for Illustrated Booklet N

Phila. phone: TRINITY 0621

CAMP LOG TAVERN
Milford, Pa.

9 E. 40 St., New York.
LE. 2-8668

Return from a Vacation
Looking Fine — Feeling Fine

From

WESTERN VIEW FARM.

high in the Connecticut Hills, you can return tanned, glowing and invigorated, and with happy memories of the warm hospitality of an Inn which is in its Twenty-seventh season under the same ownership and management.

Rates per person, $12.00 a day, $70.00 a week
Week-ends, Friday evening to Sunday evening, $24.

TED OHMER

New Milford, Connecticut Tel.: New Milford 440

PINECREST
In the BERKSHIRES
On the HOUSATONIC RIVER

150 acres of Pines & Hemlocks in a panoramic setting of the rugged Berkshires. Comfortable lodge rooms for two. Bungalows with showers and fireplace, all facing the Housatonic River.

Boating, Swimming, Fishing, Bicycles, Tennis, Ping-Pong, Recordings, Dancing.

West Cornwall, Conn. • Tel. Cornwall 89-12

Diana and Abe Berman

DEUEL HOLLOW HOUSE
WINGDALE, N. Y.

Located in beautiful, historic Dutchess County, 70 miles from New York. Delicious food served on terrace overlooking our private lake, tennis, handball, swimming. Recreation in antique Quaker Hall. A completely informal atmosphere.

PHONE WINGDALE 2588

SCHROON Crest
"In the Adirondacks"

POTTERSVILLE NEW YORK

Private Beach, Canoes, Boating, All Sports, Recordings, Playhouse, Bar, Dancing, Entertainment Nightly. Jules Audpse & His Group, Harry Alshin & Orchestra. Excellent Cuisine. • Make Reservations Early.

N. Y. City Off.: PHONE, MAin 4-8570

LEAH OKUN — IRV. SCHONBERG, Mgt.

An Adult Resort — On SCHROON LAKE

RELAX, REJOICE with SPRING at

Lakecrest

On Hunn's Lake • Stanfordville, N. Y.

90 miles from N. Y. Ideal location in the heart of DUTCHESS COUNTY. Excellent accommodations. Cordial hospitality. Recordings, Library. All seasonal sports. Via N.Y.C.R.R. to Amenia, N.Y. Open all year.

WRITE OR PHONE YOUR RESERVATIONS

EVA BERG, Director Stanfordville 2328

RESORTS

The Glenmere

Your private country estate while you are our guest.

In the Ramapos

CHESTER, N. Y.

51 Miles from New York City

Your private lake with beautiful white sand beach. Your private golf course. We offer you excellent accommodations, superb cuisine and every facility for your entertainment. Glenmere is a glorious place for your vacation.

N. Y. Office: RE. 2-5047

45 Miles from New York City

Zindorest Park
Monroe N. Y.

Telephone 4421

A Resort for Adults Only

Exclusive location. 150 acres of unusual beauty. All sports. Lake and Pool on premises. Delicious food, relaxing atmosphere, dancing, horseback riding on premises, modern accommodations.

Greyhound, Adirondack Trailway and Short Line Buses stop at our Entrance.

LAKE VIEW LODGE
BOLTON LANDING on Lake George, N. Y.

A delightful, secluded spot for a quiet, relaxing vacation, intimate, informal. Near all sports, including golf — tennis — boating — riding — fishing. Newly furnished — modern appointments. Excellent home cooking and baking. RATES FROM $40

For Free Illustrated Folder write F. MARTIN, Mgr. at above address

HATHAWAY LODGE
OPEN ALL YEAR

Formerly the palatial 592-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Winding Mountain Trails. Delicious food. Easy Transportation.

Attractive Rates • Make reservations now

For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 299

Silver Brook House
PINE HILL NEW YORK

Catskill Mts., light, airy rooms, running hot-cold water, excellent cooking. Cultured homelike atmosphere. Beautiful mountain scenery. Bathing, fishing. All sport facilities.

MAKE RESERVATIONS NOW

Tel.: PINE HILL 3836, or N. Y. Phone RI. 9-7053

RATES: July and August, $50 up

SACKS FARM
Saugerties, N. Y. Tel. 590-J

Unusually beautiful countryside, pine woods, good, homey Jewish-American cooking. All conveniences. Intimate and restful. Swimming, horseback, tennis and other sports. Adults. Booklet.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JULY 20, 1946 NUMBER 3

The Shape of Things

THE FAIRLY LARGE MARGIN OF VOTES BY which the House approved the British loan was as gratifying as it was surprising. Before the debate started the Administration, not without reason, feared a defeat that would reduce its whole international economic program to ashes. But this seems to have been one of those rare occasions when arguments really swayed votes. Reinforcing the pleas of the President and former Secretary of State Cordell Hull, leaders of both parties spoke eloquently in favor of the loan. Members seem to have been particularly impressed by Speaker Rayburn and Majority Leader John W. McCormack, and by Representatives Wolcott, Wadsworth, and Eaton who carried the ball on the Republican benches. Among the many leaders of opinion throughout the country who urged Congress to act favorably on the loan especial credit is due to Rabbi Stephen S. Wise, who with great courage opposed the raging, tearing campaign for its defeat conducted by important Zionist groups seeking to "punish Britain." Rabbi Wise, like many other good liberals who have been distressed by British actions in Palestine, realized that this kind of punishment would damage America just as much, if not more, than it damaged Britain.

✶

FOR THE BRITISH THE LOAN WILL PERMIT only slightly lessened austerity in the immediate future. But it will offer them a breathing spell during which they can rebuild their foreign trade without resorting to measures incompatible with American interests. The money, it is certain, will be spent to strengthen Britain's economic position, thus increasing the security behind the loan, and will not be dissipated to finance imports of consumer luxury goods. One investment it will make possible is the acquisition of coal-mining machinery urgently needed to raise the productivity of British mines. Britain used to be a major exporter of coal to Europe but shortage of labor, and other difficulties which it is hoped will be overcome now that the industry is nationalized, have reduced output to such an extent that it is inadequate for domestic needs. By using some of its borrowed dollars to pay for American mining machinery, the British hope to restore coal production to a level where they can again ship coal abroad. That would be a major contribution to the recovery of Europe which is certainly an American, as well as a British, interest.

UNLESS THE NEW PRICE CONTROL BILL IS almost completely rewritten in the House, the President is bound to use his veto power once again. The irresponsible measure passed by the Senate ignores the public demand for effective ceilings and represents a total surrender to sectional interests. Exemptions for livestock have been swapped against exemptions for petroleum, for grains against tobacco. The result, as Republican Representative Jesse P. Wolcott has pointed out, is to remove from control practically everything industry buys while renewing ceilings on practically everything it sells. Such ceilings obviously could not be maintained for long. Uncontrolled food prices would mean a sharp increase in the cost of living—the "free markets" we have experienced in the last two weeks clearly indicate what the trend would be—and make higher wages absolutely necessary; higher labor and material costs would force upward revisions in nearly all industrial prices. In short, instead of making an effort to halt the inflationary spiral, the Senate has equipped it with jet propulsion.

✶

WHETHER THE EGYPTIAN GOVERNMENT IS trying to appease the British by its extraordinary measures of repression or whether it is using the negotiations with Britain as a handy pretext for ridding itself of all organized opposition is not yet apparent. What is clear from recent dispatches is the extreme lengths to which Sidky Pasha's reactionary regime is prepared to go. It is one thing to imprison independent labor, and left-wing political leaders; that has been going on for a long time. But to extend the definition of "communists" to include almost every cultural group in the country and many prominent liberal European residents, and, above all, to suppress Al Waf Al Misri, principal organ of the Wafd, Egypt's one effective popular party and the chief expression of nationalist feeling, is to invite a political crisis of major dimensions. It seems to indicate that the Cabinet, which represents the Palace clique, considers a showdown now less dangerous to its tenure than the continued rise of discontent and organized opposition. Its delay in reaching a satisfactory agreement for the withdrawal of British troops coupled with the utter misery of the people undoubtedly threatens the grandiose ambitions of Egypt's fat and dissipated young monarch. Wholesale arrests and the wiping out of independent

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things 57
Ivan the Progressive 60
The Battle of Germany 60
Sidney Hillman by Henry Wallace 61
What Sidney Hillman Stood For by Freda Kirchwey 62

ARTICLES

Can Man Survive? by G. Brock Chisholm 63
Why India Starves by M. R. Masani 66
A New Deal for Texas? by Harold Young 68
The UNRRA Scandal in China by Ilona Ralf Sues 70
Molotov Shocks France by J. Alvarez del Vayo 72
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 73

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

In the Waxworks A Poem by Karl Shapiro 74
The Fabian Webbs by Keith Hutchison 74
Aragon in English by René Blanc-Roos 76
Briefer Comment 78
Films by James Agee 80
Records by B. H. Haggin 80

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 82

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 170 by Jack Barrett 83

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon — Washington Editor I. F. Stone — Literary Editor Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors
Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch — Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors
Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editor: Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx
Advertising Manager: William B. Brown
Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

associations and newspapers will not increase his popularity. Whether or not they will strengthen his position depends in part on what attitude Britain's representatives take when the renewed treaty negotiations get underway. It would create an unhappy precedent if the ruthless repressions of Sidky Pasha had the result of improving Egypt's bargaining position.

*

MINNESOTA REPUBLICANS VOTING IN LAST week's Senatorial primary did more than put a period to the archaic political career of Henrik Shipstead. They shored up the Stassen wing of the party, which had been sagging a bit since the defeat of its candidate in Nebraska; they stiffened the spine of more than one wavering supporter of the British loan in Congress; and for the benefit of the world at large they repudiated the suspicion that the Middle West was fast slipping into the McCormick groove of nationalist isolation. Seldom is a single broad issue as dominant in a Congressional campaign as was the case in Minnesota. Shipstead went to the Senate in 1922 as a foe of the League of Nations, and now after 24 years he could—and did—point to a record of opposition to the World Court, the United Nations charter, the Bretton Woods agreement, and even UNRRA. Most recently he has devoted himself to the fight against the loan to Britain, and during the campaign he went to the length of denouncing it in paid advertisements in the papers of his state, especially in districts with a large Germanic population. His opponent, Governor Thye, is one of Harold Stassen's ablest supporters, and he made no bones about the kind of foreign policy he would endorse if sent to the Senate. Thye's unexpectedly large majority by no means points to a Stassen victory in 1948; Stassen has done an educational job in his home state that still needs to be done in countless Republican sectors from the Alleghenies west to the Rockies. But if the Lundeen-Lindbergh-Shipstead country can make the grade, there is hope that even the Nebraska of Hugh Butler will in time apply for admission to Wendell Willkie's One World.

*

UNFORTUNATELY MONTANA'S DEMOCRATIC primary, which will have been held by the time this issue reaches its readers, will offer no comparable evidence of the trend of thought in that state. Senator Wheeler, even more violently isolationist that Shipstead, is a more complex character, with a more complex record. His fight for renomination, moreover, has been vastly complicated by demagogy, by a copper-dominated press monopoly directed against his opponent, and an inexcusable intervention on his behalf by the President of the United States. There was some hope that after the war, and after the death of President Roosevelt, Wheeler might shed his blind bitterness and regain some of the perspective that marked his years as a liberal politician. But apparently he has been damaged beyond repair. His campaign against Judge Erickson, whose supporters unhappily resorted to some rather unsavory devices themselves, has been marked by the shoddy techniques he picked up as an American Firster, complete with charges that his opponent was financed by Communists, New York Jews, and Wall Street—that famous trinity dreamed up by Father Coughlin. But the chief source of confusion in the Montana primary were the gratuitous endorsements of Wheeler by Senator La Follette and President Truman. La Follette's action is at least explicable in view of his isolationist prejudices and his regard for Wheeler's pro-labor record. The President's position can be explained only by his curious concept that a private friend rates a public trust. When he first came to the Senate, under the dubious auspices of the Pendergast machine, Truman was shunned by the New Dealers until Wheeler took him in hand and gave him a berth on the Interstate Commerce Committee. And now he is doing the decent thing by "Burton"—which is gallant but galling to the millions of Americans who just don't know the President well enough to call him "Harry."

✶

PRAVDA'S ATTACK ON BROOKS ATKINSON must have made Pegler, O'Donnell, and Sokolsky green with envy. Seldom has an American liberal been subjected to so eloquent a barrage of guttertalk. The occasion was a series of three articles Atkinson wrote in the New York Times on his return from ten months in the Soviet Union. In The Nation of March 8, 1941, when the fortunes of the democracies in their war against the Axis were at their lowest ebb, Brooks Atkinson wrote an article entitled, "The Decision Is Simple." Essentially it was a testament of a man's faith in democracy as a living force. He wrote: "The moral nation is the one that guarantees the freedom of the people, safeguards the health of the population, educates and cherishes the children, fosters art, spreads knowledge, endeavors to promote honest dealings between individuals and groups, lives as a good neighbor with other nations, tries constantly to widen and deepen its understanding with faith in the destiny of man." To make it quite plain that he had no illusions about the adequacy of American democracy, he noted the economic and social bondage in which the Negro race is held, the violent discrimination that bars Jews from full participation in the benefits of American citizenship, the economic serfdom under which millions of Americans spend mean and meager lives. On his return from China where he spent many months as a war correspondent he wrote, in October, 1944, on the occasion of General Stilwell's retirement: "Inside China it represents the political triumph of a moribund and antidemocratic regime that is more concerned with maintaining its political supremacy than in driving the Japanese out of China. America is now committed at least passively to supporting a regime that has become increasingly unpopular and distrusted in China, that maintains three secret-police services and concentration camps for political prisoners, that stifles free speech, and resists democratic forces." So far from being an "informer of the capitalist press" Brooks Atkinson has consistently shown incorrigible loyalty to democracy as a fighting creed. That, we suspect, is what got under Pravda's skin.

✶

SURVIVORS OF THE KIELCE POGROM WILL BE little relieved to learn, through Cardinal Hlond, that "The Catholic Church always and everywhere condemns murders of all kinds." When the Church is really out to do a job of condemnation, as against communism, it is capable of doing a thoroughgoing, unequivocal, wholehearted piece of work. Poor-spirited indeed would be the Prince of the Church who condemned communism with one breath and in the next explained that one should recognize, all the same, that this doctrine was an understandable political reaction of honest people to the evils of capitalism. Yet it was in precisely this vein that Cardinal Hlond condemned the massacre of forty-one innocent Jews in Kielce. He is filled "with sadness and regret" that these people were stoned, clubbed, and trampled to death, but "to a great degree" the tragedy is "due to the Jews" themselves. Why? Because "they occupy leading positions in Poland's government and endeavor to introduce a governmental structure which the majority of the people do not desire." The truth is that while there are a handful of Jews in office, they are insignificant in the pattern of change that so distresses the Church. The lines in Poland, tragically enough, are drawn between communism and Catholic feudalism; and the Jews, wanting nothing more than to shake the dust of Poland from their feet, are caught between the two totalitarian machines. The government uses their massacre as a stick to beat all its opponents—the Church, General Anders, and Mikolajczyk; the Church uses the same nightmare to undermine the government and damn the Communists. And the Jews, seeking only an exit from hell, find the way blocked by the British, who can't see why they don't stay where they are instead of conspiring to save the remnant of their lives.

✶

THE DEATH OF JUDGE JOHN BEARDSLEY HAS deprived American liberalism of one of its ablest exponents and staunchest friends. It would not be far from the truth to say that John Beardsley, identified with the cause of civil liberties in Southern California for forty years, brought the concept of civil rights to that region. A list of the victories he won for civil liberties in the courts would be long indeed. During the first World War he carried to the United States Supreme Court, and won, the case of a German-American deprived of civil service status by hysterical officials. In the post-war period he took to the high court the case of Yetta Stromberg—the famous "red flag case,"—which occupies a significant position in the history of the Court's interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment. For this was one of the first cases in which the Court began to use the broad language of the amendment as it was intended to be used—to defend the civil rights of United States citizens. In preparing his argument and brief in this case, Beardsley closed his law office and devoted a year to a study of the legal problems involved. As in most of his celebrated court victories, his reward consisted largely in the satisfaction of having worked out a sound concept of law and human rights. Appointed to the Superior Court of Los Angeles County by Governor Olson, Judge Beardsley was re-elected for the second time only a few days before his death.

Ivan the Progressive

THE second part of "Ivan the Terrible" will not be shown, the third part will not be made; its director, Sergei Eisenstein, has had two films released for distribution in the last seventeen years. A bourgeois critic, remembering From each according to his abilities, to each according to his needs, might feel that the Soviet Union has, for a sixth of this century, both overpaid and underemployed its best director. No Stakhanovite, he. But more searching critics—concentrated, in this country, in the vicinity of the Daily Worker—are likely to agree with the analysis of the Central Committee of the Communist Party, which has stated in its weekly newspaper, Culture and Life, that Eisenstein's film is anti-artistic, anti-historical, cold and passionless historism, and a fairy tale besides—all this because "contrary to historic truth, Ivan the Terrible has not been shown as a progressive statesman." If Ivan the Terrible is the Russian idea of a progressive statesman, this explains a lot of things that have been puzzling us.

Soviet movies, the Communist Party has decided, are so important as propaganda aids for the new Five-Year Plan that no more historical subjects, biographies, or comedies will be filmed—comedies, in particular, are "primitive and bad." All films must be made about "simple Soviet people, who are the real creators of history"; the films' themes will be, preferably, valor in war and loyalty to the Soviet Union; and a good many subjects are—shall we say suggested? The list begins with the Great Patriotic War and ends with Georgian fruit farms and "mother heroines"—women who have had ten or more children. Many a Russian movie-goer, before this terrible new Plan is over, will groan to himself: Better fifty years of Hollywood than a cycle of mother heroines! He will have to take what comfort he can in the realization that, as the Party says, "the cinema is a sharp ideological party weapon." Poor Eisenstein, impaled for seventeen years upon it, must by now realize that better than anyone.

Brooks Atkinson made some comments on the flat and deadly automatism of present-day Soviet writing; and the new Five-Year Plan for Soviet movies has a stupefying resemblance to that series of films, glorifying Free Enterprise and the American Way of Life, which was once planned by the National Association of Manufacturers. American movie-goers will look gloomily at the possibility of getting a decent film from that freshly whetted party weapon, the Soviet cinema; and they know from the grim experience of the last few years that there is little more likelihood of getting a good one from that profit-bearing financial institution, Hollywood. The French, who have made a majority of what good movies there have been in the last ten years, say that the quota system attached to the American loan will make it next to impossible for them to compete with American movies in France itself. The discriminating consumer had better get accustomed to staying at home with a good book; and the thing for a really talented director to do is to take up, say, tattooing: there are always a few sailors who will demand neither ideology nor profit from a true work of art.

The Battle of Germany

MOLOTOV'S statement on Germany to the Council of Foreign Ministers appeared at first glance to indicate a shift in the Russian position nearer to those of America and Britain. Disclaiming ideas of a peace of revenge, he argued against further dismemberment of the Reich, urged its political unification, and proclaimed the necessity of its industrial revival in the interests of European economy. All these ideas have been supported by Britain and, though with less urgency, by the United States. On the other hand they conflict totally with the policies of France which has always insisted that the industrial Rhineland must be separated politically and economically from the rest of Germany lest it again serve as the arsenal of aggression. As Mr. del Vayo explains in a cable from Paris on another page, the Molotov speech has stunned the French. The shock was not reduced when a French compromise offer to accept a provisional plan for German economic unity, so long as the Saar was excluded, was blocked by the Soviet Foreign Minister.

It is noteworthy, however, that French dismay has not been matched by American or British elation. It is evident that Byrnes and Bevin are going to look long and hard at Molotov's gift-horse, suspecting it may be of the Trojan breed and intended to carry Russian influence to the western boundaries of Germany. Their suspicions have no doubt been inflamed by Molotov's insistence, in the course of an equally skeptical scrutiny of Byrnes's own equine offering—the 25-year treaty to maintain German disarmament, that reparations to the tune of 10 billion dollars must be paid to Russia before the occupation of Germany ends. He declared that this claim was in accordance with the Potsdam agreement but, as a matter of fact, that document carefully avoided the assessment of reparations in monetary terms. Nor did it provide for their payment in "current production," as well as by removals of plant and machinery, as Molotov now asserts. On the contrary, the Potsdam declaration expressly stated that the proceeds of exports from current production were to be used in the first place to pay for necessary imports. That must mean that current production would not be available to meet reparations until Germany had achieved a trade balance. But, at the moment, America and Britain are together paying out hundreds of millions of dollars for the imports required to prevent wholesale starvation in Germany and a surplus of exports is a very distant goal.

That is the reason, perhaps, why Messrs. Byrnes and Bevin have so far made little reference to the more distant ideals of German unity enunciated by Molotov and have concentrated on the problem of economic unity of the Reich now. In their view that includes free trade between the occupation zones and the pooling of exports to pay for imports. Unified economic administration was specifically provided for at Potsdam but its consummation has been prevented hitherto by French insistence on the prior settlement of the Rhineland question, and Russian objections to giving exports priority over reparations. Bevin has now declared that if this Potsdam provision remains neglected Britain will be compelled to organize its zone in a way that will prevent it from burdening British taxpayers. That would seem to portend an imitation of the Soviet policy of integrating the Russian zone with the Russian economy. Byrnes has offered, as a second-best alternative to unification to form an economic union between the American zone and those of any other occupying powers.

Obviously there is no conflict between these proposals, as the British and American zones would certainly be more productive if operated as one economic unit. But we can be certain that Russia will oppose partial unification, since it would insure continued Soviet exclusion from any voice in the administration of the Ruhr, and would limit reparations to what could be extracted from the Russian zone. And reparations, it is clear, are the immediate Soviet preoccupation as they have been ever since V-E day. That is not surprising in view of Russia's terrific losses in the war. But it is important to note a change of emphasis regarding the mode of payment. Earlier the U. S. S. R. had been the sternest advocate among the Big Four of German deindustrialization. That fitted in with the policy of taking reparations in the form of plants. Now Molotov combines agreement with the British about the importance of German industry to Europe's economy with a demand for a large slice of current German production. Evidently Moscow has decided that there is more to be gained by having the Germans work their own machinery than by transporting it to Russia. This may be due partly to recognition that the removal policy involved a wastage of German skills, partly to shortage of labor in Russia. Hence Molotov's advocacy of Germany unity under conditions which diverted surplus production into Russian hands. But unless that surplus was genuine, that is to say, a surplus created after all imports had been offset, it would mean that Russia was milking the German cow while America and Britain provided the hay. Clearly we would not find this an acceptable arrangement, particularly as we are desperately afraid that Russia is seeking to add Germany to its collective farm.

It appears then that the first discussions of the German problem by the Big Four offer little hope of an early solution. Indeed, there can be no real solution while Russian and the Western powers are in fundamental conflict. Before the Big Four can make peace with Germany they must make peace between themselves. Until they do that Germany will remain a battleground where Russia on the one side and America and Britain on the other compete for offensive and defensive positions and offer rival bids for the support of the German people. A better set-up for the revival of German nationalism can hardly be conceived.

Sidney Hillman

BY HENRY A. WALLACE

Washington, July 13

IT IS easy to overemphasize the political side of Sidney Hillman. Political alertness and progressive political action were of his very being. And he leaves as the record of his political force three great agencies of the people's will—the American Labor Party in New York, the C. I. O.-Political Action Committee, and the National Citizens Political Action Committee. No one dares deny to these agencies—working in cooperation with the Democratic Party organization—a tremendous share in the people's progress during the administrations of Franklin D. Roosevelt.

But of coequal stature with the Sidney Hillman of political action was the Sidney Hillman of labor statesmanship. It is of the utmost significance that the memorials of Sidney Hillman's death came as much from management as they came from labor. The union that he built in his youth and guided throughout his life has given to American labor a remarkable example of collaboration with management in the interest of both the employer and the worker, with a constant concern for the consumer and the general welfare. Justice, efficiency, stabilization, and progress in industry were Sidney Hillman's watchwords. Perhaps his most important single contribution was to provide a setting of labor-management cooperation in which all parties concerned had a real sense of participation and a real stake in a joint endeavor. For Sidney Hillman made of the Amalgamated much more than just an organization to preserve and advance the rights of labor; he made it a driving force which offered constructive leadership in advancing the interests of the industry and the economy as a whole.

Whether in labor-management relations or in political action, the dominant fact about Sidney Hillman was his patient passion for the common good. He always thought in terms of what he could do today, no matter whether the thing he could accomplish today was big or small. Doing this, he felt that he was always in a position to do something bigger tomorrow. Extremists of the left frequently maligned him as much as those of the right. But he was unswerved by such character assassins as those who once called him a proponent of slave labor when he accepted the twenty-five-cent minimum wage. Acceptance of the principle of the minimum wage was the all-important fact; get the principle established and then keep up the fight for a higher minimum. And Sidney Hillman fought on with brilliant and dynamic leadership. In the end, the increase in the minimum has been the measure of a healthier and wealthier industry.

In the same way, his genius for political action has given the people an ever-increasing participation in the political life of their nation. He built well with patience. He walked softly. He travelled far. And our world is immeasurably richer for his having worked among us.

What Sidney Hillman Stood For

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

WITH the death of Sidney Hillman, the progressive labor and political forces of the country have lost their ablest leader. The full measure of that loss can be taken if one tries to think of a man to fill his place. It will be impossible to find such a man today or, we suspect, in the near future. For Hillman in recent years had become much more than the farseeing and creative union executive he had always been. The fierce conflicts that shook the country in the years before the war, together with the impact of the war itself, drove him into an active political role, first in support of Roosevelt's program, domestic and foreign, and then in building a labor political movement, capable of exercising independent power both at the polls and in Congress. The C. I. O.-Political Action Committee was Hillman's creation, even though it had the strong backing of Murray and the other top leaders of the organization. Its effective intervention in the 1944 campaign was attested to even more fervently by its enemies, in their attempt to frighten the voters with the specter of red revolution, than by its very realistic leaders. The parallel organization of the National Citizens Political Action Committee was also Sidney Hillman's work; for he understood from the start the necessity of effecting a working partnership between labor and independent progressives.

Above all Hillman was a brilliant stategist. He knew, when P. A. C. was founded, that a national third party would make a present of the election to the Republicans; he knew that the only realistic course for a left political organization was to put progressives in office and try by every means to weaken the hold of the old guard over both old-party machines. He knew that independent labor action must limit and direct itself to what it could hope to accomplish; it could not leap from birth into political maturity. The job of education conducted by P. A. C. among its own political membership has been one of its most impressive accomplishments.

But Sidney Hillman was no less alive to the necessity of allying American labor with the militant forces of labor everywhere. His role in creating the World Federation of Trade Unions to replace the moribund and largely discredited I. F. T. U. was again one of creation as well as leadership. And there, as in the organization of P. A. C., he showed unequalled skill in avoiding both Communist domination and the schismatic effects of anti-Communist fanaticism. If the new world labor organization has succeeded in reaching decisions where the agencies of the United Nations have largely failed, a very important share of the credit must go to Sidney Hillman. Almost alone among American labor leaders, he had a broad political philosophy, a keen and realistic political mind.

The effect of his death will be realized only gradually; even by his closest associates it cannot be gauged immediately. But shock and sorrow will be followed by a sense of loss that can only be heightened as labor and its progressive allies face the challenge thrown down by the reactionary forces whose strength is growing day by day in Congress and in the country.

DEL VAYO IN RUSSIA

▶ The Nation's European editor arrived in the Soviet Union this week to write an exclusive series for The Nation. He will present a first-hand report of happenings within the Soviet Union, the progress of reconstruction, an appraisal of the Kremlin's foreign policy, and the inside-Russia view of world affairs.

Can Man Survive?

BY G. BROCK CHISHOLM

THE most important question to the human race now, and perhaps permanently, should be "Is there going to be another war?" This question can be put in various ways—for example, "Is it possible for the human race to take the extraordinary and unprecedented actions required to ensure that the normal cycle of peace, preparation for war, and war which has gone on throughout known history will no longer occur?" Or "Is it possible for members of the human race actually to live in peace with each other as they have never done?" Because of man's vastly increased ability to kill, all other questions pale into insignificance; basically nothing else matters. All other importances of man on earth depend on his ability to survive in reasonable numbers. It is man's very survival which is now threatened, and so the question above can be put in another way: "Can man arrange to survive as the dominant species on the earth, and if so how?"

To pose the question in this way is not necessarily to accept as an original premise that, in any final sense, it would be a good thing for man to survive. It may well be that man's disappearance from the earth, or at least his being pushed out of the dominant position, would be in the best interests of whatever is the goal (if there is a goal) of the evolutionary process which has been going on for a long time. Other animals have come and gone. It may be that man will also become extinct and some other organisms will be left freer to develop along the lines of their own particular destiny. As a result of the recent tremendous advances made by man in the efficiency with which he can kill off his kind it would seem to be very likely that few members of the human race will be alive after 20, 50 or 100 years—or whenever the next world war takes place.

Our question, then, might be put in still another way: "Should man tamely submit to extinction or should he try to do something to prevent it?" If we examine this question from the point of view of man there is hardly room for doubt of the answer. Survival would seem to be the first law of nature—not necessarily individual survival but definitely the survival of the species. After the enormous investment the race has made in the cause of survival it would be ridiculous to give ourselves up now without taking all possible steps, no matter how drastic or revolutionary, which can increase even slightly our chances of survival as a species. The plain fact is that man, generally, wants to survive as a species. If we can agree on this premise then the answer to our question demands only a study of ways and means—the best method, the cost, and whether man is willing to pay that cost or not.

To use a medical analogy, the human race is, socially, desperately and dangerously ill. The first necessity is a clear diagnosis of the type of illness, with an identification of the cause or causes, and then the prescription of treatment. Using all available knowledge of the human being and his functioning, it should be quite possible to do this with some confidence in our ability to reach sound conclusions. The real difficulty will come—as in prevention of diphtheria, tuberculosis, and many other diseases—from the probable unwillingnes of the patient, the human race, to take the medicine or treatment because it tastes bad, or smells awful, or is painful, or involves giving up some of his present certainties, or because he still has faith in one or other of the old medicines which have never been effective. Any change drastic enough extensively to modify perhaps the most consistent behavior pattern of the whole human race throughout thousands of years, is going to be very painful indeed. Extensive surgery is not pleasant, but a persisting cancer is worse in the end.

Emerson describes the choice every mind has to make between truth and repose. To quote from his essay on "Intellect": "God offers to every mind its choice between truth and repose. Take which you please—you can never have both. Between these, as a pendulum, man oscillates. He in whom the love of repose predominates will accept the first creed, the first philosophy, the first political party he meets—most likely his father's. He gets rest, commodity, and reputation; but he shuts the door of truth. He in whom the love of truth predominates will keep himself aloof from all moorings, and afloat. He will abstain from dogmatism, and recognize all the opposite negations between which, as walls, his being is swung. He submits to the inconvenience of suspense and imperfect opinion, but he is a candidate for truth, as the other is not, and respects the highest law of his being."

GENERAL G. B. CHISHOLM was Director-General of Medical Services for the Canadian Army during the war and is now Canada's Deputy Minister of National Health and Canadian delegate to the United Nations Health Assembly. A psychiatrist of world-wide reputation, he delivered the William Alanson White Memorial lectures last October on "The Reestablishment of Peacetime Society." On that occasion Secretary Henry Wallace remarked: "The lecture of General Chisholm last night is one of the most thought provoking which has ever been given in Washington. It goes to the very roots of future peace." The above is the first installment of a two-part article.

In Emerson's day there was little social obligation to choose the hard way of following truth. Repose was not synonymous with racial suicide as it is now. The complacent attitude which found its expression in the saying "God's in His heaven, all's right with the world" did not promise complete disaster as it does now. The lives of large numbers of the race were not dependent on the goodwill of other peoples all over the world as they are now or shortly will be. Even extensive hate and intolerance could rarely gain more than relatively local expression until quite recently. The choice between "truth" or "repose" is no longer a matter of only individual concern. The people who chose "repose" made two world wars possible and, if they continue to choose it and impose that choice on their children, will be responsible for the final catyclasm.

Emerson apparently believed that every mind had indeed a free choice between truth on the one hand and repose, or orthodoxy, or authoritarian certainty, on the other. That belief was, at least to a considerable degree, mistaken. It is clear that throughout life "conscience" plays a very important part in any such choice, and that "conscience" is imposed by parental and other pressures in very early childhood. It is also true that the ability to dissociate, to avoid looking at uncomfortable things, is commonly taught in childhood and becomes a fixed behavior pattern for life.

A great difficulty in attempting to diagnose our illness, to find its causes and eventually to prescribe its treatment is the necessity to get a wide enough point of view. It is obvious that the picture must be seen whole, and not exclusively from the point of view of any one individual or group in the world.

It is, however, very difficult to assume a point of view which is not local and affected by the prejudices of our particular environment and upbringing. Complete freedom from prejudice, true objectivity, is an unattainable ideal. We are all cursed with loyalties. Our minds are not free to judge, to accept or reject, by the use of pure facts; instead our prejudices, emotions, and consciences become involved and affect our ability to see clearly and our decisions. But in order to help ourselves to look at this world with as little prejudice as possible and the truest perspective we can attain, let us imagine ourselves visitors from some other world, say, from one well outside this solar system. Let us suppose that on the way we have called on many other worlds and seen many kinds of life and ways of living.

First, let us look at this particular star in terms of space. We might number it one among millions or we might call it by a name that a few of its inhabitants have been using recently, "Earth." It is one of eight (plus some asteroids) which revolve around a much larger and hotter star. There is nothing particularly impressive about this Earth. It has one small satellite whose principal use seems to be to assume blame for certain peculiarities of behavior of some of the inhabitants of Earth. Earth is not at all remarkable for size. It is dwarfed by other bodies even in its own locality: just a below-average unremarkable star.

"BABY PLAY WITH NICE BALL?"

Reprinted from The Nation of Sept. 1, 1945

This one seems to be made of much the same materials which form other stars. It has gone a long way in the cooling-down process which seems to be general in what we have seen of this particular universe. We can easily see from the evidence presented by rocks that it was at one time very hot indeed, in a molten state, but for at least the last few billions of its revolutions around its sun, called "years" by some of its inhabitants, it has been relatively cool and has produced little heat itself. The long, gradual cooling process has been slowed greatly in the case of Earth by the heat radiated by the relatively large star, "Sun," around which it revolves. Earth is not so hot as many other bodies nor yet so cold as many others. It was much hotter a few billions of years ago and will be much cooler a few billions of years in the future. Its rate of cooling has not been constant; we find that there have been periods, the latest quite recently, when thick ice, perhaps a mile deep, covered it at both poles and possibly one half the distance from each pole to the equator. These periods perhaps had something to do with the sun not giving off so much heat for a few thousand years, or perhaps something got in the way and shadowed Earth from Sun for a while. Whatever it was could, of course, happen again and probably will. Perhaps, though, before such a cold spell comes again, and if it is not too severe, the local inhabitants may be able to arrange some sort of central heating system which will make it possible for them, or some of them, to survive. If the change comes slowly enough man may be able to grow fur again over a period of a few thousand or hundred thousand years, or, indeed, he may arrange to put some selected individuals in some sort of cold storage to await another cycle of warmer weather, while the rest die off. However if such a probable cold spell goes very far the next time, the present dominant species on Earth may well not survive, and some other more cold-resistant species may get a chance to show what it can do.

Next, what about this little star in time? Once again it is quite unremarkable, not very old and not very new. We do not know and cannot yet find out when life first appeared on Earth. There is plentiful evidence of many forms of life, not so complicated as some present forms but still a long way along the road of development, at least some billions of years ago. We know that some 500,000,000 years ago, more or less, much of Earth was populated with a variety of animals. Many large and savage species roamed the swamps and forests; many small but no less savage things crept or slithered through the jungle or marginal ooze of lakes or seas. Each species was doing its best to survive in the ways which were peculiar to itself.

But some of the present forms of life on Earth are very recent newcomers; man is one of these. Whether man developed very slowly for a very long time and then shot ahead suddenly over a period of only a few hundred thousand years; or whether at some stage of his development he was endowed with some supernatural (or not yet understood) equipment, a "soul"; or whether he was superimposed, by some supernatural (or not yet understood) process, ready-made on a world full of other animals which had developed slowly, we have not yet found out. We also notice that, very strangely, these possibilities cannot be discussed by many inhabitants in many places on Earth because of faiths and fears about these things which were imposed in childhood.

Whenever man began to be of any importance on Earth, it was probably not more than a million years ago, though some estimates of his presence in something like his present form go as high as twelve million years. Whichever is nearer the truth this is a very short time indeed in terms of world development.

We may well wonder how it is that man has assumed such a dominant position on Earth in such a short time. Many other animals have lived as long; many have lived longer and eventually disappeared. What of man's equipment has put him so quickly and so firmly in the saddle? Each species of animal has some special equipment of its own that makes its methods of survival different from those of all others. In effect each organism represents a different experiment in competition for survival. Some animals can hear many sounds inaudible to man, for instance. Others can see much better. Others can run faster or jump farther, or hug or claw more effectively, or go longer without food or water. Some, by clever camouflage, can blend with their background. Others can hibernate through long winters or dry spells when food or water are hard to find. Some can live under the water and others under the ground or high in the air. In all of these fields, and many others, man is very poorly equipped. What then is man's specialty? If we examine man's body in detail we find that everything he has, except one thing, is outclassed in many other species. The only instance in which man shows a superior development is his brain, and particularly in one part—the upper end, or "fore-brain."

This, his brain, is man's only apparent specialty. Only by its use has he come so far and so fast. Only man's power to think puts him and keeps him at the head of the procession on Earth.

[To be concluded next week]

Why India Starves

BY M. R. MASANI

Bombay, India

AN American engaged in the good cause of collecting funds for the relief of the victims of starvation in India recently mentioned in the course of a letter to a friend in India, the reasons generally given by people in the United States for not doing anything to help. His list included:

India is so far away that we aren't interested.

India has always had famines and always will have famines; if you save them this year, they'll die next year.

More food means more children and just as much starvation—so why help?

The Indians are used to famines and because of their religion they can starve without suffering much.

The Indians are inferior people and not worth helping. Sub-human masses live in India, not individuals.

Nothing can help the Indians until they become Christians and stop exploiting and killing each other.

There are fabulously rich Indians; why don't they help their own people? Why should we give money to such a wealthy country?

It's Britain's job; let her do it.

India's starvation is not our fault. We didn't bomb India nor did the war affect her.

Writing from India, one is inclined to leave to others nearer home the task of convincing Americans that the people of India are not really "sub-human," that their mass conversion to Christianity is neither necessary nor adequate for the solution of India's food problem, and that, religion notwithstanding, it is as painful for an Indian to die of starvation as it is for other human beings. No doubt the India Famine Emergency Committee's mission, which is now touring India, and the eminent journalists attached to it will apply themselves to this task on their return home. The facts set out in this article may, however, dispel three misapprehensions that would appear to be current among American readers: that more food for India means more children and just as much starvation; that India is a wealthy country and that fabulously rich Indians do not help their own people; and that World War II did not adversely affect India's food economy.

It is necessary to distinguish between the present crisis and normal conditions in the case of a country like India.

M. R. MASANI is a member of the Indian Legislative Assembly and a former mayor of Bombay. He is now serving as chairman of the People's Provincial Food Council of Bombay. He is the author of "Our India."

The food situation is, of course, always grave in a country such as ours where the masses of the people have, in the best of times, barely one square meal a day, where a balanced diet is unknown except to the well-to-do, and where the shortage of food is normally so great that there would be no food at all for 115,000,000 of the population if the rest of the people were provided with a normal diet. Today, however, India has struck a new low. Drought last fall and winter has led to a failure of crops resulting in a drop of between six and seven million tons of food grains in addition to our normal annual deficit of 10,000,000 tons. To the extent that this is not made good from overseas in the remaining months of 1946, the people of India will have to starve beyond their usual measure and many may have to die.

How does it happen, the reader will ask, that a country with a fertile soil, with an area of 380,000,000 acres sown to crops, with 280,000,000 of its people working the land, and with 200,000,000 cattle out of the world's total stock of 700,000,000, is in such a plight today? It is not possible here to go into the long-range causes of this paradox beyond indicating that an obsolete system of land tenure with only a third of the land owned by those who till it, a peasantry denied literacy and burdened with debt, holdings fragmented till they drop to an average of three or four acres per family, the absence of irrigation over large tracts of a country dependent for water supply on the vagaries of the monsoon, and the absence of a supply of good seed, modern implements and fertilizers have all played their part in producing this tragic result.

It has been urged, mostly by British publicists, that the rapid increase in India's population is as important a cause of India's misfortunes as all the factors mentioned above. It is estimated that an average of .86 acres of cultivated land is available per head of population in this country. As against this, nutrition experts in America have calculated that 3.1 acres per head are required to produce a "liberal diet," while even for what is called "an emergency restricted diet," 1.2 acres per head are necessary. In the light of these figures, it is clear that the ratio of cultivated area to population is distinctly on the low side in India. Is this ratio increasing or decreasing? Though the evidence is conflicting and the statistical data of the Indian government notoriously unreliable, one might not be far wrong in concluding with Dr. W. R. Aykroyd, until recently Director of the Nutrition Research Laboratories in Coonoor and now on the staff of the Food and Agriculture Organization, that "the available evidence suggests that the area of land under cultivation is not increasing proportionately to population growth, so that the ratio is decreasing." This does not, however, mean that the chronic starvation of people in India is caused by over-population, for we have by no means exhausted either the limits of cultivable land or the possibilities of the land already under the plough, which, on an average, yields only a fourth of what it does in England and a third of what it does in Japan. All it means is that our food production must catch up with the increase in our numbers, the rate of which appears to be quite modest when compared with those of several other countries in the past few decades. Between 1870 and 1930, our population increased by 30.7 per cent; that of England and Wales by 77 per cent; that of Japan by 113 per cent; and that of Russia by 115 per cent. It should not be difficult, therefore, to agree with the conclusion arrived at by an American writer, Kate L. Mitchell, who says: "There is every reason to believe that by making full use of her resources, India could support a far larger population than at present. The cause of Indian poverty is not the rate of population growth, but the fact that India is a case of arrested economic development."

This is India's long-term problem. What has aggravated the situation in the past few years has been India's involvement, as a part of the British Empire, in a war which was not of her choosing, with the consequent wartime loss of rice imports from Burma and Thailand. The presence of a large force of British, American, and other troops who lived to a varying extent on the country, the inability of the peasant to obtain even his normal supply of tools and fertilizers, and the failure of the British government in India adequately to mobilize and augment the resources of the country all contributed to today's emergency.

Food and finance are by no means unrelated; another complicating factor has been the inflation resulting from a persistent expansion in currency since 1940. This currency expansion was the means devised by the British government to pay for the services and materials it drew from India for war purposes without parting with anything tangible in return. Speaking about the effects of this dubious expedient, the present Secretary of State of India, Lord Pethick-Lawrence, said in the House of Commons on November 4, 1943, that "he thought the main cause of the present famine [i. e., the Bengal Famine] was that a large number of people in certain provinces had not the purchasing power to pay for such food grains as would keep them alive. For that inflation, the government of India and nobody else could be held responsible."

In 1943 the government of India appointed a Food Grains Policy Committee, with Sir Theodore Gregory as chairman, to consider the increasing gravity of the situation. That committee recommended that India import a million tons of food grains every year, that being India's average annual imports before World War II. The committee also advised the initial import of half a million tons extra to help build up a Central Food Grains Reserve to meet precisely the sort of situation we are facing today; but unfortunately the government failed to persuade the British and allied governments to make available the necessary shipping facilities.

What is India doing to reduce the impact of the blow that is about to fall on her? The government has tried to speed up its "Grow More Food" campaign which has already brought some 11,000,000 more acres under food crops during the past three or four years. Efforts have also been made to get a greater proportion of grain into the common pool and provinces like Bombay and Madras have highly involved schemes of compulsory levy which leave to the peasant little more than what he needs for himself and for his dependents. The rationing of food grains and sugar has also been extended.

The ration that was in force when the present crisis developed some months back was a pound of cereals daily for adults. That this is no princely ration can be seen from the fact that it was also the ration provided to criminals in Indian prisons and prescribed as a minimum by the Famine Relief Code. People in the United States may not realize that for the mass of our people, whose average per capita income is about $20 a year, the entire diet consists of grain alone—that meat and fish, milk, vegetables, and fruit are beyond their means. This meager ration has now been cut by as much as 25 per cent. Today men and women are expected to subsist on a ration of only 12 ounces per day, yielding about 1,000 calories as against the 2,800 calories they require for a healthy existence, and as against the 3,000-odd calories that the average American consumes. Ours is a ration of which it can be fairly said "it is so little that a man cannot live and so much that a man cannot die." Comparatively efficient administration in the affected areas today saves people from dying on the scale that they did in Bengal in 1943 when, according to the Famine Inquiry Commission, two and a half million people lost their lives. But no amount of efficiency can save the entire population from chronic starvation nor prevent a whole generation of stunted infants and children in a country which had dreamed, at the end of World War II, of entering a happier era.

That is the background against which India's representatives on the new International Emergency Food Council have been trying to persuade the governments and people in your hemisphere to come to our assistance. We in India do not want beef or ham or pork, as other countries do. But we desperately need wheat and rice to keep alive, and our hungry children can use a lot of imported milk powder.

India asks for what is her due. She does not go to the rest of the world with the begging bowl.

The Indian people, given half a chance, are prepared to do their duty by themselves and by the rest of the world. It is for the people of more fortunate countries to consider their obligations to the people of India who are today facing famine through no fault of their own, but because nature has conspired with war. Must the people of India sadly reflect with the poet that this is yet another case where "knowledge comes but wisdom lingers?" It is for the government and the people of the United States to answer.

A New Deal for Texas?

BY HAROLD YOUNG

TEXAS may get a new deal in state government this year in the person of Dr. Homer P. Rainey. Fired as president of the University of Texas a little less than two years ago, Dr. Rainey at the moment is the leading candidate for the Democratic gubernatorial nomination—which in Texas means election. The decision will be made at the primary on July 27.

Dr. Rainey's candidacy represents the first militant political attack in years on big business's domination of government and education in Texas. The corporate elite of Texas, most of whom are the straw bosses of absentee owners and managers, fear and hate Rainey as they used to fear and hate Franklin Roosevelt. The amount of money they will spend to try to defeat him will be fabulous. In addition he must contend with the opposition of nearly all the state's large daily newspapers, an unreasonable rationing of radio time by the Texas Quality Network, and a cruel whispering campaign on the level of French-postcard pornography.

The rationing of radio time, an innovation of this campaign, applies to all candidates but it injures Rainey the most. Much of his following has been built by a regularly-scheduled radio program, "Religion in Life." Whereas the others are just candidates on the air, Rainey is a radio personality to thousands of rural and small-town voters. He has complained to the Federal Communications Commission, asking whether the agreement of the four stations to limit political candidates is a violation of the antitrust laws, and pointing out that the restriction prevents "thousands of rural voters" from hearing campaign issues discussed. Three of these stations are controlled by newspapers which are bitter enemies of Rainey—the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, the Dallas News, and the Houston Post.

HAROLD YOUNG is a founder and co-editor of The Texas Spectator, a liberal weekly of Austin, Texas.

Dr. Rainey's rise to political eminence is ironic. The stubborn, hard-headed representatives of big business on the University's Board of Regents made him the political figure that he is by trying to destroy him as an educator. He was dismissed as president of the University of Texas on November 1, 1944, because he protested the domination of the University and, as a matter of fact, all education in Texas by the corporation interests. There were many quarrels between Rainey and the Board of Regents, but a majority of regents determined to fire him only after he had issued a lengthy statement listing the Board's many violations of academic freedom and sound administrative practice. Had things worked out as they usually do in Texas, Rainey would have moved on and left the regents in control. But instead he chose to stay and fight, finally deciding he could win his battle only by political action. That is why Dr. Rainey is in the midst of a campaign for governor.

The big corporations have no reason to love Rainey. He proposes to pull the state up to higher levels in public education, public health, social security, and general economic well-being by means of more taxes on natural resources—oil, gas, and sulphur. Most of these resources are either owned or exploited by monopolistically inclined corporations of the North and East, whose representatives in Texas elect governors and legislatures to keep taxes down on these items. Rainey proposes a constitutional amendment to repeal the state's $35,000,000 ceiling on social-security funds used for old-age assistance, aid to the blind, aid for dependent children, and the like. He proposes to abolish the state ad valorem tax, which brings in about $18,000,000 a year, and make up the loss with increased levies on resources, gasoline, tobacco, and liquor.

The platforms of the other candidates beat around the fringes of such issues as pay increases for teachers and more state pensions—but they also promise no increase in taxes. Rainey proposes a minimum of $1800 a year for school teachers and tells how he will raise the money.

His forthrightness about taxes is refreshing in Texas politics.

There is only one element missing from the current campaign—Governor Coke Stevenson, the slow-talking rancher who has been governor of Texas longer than any other man. He succeeded W. Lee O'Daniel in 1941 when O'Daniel was elected to the United States Senate after serving less than a year of his second term as governor. Since then, Stevenson has been reelected twice. Much of what is wrong with Texas at the moment is Pappy O'Daniel and Coke Stevenson, both willing allies of big business. They are the pair who stacked the boards of regents of the University and other state schools and colleges with corporation men, lobbyists, Republicans, and Texas Regulars.

The Texas Regulars were a political party formed in 1944 by a group of die-hards who left the Democratic party after an unsuccessful anti-Roosevelt revolt led by George A. Butler, Houston lawyer and nephew of Jesse Jones. But the Texas Regulars were a state of mind before, during, and after 1944—a state of mind of which the chief characteristic was hatred of Roosevelt and the New Deal. Stevenson and O'Daniel both connived in the rebellion, which was organized to steal the state's electoral vote from Roosevelt. Jones disavowed the Regulars late in the 1944 campaign, but he did not convince many people, Franklin D. Roosevelt least of all.

A race with Pappy O'Daniel, Coke Stevenson, and Dr. Rainey all in it—as once appeared to be shaping up—would have matched the real antagonists. Stevenson, however, decided not to seek reelection. Perhaps the man who tried the hardest to persuade Stevenson to change his mind and run was Jesse Jones. There were reports, printed in very few Texas papers, that Jones offered Stevenson the editorial support of Jones's own Houston Chronicle, the Houston Post, the Fort Worth Star-Telegram, and the Dallas News. "Draft Stevenson" movements showed that he had strength. He was the top man in a pre-campaign sampling by the Texas Poll, an accurate regional poll of the Gallup type. The corporation executives and oil men promised all the money he might need. The governor, however, decided he had had enough of public life, and retired rather than battle his way through another rough and tumble campaign.

There are five men in the campaign who have a chance to win. Rainey, of course, heads the list and is definitely the man to beat. The others are Jerry Sadler, formerly a member of the Texas Railroad Commission and a veteran of World War II; John Lee Smith, now lieutenant governor; Beauford Jester, currently a member of the Texas Railroad Commission; and Grover Sellers, state attorney general.

Sadler can be classified as the maverick of the race—at this time he is not acceptable within the corporate pale. While a member of the Railroad Commission he was very rough on the Humble Oil and Refining Company, a subsidiary of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, and the Magnolia Petroleum Corporation, a Socony-Vacuum subsidiary. Against Rainey, however, if there is a run-off, the corporations would probably settle for Sadler.

The choice of the blue chip boys is among the trio of Smith, Jester, and Sellers, with Sellers the favorite. Organized labor generally will support Rainey, but some of the American Federation of Labor leadership believe they can go along with Sellers.

Jester is a wealthier man than any of the other candidates and the one most at home in a country club. He may have learned better by now, but early in the campaign he pulled a minor political blunder in Dallas by leaving word at a hotel desk that if he received any long distance calls, he could be reached at a local country club. It might have been disastrous if anybody had called from the forks of the creek. Many Texans who are not otherwise bothered by wealth are extremely suspicious of it when it is at play and might be drinking or drawing to an inside straight.

Homer P. Rainey

Sellers supported Roosevelt in 1944, but he now would extend the olive branch of peace to the Texas Regulars. Jester likewise has no animosity against the Regulars, who represent more campaign contributions than they do actual votes. Any man who welcomes the Regulars into his camp cannot and does not intend to change the status quo in Texas.

Smith, in a word, is fantastic. He spouts analogies from Roman history like the brightest boy in a one-room school, but it is noise, not erudition. Although very outspoken on most things, he is the one candidate who has dodged answering the party's questionnaire on his loyalty in 1944.

Smith is also the darling of the labor haters. He beats his breast with a primitive fury for a state constitutional amendment outlawing the closed shop and for statutory preference for veterans in all private and public employment. Sellers and Jester belabor the C. I. O.-P. A. C. with enough fervor to convince their money-backers. Sadler has declared himself against the closed-shop. All of the four—Sadler, Jester, Sellers, and Smith—have obviously kissed off any C. I. O. support.

Any analyist who relates the Texas political situation to a hard-and-fast division of liberals and conservatives is just going to break his heart. The conservatives simply outnumber the real liberals. Dr. Rainey is a progressive but his campaign is well inside what the strategists and realists believe are the limits to which the Texas electorate will follow a liberal candidate. A great leader can enlarge these limits, perhaps, but he has to get elected first.

Rainey's strength lies in his personal popularity. He has one asset that is no minor advantage in Texas, though one that might be overlooked elsewhere: he is an ordained Baptist minister. He has another and greater source of votes in the fact that thousands upon thousands of people who call themselves conservatives have long had definite anti-corporation sentiments, several generations removed from their most likely source—the old agrarian radicalism of the Populists. These conservatives somehow realize, despite the silence of the daily press, that big business—much of it absentee—rules the state. "Wall Street" is an old battle cry in Texas, and there is always a core of sincerity in it—even on the tongue of a demagogue such as Pappy O'Daniel. In the privacy of the election booth, many of these conservatives will vote their anti-corporation prejudice.

The trouble in Texas is that this issue of corporation control is so seldom clearly drawn by a man who really means to do something about it. The persevering college professor, Homer Price Rainey, is that rare individual. He may be the next governor of Texas.

The UNRRA Scandal in China

BY ILONA RALF SUES

FIORELLO H. LA GUARDIA will go down in Chinese history as the only American official of today who placed human rights above political and military opportunism, meant what he preached, and had the courage to stand up for the people.

When the Director General of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration stopped all shipments to China (with the exception of food) at a moment's notice, after a cable from more than half of UNRRA's staff in China had confirmed reports that the Chinese Government was using relief supplies as an antidemocratic political weapon, and that food was diverted to the black market or left to rot in Shanghai warehouses while 30,000,000 people faced starvation, he set a signal example to the White House, to Congress, and to the War Department. Washington has consistently ignored the urgent appeals made by spokesmen for the vast majority of the Chinese people to stop military, financial, and economic support to Chiang Kai-shek's government. Our unconditional assistance has emboldened Chiang and has practically nullified the results achieved by General Marshall in his patient peace negotiations between the Kuomintang and the Communists.

If the Little Flower's action is followed by a stiffening attitude toward Chiang on the part of the Washington Administration, it may mean the beginning of an era of real reconstruction and rehabilitation for China.

ILONA RALF SUES is the author of "Shark Fins and Millet." During ten years at Geneva she was active in the opium control work of the League of Nations. More recently she has lived in China and is thoroughly conversant with economic and political conditions in that country.

The main reason for the UNRRA scandal—and many other scandals as well—is, beyond any doubt, our obtuse help to the small, reactionary clique of would-be rulers who are blacklisted by their own people, have an unbroken 20-year record of antidemocratic terrorism, and an all-embracing, well-nigh perfect system of corruption.

How does UNRRA work? It gets American supplies into China. But it is CNRRA—the Chinese Relief and Rehabilitation Administration, a government monopoly—which decides how these supplies are to be distributed. UNRRA can only advise and help with its technical personnel.

CNRRA's official yearly operating budget is 210 billion Chinese dollars, or $105,000,000 U. S., but the Chinese government does not furnish the funds. During the first six months of 1946, CNRRA obtained only 43 billion Chinese dollars: 23 billion came from the sale of UNRRA supplies, 18 from loans, one billion from "miscellaneous sources," and only the remaining one billion Chinese (or 500,000 American) dollars from the Chinese government!

Head of CNRRA is a 56-year-old Shanghai industrial magnate, O. S. Lieu. He is the stooge for the "Soong Dynasty" which controls finances, foreign relations, and most profitable rackets in China. Lieu was, before the war, manager of the Great China Match Co., the Shanghai Cement Co., and the China Industrial Corporation. During the war, H. H. Kung, Chiang's brother-in-law, then Finance Minister, appointed him as head of the Government Match and Cigarette Monopolies. When Kung was replaced by his rival, T. V. Soong, Mme.

Drawings by Gropper

Chiang's brother, Lieu became T. V.'s confidential agent. When the Kuomintang took over the China Merchants Steamship Navigation Co., he became managing director. And when the Japanese surrendered, they were ordered to turn over to Lieu the Shanghai Textile Mills and the ships!

Thus CNRRA Director O. S. Lieu (and his boss, T. V. Soong) have large interests in the textile mills where UNRRA cotton and wool are spun; in the flour mills which grind UNRRA wheat; in the CMSNC, which has sublet three wharves to UNRRA and handles docking facilities and inland navigation.

The Chinese Embassy in Washington is fighting La Guardia's decision and advances the stale alibi of dry rivers and poor roads as an excuse for the lagging distribution of relief supplies. But all reports from UNRRA and other sources stress the fact that the coast, the Yangtze River, the Grand Canal, and other waterways are open, as well as most railroads, and that the network of highways, with minor exceptions, is in fair shape.

Shanghai's wharves and warehouses are clogged, and, up to May 24, only 10 per cent of UNRRA supplies got through to famine areas.

Why? Because military supplies have priority. President Truman's report on lend-lease explains the situation perfectly. It states that four Chinese armies were moved by air to Manchuria and other areas, at a cost of $300,000,000. In addition, Chiang received vehicles valued at $68,000,000 (used on those "impassable" roads for troop transports), and ammunition valued at $50,000,000 (bullets in lieu of wheat!). U. S. lend-lease to China from V-J Day to December, 1945, alone amounted to $602,045,000. In addition, 40 Chinese divisions were equipped and trained with modern American materiel, as compared with only 20 divisions during the war.

There are some 10,000 trucks idle in Shanghai. Gas is plentiful and unrationed. Some of the U. S. airplanes transferred to the Chinese Government could fly grain and medical supplies into the interior, instead of being used in the war against the stricken people.

The first flour put on the market in January by CNRRA was sold in 20-bag lots, supposedly for bakers. Actually it went into the hands of black-marketeers. From January to April, the price went up from 4,000 to 12,000 Chinese dollars per bag.

In January and February, from 30 to 60 children were picked up every week in the streets of Shanghai, dead of starvation.

Flour and relief were, in many instances, distributed through the phony "labor unions" of the Kuomintang. Unemployed workers were not allowed to join the unions. Thus people who had jobs got relief and people without means of support were permitted to starve. And —quite incidentally—employed workers who needed relief were compelled to join the Kuomintang union!

CNRRA's program of industrial rehabilitation was another racket: a man of means, in good standing, with the Kuomintang Party, could buy all the machinery he wanted. The little fellow who had lost everything in the war got nothing to rebuild his workshop. Result: concentration of wealth in a very few hands.

UNRRA policy requires that relief be administered without discrimination, but CNRRA decided differently. All areas under democratic self-rule, home of some 200 million people who are holding out for peace and a coalition government, and have supported General Marshall's peace efforts from the start, have received less than 2% of UNRRA supplies.

Chiang Kai-shek broke all promises given to the people and many promises given to General Marshall. He and his group prefer civil war to a democratic government which would curtail their power and privileges. Withholding food and medicine from the people is one of his means of coercion. He did not expect that his attitude would meet with Allied indignation.

But in the case of UNRRA, as in all other China questions, real help to the people can only be effective when civil war is made impossible—if all American troops are withdrawn and no governmental loans granted until the Chinese Government has been reorganized in accordance with the agreement reached by the Political Consultative Council in February, as a result of the truce agreement concluded under General Marshall's sponsorship.

Food, not bullets, is what the Chinese people need, and it is food that can strengthen the bond of friendship and lead to beneficial economic relations between the United States and China.

Molotov Shocks France

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Paris, July 12

TODAY, for the first time since my arrival in France, the editorials in the Paris newspapers were hardly distinguishable one from the other. Perhaps this situation may change in the coming weeks, but as I write there is national unity behind the government's foreign policy such as never existed before. It is expressed in the attitude of the Cabinet where Communist ministers voted with the Socialists and the M. R. P. for what has been all along the French position on Germany: the political and economic separation of the Ruhr, French occupation of the Rhineland, and a customs and economic union with the Saar.

What is important is to understand exactly how the views of the government and the press on this issue reflect the thinking of every Frenchman. Writing in La Resistance, M. Destree makes this very clear: "France cannot but be instransigent on the German problem. Its position is that of no single party. It would have surprised us had the Communists adopted a different attitude, for they have never ceased to affirm their defiance of Germany and, if one may believe Jacques Duclos, their policy on international questions is dictated by a single consideration, the interests of France." Franc Tireur, a paper which has been consistently friendly to Russia, carried this headline: "Un Seul Reich? Il Nous Semble Avoir Déjà Entendu Ca." (One Reich? We Seem To Have Heard That Before.)

In general the first reaction of the press and public to Russia's stand against the French plan for separation of the Ruhr was one of bitter disappointment and French commentators find it difficult to undertake an objective analysis of Molotov's full statement. A few isolated voices recalled that the Russian Foreign Minister demanded complete disarmament of Germany and liquidation of its war industries, creation of an inter-allied control commission for German industry, dissolution of all military and paramilitary organizations, liquidation of all remnants of Nazism, and the organization of German politics on democratic lines. But for the French the Ruhr is the touchstone. They are in mortal fear of leaving the Ruhr within the frontiers of the future Fourth Reich for, according to the traditional viewpoint of the French General Staff, without the Ruhr neither the Second nor the Third Reich could have gone to war. To see Russia, on whose support they had counted, siding with Great Britain and the United States against separation of the Ruhr, makes the French feel that their country has been sold out and its future security compromised.

Aside from the political aspects of the question, France feels that it is being deprived of the coal indispensable to its industrial recovery. Since the first of the year, the French government has been imploring the Allies to increase France's quota of coal from the Ruhr; now any prospect of that seems remote in the light of Bevin's announcement that, whatever happens, his government must so organize the British zone in Germany as to impose no extra burden on the British taxpayer. Today, therefore, France considers itself the loser on two scores, political and economic. At the second conference of the Foreign Ministers Georges Bidault successfully played the role of mediator, notably in the case of Trieste; but he remarked with subtle irony that his mediation failed precisely where vital French interests were concerned.

Actually, the chances of mediation in the world that has emerged from the war are very slight at present. The new diplomacy is characterized by a lack of contact, of real negotiation. At the Foreign Ministers' conferences and in the meetings of the Security Council, monologue has replaced dialogue. A Foreign Minister or a delegate rises to outline his country's policy. Other speeches follow—but there is no healthy give-and-take discussion. And though the positions may be set forth with unquestionable clarity, as in the controversy over Germany, no attempt is made by diplomatic exchange to bring the various points of view closer together.

The French are terrified by the increasing activities of Nazi groups in Germany and the frequent armed attacks on the occupation forces. No Frenchman with political understanding would favor the annihilation of Germany. No responsible French political leader would dispute the fact that Europe must have a Germany capable of producing. "But how can we keep this country of producers in the family of nations and at the same time prevent it from being a country of warriors?" That is the question that Frenchmen are asking as a consequence of the Molotov speech.

Postscript, July 14: Under the title "Loyal to France," Pierre Hervé, leading columnist and Communist deputy, writes in today's L'Humanite: "For some time the French Communist Party has had differences of opinion with the German Communists. It has others with the Italian Communists. Moreover, is it not inevitable that there should be clashes of interest between the big nations? Is it not natural that in international debates, the views of France and the Soviet Union may differ—indeed, conflict? The French Communists intend to fight to insure that the security of our country is safeguarded and the legitimate needs of our economic recovery taken into consideration by the United Nations. That is, simply, the reason for our attitude."

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

American Inflation Hits the World

WE TEND to think of the current battle in Washington over price control as a domestic affair but actually its outcome is of momentous importance to almost everyone in the world. On June 29, when the President's veto blasted the phoney OPA bill which the Congressional die-hards had concocted, leaving prices in this country temporarily at the mercy of the free market, economic seismographs in many countries registered a major disturbance. On some of the European black markets the price of dollars fell as some speculators who had been paying far more than the official exchange rate for American bills foresaw depreciation in the dollar's buying power and started to unload. In Canada the government revalued its currency, wiping out the ten cent premium that United States dollars had commanded for the last seven years. The readjustment was considered necessary to enable Canada to maintain its own very successful control of prices.

But while Canada, thanks to large holdings of dollars and gold, was in a good position to defend itself against inflation here, other countries were not so fortunately placed. For Britain the rise in American prices meant that the purchasing power of its much-needed American credit was shrinking even before Congress had approved it. Theoretically this should be offset by the fact that inflation in this country would make British goods more competitive in foreign markets. But at this time Britain has no difficulty in selling everything it can spare for export so that the actual trade advantage afforded to it by dollar depreciation is unimportant. Certainly it does not offset reduced ability to buy food, raw materials, and machinery in the United States. Moreover the British are convinced that an inflationary boom in America now will be followed by an equally violent deflation which will drag down the whole level of world prices. If they prove right the loan they are contracting in terms of dollars with a low purchasing power will become repayable in dollars with a high purchasing power; in other words, they may have to return far more real wealth than they receive.

For many Latin American countries price inflation in the United States poses a similar problem but in reverse. During the war years they sold raw materials to this country in great quantities at controlled prices. Since they were not able at the time to buy equivalent amounts of American manufactures, they accumulated large dollar credits which they would like to turn into machinery, automobiles, textiles, and other goods. Now they see that prices are likely to be raised against them. They sold in terms of 100 cent dollars; they may find they must buy in terms of 75 cent ones.

Our neighbors to the south, however, have possible defensive measures open to them. Some of them might follow Canada's example by appreciating their exchange rates; all of them are likely to raise prices against the United States which cannot get along without large quantities of Latin American sugar, coffee, copper, cocoa, linseed oil, and other commodities. Already the Cubans, with whom the Department of Agriculture has been negotiating for months seeking to buy the whole of the 1946 and 1947 sugar crops, have secured a new contract which provides that prices will be raised pari passu with increases in the food price index of the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics. Thus Cuba will be protected against the higher cost of flour and other foods which it imports from this country.

The peoples abroad most likely to be adversely affected by American inflation, and those least able to defend themselves against its ravages, are those of the hungry countries. Between June 30 and July 10 some of the foods that UNRRA is buying for relief shipments increased in price as follows: wheat, $1.97 a bushel to $2.16; hogs, $14.75 per hundred pounds to $17.75; lard, 14 cents a pound to 18 cents. What this means is that UNRRA's funds, which are strictly limited and already barely adequate for the tasks assigned to the agency, are being effectively reduced in purchasing power.

Even more serious is the question of procurement for export. Up to June 30, the Department of Agriculture had been providing for export requirements of wheat and meat by "set-aside" orders which required elevators and slaughterhouses to sell to the government at ceiling prices a definite proportion of their receipts of these commodities. With the suspension of OPA these orders were rescinded for, in the absence of enforceable ceilings, their continuance would have meant government competition in the open market—a powerful additional stimulus to price increases. There is enough wheat in the pipelines to cover promised deliveries for the next month and, as regards meat, the Department apparently expects that heavy livestock marketings will soon begin to check the upward trend of prices and allow it to resume purchases without disturbing the market.

The fact is, however, that with the end of food ceilings the hungry people of Europe and Asia are forced to compete directly with the swollen pocket-books and large appetites of the American people. In this situation I, for one, would not like to prophesy how far prices may rise when the full pressure of foreign as well as domestic demand for wheat and meat is brought to bear on American supply. For supply of such commodities cannot be rapidly increased in response to higher prices as it can in the case of many manufactured articles. This year's wheat harvest is almost completed and while it is near last year's record, total supply is considerably less owing to the reduction in the carry-over. As for meat, the livestock population is considerably higher than before the war but it has not kept pace with the growth of national income. "Production of meat," writes the Journal of Commerce of July 10, "is now about as large as it is likely to be. Shortages will be ended not by larger output but when prices reach a level at which the demand for wheat will be equated to supply;" in other words, when the lower income groups, here and abroad, will be unable to afford to buy it. And, since every increase in the price of meat encourages the diversion of grains from human to animal consumption, a runaway meat market must mean less bread for those to whom it is literally the staff of life.

KEITH HUTCHISON

BOOKS and the ARTS

In the Waxworks

At mid-day when the light rebukes the world,
Searching the seams of faces, cracks of walls
And each fault of the beautiful,
Seized by a panic of the street I fled
Into a waxworks where the élite in crime
And great in fame march past in fixed parade.
How pale they were beneath their paint, how pure
The monsters gleaming from the cubicles!

When, as in torsion, I beheld
These malformations of the evil mind
I grew serene and seemed to fall in love,
As one retiring to a moving picture
Or to a gallery of art. I saw
The basest plasm of the human soul
Here turned to sculpture, fingering,
Kissing, and corrupting life.

So back and forth among the leers of wax
I strutted for the idols of the tribe
Aware that I was on display, not they,
And that I had come down to pray,
As one retires to a synagogue
Or to a plaster saint upon the wall.
Why were these effigies more dear to me
Than haughty manikins in a window-shop?

I said a rosary for the Presidents
And fell upon my knees before
The Ripper and an exhibit of disease
Revolting more in its soft medium
Than in the flesh. I stroked a prince's hand,
Leaving a thumbprint in the palm. I swore Allegiance to the suicide whose wrists
Of tallow bled with admirable red.

Why were these images more dear to me
Than faïence dolls or gods of smooth Pentelikon?
Because all statuary turns to death
And only half-art balances.
The fetish lives, idolatry is true,
The crude conception of the putrid face
Sticks to my heart. This criminal in wan
Weak cerement of translucent fat

Is my sweet saint. O heretic, O mute,
When broils efface the Metropolitan
And swinish man from some cloaca creeps
Or that deep midden, his security,
Coming to you in brutish admiration
May he look soft into your eyes;
And you, good wax, may you not then despise
Our sons and daughters, fallen apes.

KARL SHAPIRO

The Fabian Webbs

BEATRICE WEBB. By Margaret Cole. Harcourt, Brace, and Company. $3.

DESPITE the author's prefatory disclaimer this is, of course, the story of Sidney as well as of Beatrice, and Beatrice and Sidney, for it is not possible to write the biography of one half of a close and fruitful partnership without telling a lot about the other half and still more about the whole. Without the partnership either might have been the subject of a monograph, for both were people of talent who had begun to make reputations on their own before they married. But the most remarkable thing about them was that they so exactly complemented each other that together they exerted an intellectual force far greater than twice their separate strengths. "We are both of us second-rate minds," wrote Beatrice in her diary at the time of her engagement, "but we are curiously combined." Sidney was the logician, the master draftsman, the sponge of significant facts; Beatrice had a more intuitive mind and a wider social experience. It was she who first conceived the idea of their great "History of Trade Unionism" but without Sidney's drive and organizing ability she could never have completed it.

Before their paths came together, when they were both in their thirties, the two Webbs had travelled over very different country. Beatrice, a daughter of the haute bourgeoisie, had little formal education but was brought up in a stimulating household where conversation on books and affairs was maintained at a high level. At the proper age, she served her time in London society and came close to marrying Joseph Chamberlain, the most glamorous political leader of the day. But she saw through him as she saw through the delights of society and turned aside to pursue the search for a faith and a profession that she later described in her absorbing book "My Apprenticeship." There followed adventures in "slumming," her introduction to social research as one of the contributors to Booth's famous survey of London life and labor, and a growing interest in economic institutions which led to a study of consumers' cooperation.

Sidney, springing from the ranks of the lower middle classes, had to fight his way up the educational ladder. He did so with such success that at the age of 23 he passed into the First Division of Civil Service despite the lack of a university education—a really extraordinary feat in those days. Not long after he joined the recently founded Fabian Society and with Bernard Shaw and Graham Wallas began to sow seeds from which the British Labor government is reaping a harvest today.

In the nineties, however, at the time that they married, the Webbs were not thinking in terms of a separate workers' party. They took no part in the activities of the Independent Labor Party which, despite the contempt the Webbs felt for it, made a great contribution to the building of the Labor Party proper by heavy spadework on street-corners and doorsteps. The Fabians, in the same period, were less concerned with carrying their message direct to the people than with influencing the élite. They did succeed to a certain extent in infiltrating the Liberal Party but the limitations of this method were brought home to the Webbs and their friends by the experiences of Beatrice as a member of the Royal Commission on the Poor Law (1905-1909).

The Minority Report which she and three other members signed was a devastating attack on the whole Poor Law system, a penetrating analysis of the causes of poverty, and a series of revolutionary proposals for state action to remove those causes. To popularize these ideas the Webbs promoted a national organization and took to public agitation in a big way. But although they created quite a stir, they made little impression on the Liberal government of the day. The crusade failed and its failure turned the thoughts of the Webbs to the need for a third party with a socialist program.

During the first world war, the Webbs moved closer to the Labor Party, then more of a trade union group than a national political organization. Sidney assisted in its reconstitution on a broader base and drafted the new program on which it fought the election of 1918 when, though still small, it emerged as the official opposition. For the next twelve years, the Webbs were immersed in labor politics, although their literary output continued to be formidable. Sidney went into Parliament and twice held office in minority Labor governments. But they were both disappointed at the results and were glad to retire from active politics after MacDonald's betrayal of the labor movement in 1931.

Thus the last, and most sensational, phase of their career —their enthusiastic discovery of Soviet Russia—took place against a background of disillusion. This enthusiasm was all the more astonishing because their attitude toward the Russian revolution had been cold and critical. Beatrice, Mrs. Cole writes, regarded the Bolsheviks in 1918 as "a new and unpleasing variety of anarchists or syndicalists, who had unfortunately obtained a chance of putting their ridiculous theories of workers' control into practice." Invited in 1919 to come and see for herself, "she retorted grimly that she knew what happened to hostages."

However, in 1932, when the Webbs finally went to Russia, after an intensive preparatory course of reading, both sides forgave and forgot. The Soviet government entertained its distinguished guests in a way that made Sidney comment: "We seem to be a new type of royalty." To the Webbs Russia appeared like a Fabian blueprint brought to life; the collectivist state in full operation, with, of course, all that nonsense of workers' control long abandoned. Above all, they were impressed with the "moral fervor" of the Russian Communists, in whom they found the dedicated élite of which they had long dreamed. They came home after two months, laden with documents, unabashedly admitting that they had "fallen in love with Soviet communism," and devoted their last working years (they were now in their seventies) to explaining and defending the new civilization they had discovered. Mrs. Cole, while obviously not sharing all their enthusiasm, finds it rather touching and I think most readers will do likewise. Yet we must also regret that two such experienced researchers failed to get below the

What about cartels?

CHARLES R. WHITTLESEY'S

National Interests and International Cartels

Because healthy world trade is a prime requisite for a peaceful world, the problem of cartels is of vital interest today. Yet it is usually discussed with more heat than knowledge. The very word "cartel" has acquired emotional implications which make dispassionate discussion difficult. Professor Charles R. Whittlesey of the Wharton School of Finance, University of Pennsylvania, brings sanity into the situation by critically examining the flood of contentions, pro and con.

CONTENTS

1. The Cartel Problem
2. The Basic Issue: Cartels in a Free Economy
3. Are Cartels a Menace to Peace and Security?
4. Are Cartels Essential to American Export Trade?
5. Cartels and the American Patent System
6. The Framework of Cartel Policy
7. Proposals for Solving the Cartel Problem
8. Toward a Solution of the Cartel Problem
9. Conclusion

$2.50 at your bookstore

MACMILLAN

surface in Russia and to examine the human cost of the great experiment. One reason, I suspect, was that in writing "Soviet Communism" they relied overmuch on documents, treating the word as the deed, and accepting dubious statistics on trust. The result was a picture which impressed by its massive detail but lacked the light and shade that gives perspective.

This review would not be complete without a word about the excellent qualifications of its author. Mrs. Cole knew the Webbs as a disciple, as a political adversary, and finally as a friend. She and her husband, G. D. H. Cole, were among the young Fabians who came along to challenge "the old gang" in the years just before World War I. They were leaders in the Guild Socialist movement, which the Webbs heartily disapproved, both because of the heretical nature of its ideas and the light-hearted "bad manners" of its members. But, as Mrs. Cole says, the Webbs never wasted energy in bearing grudges and although the fight was sharp while it lasted it did not prevent the renewal of warm relations. So Mrs. Cole has been able to enrich this book with a wealth of personal knowledge. Written with affection, respect, but not, thank heaven, undue reverence, it is a modest but worthy tribute to a notable woman and a still more notable marriage.

KEITH HUTCHISON

Aragon in English

ARAGON, POET OF THE RESISTANCE. Edited by Hannah Josephson and Malcolm Cowley. Duell, Sloan, and Pearce. $2.

I GREATLY admired Aragon's poems on finding them, some years ago, a few at a time and selected with excellent taste, in Roger Callois's Lettres Françaises. It was not until the publication of the two volumes "Le Crêve-Coeur" and "Les Yeux d'Elsa" that the distinction had to be made between the Aragon who without self-conceit shared the experience and emotion of his companions at the front, turning it into excellent poetry, and the man who so frequently turns sympathy into a sort of professional pity, embarrassing to the reader and, I should think, to the men Aragon claims to represent. (In the same way I admire Louis Aragon's war record, but in reading about it I don't want repeatedly to be slapped in the face with a wet dishrag because I didn't happen to be around to wash up after dinner.) There are also pieces of verse like Lancelot in "Les Yeux d'Elsa" where Aragon confuses metempsychosis with skin-grafting. Not even Hugo's "Châtiments" are as fulsome.

The poems I like best in "Le Crêve-Coeur" are Le temps des mots croisés, Ombres, and Complainte pour l'orgue de la nouvelle Barbarie—for its mechanical accomplishment. Zone Libre reminds me enough of Apollinaire to make me wish he hadn't died so soon. Elsa je t'aime again is such a mixture of Apollinaire's rhythm, prosodic procedure, and sensibility that it is impossible to forget how imitative it is.

A great deal of what Malcolm Cowley's book translates from "Les Yeux d'Elsa" isn't worth the trouble, whereas the long sequence called Cantique à Elsa, which certainly includes the best poetry in the book, is completely omitted. The poetry about which I think there isn't any doubt can be found in Ouverture and in Aragon's completely beautiful piece of writing Le Regard de Rancé; here his preoccupation with the trobar clus of the early Provençal poets really does perfectly accomplish its intention. The description of Rancé's finding his mistress murdered and mutilated in her bed, the embalmers standing by, whispering and discussing anatomy, surpasses the merely macabre; and the equation woman-mother-country for once becomes wholly acceptable. There are implications in Aragon's patriotism which have nothing to do with the Stalinist line—as Partisan Review's editors like to think—but which lead to the equivalent of a magna mater religion, an Albigensian heresy, such as De Rougemont describes in his "Love and the Western World." It is precisely about trobar clus that Aragon fails to be explicit in his prose prefaces, merely mentioning that he would like to "renew the mysteries of the clus trover, of that hermetic art about which I have not finished dreaming."

Whether you can swallow Aragon whole depends on how you accept the prose introduction to "Les Yeux d'Elsa": "My own Place de l'Étoile is in my heart, and if you wish to know the name of the star, my poems sufficiently betray it (Elsa). People will say that a man owes it to himself not to expose his love in the market-place. [Aragon is a master of paraleipsis.]...To all those who in uttering the one blasphemy disown both Love and that which I love, even though they should be powerful enough to stamp out the last spark of that fire of France, I hold up before them this little paper book, this wretchedness of words, this doomed book of black magic; and how should it matter what becomes of it if, at the moment of ultimate hate, I shall for an instant have shown this lacerated country the resplendent visage of love." Even if this is all right in the poems, where certain old conventions make it pardonable, it won't do in prose. In another part he writes, "I sing of arms and the man," and sets himself up as the recognized embodiment of the unknown soldier. Corbière's taunt applies here: Garde national épique.

In the same preface Aragon advertises his innovations in rhyme, crows with delight at having composed a few quatrains of French alexandrines which, because of internal rhyme occurring at a set place, can optionally be printed as sestettes of octosyllabics. A great amount of space is taken up with Aragon's illustrations that prove how clever a rhymer he is. "...Opéra paré d'opales," which he compares with Mallarmé's "...tristement dort une mandore," is to him not

The concentration camps of Franco, Vichy, Germany have left over 100,000 sick and wounded Spanish anti-fascists. Most of these Spaniards in exile in France have Tuberculosis.

SPANISH TRADE UNIONS ASK FOR MEDICINES

The Spanish Trade Unions (UGT) write: "We have so many sick, we have doctors to treat them. But we have no medicines. Send us these vital medicines. Save our people."

Doctors can write for the name and address of a Spanish doctor and send medical supplies directly.

The rest of us can and must contribute for medical supplies. Rush funds now and save these first fighters and victims of Fascism. (No administrative salaries)

MEDICAL AID SECTION
INTERNATIONAL SOLIDARITY COMMITTEE
303 Fourth Avenue, Room 516, New York City

mere baby-talk but a revolution in French versification. He claims to be going on from where Apollinaire left off. He imitates "Alcools" and "Caligrammes" in rhyming Toulon with ombres, embarquèrent with Dunkerque, and so on, where the tonic syllables in order to rhyme according to this scheme must have the same exact vowel with immediately following consonant. Apollinaire's poem Zone, for instance, rhymes Pape Pie Dix with Christianisme; and so far as I know it is the first time this sort of thing has been used in French rhyme. (In America MacLeish made a complete system out of it.) But this is of no importance compared to Aragon's conscious absorption of Apollinaire's style and sensibility. He invents nothing, and there are more unflaunted, really subtle internal rhyme-schemes in Verlaine's sonnet Parsifal alone than in all of Aragon's verse put together. He is fighting a sham battle—the symbolists settled all this long ago.

The translations of Mr. Cowley's book have little to do with the original poems. "They all (the translators) knew in the beginning, and they learned again before completing their task, that poetry is in the strict sense untranslatable." Cervantes, and many others, said this a long time ago; but Mr. Cowley, more stubborn, publishes an entire volume to prove his point. I do not quite agree with his assertion that Aragon's "own personality, his own style, his own story are strong enough to persist essentially unchanged in all the translations." The translations are like Dr. Johnson's dog walking on its hindlegs; the wonder is that it can be done at all. Kenneth Muir translates: "...and yet I know...your month of Sundays. O!" There is no interjection in the original, but we have to have something to rhyme with I know. This is naive but unimportant. Why does Mr. Cowley, in his own translation, put the rhymed Tapestry of the Great Fear into blank verse, unless to prove what is apparent, that the few translations which do not try to rhyme are the only accurate ones?

Louis MacNeice, having to rhyme with heart—which anyway does not occur in the original—writes:

> I shall not ever forget the lilacs or the roses
> Nor those the spring has kept folded away apart.

Impossible to derive meaning from this without consulting the French:

> Je n'oublierai jamais les lilas ni les roses
> Ni ceux que le printemps dans ses plis a gardés where in the original you have at least a Botticellian personification of Spring enshrouding the fallen soldiers in the folds of her gown.

Again, in his introduction, Mr. Cowley writes "I might call special attention to John Hayward's More Beautiful Than Tears, a poem which I had at first judged to be too purely French for even a rough English approximation, let alone an accurate version like Hayward's." I could wish my special attention hadn't been called to:

> What matter if I die, it is enough
> If others see that blessed face reborn:
> Dance, children, dance your capucine, forlorn,
> My country is Dearth, Penury, and Love.

A great liberal historian interprets 1000 years of

THE GERMAN PEOPLE

THEIR HISTORY AND CIVILIZATION FROM THE HOLY ROMAN EMPIRE TO THE THIRD REICH

by Veit Valentin

To fill the need for a comprehensive, modern, one-volume coverage of its subject, this book has been prepared by an internationally known German scholar expressly for American readers.

Illustrated with 8 maps; 784 pages

A BORZOI BOOK

For sale at all bookshops at $6.00, published in New York by since the world forlorn is gratuitous, though ending in orn; the plural of mon enfant unimportant but unwarranted; and Dearth and Penury stilted:

ALFRED·A·KNOPF

> Qu'importe que je meure avant que se dessine
> Le visage sacré s'il doit renaître un jour
> Dansons ô mon enfant dansons la capucine
> Ma patrie est la faim la misère et l'amour.

These are not isolated examples, alas.

I was surprised at first to find that Mr. Cowley's book had no juxtalinear translations on facing pages. When I began to read I thought vaguely of the paper shortage, of distorting mirrors, and of the paper shortage.

RENÉ BLANC-ROOS

BRIEFER COMMENT

The Editor-in-Chief of the Navy

THE CAREER OF JOSEPHUS DANIELS is a problem in democracy. Here is a "tar-heel editor," fully as naive and as provincial as you would expect. (In Paris he was guided by a French naval officer "who had never heard the name of Pasteur." As pronounced by the Secretary, no doubt.) He is intrusted with the American navy in a world crisis. He tries to make the navy bone-dry and democratic, and fails. But with Daniels as editor-in-chief, the navy functions efficiently. (Sims was to attack one major decision, but found little support either in the navy or in Congress.) Daniels was not a disaster. Indeed, he was a very good Secretary. He was loyal to his great leader; he had an enthusiastic and capable assistant; he knew how to leave technical details to experts. He proved that "the common man," with shrewdness, kindliness, honesty, and a high purpose, can go a very long way. Oddly enough, the pacifist editor became the advocate of a big navy, more radical than some of the admirals. As such, he clashed with the British, who never accepted "the freedom of the seas." There are traces of good old-fashioned Anglophobia in his book ("The Wilson Era: Years of War and After, 1917-1923," North Carolina, $4) as folksy, as racy of the soil as his style or his religion. But the right to challenge England's supremacy is restricted to the United States. Britannia and Columbia, twin gems of the ocean, rule the waves. All others are interlopers. Good horse sense (I hope the horses won't be offended).

The center of interest, of course, is not Daniels but Wilson. Daniels's devotion to his chief is a credit to both. The portrait is not idealized: Daniels does recognize the stiffness of Wilson, and his temper; Wilson was no F. D. R. But he claims—rightly, I believe—that there was no Wilson mystery. What puzzled the professional politicians was that Wilson meant what he said. Still—and that was the world's tragedy—even when he brought down the Tables of the Law, he did not quite know his own mind. There are two quotations in the book which, when brought sharply together, are particularly illuminating. The first is from Wilson himself. "The devils had taken me up to high mountains to be tempted of them, but I had forced British and French statesmen to sign an Americanized treaty. I am compelled to be sincere if they are not. I can stand defeat. I cannot stand retreat from conscientious duty." The other is borrowed from Lincoln Steffens (I streamline). Clemenceau—"You gentlemen profess to want a permanent peace. Do you mean it?" Wilson and Lloyd George nod. "Have you counted the cost?" "What cost?" "Why, giving up empire, privileges; not possessing the keys of trade routes and spheres of influence any more." Wilson and Lloyd George protested that they did not mean exactly that; no, not all that; not at once, anyhow. "Then," said Clemenceau, "you do not mean permanent peace. You mean war." The old democratic Radical, brought up in the humanitarian tradition of 1848, could have been won over to permanent peace, if Wilson had clearly meant peace, that is, the complete renunciation of privilege. But Clemenceau knew that equivocation is the root of war.

ALBERT GUERARD

Old Truths in Germany

IT SEEMS TO ME SYMPTOMATIC of our emotionally upset thinking that the rediscovery and restatement of old truths—that not all people are alike, that there are good and bad, brave and cowardly—should make the particular value of a book on present-day Germany. Percy Knauth, the author of "Germany in Defeat" (Alfred A. Knopf, $2.75), is endowed with a keen sense of the essentials of character, and gives his sympathy freely where he feels sympathy is deserved. His understanding of men, especially of those who suffer, is his strength as a writer; it enables him to paint arresting portraits of old underground labor leaders in Frankfort planning for the future, of a young woman in Leipzig who faces suicide calmly and serenely, of a courageous minister of the Confessional church who grapples valiantly with the political facts of a confusing reality. Percy Knauth is, to my knowledge, the first to tell the real story of the underground movement and revolt in Buchenwald, the surrender of Nürnberg catacombs, and the actual plot of July 20 in the Führer's headquarters.

He is no sentimentalist, however, and reports just as strikingly on the maze of human weakness and wickedness that was Hitler's Reich. Many people swear in all honesty that they never belonged to the Nazi Party; yet with each word they say or write they demonstrate how deeply the poison of National Socialism perverted their thoughts and feelings. A short sketch on Pastor Niemöller, who paid for his religious beliefs with eight years in a concentration camp but still volunteered for Hitler's submarine war, is illuminating. A whole chapter on Adolf Hitler, based on interviews with his closest collaborators, is one of the finest short character analyses of Hitler ever written.

The weak points of the book lie in the drawing of general conclusions from concrete personal observations. In Knauth's evaluation of Soviet policy in Germany, wishful thinking replaces an objective study of reality. And by limiting the significance of the affair of July 20 to a mere military cabal of disgruntled generals, he is led to the very debatable statement that the Allies have all the reason in the world to congratulate themselves on the failure of that attempt to shorten the war by ten months.

HERMAN EBELING

STAGE PLAYS

THEATRE GUILD'S PRODUCTIONS
THE MUSICAL HIT

CAROUSEL

Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Reuben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille with Herold Kool — Iva Withers
Jean Darling • Eric Mattson • Norma Howard • Jean Casto
AIR-COND. MAJESTIC Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT

OKLAHOMA!

Based on Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs"
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Reuben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
Jack Kilty • Owen Martin • Betty Jane Watson • Ruth Weston
AIR-COND. ST. JAMES Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." — Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40. AIR-COND.

"BULL'S EYE!"—Barnes, Herald-Tribune
RICHARD RODGERS and OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd Present

ETHEL MERMAN in
"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"

Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON
Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN
IMPERIAL THEA., 45th St. W. of Bway. Mats. Wed. & Sat. Air-Cond.

MOTION PICTURES

JEROME KERN'S

Centennial Summer

in TECHNICOLOR
— STARRING —
Jean Crain • Cornel Wilde • Linda Darnell
William Eythe • Walter Brennan
Constance Bennett • Dorothy Gish
Produced and Directed by OTTO PREMINGER
A 20th CENTURY-FOX PICTURE

— ON STAGE —

CHICO MARX

EXTRA!

JANE PICKENS

COOL
Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

HAL WALLIS Presents
ROBERT YOUNG • SYLVIA SIDNEY
ANN RICHARDS

"THE SEARCHING WIND"

From the Broadway play by LILLIAN HELLMAN
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

— IN PERSON —
ANDY RUSSELL
PLUS
ALAN CARNEY
•
THE PIED PIPERS
•
Extra Added Attraction
RAYMOND SCOTT
And His New 1946 Band

NOW PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"MUSICALLY SATISFYING" —PM.

MAUREEN O'HARA • DICK HAYMES • HARRY JAMES

'Do You Love Me'

in TECHNICOLOR
— AND —
"DARK CORNER" LUCILLE BALL WILLIAM BENDIX

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
ALDEN
Jamaica
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

"Amusing."—N. Y. Sun

ANN SHERIDAN

Dennis MORGAN • Alexis SMITH
Jane WYMAN • Jack CARSON

'ONE MORE TOMORROW'

Based on Philip Barry's Play
"ANIMAL KINGDOM"

Her Kind of Man DANE CLARK ZACHARY SCOTT • FAYE EMERSON

EUGENE O'NEILL says:
"The finest picture I have ever seen. I enjoyed it so much I went a second time...and I am going to see it again."

The THEATRE GUILD presents

LAURENCE OLIVIER

in William Shakespeare's

"HENRY V"

IN TECHNICOLOR • Released Thru United Artists
PRICES: Evgs. (at 8:30) $2.40, $1.80 Wed. daily (at 2:30) $1.80, $1.20
ALL SEATS RESERVED
NOW! N. Y. CITY CENTER 131 West 55th St.

Buy Books through The NATION

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price, post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street New York 7, N. Y.

Films

JAMES AGEE

THE press on Laurence Olivier's production of Shakespeare's "Henry V" has been exceptionally warm and friendly, as seems no more than proper. Although the press is not to blame for it there is also a rumor, credited apparently by a good many, that it is the best movie ever made. Through some people I have talked with I gather that it is also possible for intelligent people to be disappointed, displeased, or even bored by the film. Indeed I will not be greatly surprised if a sort of highbrow underground develops, devoted to spoiling the fun of relatively easy-minded enthusiasts. Let me therefore first appease the more demanding among my readers, insofar as may be, by getting off my chest all I can possibly find to object to.

"Henry V" is by no means the best movie ever made; it is a recreation of an old dramatic poem, not the creation of a new one. Nor is it the best of Shakespeare's plays; it is merely a very good and vigorous and at times very moving and beautiful one which, among all his plays, is one of the most obviously amenable to movie treatment and which was for obvious reasons particularly germane at the time it was planned and made. The movie treatment, in turn, is by no means as adventurous as it might have been. No attempt is made to develop a movie style which might in poetic energy and originality work as a cinematic counterpart to the verse. The idea is, rather, to make everything on the screen and soundtrack serve the verse, as clearly and well and unobtrusively as possible. Within this relatively modest and, I think, very wise and admirable intention, moreover, the success is not complete.

Much as I like most things about the opening sequence, in the Globe Theater, and skilfully as I think it is used on the whole, to accustom many levels of the contemporary audience to Shakespeare's style and skill, I am sorry about the subtly patronizing way in which a good deal of it was done. We have a right to assume that the Elizabethan stage at its best was in its own terms as good as the theater or the screen can ever hope to be, and I wish this might have been suggested—as it is in flashes by Olivier—without even the faintest suggestion of "Murder in the Old Red Barn," or of "life ran very high in those days." The gradual transference from theater to screen seems to me good or better than good in each single idea, but a little heavy and balky taken altogether, and in spite of shrewd editing and, within each single scene, exquisite pacing, the movie is during its first hour or so almost as fitful and choppy as the play. I very greatly like the anti-naturalistic, two-and-a-half-dimensional effect that is got by obtunding shallow perspectives in painted drops, and these drops are very pretty and clever; but too many of them are pretty and clever in a soft, almost travel-poster way which to some extent conflicts with and lets down the foregrounds. The night sequence in the English camp might, I think, have been still better if it had taken more of its country-night poetic atmosphere straight from nature, and had wholly avoided the smell and look of a good, semi-naturalistic studio set. The shooting of the battle is fine in its main design; I have an idea that here again, sharp naturalism and sharp detail would have improved it and would only have intensified its poetic quality. Shakespeare, after all, was exceedingly rangy in his diction; the movie diction of these good but lesser poets is a little too resolutely "poetic."

I personally enjoyed—and even heard and understood—nearly everything that was done by the comics and semi-comics—especially Robert Newton as Pistol—but well played as they mostly were, I'm not convinced that they survive three hundred years with enough vitality to make them honestly and generally amusing, without a sort of "cultured" over-generosity towards them which I rather dislike in any context and find particularly distasteful in humor. They were not up to giving the narration of Falstaff's death any of the dizzying blend of comedy and noble piteousness it has in the text, nor can I imagine any human beings who would be; and although the actress who played Mistress Quickly gave her lines much tenderness and thought, she was, barring the Irish comic—with his unplayable role—the only embarrassing bit of amateurishness in the show.

I have, I must confess, a glimmer of the kind of unhappy premonition which sometimes signals a change of heart—a feeling that with many more seeings, and a good deal more remembrance, much that now seems highly satisfying, visually, will come to seem too much like conventional illustration to be quite so happy; and that a good deal of the casting, which now seems as nearly perfect as any I have ever seen in a film, and incomparably the best I have seen in a Shakespearian production, will seem perhaps no less good, so far as it goes, but a little predictable, even stodgy. I fear particularly that elements in Renee Asherson's performance as the French princess, which now seems to me pure enchantment, will in time look a little coarsely coy. But if this time ever comes I fear also that I will have lost a certain warmth of spirit, and capacity for delight, which this film requires of those who will enjoy it, and which it asks for, and inspires, with a kind of uninsistent geniality and grace which is practically unknown in twentieth century art, though it was part of the essence of Shakespeare's. I don't have the feeling that any extraordinary, fresh creative force is at large in the film except that of Shakespeare, though the film itself swarms with the evidence of creative intelligence of a gentler and still highly honorable kind, and with evidence also of a quality of taste which is far too good and too sure of itself to need to scorn the great middle audience. It is not, I repeat, the most exciting or inspiring or original film I have seen. But I cannot think of any that seems to be more beautiful, more skilfully and charmingly achieved within its wisely ordered limits, or more thoroughly satisfying.

Such are my objections; I could with pleasure fill twenty times this space with a mere listing of specific excellence, without more than beginning to express my esteem for the film and its makers. But what little of that there will be room for will have to wait a couple of weeks.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

WRITING about jazz records a year ago I remarked on the way attitudes like those of the musicologists were turning up unexpectedly in discussion of jazz. For one thing like the musicologists' preoccupation with stylistic developments and tendencies instead of with the particular work of art as a unique artistic communication. And for another thing like their habit of setting up an early form of an art as the art, which meant that subsequent deviations from that form to other forms were deviations from the art to things that were not the art.

In jazz the early form was the New Orleans group improvisation, which one reader described as "cornet lead, clarinet, and trombone countermovements over a two-beat rhythm section"; and he went on to say that "all other methods wander out into the damnedest complications and methods having nothing but historical connection (if that) with the original jazz style." Thus the early Louis Armstrong Hot Five performances with "Armstrong's soloing," which were a "first break away from the sometimes less individually brilliant but always more collectively alive New Orleans style," were also a first step toward present-day "individual exhibitionism, powerhouse arrangements for 27 trumpets and 89 saxophones, and Duke Ellington," and toward the intervening performances of the Chicagoans that my correspondent disliked. So that while the early Hot Five with Dodds and Ory played jazz, even the slightly later Armstrong-Hines-Robinson combination only played "like jazz."

But another reader with a more rigorously systematizing mind contended that the term "jazz" was correctly applicable only to the New Orleans type of ensemble performance to which it had been applied originally; and that performances which emphasized solos rather than ensemble—even performances as good as those of the Armstrong Hot Five, the Dodds Black Bottom Stompers, the Chicago "jazz imitators like Beiderbecke, Teschmacher, and Spanier"—were not "jazz in the strict sense." And he too pointed out that they were the first step toward the later Armstrongs and the performances redeemed only by a solo by Buck Clayton or Bix; and that "from there it is only another short step to Glenn Miller and Tin Pan Alley."

To all this I answered that jazz could not stop with the New Orleans style, and a deviation from that style was not ipso facto a deviation from jazz: one had to distinguish, in the deviations, what was jazz from what was not. One also had to recognize the particular value of the particular performance in whatever style of jazz, and accept the fact that a particular Chicago performance happened to be better than a particular New Orleans. And it did not become bad because something bad followed from it: only the bad thing that followed was bad (to say nothing of the good things that also may have followed).

My idea of what was jazz and what was not I described in an answer to a further letter from my systematizing correspondent, in which he argued that to insist that the music produced by the Armstrong Hot Five is the same as the obviously different music produced by the later Armstrong Savoy Ballroom Five "leads to hopeless confusion," and therefore he did not see "what is gained by insisting that both must be called jazz." I wrote: "I have considered jazz to be the performances of small groups of musicians—performances spontaneously, freely creative in the traditional language and style described by Wilder Hobson in 'American Jazz Music,' and exhibiting the integration, the immediacy of relation of ensemble performance in both the ensemble and the solo passages. Against these I have set the well-oiled performances of written-out arrangements by large bands. And I have taken into account in-between types like the various Ellingtons, ranging from the early ones nearest jazz, in which the soloists operate with considerable freedom, to the later ones that are nearly all arranged gilt-and-plush. But the New Orleans performances, the Armstrong Hot Fives and Hot Sevens and Savoy Ballroom Fives, the Chicago performances—these I have regarded as different ways of doing what I have described as jazz. . . . The same thing is gained by calling a Hot Five and a Savoy Ballroom Five both jazz as is gained by calling a work of Mozart and a work of Beethoven both symphony; and confusion is created by giving them two names."

And now my first correspondent has written again, to ask whether I have listened to the recently reissued Teschmacher and Johnny Dodds and Jelly-Roll Morton performances, and whether I now hear the faults of the Chicagoans —"erratic rhythm sections, alternately jerky and wooden . . . inability to improvise collectively . . . Teschmacher's bad tone and intonation"—as against the "relaxation, melodic and tonal richness, and rhythmic flow" of the Dodds and Morton groups. Yes, I have listened; and the two outstanding performances in Decca's Teschmacher volume (Set B-1017; $3.50)—the Chicago Rhythm Kings' "There'll Be Some Changes Made" and "I've Found a New Baby" (80063)—are for me, in their own style, superb jazz, made exciting by their rhythmic drive, their flow of ensemble and solo invention, and especially the rhythmically intricate solos of Teschmacher, even with their imperfections of execution. The other performances in the volume are poor. But in Decca's Dodds volume also (Set B-1020; $3.50) only the two performances in which Armstrong plays—"Weary Blues" and "New Orleans Stomp" (80073)—have the melodic richness my correspondent speaks of. The others are lively ensemble performances which get monotonous for lack of interesting musical ideas—Dodds's invention being undistinguished and limited. After them it is amazing to hear in "Weary Blues" and "New Orleans Stomp" not only the richness of Armstrong's own melodic invention but the way it causes everybody else—and Dodds, in particular—to be suddenly full of ideas and the performances to be not only more individually brilliant but more collectively alive. (More extraordinary is the "Wild Man Blues" recorded at the same session, and included in Decca's Armstrong volume. It consists of two solos: one of Armstrong's greatest, which elicits from Dodds a superb answer in the same style.)

I should add that from some of the material sent by my systematizing correspondent I discovered that it wasn't only the attitudes of the musicologists that were turning up in jazz, but the musicologists themselves who had moved in on jazz, finding in it, as usual, not something to enjoy but an additional material for their categorizing and system-grinding. This was something I had not realized when I had encountered in the Herald Tribune an article on "Jazz Purism" by one Rudi Blesh, which used the same method of falsifying schematization as did the monstrosity on chamber music in the nineteenth century that Professor Paul Henry Láng contributed to a New Friends of Music booklet. But that will have to wait.

YOUNG MEN, VETERANS PREFERRED, who have moral and physical courage, who would like to help bring freedom and dignity to oppressed and under-privileged people, who believe in honest democracy and in the fundamental goodness and worth of all the people, are wanted to help organize farm laborers, tenant farmers and sharecroppers in the South.

The wages are small. The opposition is rich, politically influential, and frequently violent.

Dilettantes and communists need not apply.

Interested persons should write full particulars to Captain Barry B. Taylor, Organization Director, National Farm Labor Union, Box 443, Memphis 1, Tenn. (NFLU is also known as the Southern Tenant Farmers Union.)

BOOKS FOUND FREE!

WHAT BOOKS DO YOU WANT?

We quote lowest market prices. No charge for locating Hard-to-Find and Out-of-Print Books. All books, OLD or NEW, mailed POST-FREE.

SEARCHLIGHT BOOK REPORTS
22 East 17th Street, New York City

Letters to the Editors

UNRRA Defended

Dear Sirs: The following paragraph appears in an article entitled "Elections Every Sunday," by Donald Downes, in the May 18 issue of The Nation:

> "Much of the responsibility for the high prices and bad distribution rests with the weak Italian government. When election day lasts four months, it is hard to make politicians concentrate on such matters as food and price-control laws. UNRRA is partly responsible, for it has apparently failed to use the utmost possible pressure to get the government to act. Harlan Cleveland, head of the economic section of UNRRA, in a conversation with this writer casually confirmed the fact that 100,000 tons of textiles, 100,000 tons of phosphates, and nearly 50,000 tons of medicines, all of Italian make, are being hoarded by manufacturers and speculators in the north. Probably 100,000 tons of textiles is enough to make two complete outfits for every man, woman, and child in Italy. A suggestion that these materials be requisitioned by the government and distributed in the same manner and under the same price control as UNRRA goods was looked upon by Mr. Cleveland as foolish, and I suppose as dangerously anti-capitalist."

The observations in this paragraph are as generally superficial and uninformed as the rest of the article. The facts:

1. When he came to visit the UNRRA mission in Italy, Mr. Downes was patently looking for something scandalous to pin on UNRRA. He didn't find anything, so he apparently decided to saddle UNRRA with problems for which it has no direct responsibility.

2. There are 100,000 tons (more or less) of textiles, mostly synthetic goods produced during the war and still held in manufacturers' and wholesalers' warehouses, in Northern Italy. These are not goods made with UNRRA cotton and wool, which are moving. The synthetics have not moved into consumption channels because (a) they are mostly inferior synthetic goods (fiocco), which nobody wants now that good cotton and wool is coming on the market; and (b) they are being held at too high (but now falling) prices. The UNRRA mission has consistently pressed the Italian Government to do something about them, and would favor any system that would actually get these goods, inferior as they are, to the people who need them.

3. Small stocks of superphosphates—around 40,000 tons—were discovered some time ago. Steps have now been taken by the Government to make sure that all superphosphate moves quickly out on to the farms where it is needed. The phosphate rock from which this fertilizer is made results from a trade agreement between the Italian and French Governments. It is not part of the UNRRA program.

4. The stocks of medicines — Mr. Downes' figure is way out of line— are not of Italian make, as stated, but are imports which the Italian Government has been slow in distributing. There are also some captured enemy stocks, which have only recently been turned over to the Government by the military. In cooperation with the Allied Commission, UNRRA has brought the utmost pressure to bear on the Italian Government to get them distributed, and has even modified its own program because of the existence of these stocks. It is expected that this situation will improve shortly, and we are not relaxing in our efforts.

HARLAN CLEVELAND

Washington, D. C., May 23

Liberal Blind Spot

Dear Sirs: Reinhold Niebuhr has illumined a curious blind spot in American "liberalism" in his recent article on British labor. British labor is carrying to completion much of the program for which it has campaigned and for which our so-called "liberals" are currently agitating. Oddly enough, our liberal press has paid little attention to this important development in Britain and even to the epoch-making steps toward Indian independence.

Too few Americans realize the difficulties of liquidating an empire or transforming it into a commonwealth in these days of heightened nationalism. Our own experience in the Philippines, Hawaii, Puerto Rico and our sad bungling of our racial minorities should make our "liberals" more patient with Britain's colonial policy.

Equally strange is the double standard of political morality with which many judge the actions of Russia, Britain, or ourselves. Distance lends enchantment; the average Russian does not mind being watched by the secret police or the peasant does not care whether his farm is collectivized. But a much milder terrorism in our factories in the field can arouse these same people to great indignation.

Truman's unfortunate bill to draft striker's is roundly scored; but many of our liberals praise the compulsory labor registration system in Russia not to mention the uncounted millions who were virtually enslaved to work in the lumber camps and mines of Siberia. Perhaps these policies of the Russian government can be defended as temporary expedients. But why not give British labor an equal tolerance of error?

DAVID ELLIS

Utica, N. Y., June 10

New Veterans Group

Dear Sirs: Over 100 paraplegia patients at Halloran General Hospital have formed the Paralyzed Veterans' Association. A paraplegic is an individual paralyzed in varying degrees from the waist down as a result of injury to the spinal cord.

There are about 2,000 members and ex-members of the armed forces who are paraplegia cases. Legislation for our needs has been slow and insufficient. Our aims are:

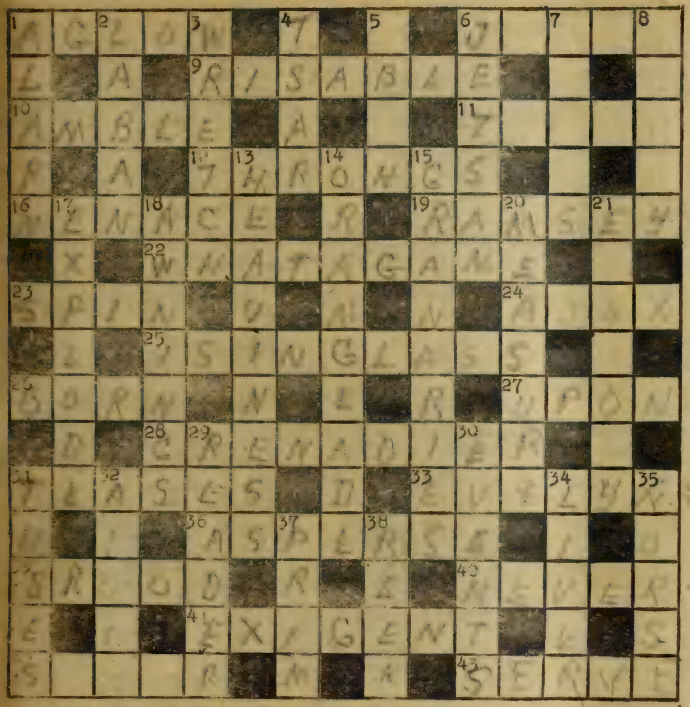
1. Legislation to provide a car to prevent us from being house-ridden for the rest of our lives.
2. Reasonable housing facilities for our peculiar needs.
3. Issuance of two sets of the best type of braces, crutches, or wheel chairs.
4. Maintenance of Halloran hospital for the treatment of paraplegic patients by the Army or the Veterans' Administration.
5. Increased disability pension laws. A single veteran should retain all benefits when hospitalized and not be cut to $20 per month as the present law requires.

P. F. C. BOB MOSS, Publicity Director

Staten Island, N. Y., June 27

Crossword Puzzle No. 170

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Phosphorescent?
6 He married the girl himself, in Trial by Jury
9 Laughable
10 Not the pace that kills
11 State of things at any period
12 Crowds
16 Threaten
19 First name of a pre-war British premier
22 A sporting view of life (4, 1, 4)
23 Fish with a swivel or spoon-bait
24 General A. Jacks
25 Glutinous stuff
26 Nee
27 In an elevated position
28 Name of the first regiment of British foot-guards
31 Pulls the leg of 33 Feminine, or masculine, name
36 Slander
39 Meditate on children?
40 Surely not!
41 Demanding immediate attention
42 Brandished by the Bard
43 Wait upon

DOWN

1 Rings you up
2 He decreed seven years' hard labor for a wife
3 Poor fellow
4 A Romanoff, perhaps
5 Where they allow only twenty-five letters to the alphabet?
6 Unlike flotsam, this is thrown overboard
7 Heaps of unhappiness
8 Easy's not quite the word for it
13 Weightiness
14 Fresh fruit drink
15 There's plenty when they are full
17 Burst into laughter
18 They keep the sun off
20 Slow and stately dance
21 Humorously, one's body
29 A book, or its user
30 Coming ones cast their shadows before (sometimes)
31 Radio set valves
32 Sailor's at the front
34 The happiest one is he who does not know that he has one
35 Language of ancient Scandinavia
37 Very proper
38 Smoke

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 169

ACROSS:—1 HOT PLATE; 5 SORTIE; 10 TRUFFLE; 11 ICELAND; 12 EPIC; 13 MAJOR; 16 YAWL; 17 MINUTES; 19 STEIN; 20 GOBLIN; 22 NUPTIAL; 23 OPIATE; 25 LIMBO; 27 STACKED; 31 COVE; 32 SPEED; 33 OGRE; 36 INDOORS; 37 PERSIAN; 38 GARDEN; 39 PREMIERE.

DOWN:—1 HATTER; 2 TOURIST; 3 LIFE; 4 TREPAN; 6 OVEN; 7 TRAVAIL; 8 EIDOLONS; 9 PILOT; 13 MINUTES; 14 JUSTICE; 15 REGALED; 17 MINTS; 18 SOLID; 21 TOUCHING; 24 INVADER; 26 BEGUILE; 28 APISH; 29 KEEPER; 30 SEANCE; 34 LOVE; 35 DRUM.

BOOKS

C. P. A. Questions and Concise Answers

AUDITING—THEORY—LAW

By L. MARDER, LL.B., C.P.A.

is designed for the final review, that period before the examination when voluminous texts contribute little but worry and confusion. It will teach the C.P.A. candidate to answer questions in a style preferred by Examiners—briefly and to the point.

1300 Questions with Answers Auditing and Theory. Cloth bound—448 pp. $5.00

600 Questions and Answers in Law 1.00

Free Descriptive Circular

Concise Text Press DEPT. N P.O. Box 824 Church St. Annex New York 8, N. Y.

"HAWAII TO HEAVEN"

by GUALTERIO QUINONAS, Hawaiian Writer

Lovely Hawaiian-American novel—Delightful story of a Hawaiian boy who found a beautiful romance awaiting him in this land of democracy, the Heaven among nations. A charming, inspiring book, filled with Hawaiian and American incidents, history and romance.

Cloth, illustrated, $2.00

HOBSON BOOK PRESS

52 Vanderbilt Avenue, New York City 17

OUT-OF-PRINT and hard-to-find books located free of charge. Send list of wants to J. Thompson, 1 Hillside Ave., Pelham, N. Y.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

10 ROOM HOUSE; 12 ROOM HOUSE; 3 barns; garage; 380 acres; brook; woods; bridle paths; excellent for private homes or collective use. Bargain at quick sale. $12,500. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

FURNISHED ROOM WANTED

YOUNG MAN, music student, desires room, Manhattan, congenial atmosphere, use of piano or place for own piano if possible. Write Leon Dohn, 144 East 24th Street, New York 10.

LANGUAGES

ALL LANGUAGES. Phonograph Courses. Linguaphone, other makes. Sold, bought, rented. A. Alin, 475 5th Avenue, New York 17. MU. 3-1093.

MERCHANDISE FOR SALE

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.40 per carton, postpaid. Send check or money order. Ace Mail Order Co., East Orange 1, N. J.

There are more than 42,539 readers of The Nation doing what you are doing — reading this advertisement. If you have something of interest to offer them—call The Nation Advertising Department for particulars as to space, cost and closing date of next issue.

THE NATION

20 Vesey St., N. Y. C. 7 BArclay 7-1066

SITUATIONS WANTED

YALE GRADUATE needs position as news writer or editorial assistant. Courteous, intelligent, broad minded, ambitious. Age 38, single. Sample of newspaper letters published furnished on request. Pay secondary. Willing to go anywhere. John D. Williams, Glastonbury, Conn.

EXECUTIVE, capable handling executive position, personnel, public or industrial relations. Salary open. 901 Jefferson Hotel, Dallas, Texas.

RESORTS

Tel.: New Milford 756-J3

Open under new management—newly remodeled, all conveniences. Swimming, Tennis, other games on premises. All year around accommodations. For your vacation in the Berkshires, write or phone for information.

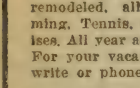
★STAR LAKE CAMP★

In the Glorious Adirondacks

Between Thousand Islands and Ausable Chasm. A marvelous pleasure playground, 1,800 feet elevation and right on the lake with plenty of gorgeous woodlands. Bungalows and lodges with hot and cold running water and modern conveniences. Tennis Courts, Canoeing, Swimming, Handball, Baseball, Ping Pong, Fishing, Saddle Horses, Golf, Cards, Dancing, etc. Interesting one-day trips arranged. Delicious wholesome meals. Dietary Laws. Rates: $45, $50, $55 per person.

Send for Booklet — New York Office

320 BROADWAY Room 906 CO 7-2667
Sundays, Evenings, Holidays — PR 4-1390



Gloucester, Mass.
ABRAM RESNICK
Director

This Adult Camp...

Sheltered cove near picturesque Gloucester. Salt water swimming, sailing, boating and fishing on premises. Dancing, tennis, trips and all sports.

Write for booklet and rates.

MERRIEWOODE

A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.

FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT: Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoes; interesting hiking objectives thru woodland trails; fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riflery croquet, ping pong, square dancing.

OLIVE H. G. BARON, Director

INVITATION TO RELAX

Enjoy the serenity of Plum Point. Gorgeous countryside, outdoor activities, delicious food — and fun. Only 55 miles from New York
MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY

PLUM POINT
"Year-Round Vacation Resort"
New Windsor, N.Y. Tel. Newburgh 4270

CASA MANOR

On Beautiful LAKE COSSAYUNA
COSSAYUNA, NEW YORK

Only 20 miles from famed Saratoga. 50-guest limit to preserve comfortable, restful, informal atmosphere. Excellent cuisine. Swimming, boating, fishing, table tennis, etc. From July First. Write or call.
JACOB M. OLSHANSKY
93 State Street, Albany, New York. Phone: 5-0363

Indian Lake Lodge
In the Heart of the Adirondacks
INDIAN LAKE, N. Y.

Ten Mile Long Lake, a backdrop of 3500 foot mountain ranges, a hundred acres of lawn and woodland. Scenic beauty plus all water sports, tennis, hiking, informal atmosphere, good food and comfortable quarters are yours to Sept. 15th. TELEPHONE: INDIAN LAKE 2412

Yours for Vacation Enjoyment

HILLTOP LODGE

On beautiful Sylvan Lake
HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.
65 mi. from N. Y. C. • R. R. Station Pawling, N. Y.
Every conceivable Sport and Recreation
. . . with intimate, congenial people
Many improved features for the new season!

Open from May thru October

Under direction of: PAUL WOLFSON, SOL ROTHAUSER
New York Office: 277 BROADWAY, COrtlandt 7-3958

Timberland
POCONO MOUNTAINS

AN ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS
LIMITED TO 100
ALL SPORTS ▪ PRIVATE LAKE
DANCING ▪ LECTURES ▪ CONCERTS
N. Y. OFFICE: 33 W. 42nd St. LOngacre 5-8674
The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group

BYRAM LODGE

ARMONK, N. Y. Tel. Armonk VIII. 906

Only 35 miles from N. Y. C. in Westchester. Completely remodeled, all conveniences, new furnishings. Beautyrest mattresses, all sports, bowling.
Rates $60 weekly; $10 daily. American Plan.
American-Jewish Cuisine
N. Y. Office 11 West 42nd Street PE 6-3243

MAMANASCO Lake Lodge

Ridgefield, Conn. ▪ Phone 820
A resort of distinction fashioned from a country estate. Water sports, hiking trails, tennis. Library, open fireplaces. Congenial atmosphere. Famous cuisine.

HUNNS LAKE HOUSE

STANFORDVILLE NEW YORK

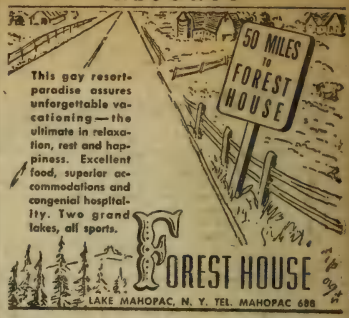
90 miles from New York via N. Y. Central. Charming lake and countryside, rustic, restful. Directly at lake, bathing, boating, fishing, other sports. Beautiful walks on own grounds. Excellent American cuisine. Ideal for week-ends and vacations. Adults only. Rate $45.00.

Management GRETE POPPER
Telephone Stanfordville 2931

OAKWOOD

NEW WINDSOR, N. Y. Newburgh 4477
Delightful...Boating and swimming in our private lake.
Different...The colonial atmosphere.
Delicious...Our unexcelled cuisine.
Diverting...Recordings for listening & dancing.
All this only 53 miles from New York City
A Resort for Adults Only

★ BUY U.S. SAVINGS BONDS ★



This gay resort-paradise assures unforgettable vacationing—the ultimate in relaxation, rest and happiness. Excellent food, superior accommodations and congenial hospitality. Two grand lakes, all sports.

FOREST HOUSE
LAKE MAHOPAC, N. Y. TEL. MAHOPAC 688

Stonegate LODGE
On LONG LAKE, N. Y.

NEW ADULT RESORT IN THE ADIRONDACKS
Limited Accommodations. ▪ Rates $65 to $85.
Open in September
GEORGE KLEINSINGER, Musical Activities Director
Fishing • Motor Boating • Tennis • Golf
New York Office: 150 Nassau Street, WO. 2-2900
LOUIS A. ROTH Director

ALL ABOARD

For our 40 acre private lake where you swim in cool, clear waters, fish for pickerel or just relax in one of our grand canoe boats and drift almost with the breeze.

SOUTH WIND
P. O. Box 33 Woodbourne, N. Y.
All Sports—four fast clay tennis courts
Make reservations now for Labor Day week-end

THE HOMESTEAD, CRAFTS, Carmel, N. Y. Swimming, boating, tennis, handball, good food. Small dormitories, modern washrooms. August 19th through Labor Day. $35.00 weekly. Phone GR. 5-0582. Socialist Party, 303 4th Ave., N. Y. 10.

?

Butcher . . .

Baker . . .

Candlestick Maker

Where will they spend their vacations this year?

Why not tell them about your resort in the pages of

THE NATION

Resort Classified Display
$6.16 per inch

Write or phone today for further information

Advertising Department
THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York City 7
BArclay 7-1066

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • JULY 27, 1946 NUMBER 4

The Shape of Things

STRAINING OUR ANGLO-SAXON TRADITION to the snapping point, we will assume the innocence of Representative Andrew Jackson May until he is proved guilty. We will not rush to conclusions just because his endorsement has been found on checks made out to a dubious lumber company for lumber that was never delivered; nor will we pass hasty judgment on him for allegedly having badgered the army into giving millions of dollars' worth of war contracts to as questionable a collection of characters as ever approached the public trough. We will give the Congressman the benefit of the doubt—but not for long. He has refused to appear before Senator Mead's investigating committee unless guaranteed special and unprecedented privileges. This is asking a great deal for a man who as chairman of the Military Affairs Committee demanded expulsion, without so much as a hearing, of State Department employees whom he chose to regard as "pro-Soviet" and "disloyal." Perhaps the Kentucky representative will be able to refute testimony that he served as guardian angel for an Illinois syndicate that expanded from a letterhead to a "paper empire" by way of lush war contracts; and that in at least one telephone conversation with its Washington agent he demanded his cut. But until he does take the stand, he is clearly disqualified from carrying on as chairman of one of the most powerful committees in Congress. While unrefuted evidence of graft and malfeasance continues to pile up against him, Mr. May cheerfully occupies himself with nothing less monumental than devising legislative controls on the production of atomic energy. Honest as he may be, we would like to see him demonstrate his innocence under oath before nuclear fission becomes the monopoly of his shady business associates.

*

A REPORT SIGNED BY EIGHT OF THE TEN members of the Congressional Pearl Harbor Investigating Committee declares that "the ultimate responsibility for the attack and its results rests upon Japan" and that "the diplomatic policies and actions of the United States provided no justifiable provocation whatever." That is not exactly a startling conclusion, and months of painstaking inquiry would hardly have been necessary to establish it but for a concerted attempt to prove that Japan had been maneuvered into undeclared war by the late President Franklin D. Roosevelt. The four Republican members of the Committee, two from the Senate and two from the House, began the investigation apparently convinced of the truth of this thesis and intent only on finding "facts" to support it. To their credit, Representatives Keefe and Gearhart have been sufficiently impressed by the evidence to sign the majority report, the former with some reservations. Senators Ferguson and Brewster, however, have lost none of the fine prosecuting zeal with which they set out. Having failed to find the proofs they wanted, they accuse their Democratic colleagues of suppression of facts. Their minority report might just as well have been written without any inquiry for it simply repeats the accusations against the late President and some of his chief advisers that they had made before. The verdict of history, we think, will not bear out their charge that on December 6 and 7, 1941, Mr. Roosevelt failed "to take that quick and instant executive action which was required by the occasion." This vendetta pursued beyond the grave reflects on its perpetrators, not its victim.

*

AT NO TIME SINCE THE COUP THAT BROUGHT Villarroel and his gang to power in Bolivia has there been doubt in informed circles about the nature of the regime. Several articles in The Nation, beginning with one by Manuel Seoane immediately after the new government was set up at the end of 1943, gave precise facts to establish its fascist character. The State Department's decision to recognize it—after a fake investigation by our chief whitewasher, Avra Warren—was based strictly on considerations of expediency. The department apparently hoped both to draw Bolivia out of the Argentine orbit, and to stop Nazi activities there. Like other similar maneuvers this one succeeded only in confusing public opinion here and in Latin America. The Bolivian regime continued as an out-and-out dictatorship with Axis ties; its affiliation with Perón became even closer. Although its leaders constantly proclaimed their love of freedom, attempts by democratic groups to function legally were met with assaults, arrests, and frequent assassinations. At the end of May this year Villarroel proclaimed a state of seige, suspending all constitutional rights and locking up a lot of opposition leaders and newspaper publishers. Now Villarroel is dead and a revolutionary group, supported by some elements in the army, has smashed the regime after several days of sanguinary fighting. The

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS
The Shape of Things 85
Inquest on a Dead Pigeon 87
Obligations in Palestine by Freda Kirchwey 88

ARTICLES
Atoms and Common Sense by Alfred Friendly 90
Salazar: Franco's Junior Partner by J. Alvarez del Vayo 91
Can Man Survive? by G. Brock Chisholm 93
In the Wind 96
G. B. S. at Ninety by Kingsley Martin 97
An Illustrated Guide to George Bernard Shaw by Oscar Berger 98
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 101

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
The Disenchantment of the World by Harry M. Johnson 102
The Nature of Communist Crisis by Kenneth Boulding 102
The Atomic Bomb by Grayson Kirk 104
The Strategy of Kenneth Burke by Charles Morris 106
Briefer Comment 106
Art by Clement Greenberg 109
Music by B. H. Haggin 109

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 171 by Jack Barrett 111

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon — Washington Editor I. F. Stone — Literary Editor Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors
Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart
Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors
Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editor: Robert Harvey
Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx
Advertising Manager: William B. Brown
Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

rebels have liberated all political prisoners, and their worker and student leaders have invited members of the Supreme Court and the head of the National University to join them in choosing a provisional government.

*

LAME-DUCK SENATOR BURTON K. WHEELER will find his best political epitaph in, of all places, the New York Daily News. Even more intrenched in isolationism than Wheeler, and if possible more vindictive, the News at last concedes defeat. In the repudiation of Senators Wheeler and Shipstead by the voters of Montana and Minnesota respectively, the News admits "you have something . . . If this is not a trend, then we do not know one when we see one." Could it be that the late Captain Patterson was wrong; that the nation was really behind President Roosevelt all the time and didn't have to be "lied into the war?" The News doesn't go so far, but perhaps if its editors look more deeply into the matter they will find that since Pearl Harbor the people have turned out of office not merely Shipstead and Wheeler, but such other stars of the isolationist firmament as Clark of Missouri and Clark of Idaho, Danaher of Connecticut and Holt of West Virginia, Nye of North Dakota and Fish of New York. "Mass movement" would be a more descriptive term than "trend." We said last week that the Montana race was not a clear-cut test on the isolationist issue, that the campaign had been complicated by such extraneous issues as the President's ill-considered endorsement of Wheeler. We believe that to be true; but the complications all favored Wheeler, who was generally expected to win by a small margin. His defeat in spite of these advantageous cross-currents is the clearest kind of repudiation of the isolationism which in a period of six years reduced him from the stature of a liberal crusader to the proportions of an embittered, narrow-minded man. The liberal who entered the Senate in proud association with the elder La Follette, Norris, Borah, and Tom Walsh, leaves public life in the company of Hamilton Fish, Stephen Day, Father Coughlin, and the rest of that unsavory band that called itself "America First."

*

CONDOLENCES TO THE STATE OF GEORGIA on the untimely resurrection of Eugene Talmadge. After four years of Ellis Arnall's enlightened administration in Atlanta, it would be hard in any circumstances for Georgians to face a return to the spoils system in government, ranting chauvinism in public life, sinking standards in boss-controlled schools, and all the other blessings peculiar to the Talmadge-Bilbo brand of demagogy. It is particularly hard to face this prospect in the knowledge that a majority of Georgians want no part of it and voted against it by a margin of more than 70,000. Talmadge owes his election to two known factors. The first is Georgia's county-unit electoral system, whereby one vote in Chatahoochee County is the equivalent of twenty votes in Atlanta. This rotten-borough mechanism goes far to explain Talmadge's victory over James V. Carmichael, who was Governor Arnall's choice as a successor, but it does not go far enough. Four years ago Arnall won despite the county-unit system and without the 100,000 Negro votes that supposedly went to Carmichael.

*

THE KEY TO TALMADGE'S SUCCESS WAS the intrusion of a third candidate—former Governor Rivers. There is reason to believe that the Rivers campaign was financed by the same Georgia Light and Power gang that backed Talmadge, in a deliberate and successful attempt to cut into the Carmichael vote in doubtful counties. By subtracting the 100,000 Negro votes from the Carmichael total it would appear that a majority of 30,000 white Georgians voted for Talmadge, but here a third factor—necessarily unproved but reliably credited—must be taken into account: namely, that the full Negro vote did not in reality go to Carmichael. A number of these ballots are believed to have been bought for Talmadge, a substantial number captured by intimidation, and an unknown percentage simply stolen. If such explanations, however valid, are small comfort, there is at least the reassuring fact that a majority of Georgians did vote against Talmadge. They are not likely to allow archaic electoral machinery to prolong minority rule indefinitely.

*

ATTORNEY GENERAL TOM CLARK IS HOLDING a stick of dynamite in the form of a report brought back from Nürnberg by his special assistant, O. John Rogge. This is the same Mr. Rogge who two years ago was forced to suspend the sedition cases against a number of Firsters, Bundists, and other national pests for lack of clinching evidence. His report has not been made public officially, but portions of the document, in addition to testimony taken by Army Intelligence officers, have been cited in the columns of Drew Pearson and Marquis Childs. From Herbert von Strempel, formerly one of Göring's Washington agents, the investigators learned of a huge slush fund for the defeat of Roosevelt in 1940. Von Strempel himself had $5,000,000 to spend, but Göring scoffed when asked whether this was the full amount. "Five million!" he is quoted as replying. "We were prepared to spend from $150,000,000 to $200,000,000 to achieve that end." Göring is reported to have worked through William R. Davis, the oil man who, it will be recalled, was credited with inspiring John L. Lewis to break with Roosevelt and with financing Lewis's dramatic broadcast to the nation on that occasion. There is a great deal more in the findings of Mr. Rogge and his associates, touching on nationally known figures. We withold further comment until full publication of the report—or the resumption of the trials. But in the meantime we want to warn against efforts to eliminate another agency that has been useful in tracking down American ramifications of the Nazi conspiracy. This is the military affairs subcommittee headed by Senator Kilgore, which has delved deeply into German cartel connections in the United States. Speedy publication of the Rogge report should help checkmate such Senators as Brooks of Illinois and Wherry of Nebraska, who have been leading an undercover fight to kill the committee and minimize its findings.

Inquest on a Dead Pigeon

LEON HENDERSON said last week that, regardless of what action Congress finally took, OPA was a "dead pigeon." That finding, we fear, will prove accurate even though the President decides to sign the bill that has emerged from the Senate-House conference. The best thing that can be said for this measure is that it includes a drastic revision of the Taft amendment, but against this improvement must be set the fact that it exempts some important basic commodities from controls and leaves the prices of others free to gyrate until August 20, when their fate is to be decided by a new three-man decontrol board. Since the bill also provides that the Department of Agriculture is to have the last word on farm prices, this means that OPA will in the future divide its authority with two other bodies. That should prove a sure guarantee of administrative chaos, which is, perhaps, the objective of some members of Congress. But even though the bill were a sound one, it is doubtful if effective control over prices could be reestablished. Three weeks of mad markets have shattered the line and stouter levers than Congress has provided would probably prove powerless to roll prices of primary products back to June 29 level.

There will certainly be a concerted effort to blame the end of effective price control, with its many dangers, on Mr. Truman because legally it was his veto that cut markets loose. But we do not think that all the people, or even nearly all of them, will be fooled this time. They know that the measure the President turned down was a phoney; they know, too, that it would have been perfectly possible for Congress to pass on July 1 a bill temporarily extending price control. That would have prevented prices from getting out of hand pending a new effort to achieve satisfactory legislation extending OPA for another year. The House passed such an extension bill in short order but the Senate, under the leadership of Taft, O'Daniel, and others, balked. These Senators cannot dodge major responsibility for the consequences of the inflationary forces they so recklessly let loose.

In the three weeks which have passed since price control ended Americans have had a suggestion of just how destructive those forces may prove and, we suspect, much worse is still to come. For except in the case of some foods the rise in primary commodities has not yet been reflected at the retail level. This is due both to a normal time lag and to a go-slow policy on the part of processors and merchants who have been anxious to see what would happen in Congress before adjusting their prices in accordance with the changes in commodity quotations. The relief thus afforded to consumers is, however, likely to prove very fleeting. They can be sure that, when the cotton and the hides now being bought at sharply advanced prices are turned into shirts and shoes, the retailers' tags will tell the story.

According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, the index of producer prices of twenty-eight basic commodities rose 24.8 per cent between June 29 and July 16. In the same period, industrial raw materials advanced 19.1 per cent, wholesale food prices 33 per cent. An attempt is being made to explain away such increases by saying they are quite modest if comparison is made not with ceiling prices on June 29 but with black-market prices which, it is claimed, represented realities in the case of many commodities. Thus the New York Journal of Commerce, whose daily index of sensitive commodity prices showed a rise of 16.2 per cent on July 15, declares that the actual rise, using a black-market instead of an official base and allowing for the ending of subsidies, is only 6.3 per cent—in itself a sensational advance in little over two weeks. But in any case this argument is invalid since it assumes that most people were paying black market prices prior to June 29, while actually a very large number would not, or could not, do so. That surely is demonstrated by the fact that so many consumers have indignantly refused to pay the new prices for meat and butter. Had they been accustomed to buying in the black market, they would hardly have been so outraged.

Such consumer resistance, incidentally, is the one hopeful feature of the present situation. It has already proved moderately effective in the case of meat, when a quite unjustifiably steep rise in the price of livestock resulted in a healthy coincidence between a rush of animals from the farms and a housewives' refusal to buy. But to be effective a consumers' strike must be organized and widespread. It will require the strong backing of both unions and civic bodies, and the pressure must be steadily maintained. We are glad to see that the C. I. O., as well as many of its affiliated unions, have begun to move in this direction, and we hope that the A. F. of L. will not allow factional differences to prevent it from adding its powerful support.

From the trade-union point of view it is much better to check inflation on the price front than to try and outflank it by forcing an increase in wages. Should the cost of living continue to climb, pressure for higher wages will naturally develop. But union leaders know well that the labor hounds can seldom catch up with the price hare and that both hunter and hunted are likely to end up by plunging into the chasm of deflation. Strikes for higher wages, therefore, should be a last resort under present circumstances; strikes against higher prices, by a reduction of purchases to absolute necessities, will prove a more effective remedy.

Obligations in Palestine

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

AS DISCUSSIONS on the Palestine issue proceed in London behind sealed doors, it is important for Americans to keep in mind a few basic facts. If we forget them we are likely to fall into a mood of exaggerated compunction which will help neither our own position nor those of the peoples more directly involved.

The first of these facts is that the Mandate for Palestine, with its explicit obligations to the Jews, was accepted by Britain for obvious political reasons. If altruistic ends were served they were, let us admit without reproach, incidental or at least subsidiary. But the obligations were undertaken none the less and the adoption in 1939 of the policy described in the White Paper, whatever its immediate justification in terms of imperial strategy, in no way absolved Britain of a commitment which had been accepted by both the League of Nations and the United States as one of the basic conditions of the Mandate. The White Paper merely violated the terms of the Mandate, as the League declared and as leading British statesmen, including the present Prime Minister, Mr. Attlee, and his predecessor, Mr. Churchill, charged at the time. A mandate is not a private enterprise to be administered as a person might administer his country estate; it is an international public trust and its violation is every nation's business.

The facts that financial support for the Jewish National Home has come largely from the United States, and that our large Jewish population overwhelmingly favors the Zionist development admittedly give this country no special political rights in Palestine. They do, however, create a special interest which is legitimate as well as inevitable and which has always been admitted by Britain. That the voting strength of Jews, especially in large centers like New York and Chicago, has influenced the attitude of the Administration and of both major parties cannot even be questioned; I wonder in what democratic country this would not be the case. Jewish influence has served partly to offset contrary pressures, such as those of the great oil interests, in determining this nation's policy in Palestine and the Middle East generally. It is a political factor which must be given its full weight in analyzing the balance of forces in America; but only an anti-Semite would be tempted to convert it into an accusation.

When the President proposed that Palestine admit 100,000 displaced persons from Europe, he had no reason to think that his advice would be considered an intrusion into Britain's national affairs; nor indeed had he any right to assume that the Labor Government was intending to continue in Palestine a policy for which it had bitterly attacked the Tories. The Labor Party had been explicit in its campaign promises: it was committed to the abolition of the White Paper. Like liberals in other countries, British Labor had taken the view that the Empire's interests would be served rather than injured by carrying out the purposes of the Mandate; and the plight of Europe's surviving Jews, and even the difficulty and expense of providing a minimum of protection and food for those who had flocked into the D. P. camps in the British and American zones of occupation, counseled speedy action. Once in office, however, and confronted with the intransigence of Colonial officials in Palestine and the threats of Arab agitators, the Labor ministers drew back from the logic of their own arguments. The Anglo-American Joint Committee of Inquiry was called into being to serve several purposes at once: first, to delay a final decision; second, to commit the United States to the proposition that if it wanted to give advice, it should also be prepared to accept responsibility; and third, to acquaint the United States at first hand with the thorny difficulties in the way of the mandate.

How far the British Government hoped also to implicate this country in the actual defense and administration of Palestine still remains a question. But from our point of view, participation in the Joint Inquiry committed us to nothing beyond the terms of the inquiry itself, and the unanimous report which resulted assumed the continuing responsibility of the British Government as the mandatory power. Only after the report had been published, and after Mr. Truman had reiterated his hope that at least the recommendation to admit 100,000 refugees would be promptly carried out, was the idea that America should become permanently involved in Palestine put forward in England.

Never has this idea been fully explored. Its first official appearance was in Mr. Attlee's speech of May 1 in which he said that "His Majesty's Government wish to be satisfied that they will not be called upon to implement a policy that would involve them single-handed in such commitments, and . . . they wish to ascertain to what extent the government of the United States will be prepared to share the resultant military and financial responsibilities." It has cropped up since then in various forms, official and otherwise. And by repetition and gradual extension it is coming to imply that America has no business to press for action in Palestine unless it is prepared to back up such action with arms.

This implication the United States should refuse to tolerate. Assuming for the purposes of discussion that Britain has a right to request American military help in carrying out its policy in Palestine—an assumption which would, I believe, be sharply challenged in the Security Council—we have an equal right to consider such a proposal strictly on its merits. Nothing we have said or done about Palestine imposes upon us an obligation to say yes. And if we decide to say no, we do not thereby forfeit our right—which is also a duty—to insist that Britain live up to the terms of the mandate under which it governs Palestine. Nothing could be more unfortunate than to allow ourselves to be jockeyed into a position where we feel we must keep our mouths closed or dispatch an armed force to Haifa. A "put up or shut up" attitude in London won't help soften Anglo-American tension.

On the other hand, not as a quid pro quo but as a contribution to good relations and an early solution of the refugee problem, we should recognize Britain's anxieties and do what we can to mitigate them. First of all we should erase the impression that we intend to sit back with our heels on the table offering advice while Jews, Arabs, and British slug it out in Palestine, and Russia watches from the side-lines. The United States has already offered to undertake the transfer of the 100,000 D. P.'s, if they are admitted to Palestine, and provide funds for their settlement and rehabilitation. American Jewish agencies have promised full support, and enormous sums of money have already been raised to enable the Jewish community in Palestine to absorb the refugees with as little internal dislocation as possible. But this is not enough. What the United States must do if it is to reassure even the most friendly and pro-Zionist Labor people in England, is to indicate a willingness to help solve the tangled problems of the Middle East of which Palestine is only the most unyielding. British leaders know very well that powerful economic interests, notably oil and aviation, strongly opposed to the Committee report and the President's attitude, are doing their best to undermine both. They know that key men in the State Department and in diplomatic posts in the Middle East are bitterly anti-Zionist and can be counted upon to encourage Arab resistance to any change of policy. Leaders like Laski who are trying to induce their government to accept the report would be immensely helped if they could believe the United States would stand firm, after election as well as before, and would refuse to take advantage of Britain if the ending of Arab appeasement should result in penalties to British interests.

Above all, our position would be strengthened in England and in Palestine if we were to agree to accept a fair proportion of those European Jews who wish to emigrate but do not insist on going to Palestine. Small or large, the number is unimportant. What is needed is proof that our concern for the fate of a dispossessed people is generous enough to induce us to open our own doors. By an understandable paradox, it would be the most effective method we could use to pry open the doors of Palestine.

Atoms and Common Sense

BY ALFRED FRIENDLY

Washington, July 18

A WASHINGTON observer may be permitted to doubt the truth of that tiresome cliché to the effect that modern transportation and communication have shrunk our planet into a single community, in which ideas circulate with the speed of light.

In Washington, at least, it just isn't so. To get an idea from the Federal Triangle to Capitol Hill takes years; to get one from the people of the country into the Senate or House is, with this Congress, practically impossible. This past week has provided disheartening proof of the existence of a Chinese Wall, or perhaps an impassable tropical jungle, encompassing the Capitol —insuring the legislators against violation of their tradition: learn nothing, forget nothing.

At one end of Constitution Avenue, in the Interior Department auditorium, was a two-day Institute on World Control of Atomic Energy. It was addressed by distinguished, literate, and intelligent speakers. With logic, humor, illustration, and exhortation, they stressed two points, neither novel but both profoundly true. The first was that domestic development of atomic energy must be freed from military domination, and the second was that our only defense against an atomic war and our only hope of survival lie in a world organization, set up by international law, to control atomic energy.

At the other end of the avenue, on the floor of the House, there was a debate on the May-mangled McMahon bill. And for every scientist at the Institute who demonstrated that there could be no "secret" in atomic discoveries, there was a Representative who screamed against this legislation which would "give the secret away." For every round of applause in the Interior auditorium approving the thesis that atom bombs from abroad were the only replies to be expected to atom-bomb manufacture at home, there were equivalent huzzas in the House greeting pleas for army manufacture of more and bigger atomic weapons of our own.

As this is written, the House has not yet acted on the McMahon bill. Administration leaders may succeed in knocking off the amendments tacked on by Chairman Andrew Jackson May and his Republican allies in the Military Affairs Committee. A pair of the amendments require one and permit two members of the armed forces to serve on the domestic control commission. A third amendment insists that the director of the proposed military applications division of the commission be an army or navy man, and a fourth authorizes the army to manufacture atomic bombs at the rate it sees fit.

Even if the outcome of the House deliberations is favorable, there remains, to keep us all awake at night, the terrifying fact that such a large number of legislators are imbued with such a large amount of ignorance, misconceptions and tortured conclusions. Representative Rich, Republican of Pennsylvania, wants to bury the bomb and all its secrets so deep that no one else can ever find them. Representative J. Parnell Thomas, Republican of New Jersey, residual legatee of the Dies Committee, apparently wants to bar scientists from atomic work because they yearn to give the secrets to Russia. Representative Elston, Republican of Ohio, who has found an entrancingly simple formula for making all decisions, abhors civilian control because Communists favor it.

Even if the Congressmen were not convinced or impressed or even touched by the Institute (which was sponsored by the National Committee on Atomic Information), even if they aren't susceptible to learning, their very imperviousness points to the need for the Institute, for more and more forums that will tell other Americans the frightful truth of this age—that we have found a way to destroy ourselves and the whole world.

Most speakers at the Institute had no illusions. They knew what was going on in Congress and what was not going on in the minds of too many Americans elsewhere.

Philip Morrison, of Los Alamos and Hiroshima, told of a Professor Nishina, who, with $20 worth of equipment, worked in Hiroshima for a few weeks and solved the fundamentals of the release of nuclear energy, discovering bomb facts still held secret in this country, all without the benefit of the Smyth report. William Higinbotham, Chairman of the American Federation of Scientists, told what America would have to do when the Professor Nishinas all over the world had completed their studies and built bombs of their own: "We shall be forced to give up the concept of cities."

Quoting a War Department General Staff report, Higinbotham noted its two recommendations—urged for action now, not at some future date. They are: "Evacuation of unnecessary inhabitants from threatened urban areas [translation: every major city in the nation] and . . . rapid creation of adequate shelters for people who must remain." Those results, Higinbotham commented, "could not be accomplished without regimentation and discipline such as Americans have never yet tolerated.

ALFRED FRIENDLY is a reporter for the Washington Post, covering labor and economic subjects, and a frequent contributor to The Nation.

[This program] would require giving up our freedom."

Even some of the speakers appeared to need enlightenment. A basic finding of the Lilienthal committee, restated by its secretary, Carroll L. Wilson, was lost on John Hancock, Bernard Baruch's advisor on the U. N. Atomic Commission. This was that at the present stage in world affairs, human nature, and the atomic art, the best that could be hoped for from an international control plan was defense against a surprise atomic attack. Hancock, even as Baruch in New York, continued to flog away at his Utopian, unrealizable, and very dead horse: a demand for abandonment of the veto right at a level where the veto power is simply not germane.

Pierre Auger, scientific advisor to the French delegation on the U. N. Atomic Commission, distilled the issue into a couple of sentences: Of course the agreement providing for an Atomic Development Authority had to be a treaty, meaning a document no individual section of which could be abrogated at will by any signatory. But if it were violated, the issue would obviously be a question of going to war. And whether or not the violator nation chose in the Security Council to veto the declaration of war against it was by way of being academic.

It was Auger, in fact, who best and most thriftily stated each issue before the Institute and before the world. (It is noteworthy, incidentally, that American scientists look to him and his two colleagues, Joiliot-Curie and Kowarski, as their real representatives in the U. N. Conceivably, this may be explained by Baruch's remarkable choice of advisors.) Auger was the one to state most simply that the generosity of the American control plan would be better understood if we, unilaterally, announced that we had suspended the assembly of atomic bombs. He was the one to note that it was less than ideal negotiating tactics for Baruch to demand an inventory of atomic ore deposits from other nations without at the same time giving any promise of a quid pro quo—particularly when secret information on the location of ore resources is the only asset some of the participating nations possess.

Finally, it was Auger who brought out that in the great peace-seeking effort of the Americans in the U. N. Atomic Commission, Baruch had failed to present the foreign delegates with one scintilla of helpful scientific information as a first gesture of our promised sharing of fundamental (not atom-bomb) data.

(The wisecrack of Professor Wigner, head of the Oak Ridge laboratories, on this subject is worth recording. Asked how much information the Manhattan District had released at a recent scientific meeting, in accordance with a prior promise, Wigner replied, "Speaking approximately, very little; speaking exactly, none at all.")

It remained for Mrs. Edward U. Condon, wife of the distinguished head of the Bureau of Standards, to add the last summary of the Institute, the state of science, and world affairs. Secretary Wallace, her dinner partner at the Institute banquet, was pointing out to her that soon science would be able to control all matter.

"Except," said Mrs. Condon, "the matter with the human race."

Salazar: Franco's Junior Partner

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Paris, July 19

THE STORY of British policy toward Spain would be incomplete if Salazar were left out. From the beginning the Spanish and Portuguese dictatorships have run a parallel course, rendering each other the most valuable services. The Badajoz massacre near the start of the Spanish War, which opened the decade of Franquist terror, was one of the first fruits of this infamous collaboration; the Salazar police drove Spanish Republican fugitives back across the border to be herded into the Badajoz bullring, where thousands were machine-gunned. Until very recently the Unitarian Service Committee was still struggling to find haven overseas for Spanish Republicans in Portugal who were in immediate danger of being arrested and delivered to Franco. The Spanish dictator would not have felt so sure of himself these past years had he not been able to count on an efficient ally in Portugal. Conversely, Salazar would long ago have been overthrown had it not been for a Spanish army ready to back him in a crisis. The offensive and defensive alliance between Spain and Portugal, signed by the two dictators when they realized that Hitler's fate was sealed, continues this bloody partnership.

Personally, Salazar is more presentable than Franco. He is far more intelligent and has not the degree of cruelty that characterizes the former chief of the Moorish Legion. But the political ideas the two men espouse are identical. A single party, the Uniao Nacional, similar in structure to the Spanish Falange, constitutes the base of Salazar's corporate state. As in Spain, the church in Portugal is on the side of the dictator. The head of the hierarchy, Cardinal Cerrejeira of Lisbon, is an old friend of Salazar; they studied together at the University of Coimbra and a twist of fate might easily have reversed their roles in life. As in Spain, the cost of living has increased enormously in Portugal. From 1939 to 1944, years for which official figures are available, living costs rose 210 per cent; they are even higher today. In the same period, wages and salaries increased by only 35 per cent. Rosy accounts of prosperity under Salazar are pure fiction; the Portuguese masses know only poverty and starvation. Food consumption averages 9 kilograms of meat, 11 litres of milk, 186 grams of cheese, 485 grams of butter, and 40 eggs per capita per annum. Little wonder that, according to one of the country's outstanding physicians, one of Portugal's 8,000,000 people dies of tuberculosis every fifteen minutes.

Again as in Spain, the opposition to Salazar has spread to circles which originally were the very source of his power. This fact has made Britain and the United States consider the advisibility of repainting the dictatorship some brighter, democratic hue. Last fall, under Anglo-American pressure, Salazar announced that "free elections" would be held on November 18. The opposition was allowed to participate under certain conditions: first, a candidate had to declare his acceptance of the corporate state; second, no one who had spent some years outside of Portugal could run for office—in other words, the entire democratic opposition in exile was excluded (compare this with the projected "amnesty" in Spain to which I referred in my Nation article of July 6); finally, the electoral census was rigged to prevent thousands of the regime's adversaries from voting.

Though the November election was a farce, it convinced Salazar that the whole operation had been extremely dangerous. The day after his proclamation of the election, the opposition came out fighting. They formed the M. U. D. (Movimiento de Unidad Democratica), a coalition which included democrats of every creed, from conservatives to Communists. But after twenty years of illegality they needed time to reorganize their forces; they asked that the voting be postponed for six months and backed up their demand with mass meetings and demonstrations. Dismayed by this impressive show of strength, Salazar refused any delay, whereupon the M. U. D. took the only course open to it and issued a call for a boycott of the election. On polling day no more than 25 per cent of the electorate voted. This Pyrrhic victory showed Salazar that 75 per cent of the Portuguese want neither him nor his regime.

Since then Salazar's health has deteriorated. This year for the first time he failed to speak on May 28, the anniversary of the dictatorship. The names of two possible successors are already circulating in Lisbon: the Minister of War, Santos Costa, a tough, dyed-in-the-wool reactionary, and Marcelo Caetano, the more subtle and intelligent Minister of Colonies.

Salazar—or, if he should die, his regime—is bolstered on one side by Franco, on the other by the British. A few days ago in Paris I met two Portuguese democrats, one of whom had just arrived from Lisbon and the other from London, where he has lived for several years. We talked about our respective countries and the role Portugal is playing in British policy toward Spain, a role wholly consonant with the tradition of Anglo-Portuguese relations. The oldest alliance in existence today is that between Portugal and England, dating from 1373; for the last two centuries particularly Portugal has been more or less within the sphere of British interests.

Both my friends are convinced that fear of Russia is the key to Britain's status quo policy, which maintains fascism in power in the Iberian Peninsula. One of them went so far as to say that Portugal is the decisive factor underlying British hostility to the return of a democratic regime in Spain; a victory for the Spanish Republic would mean the early end of Salazar, and Britain does not want that.

As a result, said the man from Lisbon, resentment is growing among Portuguese democrats of every political conviction. The people of Portugal have always felt a strong admiration and friendship for democratic England and its people, seafarers like themselves. They reckon that without the Anglo-Portuguese alliance, what remains of their country's once-great colonial empire would have been lost. But on the other hand, they know well that British protection has been dictated by self-interest; that Britain has as much to gain as Portugal from safeguarding the integrity of Portuguese territories in Europe and overseas; that Britain has never hesitated to use the big stick when the Portuguese have refused to submit to its will, as they did during and after the Napoleonic invasion, and again in 1890. Nor have they forgotten that before the first World War, in one of those appeasement moves toward Germany that inspires British policy from time to time, London was disposed to sell out the Portuguese colonies to satisfy the Kaiser's appetite for lebensraum.

But until now these manifestations of greed and selfishness were attributed to Tory rule or tradition. In 1945, after the overwhelming Labor victory, the Portuguese breathed a sigh of relief; Lisbon and Oporto, the birthplace of the Republic, acclaimed the advent of the new British government as the beginning of a new era in Anglo-Portuguese relations. Disillusionment set in very soon. Today Whitehall appears quite satisfied with the tact displayed by Salazar's dictatorship. The Lisbon brand of fascism is more gentlemanly than Madrid's and testifies to British influence by its careful observance of good manners in the exercise of terror. One never hears stories from Lisbon of mass executions such as took place in the Spanish prison of Alcala de Henares; Salazar quietly dispatches his enemies to the concentration camp of Tarrafal, in the Cape Verde Islands. There his victims work in a quarry under the tropical sun. The camp's official mortality figures list 9.73 per cent of deaths due to malaria; actually the rate is much higher. When asked for quinine, Esmeraldo Prata, the colonial doctor in charge of the camp "health service," answers: "My job here is to sign death certificates." Tuberculosis is rampant; one of the next to die from it will probably be Edmundo Petro, a true "premature anti-fascist" who entered the "Camp of Death" in 1935 when he was only fifteen years old. On the whole, however, repression is carried out more discreetly than in Spain and gives the British Foreign Office fewer headaches.

I asked my London friend, who had listened to this recital in silence, what he thought. He said that having lived in England many years, he could not help but admire the sterling qualities of its people, though this never blinded him to the evils of its foreign policy. "Unfortunately, the great majority of the English people are convinced, today more than ever, that they always win the last battle. They have developed such self-admiration that they are in danger of falling prey to the master-race complex. The fact remains that after having helped to save mankind from Nazism, for which they deserve the gratitude of all democrats, the English today are the most disliked people in the world. And they seem not to realize this, or to care." Then he added, "The worst of it is that though they never seem to tire of praising the liberal character of their own institutions, they always foster reactionary governments elsewhere."

My Portuguese friends are convinced that the battle is one and the same for Portugal and Spain. Theirs is a feeling shared with growing intensity by large numbers of Portuguese and Spaniards. The idea of closer collaboration has been spurred by the co-existence of fascist regimes in the two countries and by the realization that the Anglo-Saxon powers are playing the same anti-democratic game in both. The Uniao dos Anti-Fascistas Portugueses en Francia have invited me to address their first big public meeting in Paris on July 25; they did so because they know we are bound to work together for the liberation of Spain and Portugal, and that we are bound to keep on working together beyond that. A common destiny links the peoples of the Iberian Peninsula.

Can Man Survive?

BY G. BROCK CHISHOLM

II

AT this early stage of his evolution we must not take it for granted that man's present dominant position on this star called Earth is necessarily permanent. Outside of such possibilities of his obliteration as we suggested last week, if man should become complacent and for a time ignore some of his rivals, he might be destroyed very quickly. Suppose man, after a few generations of freedom from smallpox or diphtheria, no longer thought of these enemies and stopped vaccinating and inoculating children. Epidemics like the old Black Death could quite conceivably wipe out most, or even all, of the world's human population in a very short time, helped along by the rapid methods of transportation introduced by man. It is quite possible that one of the species of bacteria or viruses might develop a degree of virulence which man could not cope with until he had become extinct in large areas of the world. Other animals have been defeated, and apparently permanently.

Continual and permanent vigilance is necessary if man is to survive on Earth—though even with all he can do, he may sooner or later be rendered extinct as have so many other animals before him.

In spite of these obvious truths, it appears that man generally regards his tenancy on Earth as permanent and unassailable. He has, until quite recently, very extensively wasted the natural resources of Earth, with no thought for future generations at all. Even yet we note that many of Earth's raw products are being used faster than they are being replaced. This shortsighted policy, so usual in man despite his intelligence, seems to persist as a result of the local and short-term points of view he seems to have about everything.

It follows then that man's natural and inevitable future lies in the further development and use of his brain, his ability to think. All indications suggest that if there is any universal plan for man (which is not to be taken for granted) it must involve that development of his thinking power. His survival demands it and his evolution up to now shows it to be his only superiority over other animals. There has, of course, been a gradual, though interrupted, development of this ability in man; but it is very evident that the actual thinking equipment available is not by any means used effectively to attain the ends man generally professes to want to attain. We notice that throughout man's history there have been, and still are, certain influences which prevent, in the individual and in groups, the full use of man's intellectual endowment. These influences, which everywhere limit man's thinking, make blind spots in his experience, and distort his judgment and decisions, are his "taboos."

GENERAL G. BROCK CHISHOLM is Canada's Deputy Minister of National Health and Canadian delegate to the United Nations Health Assembly. This is the second and concluding installment of an article based on the proposition that "the problem of society in a world trembling with the power of self-destruction is essentially the problem of society's individuals."

Taboos are the social sanctions set up in all tribes of humans by interested and powerful individuals or groups and authoritatively imposed on the young to protect the privileges, ideas, or faiths of the old people. Such taboos may prevent young men of the tribe from wandering away to explore certain rivers or mountains, explorations which must not be undertaken because "a terrible and powerful god lives there," or because "the spirits of the ancestors would not like it," or for any one of many possible magic reasons. They proscribe changes from the ways of the old people or demand certain attitudes or obediences. In various human communities taboos affect attitudes about such things as money systems, educational systems, systems of government, sexual education and behavior, marriage, clothes, health, foods, and religion.

In many of the most important questions of life it is evident that the minds of large numbers, indeed almost all, of the human race are not freely open to consider how true or untrue old ideas are, or to consider any advantages which might be found in new ideas. Old ideas and customs are generally called "good" or "sound," and new ideas, or experimental thinking or behavior, are usually labeled "bad," "unsound," "communist," "heretical," or any of many other words.

The power these words have obtained over much of the race is astonishing. They are the symbols of the control that older people and the past have, and cling to, over young people and the future. They are the chains that bind man to his miserable past and his discouraging present. They are the premises which were incorporated into consciences when each human was too young and dependent to defend himself by using his intelligence. We find that rarely is it possible to discuss intelligently, without striking prejudices which have been inculcated in childhood, such ordinary commonplace things as health, clothes, Negroes, politics, patriotism, conscience, Jews, superstitions, war and peace, money, sex, property, marriage, religions, some diseases, India, wage scales, socialism, communism, trade unions, political parties, and so on through a long list which varies from place to place, time to time, and family to family. Very few people can think clearly and honestly about many of these things; and yet these, and such as these, are the things which make up the life of man and which, misunderstood, mishandled, and fought over, have caused most of the fear and misery in the world.

Most of the humans on Earth are sure that they know what is "right" and "wrong" about every one of these questions; but there is no general agreement, and we find that in almost all cases the certainty comes, not from intelligent consideration, but from the accident of birth into a particular family at a particular time and place. The certainties have generally been imposed in infancy and any questioning of their validity called "bad," "wicked," "evil," or some like word, accompanied by evidence of strong parental disapproval. Parents are usually quite sure that their values, learned in the same way, are true, final, and permanent.

It is amazing that this attitude can be so universal when even in the next house may live other, just as intelligent people who have quite different sets of "rights" and "wrongs." Rarely do we find humans who examine their authorities. Mothers and fathers are supposed to have acquired, by the mere fact of giving life to children, all wisdom on all subjects, and very usually pose as authorities on every aspect of living to their children, even though their own living may not have been at all happy, satisfying to themselves, or useful to the community.

When we investigate to find the time at which taboos are introduced into the thinking process, we find everywhere that the distortions are produced in childhood. The method is the application of fear—fear of punishment, fear of loss of parental protection, fear of disapproval and consequent insecurity. Distinctions are drawn for the child by labeling all activities or interests as "good" or "bad." And it is very evident that the human race has been doing this for a long time. At least several thousand years ago these same methods were in vogue. Certain writings of long ago, however, show a better understanding of the threat to the race inherent in this system than is common now. The early folklore of the Hebrew tribes, for instance, contains a story in which their god, Jehovah, or Yahveh, warned the first man and woman against having anything to do with good and evil. A serpent, symbolizing the tempter who seduced them away from the true destiny of man, induced them to adopt the conceptions of good and evil, promising them that they would become as gods. As gods they could control other people by the use of good and evil. The old story goes on to show how, at that moment, they introduced guilt, fear, shame, prudery, and deceit to the human race. I find much wisdom in this ancient story and marvel that so little of that wisdom has survived to the present time.

In looking about us we see that taboos have, perhaps, been most rigid, and the distortion of thinking most prevalent, in relation to the whole field of reproduction. The sexual taboo is usually set up in early infancy. All normal infants explore their environment as extensively as possible, and this exploration naturally includes their own bodies. They, of course, have no concept of the feelings associated with some parts of their bodies being "good" and those associated with other parts "bad." The first impressive introduction to this limiting concept commonly occurs when they are first "caught" touching their genital organs. The offending hand is slapped and the accusation of "bad, bad" is made. There is little probability of any child so misinformed about equipment so vitally important in marriage, making a really satisfactory marital adjustment later in life. The flavor of "badness" will always permeate all sexual functions as long as that child lives. This same feeling of "badness" appears to be the greatest stimulus to promiscuous sexual exploration throughout adulthood; it seems to be the greatest source of the associated feelings of danger and adventure which are so attractive.

It is very important to understand that tabooing of activities does not mean the simple prevention of those activities on a reasonable basis. It means the prevention of activities, whether physical or mental, on an authoritative, moral-magic basis which is not arguable or answerable to reason. Certain controls which in themselves are quite reasonable, and both socially and personally desirable, can become both socially and personally damaging as the result of the use of authoritative moral-magic instead of reasonable methods of application.

Commonly in childhood the process goes something like this:

1. Child does something he wants to.
2. Mother punishes or disapproves with accompanying "Bad, bad boy."
3. Child is afraid of physical punishment, or threatened loss of security in disapproval, and does not again commit same act when mother is there, but
4. Child does same thing when mother is not there.
5. Mother discovers child has done it again, sometimes "a little bird told me" or "God told me." (As a result, child may enjoy killing nasty, tattling little birds, or may hate God as much as he dares to, all his life; both are enemies.) Other methods of discovery are not explained to child.
6. Mother punishes child.
7. Child stops doing it when mother is not there for the same reasons as (3) above, but he is now more confused with magic and more convinced of his essential "badness." He knows that he is supposed to be "good" but is really "bad." He must pretend he is "good" so that he will not be punished or meet disapproval from everyone.
8. Child imagines doing things he would like to do and often unguardedly indicates this to watchful parents.
9. Mother punishes or strongly disapproves of child's thinking things and frequently copes with the situation with "Remember God [already an enemy] always knows what you are thinking," with all its implied threat of continual, night-and-day surveillance, disapproval, and eventual punishment.
10. Child has to control his thinking and make it "good," leaving no outlet whatever for all his normal and desirable urges and wishes, which by now are almost all labeled "bad." All the "original sin," the normally developing human urges, must be hidden even from himself by pretence, guilt, shame, and fear. The result is usually a hatred and fear of God which may be compensated for by a superficial, cringing conviction and demonstration of "love," or, on the other hand, by a defiance of all rules attributable to God in an effort to prove to himself non-belief and thus avoid fear.
11. During this same time other magics which prevent the development of clear thinking have been set up. Among these are fairies, Santa Claus, personification of animals and things, night skies in which stars are deceased relatives, babies brought by storks, or in the doctor's bag, or found under rose bushes, and many other distortions of reality. Unless he goes through a long and difficult process of re-education it is probable that no child who has ever believed in any of these things can ever, throughout his life, think quite clearly and quite sanely about a wide variety of important things in his adult environment. This statement is not theory; it is quite provable.

Factual thinking for adults so authoritatively misinformed in childhood is permanently labeled bad and dangerous, and can be undertaken only defiantly or shamefully, accompanied by reactions of guilt, fear, and insecurity. Naturally the threat of these feelings is usually sufficient to repress any such attempt or to distort the attempted intellectual process extensively. Every psychiatrist has seen many clear illustrations of this process and knows that it is a potent factor in the production of the confused thinking which is almost universal in the human race. The astonishing belief is commonly supported, as a moral value, that it can be "bad" to know, to want to know, the truth.

Imagination has, by this process, been distorted and permanently crippled. It can be allowed to play only with "good" urges and desires, except with accompanying feelings of guilt and shame, or bravado and defiance. What is this "imagination" which may be crippled? It is a function of the highly developed cerebral lobes of his brain, possessed to a far greater degree by man than by any other animal, which enables him to picture and experience objects or circumstances or activities which are not present in reality. Does it matter if imagination in man is crippled and shackled by moral values and distorted by fears, if it is forbidden by taboos to explore in certain directions? Clearly, it does matter—very greatly.

Imagination provides a way of exploring without any real danger, of trespassing without being caught, of adventuring to gain experience without committing oneself in reality. Imagination is a scout that man may send out in all directions—past, present, and future—to investigate all circumstances, activities, possibilities, and consequences. Major adjustments to the important requirements of any civilization must be made in all fields of human urges. Only by true reports from a free imagination is it possible to get true pictures of the results of various kinds of adjustments to these demands. Each person's environment and problems of adjustment are different from those of others and continually change.

They require always his own solution, not a standard rule to be applied at all times and under all circumstances throughout his life. If the scout (imagination) must be deaf to some things, blind to others, and may not feel still others, its value as a reliable source of information is greatly reduced. Actions and decisions founded on its reports are not likely to be effective or sensible.

The only possible substitute for imagination and reason as a guide to decisions and actions is "conscience." More foolishness has been talked and written about conscience than about almost anything else. It is quite clear, and easily provable, that conscience is nothing more nor less than whatever one believed in childhood. One should be guided by conscience only if one is prepared to believe that the child was wiser than the adult is now. To go to conscience for guidance is to appeal to the rules imposed on a child before he was able to defend himself from authoritative parental certainties which might or might not be true or relevant. Actually these are rarely the rules which parents use for themselves but are only their ideas of what children should believe—generally what the parents believed when they were children.

Thus, though the parents may have escaped intellectually from their childhood beliefs, they still commonly continue to have a potent though unrecognized faith in the rightness of their own consciences. The setting up of conscience as an authority is an attempt to legislate in childhood for all possible circumstances which may arise throughout life. It would be a very foolish parent who would think himself qualified to prescribe the desirable behavior of his children even thirty years from now, when he can have no idea of what changes may have been made in the local customs of the natives by that time. Surely it would be sounder to equip the child to do his own thinking, clearly and unafraid, not hampered by taboos or the certainties which happened to be the conscience values of his parents, imposed by the authority of their parents, and so on back.

It would appear that we have now discovered our diagnosis to be something like this: "Man is prevented from progressing peacefully along the pathway of intellectual development (the pathway determined by his inherent equipment) by distortions of his power to think clearly, distortions which are imposed on him while he is still a small child and defenseless against parental authority."

If this diagnosis is valid then the prescription is easy. Stop doing it. Stop giving children final answers, rights and wrongs, local or any other kinds of certainties. Allow them to look at everything. Help them to look at all available realities and encourage them to prepare to do their own thinking, independent of their parents' faiths.

It is as simple as that, but not easy. Perhaps enough people can do it to save the human race.

In the Wind

FRANCE STILL LIVES! Cognizant of this was a New York Herald Tribune correspondent who cabled this story: As the Paris-Nice express gathered speed and prepared to whirl through the whistle-stop town of Fréjus, one of the passengers could restrain himself no longer. He pulled the emergency-alarm chain. The train ground to a halt before the Fréjus station and out stepped Henri Giraud, Mayor of Fréjus. Admiring townsmen, who had long fought off the impulse to do what their mayor had dared to do, hoisted Giraud to their shoulders and paraded him triumphantly into town.

OCCUPATIONAL ADJUSTMENT. Judging from the juxtaposition of two recent books reported in the Labor Department's current Monthly Labor Review, the golden age of competition yet to come (sans OPA) should consist mainly of captains of industry—a book by Michael Gore lists "101 Ways to be Your Own Boss," but Paul W. Boynton can offer only a modest "Six Ways to Get a Job."

THE HUMAN SIDE: Business Week reports Frank W. Abrams, president of Standard Oil Company (New Jersey), is gifted with talents that include an understanding of men. His first official act, while conducting a meeting of its manufacturing committee on a hot summer day, was to order all present to take off their coats.

NATURALLY! A sign on a display of wooden blocks with bored centers in a New York surplus-goods store: "We don't know what in the hell they are, but you're sure to find a use for 'em, at 7 cents ea."

WHY DIDN'T WE THINK OF THAT? The "Washington Calling" column of Scripps-Howard newspapers reprinted the following gem of economic reasoning which they credit to a business journal: "If milk prices go up several cents a quart, families in low-income brackets will use less. Surplus would go into other dairy products—butter, cheese, ice cream—eliminating shortages in these lines. If auto prices go high enough, fewer people will be able to buy cars (even on time payments), and there won't be any more worry about steel."

OPTIMISM UNBOUNDED: A Reuter dispatch in the Tientsin, China, Evening Journal, for June 29: "The construction of eighty-five fortresses (blockhouses and pillboxes) at vantage points in the former foreign concessions of Tientsin has necessitated the expenditures of C. N. $300,000,000 (U. S. $150,000). This was revealed by Mayor Chang Ting-ngao who stated the expenditures would be refunded by the Central Government later. . . . Mayor Chang was inclined towards optimism regarding the prospects of settling China's internal differences."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

G. B. S. at Ninety

BY KINGSLEY MARTIN

London

A WELL-KNOWN English critic, who recently reread the bulk of Shaw's works, wrote to me to express his disappointment in finding him after all "an indifferent artist." He added: "Maybe it is my eyesight that is at fault, but what I see is a chaos of clear ideas; a devotion to mankind based on emotional indifference to human beings; plenty of wit. That is all."

A harsh judgment on the greatest living writer of English prose. My first response is to cry out that such a summary leaves out the most important aspect of Shaw —G. B. S. himself. His personality impressed his age almost as Voltaire's did the mid-eighteenth century. He is what the world likes best of all—a great character. Today he has outlived his fame and become, to the younger generation, a legend. But as I found when I saw him the other day, he has in fact changed very little. He has, if you like, become one of his own Ancients. But his eyes are still as incredibly clear and his skin as pink as ever; he has the same upstanding carriage, though his legs trouble him on the stairs, and he carries a stick; he has the same immense gusto and infinite benevolence.

His vitality has not withered. He tells me that the thought of dying has become so familiar that he no longer thinks of it at all, and then, in the next breath, that he is utterly bored with people wanting to celebrate his ninetieth birthday; some of them even ask him to receive deputations. "I wrote and told them that I knew it would be a jollification for them, but that it would probably be the death of me." But he went further, explaining with his old vivacity his desire to have a Bernard Shaw Act of Parliament passed, an act to simplify the procedure by which one passes property over to local authorities, tax free, for some public purpose.

"I think," he said, "the country owes me some recognition. I don't want to be a knight, and I can't afford to be a duke, so I think they might give me an Act of Parliament. I don't mind whether my name is attached to it or not."

The biographers of Bernard Shaw will have no awkward incidents to cover. The more letters that are disclosed, the better light they will throw on G. B. S. In public he has been forced, by the insistence of beggars, to present a brazen front to charitable appeals; in private he is endlessly generous. The story of his loyalty to his old editor, Frank Harris, is typical. Harris was an unmitigated scoundrel, whom Shaw always befriended when he got into difficulties. Later in his life Harris wrote a shocking book full of libels about Shaw. After Harris's death, when his wife was hard up, Shaw took the book, rewrote most of it, published it as a "Life of Bernard Shaw," by Frank Harris, and gave the royalties to his widow. If Shaw's personal life is full of such incidents, it is because he is by nature benevolent, not because he is attached to individuals. Though he surprised his friends by making an extremely happy and successful marriage, he seems never to have had a grand passion as a young man—he preferred flirting with Ellen Terry by letter. Probably his deepest friendship has been with Beatrice and Sidney Webb, a friendship which has lasted without a break from the days when they were first associated in the Fabian Society in the '80's until now, when Shaw is 90 and Sidney Webb 87. But if Shaw has had few intimate friends, innumerable friendships, and millions of admirers, he has also made no enemies. Odd, one would say, for anyone who had hit so hard and fought so many battles with the gloves off. The explanation is that Shaw's high spirits remove the sting. The sneer inflicts a wound that does not readily heal; but pages of boisterous abuse, full of good-tempered mockery, are rather flattering. The attacks of G. B. S. are rather like the gusts of a high wind that blow the top-hat off a respectable city gentleman. The victim is forced to join in the general laughter.

All these are personal reasons for loving Bernard Shaw. They are no answer to the criticism that I quoted in my first sentence. An indifferent artist? Time will show. I should say myself that some of Shaw's comedies —"Candida," "Arms and the Man," "You Never Can Tell," for instance—will be constantly revived, as Sheridan is revived. Others will be mainly read by students of ideas. For this was Shaw's particular contribution to the British stage. He swept away the Victorian drawing-room comedy and, much influenced by Ibsen, introduced first the problem play and then his peculiar invention, the drama in which it is the ideas, and not the characters, that are dramatic. The extreme example of this is "Getting Married," which is all talk and no action. This genre will have few successful imitators, because Shaw's capacity for being continuously witty is unique. Perhaps his most remarkable feat is the third act of "St. Joan"

(Continued on page 100)

THE FIRST NINETY YEARS of George Bernard Shaw were concluded on July 26, 1946. By way of celebration those nine decades have been summed up by KINGSLEY MARTIN, editor of the London New Statesman and Nation, and chronicled by OSCAR BERGER, internationally-known caricaturist, in this four-page section.

An Illustrated Gui

George Bernard

By OSCAR BERGER

1. Baby George Bernard Shaw is born at 3 Upper Synge Street, Dublin, Ireland, on July 26, 1856.

2. Shaw, tired of working as an office boy and cashier in Dublin, goes to London in 1876 to join his mother and two sisters, and to find his métier.

3. He is 22 when he writes his first novel, "Immaturity," which was not printed until fifty years later.

4. G. B. S. joins the Fabian Society, is active as Socialist street-orator, lecturer, and pamphleteer (1884). He is reviewer for the Pall-Mall Gazette (1885), music critic for the London Star, drama critic for the Saturday Review (1888-1898).

to dhaw

1898 he marries harlotte Frances ownshend in Lone writes "The Ad-Bashville" (1900), and Superman"
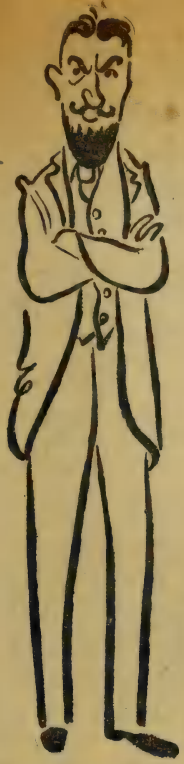
, "Major Barbara"
, "The Doctor's Di-
(1905).



6. He is famous now; the world takes notice. Prefaces to his plays bristle with Shaviana. His treatises on economics, biology, socialism, fine arts are masterpieces of a Genius (1901-(1915). He writes "Pygmalion" (1911), "St. Joan" (1922).

8. G. B. S. at 90: an institution, a legend.

7. Shaw visits Russia in 1931 and comes out a great admirer of the Soviet system.

(generally speaking, the most dramatic of his plays), which consists of a solid discussion of political theory lasting for more than an hour. The audience, I have noticed, listens without even shuffling its feet. The brilliant Hell scene in "Man and Superman," however, in which Shaw's philosophy is most fully worked out, lasts at least twice as long and can be played only to a highbrow audience.

A chaos of clear ideas? Personally I find some consistent strains of thought throughout the works of G. B. S. To me the most interesting is his attitude toward human history and progress. A historian of ideas is likely to see the "life force" as the working philosophy of rebels (and Shaw is first and foremost a Protestant) who have discarded conventional religion and could not accept the automatic progress believed in by nineteenth century materialists. It makes a useful distinction between the material world of mechanical forces, which we cannot alter, and the direction of human life, which we like to think is subject to our own will. Shaw's religion is a challenge to imagination and effort; he does not deny the possible regression of society, but he tells us that we can escape the doom which now seems so probable. The instruments of progress, in Shaw's view, are not ordinary men and woman, but the exceptional heroes and saints who, as he explains in his book on Wagner, are usually put to death by the rational people who want law and order. There is much resemblance here between Shaw and Carlyle. Shaw's heroes, however, are not conquerors like Frederick the Great, but heroes of imagination and intellect like St. Joan, Shelley, and, in his portrait, the matured Julius Caesar.

This emphasis on the Great Man fits in with the impersonal "emotional indifference" to ordinary men and women of which my correspondent complained. Like Carlyle, Shaw loathes the inefficiency and cruelty of the world and inveighs against the accepted conventions and the authorities who maintain them. Therefore, the early Shaw is the iconoclast loved by radicals. Not content with destruction, Shaw worked like any party hack for years as a Socialist lecturer and pamphleteer, and found, as the Webbs did, the consummation of his hopes in Soviet Russia. Hence he is loved by Socialists. But here we reach the point where inconsistency begins. For again like Carlyle, Shaw's skepticism about ordinary people's capacity to govern themselves has tended to make him a champion of authority. He even defended Mussolini and at one time thought we were foolish not to accept Hitler. Some of his later plays are diatribes against democratic institutions.

It would be easy to find pages of contradictions between Shaw, the rebel—declaring, for instance, that it was a sin for the educationist to mold the mind of any child—and Shaw, the champion of the authoritarian system of education in Russia; between Shaw holding that a Socialist state must shoot those who do not work, and Shaw saying, "Progress depends on our refusal to use brutal means even when they are efficacious." There is I think often an unresolved conflict between Shaw's impatience to put the world to rights, if necessary by autocratic means, and his temperamental and artistic love of freedom. But it must be remembered that at no time has Shaw ever been a liberal. He has always insisted that socialism and communism are one and the same thing, and though in practical politics he has been the most Fabian and pragmatic of political advisers, his theory has always been revolutionary.

Shaw once said of himself that "he would never be a really great author because just when he was about to achieve tragic heights, some absurd joke occurred to him and he could not resist the anti-climax." "I have got the tragedian and I have got the clown in me, and the clown trips me up in the most dreadful way." It is true; Shaw could never allow any of his characters, or himself, to get away with pretentiousness. No sooner do you think you see the moral that he would draw than he finds some real or absurd objection to it, and turns his tragedy into a comedy and sometimes, alack, even into a farce. Often, therefore, in his best plays—in "Major Barbara," for instance—you are left with the central problem brilliantly explained and quite unresolved. He must be fair to all his characters and avoid giving anyone the last word. If you think this impossible, notice how he rings the curtain down on some deflating incident which, perhaps, leaves his hero intellectual master but exposes him as humanly comic. This trick has made many people think that Shaw is only a jester, and he has done much in his private life to maintain this role. Once his lightest word became news, he was besieged by reporters. He did not fall for the usual device of the "star" and win his headlines with gush or slop. His method was to don the jester's colored stockings and make cracks about society and people which would set the world laughing, storming—or even thinking. For, when you sum it up, you see that Shaw in the last analysis is the great stimulator of thought, a moralist, constantly preoccupied with the problems of religion and social relations, using the weapon of satire to sweep out of the way the accumulated rubbish of false romance, bad arguments, and shoddy convention. Throughout, he has remained benevolent and puckish, preacher and jester, always personally beyond reproach.

The other day when I visited him at his home, he saw me off in the road and there, in a burst of high spirits, sang in a strong, clear voice (as he has done almost every day of his life in private) an operatic aria. "You see," he said, "even now my voice is no penny whistle." That, certainly, it never has been. It has been a voice not always, perhaps, in tune, but always potent to rouse men from lethargy, to entertain them, to make them think, and to make them want to think and act better.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

A Test for Democratic Socialism

ON July 12, when the Coal Industry Nationalization Bill received the royal assent, Britain's greatest natural resource became the property of all its people. This is incomparably the most far-reaching economic change yet undertaken by the Labor Government and its consequences will be watched anxiously by both the friends and foes of socialism. "Our future," Emanuel Shinwell, who piloted the bill through Parliament, told the recent Labor Party Conference, "depends on whether or not this audacious experiment succeeds."

Let us make no mistake about it, nationalization of the British mines is going to prove a stern test for democratic socialism. In taking over coal production the Labor Government has acquired, not a smooth-running industry but one that is run-down, inefficient, and disintegrated. Moreover it is an industry in which a very acute short-term crisis has, as a result of the war, been superimposed on a chronic crisis. The new National Coal Board, which will be the top management of the industry and responsible to Parliament, must overcome both crises and it will have to work fast if Britain's whole economy is not to be disrupted for lack of fuel.

I have not the space to give any detailed account of the long-term crisis; it is in any case a fairly familiar story. Ever since the last war the British coal industry has been deathly sick. Its symptoms have been falling output and rising costs, and constant labor unrest. None of the varied prescriptions offered by successive governments ever resulted in more than very temporary improvement. It broke down on a diet of rigorous competition but it proved equally unable to flourish on a regimen of cartelization. A committee of technical experts reporting to the last British government in March, 1945, stated flatly: "It is evident to us, as mining engineers, that they [the changes necessary for efficiency] cannot be satisfactorily carried through if the industry is organized as it is today. . . . An authority must be established which would have the duty of ensuring that the industry is merged into units of such sizes as would provide the maximum advantages of planned production." This report made it clear that no solution for coal was to be found in private enterprise in the strict sense. The choice facing the British people was between private monopoly and public ownership.

In his book, "New Deal for Coal," Harold Wilson, young British economist and Labor Member of Parliament, has written: "With an industry whose history and psychology are so bitter, there can be no guarantee of success under nationalization; there is only the certainty of failure without it." Nevertheless, that certainty will not serve as an excuse if the nationalized industry fails to produce more coal at lower costs and to offer much improved working conditions to the men who dig it. In working towards this goal the advantages of single ownership and centralized management should soon become apparent. The National Coal Board will be able to close down the least efficient pits and so conserve its limited labor supply. It will be able to connect, and work as a unit, adjacent pits which hitherto have been under different ownership. It will be able to speed up the mechanization of coal-getting. And in attempting such tasks, the Board will not be handicapped by lack of funds, for the Nationalization Bill provides for a capital expenditure of $600,000,000 on modernization during the next five years.

But fundamental reorganization will not show immediate results, and it will not, therefore, meet the short-term crisis which consists of a lag of output behind Britain's basic minimum consumption of coal. In the first five months of this year average weekly production amounted to 3,575,000 tons compared with 4,353,000 in 1938. In that pre-war year, however, there was widespread unemployment and many factories were idle, so that demand was smaller. Today the fuel needs of industry are being barely met by severe rationing of domestic consumers and the reduction of exports to a fraction of their prewar total.

Addressing the recent convention of the National Union of Mine Workers, Will Lawther, the union president, declared that the situation "contains the elements of national disaster." If his forecast of a possible deficiency in supply of 20,000,000 tons next year is borne out, his language is none too strong. For lack of fuel would bog down Britain's whole recovery program, including the export drive, and cause an unemployment crisis at the peak of reconversion.

Reduced production by fewer workers is the immediate cause of this situation. In April, 1946, there were 84,000 fewer miners at work than the weekly average in 1938 and the output per man-shift had fallen to 1.01 tons compared with 1.14 prewar. New recruits for the industry are, therefore, an urgent necessity, particularly as the average age of mineworkers is very high—one reason for the fall in productivity. But in the first quarter of this year only 2,962 juveniles entered the mines while 16,670 old men died or retired. The return of some 17,000 miners from the armed forces prevented an actual decline in the total working force but this, obviously, is a source of manpower that must come to an end with the completion of demobilization.

The problem, then, is to attract youngsters into an industry which, owing to its past history, has a well-earned reputation as one to avoid. Under nationalization, we may expect in time a great improvement in safety and working conditions, together with a system of training and continued education which will make mining a career open to talent. But until such hopes begin to be realized they are not much inducement to boys entering industry. Early adoption of a five-day week, which, it is believed, would increase rather than reduce output, might help recruiting and may be one of the first steps taken by the National Coal Board. Another possibility is the engagement of men from the Polish army-in-exile, which is being disbanded, and other displaced persons. This proposal is at present strongly opposed by British miners but if alternative methods of raising output fail, they might reluctantly agree to its adoption on a limited scale. After all they have a great stake in the success of nationalization, which has been their goal for forty years, and they cannot afford to allow the experiment to be damned by a coal famine in its first crucial years.

KEITH HUTCHISON

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Disenchantment of the World

FROM MAX WEBER: ESSAYS IN SOCIOLOGY. Translated, edited, and with an introduction by H. H. Gerth and C. Wright Mills. Oxford University Press. $5.

BROADLY speaking, Max Weber is a much-needed corrective to those "realistic" thinkers who attribute all social weal and woe to ill-analyzed "economic factors" and tend to regard all ideas (but their own, of course) as merely "reflections" and justifications of class interests. Weber was just as tough-minded as they, without being doctrinaire or simplistic. A vast amount of evidence convinced him that in fact ideas define, and thus help to "determine," interests. Consequently, he could reject the view that man is absolutely helpless in the face of a rigid historical determinism.

In his more comprehensive purview, the various "spheres" of action—political, economic, "status," and religious—are interdependent. Each of these spheres, to be sure, must first be analyzed separately with reference to its own peculiar problems. Thus, religious systems always deal, in part, with the problem of the irrationality of the world—the problem of "undeserved suffering, unpunished injustice, and hopeless stupidity." But the particular set of religious assumptions that any group develops to give "meaning" to the world (and thus to "solve" the problem) will inevitably have a bearing on the economic and political spheres also. This is the general form of the thesis which is illustrated in "The Protestant Ethic." The controversy over that essay arose partly because many critics were not familiar with the rest of Weber's work. Gerth and Mills now provide us with some more of Weber's confirmation, particularly in "The Protestant Sects and Modern Capitalism," "Religious Rejections of the World and Their Directions," and "The Social Psychology of the World Religions." ("Social Psychology" is a slightly ambiguous translation of Wirtschaftsethik, or "economic ethic.")

These fourteen essays are too broad in scope to be summed up in any neat formula; nevertheless, a persistent theme is the process of "rationalization"—the growth of "systematic coherence" in all phases of thought and social organization. This process has been carried to its greatest lengths in the Occident. Readers of "The Protestant Ethic" will remember that Weber lays great emphasis on the Calvinists' rejection of the sacraments and all other "superstition"—that is, on "the disenchantment of the world" in favor of rational techniques of mastery. A tremendous impetus to modern science was one of the consequences.

Another aspect of rationalization is analyzed in the famous essay on bureaucracy. As the editors say, > Marx's emphasis upon the wage worker as being "separated" from the means of production becomes, in Weber's perspective, merely one special case of a universal trend. The modern soldier is equally "separated" from the means of violence, the scientist from the means of enquiry, and the civil servant from the means of administration. . . . The series as a whole exemplifies the comprehensive underlying trend of bureaucratization.

Moreover, the "separation" of the "worker" from the means of "production" is only one among many characteristics of bureaucracy, all tending toward greater predictability and efficiency in organization, regardless of the kind of work performed. Other characteristics, for example, are the strict definition, by general rules, of officials' respective spheres of authority and the separation of place of work from living quarters. "The Chinese Literati," which deals with the Imperial civil service, puts in relief the peculiar refinements of modern bureaucratic organization in government, business, and the Roman Catholic Church.

Whatever the subject he treats, whether the caste system or political parties, Weber uses scientific method and care throughout. He assigns precise meanings to words that are also used in ordinary discourse (e.g., "authority," "office," "sect"). He is able to compare data systematically from many times and places because his analysis proceeds in terms of abstract concepts. In fact, his procedure is more systematic than appears from this volume alone, for the more general parts of his sociological writing are not included. Having said this much, one should add that Weber's precision, in these essays, is not so technical as to discourage the intelligent non-specialist; and, above all, it by no means consists in that "painful elaboration of the obvious" with which sociologists are often, and sometimes justly, charged. For example, many of the essays besides "National Character and the Junkers" contain facts, too little known, that are essential to an understanding of "the problem of Germany."

The excellent introduction gives not only a clear account of Weber's life and personality but also some insight into the bearing of his personal relationships and his active political interests on the development of his theories.

The difficulty of Weber's German has prevented him from having as wide an influence in this country as he should. A few specialists, notably Talcott Parsons, have assimilated his conceptual scheme and even improved upon it; but his brilliant empirical studies, such as the ones collected here by Gerth and Mills, will be read for a long time to come. For minds of a scientific bent, it is hardly too much to say that Weber compensates for the disenchantment of the world.

HARRY M. JOHNSON

The Nature of Communist Crisis

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE SOVIET ECONOMIC SYSTEM. By Alexander Baykov. The Macmillan Company. $6.50.

THIS, the fifth in the series of economic and social studies sponsored by the National Institute of Economic and Social Research in London, is an excellent, straightforward account of the economic history of the Soviet Union from 1917 up to about 1940. The author modestly disclaims the intention of writing an economic history, claiming his book to be "only an historical introduction to the description of the present-day system." Nevertheless, in form the book is essentially an economic history, and within the limits of its space it does a good, well-proportioned job. The author's general attitude seems to be that of a sympathetic critic. He divides the period into four well-defined parts—the period of war communism, the New Economic Policy, the collectivization struggle, and the revival of the later thirties. Within each of these four periods he analyzes the condition of industry, agriculture, trade, labor, finance, and the general conditions of planning. The main theme of the book is to show the development of the planned economy in all it aspects.

As books on Russia go, this is a good, if not a brilliant performance, written with a solid factual basis from original sources. All serious students of the subject will find it valuable. Like all books on Russia, it leaves a great many questions unanswered: the reader who lives and moves in the atmosphere of the Western world finds it difficult to penetrate beyond the abstractions and organizations to the real people who presumably live underneath them. Every sober, factual book of this nature needs as its complement a rousing novel —something that would transport the reader in imagination into the minds of the manager, the commissar, the Gosplan official, the Stakhanovite, and the ordinary Joe or Ivan.

Dr. Baykov is concerned to present the facts rather than to attempt interpretations. The facts themselves, however, are of such interest that the reader can hardly avoid trying to draw some conclusions—or at least to ask some questions. Two questions in particular arise in the mind of the present reviewer. The first is to what extent the apparent cyclical movement of Soviet history is a true cycle. The four periods into which Soviet history, before 1941, can be divided follow a fairly clear cyclical pattern. We have first the period of war communism and great social disorganization (depression?) followed by the establishment of greater security of property under the N. E. P. and the subsequent revival. This in turn is followed by the collectivization "depression," leading to the famine of 1931-32. Following this again we find a slackening of strictly Communist fervor against the establishment of greater security of property, differential wage rates, economic incentives, with again a revival of production. It would be absurd to call this phenomenon a "business" cycle, but it is a real question whether patterns of a more or less cyclical nature do not tend to be established in any society from causes lying very deep in human psychology. In Russia the cycle is "political" rather than "economic" in a strict sense, but it follows a broad pattern not wholly unlike the cycles of the Western world. We make mistakes, we learn something from experience when the effects of our mistakes become apparent, and in part rectify them. Then comes a period in which the lessons of past experience do not apply, and we make more mistakes, which in turn we must painfully learn to rectify. By transforming a society from one in which economic motives are strongest to one dominated by political motives we do not necessarily do away with this cycle; we merely replace the mistakes of business by the mistakes of government.

The second question concerns the nature of the planned economy itself. Dr. Baykov distinguishes rightly between the "planned" and the "controlled" economy. In the one, the economic structure is regarded as monolithic: as Stalin himself says, "Our plans are not prognosis, guess-plans, but instructions which are compulsory for all managements and which determine the future course of development of our entire country." It is in this sense that the Soviet Union is the world's biggest business. It would be interesting, incidentally, to make a comparative study of the organizational problems and patterns of power relationships in a large corporation and in the Soviet Union: one suspects that striking similarities would emerge. The controlled economy, on the other hand, is one in which the state acts merely as a governor of the system, controlling it by affecting the environment in which the numberless decisions of individuals are made. The planned economy, that is to say, is a genus of which a totalitarian war economy, an army, or a patriarchal family is a species. It is a profound law of being, however, that monolithic structures cannot go beyond a certain size without danger: the interaction of many small individuals may be more successful that the internal operations of a leviathan. The Soviet Union, and perhaps even the United States, might do well to ponder the fate of the Brontosaurus.

KENNETH BOULDING

Henry A. Wallace

As our good will ambassador he saw the friendly, courageous East

"Mr. Wallace's book is more than a report of the good will journey on which, in the spring of 1944, Franklin Roosevelt sent the author to Siberia, Soviet Central Asia, Outer Mongolia, and China. It is at once a fascinating travel book, a story of a remarkable adventure, and an illuminating interpretation of the countries and people the author visited."
—MAURICE HINDUS, Saturday Review

"A heartening expression of faith in the Soviet Union."
—FOSTER RHEA DULLES, N. Y. Herald Tribune

SOVIET ASIA MISSION

12,000 AIR MILES THROUGH THE NEW SIBERIA AND CHINA

At all bookstores Illustrated $3.00

REYNAL AND HITCHCOCK

The Atomic Bomb

THE ABSOLUTE WEAPON. By Frederick S. Dunn, Bernard Brodie, Arnold Wolfers, Percy E. Corbett, and William T. R. Fox. Edited by Bernard Brodie. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $2.

IN THE ten months that have elapsed since the atomic bomb made its frightful debut at Hiroshima social scientists have been faced with a problem of terrifying complexity. Indeed, it is little wonder that, up to now, most of the proposals advanced for the control of this new monster either have been narrowly technical or have offered solutions which, though logically attractive, have required political action far beyond the capacity of the world at its present stage of social development.

Meanwhile the social scientist is perplexed by the fact that he is supposed to rush forth with a solution which takes account, among others, of the following probabilities: first, that an American monopoly of atomic weapons is manifestly temporary; second, that in view of the premium given to the aggressor by this ghastly weapon there is no safety for anyone in the general possession of atomic bombs by all great powers; third, that because of this tempting advantage offered to the violator there is no safety in a policy of voluntary restriction through international treaties; and, finally, that the creation of a world state is not now practicable and may not even be desirable. Since he cannot take refuge in the philosophy of St. Thomas Aquinas or find comfort in the latest best-seller on world government, he has been obliged patiently to explore what possibilities for a solution exist within the framework outlined above. Thousands of men, billions of dollars, and years of preliminary effort were required to split the atom; yet the social scientist is supposed to evolve a satisfactory system of control on some bright day before tea time.

But sound work is being done, and the best evidence of it is this latest volume published by the members of the Yale Institute of International Studies. Avoiding panaceas and catchwords, the five collaborating scholars have prepared a serious analysis of the problem, studying the probable effects of the bomb upon the existing structure of international politics and exploring the practicable approaches to a solution. Their conclusions—to this reviewer, at least—seem sound, and the book deserves the widest possible reading by thoughtful men of good-will. Its greatest merit probably lies in the fact that it will be bitterly denounced by extremists of all categories.

The book begins with an introductory essay by Professor Dunn on the possibility that the world's treaty structure can safely be subjected to the strain of carrying an atomic-energy agreement. His conclusions, understandably enough, are skeptical. Bernard Brodie, the editor of the volume, then examines the effect of the bomb on military policy and the art of war. His list of basic postulates concerning the bomb and its effect does much to clear the murky atmosphere of public discussion, so beclouded by a disintegrating policy of official secrecy. Professor Wolfers follows with a brilliant essay on the implications of the bomb for United States–Soviet relations. Professor Corbett skilfully applies the same technique of analysis to the effects of the bomb upon international organization. The concluding essay by Professor Fox on the control problem strikes this reviewer as the sharpest and most lucid writing on the subject which he has seen.

In any book of political analysis the conclusions are bound to be much too subtle for brief and accurate summarizing. The authors point out that the bomb gives us little or no diplomatic purchase in political negotiations with the Soviet Union. They dispose effectively of the notion that the possession of the bomb by many countries might lessen its threat value to the world. They are equally sure that moonbeam-chasing after a world state at the present time is both futile and harmful. Consequently they reach the conclusion—which cannot be too often reiterated—that the answer to the problem of the bomb is not to be found in the discovery of some ingenious device, such as an elaborately conceived inspection system, but in the development of general political understanding between the United States and the Soviet Union. Since this is less of an answer than the basis for an answer, the authors do give a nod of approval to the Lilienthal report as the most promising proposal to date. They also suggest that the nations should agree to a policy of instantaneous retaliation against any state making illegal use of the bomb.

But in general, as this brief analysis indicates, the book is less concerned with specific proposals than with an investigation of the limitations and conditions which will affect the decision-makers. This illumination of the nature of the problem which confronts the statesmen is the major task of the social scientist. The Yale authors have discharged their share of responsibility.

GRAYSON KIRK

REVOLT of the SOUTH and WEST

"Too long have the South and West been attached to an imperial East as colonial appendages. . . . I commend the book. It is a factual challenge to America."
ELLIS ARNALL
Governor, State of Georgia

"The 'East versus West' fight is whipped up again. A. G. Mezerik comes out with a book (and) a controversy threatens to boil up over it in the West."
ROBERT C. ELLIOTT
The San Francisco News

"Handbook for Action!"
"The Revolt of the South and West is a serious book and deserves a serious hearing. It covers the subject completely. It is a Handbook for Action which should be read in every home this side of the Canadian border."
LEE McBRIDE WITE JR.
Birmingham Alabama News

DUELL SLOAN & PEARCE • $3.00 at your bookseller

EARL BROWDER On Russia

exclusively in THE NEW REPUBLIC

starting in the issue dated August 5

Don't miss this important series of articles

REPORT ON RUSSIA

Today . . . and her hopes for Tomorrow

Attach a $1.00 bill and mail this coupon NOW! for a 10 week subscription to THE NEW REPUBLIC which includes the complete Earl Browder series.

THE NEW REPUBLIC, 40 East 49th St., New York 17

Please enter my subscription for 10 weeks. I enclose $1.00.

Name.....

Street.....

City.....Zone.....State.....

N-7-27-46

The Strategy of Kenneth Burke

A GRAMMAR OF MOTIVES. By Kenneth Burke. Prentice-Hall Inc. $5.

KENNETH BURKE'S "A Grammar of Motives" is the first work of a trilogy, to be followed by "Rhetoric of Motives" and "Symbolic of Motives." The series may be regarded as a detailed mining of the territory staked out in the earlier "Permanence and Change." It is the same Burke with the same quest and the same strategy, as baffling, as inconclusive, as penetrating, as rewarding as ever, working on the largest and most important job of criticism that is being done among us.

The quest is substantiality and the strategy is the criticism of linguistic resources. Substantiality not in the abstract, but in the concrete human sense of having an identity, standing for something, being oriented by a goal, answering Shakespeare's "What is your substance?" "Peer Gynt" is searchingly analyzed as a "character in search of his identity"; "A Grammar of Motives" is engaged in the same search. In this sense Burke is after a way of life for himself and modern man. But he differs from the easy prophets who know the answer by a recognition of the arduousness of the task, and in the linguistic means which he employs. His resources are those of the critic; he sometimes seems to believe that salvation can be obtained by semantics.

"A Grammar of Motives" forces us to assume a succession of points of view from which human motivation has been described, and then dissolves each perspective by showing its partiality in terms of other perspectives. We find ourselves engaged in a dramatic dialectic in which philosophers, political theorists, economists, poets, theologians, and psychologists all have their say, and each mode of saying is shown to need correction by each other mode. The book is experienced as a vast dialogue. The participant reader goes through a complex psychological process in which his initial value-perspective toward human nature is confronted by the multitude of attitudes which other persons have held. One is challenged to find himself by taking the role of others.

Does Burke by this strategy reveal his substance or lead the reader to find his own? Fairness would require that we wait for acts two and three of the critical drama. Yet some preliminary, and perhaps premature, comments are insistent. Burke's hope is surely that in the process of assuming a multiplicity of perspectives toward man something "substantial" will result. Whether this is so is not so clear. In "Permanence and Change" Burke believed that a knowledge of man's biological nature would reveal what is constant in human history, and that communism offered the value-orientation by which contemporary man could attain an ethical identity. In "A Grammar of Motives" Burke does not continue these suggestions; he remains primarily at the level of critic, more detached, more ironic, more uncertain. There are valuable hints that the new self (and the new society) can find its unity only in the dynamic interrelationship of its diversities—that a federated self and a federated society is the answer to the problem of substance and change. But this position is not worked through, and the concluding pages extol a "neo-Stoic" attitude, a rather tame ending for a dramatic inquiry into man conceived as a dramatic animal. We emerge, indeed, with a heightened sense of our linguistic resources, but with no clear indication as to how they are to be employed.

This result is what we should expect. For the work of the critic is not that of the scientist or the philosopher or the prophet. Burke's brilliant exploration of our modes of expression is made in terms of one mode of expression, that of criticism. It cannot give us the full story of our linguistic resources, nor can an analysis of man through his language provide us with a full account of human motives. Burke snaps at science in all his writings, but his literary version of motive and language greatly needs supplementation by the work of psychologists and linguists. His own special orientation to substantiality causes him to ignore important treatments by contemporary philosophers of the problem of substance. And his preoccupation with modes of expression is not the focus from which either poetry or prophecy emerges.

The critic, however, has his own important task, and Burke is performing that task admirably. "A Grammar of Motives" is a significant book. It will be read by those who take seriously the role of words in human life, and by those who are earnestly concerned with the fateful problem of what man is to make of man.

CHARLES MORRIS

BRIEFER COMMENT

Old Age: Some Remarks from Russia

IN READING "The Prolongation of Life" by Dr. Alexander A. Bogomolets (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $1.50), the reviewer has asked himself three questions which he deems pertinent: (a) precisely what is this "anti-reticular cytotoxic serum" which "prolongs life"? (b) what "test experiments"—on animals, for example—have been performed? (c) what is the experimental evidence for its benefits to man?

Answers to these questions, however, cannot be found in this book. The author fills his pages with discussions dealing with various theories connected with the aging process, interesting in themselves, and of value as an introduction to Bogomolets' researches, but that is all. The Director of the Kiev Institute of Experimental Biology (Bogomolets' official title) may be the great scientist that he is advertised to be, but the evidence for such a claim is not given in this book.

BENJAMIN HARROW

The Maze of Marriage

WHOEVER DOES NOT BELIEVE that law is the occult science of the legal profession will welcome the "Legal Almanac Series" (Oceana Publications). In the first number Richard V. Mackay, in non-technical language, outlines concisely the state laws governing marriage and divorce. Charts comparing the various statutes disclose the amazing diversity of the forty-eight matrimonial laws in the United States, a diversity which hardly contributes to the unity of the American way of life.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

ANNIVERSARY

Just 20 years ago

Warners made a movie that talked

August 6th in 1926 was the First Night. And four determined brothers saw their vision fulfilled. It was at the old Warner Theatre on Broadway that Warner Bros.' new movie confounded the skeptics and "talked"!

This was it—fade-out for the silent screen and start of the era that brought Motion Pictures to the place in the world they occupy so prominently today. It's natural then that Warner Bros., whose pioneering courage made pictures "talk" so successfully, should feel a very special sense of satisfaction — and responsibility.

So when the New York Times not long ago commended Warners for "combining Good Citizenship with Good Picture-Making" it was recognition, we felt, of a way-of-thinking which began in a small-town "nickelodeon" in 1906. And you may be certain of this same way-of-thinking—and pioneering—just as long as there's a Warner Picture around for you to see — and Hear!

TWENTIETH ANNIVERSARY Warners OF TALKING PICTURES

Co-sponsors with Warners in Celebration of this 20th Anniversary of Talking Pictures:
AMERICAN TELEPHONE & TELEGRAPH CO. • BELL TELEPHONE LABORATORIES • EASTMAN KODAK CO. • R C A VICTOR Division of Radio Corp. of America • SOCIETY OF MOTION PICTURE ENGINEERS • THOMAS A. EDISON, INC. • WESTERN ELECTRIC CO., INC.

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"Exciting and Engrossing." —N. Y. Herald-Tribune "Story Has Dash and Sweep." —PM

GARY COOPER • INGRID BERGMAN
in EDNA FERBER'S
'SARATOGA TRUNK'
with FLORA ROBSON
From the Novel by EDNA FERBER

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL B'way & 62 St.

"MUSICALLY SATISFYING" —PM.
MAUREEN O'HARA • DICK HAYMES • HARRY JAMES
'Do You Love Me'
In TECHNICOLOR
— AND —
'THE DARK CORNER'
LUCILLE BALL • WILLIAM BENDIX
MARK STEVENS • CLIFTON WEBB

EUGENE O'NEILL says:
"The finest picture I have ever seen. I enjoyed it so much I went a second time...and I am going to see it again."
The THEATRE GUILD presents
LAURENCE OLIVIER
in William Shakespeare's
"HENRY V"
IN TECHNICOLOR • Released Thru United Artists
PRICES: Evgs. (at 8:30) $2.40, $1.80 Mats. daily (at 2:30) $1.80, $1.20
ALL SEATS RESERVED
NOW! N. Y. CITY CENTER 131 West 55th St.

BARBARA STANWYCK • VAN HEFLIN
LIZABETH SCOTT
— IN —
HAL WALLIS' Production
"THE STRANGE LOVE OF MARTHA IVERS"
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

— IN PERSON —
DINAH SHORE
— Plus —
GIL LAMB
TOMMY STANFORD
EXTRA!
DICK STABILE
and his Orchestra

NOW PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

STAGE PLAYS

THEATRE GUILD'S PRODUCTIONS
THE MUSICAL HIT
CAROUSEL
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Reuben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
with Harold Keel — Iva Withers
Jean Darling • Eric Mattson • Norma Howard • Jean Casto
AIR-COND. MAJESTIC Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT
OKLAHOMA!
Based on Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs"
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Reuben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
Jack Kilty • Owen Martin • Betty Jane Watson • Ruth Weston
AIR-COND. ST. JAMES Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." — Ward Morehouse, Sun.
MAX GORDON presents
BORN YESTERDAY
The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40. AIR-COND.

"KEEPS AUDIENCE ROARING"—Hawkins, World-Telegram
RICHARD RODGERS and OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd Present
ETHEL MERMAN in
"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"
Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON
Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN
IMPERIAL THEA., 45th St. W. of Bway. Mats. Wed. & Sat. Air-Cond.

FOR YOUR CONVENIENCE

THE Nation — Money-Saving Magazine Combinations

with Harper's Magazine	$7.50
You save $2.50
with Consumers Union	$8.00
You save $1.50
with Harper's Magazine and Consumers Union	$10.00
You save $3.50
with Free World	$8.50
You save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses. Canadian and foreign postage extra.

THE NATION by itself:

☐ One Year $6 ☐ Two Years $10 ☐ Three Years $14

☐ Servicemen's Rate $4 a Year

Canadian and Foreign Postage—$1 a year extra

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

_____

_____

_____

☐ Remittance enclosed. ☐ Bill me.

NAME _____

STREET _____

CITY _____ ZONE _____ STATE _____

7-27-46

Art

CLEMENT GREENBERG

THE category of "primitive" is not large enough to contain the phenomenon of a talent such as that of Henri Rousseau ("le Douanier"). Unlike any other latter-day primitive, he painted monumental pictures and he helped determine the course of art. If the picture "Storm in the Jungle," with its cunning and almost facile play of tones within a limited range, and its surface enriched by streaks of glaze representing rain, is really and truly by Rousseau and was actually painted in 1891, then he did not even begin as a primitive. The superb plein-air handling of color in such a painting as "Landscape, Pointoise" and the placing of the darks and lights in "Medieval Castle" and "Evening Carnival" likewise vouch for his learnedness as a painter.

Why, then, did Rousseau usually stiffen and simplify his art into something more characteristically primitive, so that while gaining pattern and decorativeness he lost the subtler modulations? He was far from the knowingness that would have led some one to become a primitive deliberately. The case is puzzling. Perhaps if we had more information about Rousseau's personality in the years before the avant-garde got to know him, it would be less puzzling. As it is, we can only venture hypotheses.

It seeems certain that Rousseau did not paint as a primitive simply because he was isolated, or lacked training, or was without dexterity of hand and eye. Whether or not he was always the psychotic he appears to have been in his old age, he seems to have been at least simple-minded, a naïf, from the first (and it is told that he used to "see ghosts"). It was perhaps his simplicity, translated into an aberration of the eye, that saved him from realizing in his own work the dead academic finish he admired so much in Gérôme's and Bouguereau's. In my opinion it was almost certainly the growing derangement of his mind that in later years freed him so completely from the conventions of nineteenth century art and made it possible for him to attack his vision so directly and conform to it so exactly in his execution. It is this directness that is primitive.

Rousseau in his derangement, which made him paint as if six hundred years of Western art had never been, joined the company of two other more or less deranged artists, who painted precisely as if to refute those six hundred years. Cézanne too was a little balmy, not to mention Van Gogh. (And there was also a lesser painter in America, Eilshemius, whose unbalanced mind permitted him a boldness he might have turned to better advantage for modern art had he lived in France and become well acquainted with Impressionism.) Thus those who maintain that modern art was started by mental cases would seem to be right. But they are only partly right, in a way they do not intend—a way that does not at all compromise modern art.

Just as Rimbaud had to give birth to modern poetry by deliberately cultivating the "derangement" of his senses, so those who made the leap from impressionism to that which came after could find the courage to leave the practical reality of the bourgeois world (impressionism having already arrived at that sort of reality after leaving official, ostensible reality) only when pushed by mental impulses so strong and so disconnected from the actual environment that they had to be those of psychotics. It took an extreme eccentric to shut his eyes with Cézanne's tenacity to the established examples before and around him and go on pursuing his "little" sensations with such fidelity to an ideal only he had glimpsed—yet which represented a reality more valid than that recognized by high and low in his time. Without his madness Van Gogh would, in the beginning, have seen only too clearly the distance between his own painting and the official variety he, like Rousseau and Thomas Eakins, admired so much; and had he seen that distance well enough, he would have been able to close it, to the detriment of his art.

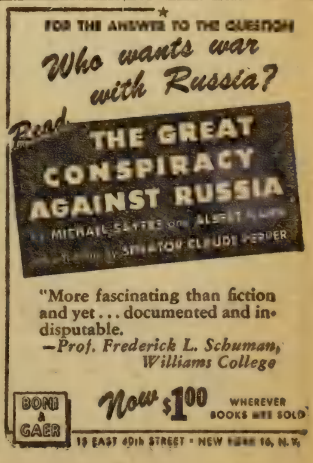
That which modern art asserts in principle—the superiority of the medium over whatever it figures: thus the inviolable flatness of the picture plane; the ineluctable shapedness of the canvas, panel, or paper; the palpability of oil pigment, the fluidity of water and ink—this expresses our society's growing impotence to organize experience in any other terms than those of the concrete sensation, immediate return, tangible datum. Modern art is now practiced by such relatively cold, hard heads as Matisse and Picasso, who produce it out of their sense of contemporary experience. But it needed mental cases to show them the way, to cut through to the ultimate truth of life as it is lived at present.

In this sense Rousseau deserves to rate as one of the founding fathers of modern art. It is not only—as R. H. Wilenski suggests—that he influenced Gauguin and, through him, Van Gogh. And it is not only that he painted some great pictures (and even so, we should be careful not to over-rate him, for his total work does not cover enough ground to rank him with the greatest painters). It is, even more, that his flat, direct, almost crass colors, contours, and modelling gave to many painters the first real impression they ever got of what life, reduced to solely empirical considerations and without the deception (but also protection) of faith in anything, looks like in art. Of course what we may also have in Rousseau is the very poetry of such elemental existence—but I doubt whether that poetry is the main thing.

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

DISCUSSING a volume of Nietzsche's writings many years ago Shaw described how a philosopher could operate with spurious materials —how, "having pieced an illusory humanity and art out of the effects produced by his library on his imagination, [he can] build some silly systematization of his worthless ideas over the abyss of his own nescience." As I read this I reflected that with only a few modifications it would describe similar operations of the musicologists. Thus, of the article on chamber music that Professor Láng contributed to a



FOR THE ANSWER TO THE QUESTION
Who wants war with Russia?
Read
THE GREAT CONSPIRACY AGAINST RUSSIA
MICHAEL SAYERS and ALBERT KAHN
SENATOR CLAUDE PEPPER
"More fascinating than fiction and yet . . . documented and indisputable.
—Prof. Frederick L. Schuman, Williams College
BONI & GAER
Now $1.00 WHEREVER BOOKS ARE SOLD
19 EAST 40th STREET • NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

"The resolution of conflict in self is like the making one of opposites in art"
The Committee for Aesthetic Analysis presents
ELI SIEGEL
in an Introductory Lecture on Aesthetic Analysis
SELF AND WORLD
CITY CENTER CHAMBER MUSIC HALL
130 West 56th Street
AUGUST 1, 1946 ▪ 8:30 P.M.
This lecture will discuss the basic problem of ALL persons; contain a critique of the concepts of Freud, Horney, etc.; and will show that aesthetics is necessary to explain and organize conflict in self. Discussion follows the lecture.
For tickets ($1.00, inc. tax) and information write to Martha Baird, Secretary, Committee for Aesthetic Analysis, 67 Jane Street, N. Y. C. Tickets also at door.

Buy Your Books Through
THE Nation
Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price, post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible.
Please address your orders to
THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
THE NATION
20 VESEY STREET ▪ NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES
•
62c a line (six words)
Minimum 3 lines
$6.16 per inch
•
Attractive discounts for multiple insertions.
•
THE Nation
20 Vesey St., N. Y. 7, N. Y.
BArclay 7-1066

New Friends of Music booklet last year one might say that having pieced illusory nineteenth-century audiences, composers, and music out of the effects produced by his imagination on the facts, he built a systematization of his inventions over the abyss of suppressed truth.

To deal with the entire article would take an entire issue of The Nation; let it suffice, therefore, that for Professor Láng chamber music, in the nineteenth century, was reduced to "the private affair of a musical minority, a musical élite" which was "able to derive enjoyment from 'absolute' music"; while the public musical scene was dominated by the "Bengal light" orchestral sonorities of program music, the music with extramusical meaning that was "dictated" by the new concert-hall public "composed of the large mass of the middle classes" who "possessed the necessary general culture but whose musical capabilities could not rise to pure music." And let it suffice to say that actually chamber music and other nonprogrammatic instrumental music continued to be written throughout the century—by Schubert, Schumann, Mendelssohn, Brahms, Dvorak, Fauré, among countless others—at the same time as program music and often even by the same composers; that it was performed at public concerts for members of the middle-class public; that Edwin Denby's observation—"to recognize poetic suggestion through dancing one has to be susceptible to poetic values and susceptible to dance values as well"—is true also of poetic suggestion through music; indeed that as cultivated a musical taste is required by the subtleties of melody, harmony, instrumentation, and form which convey the poetic suggestion of the Love Scene of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" as by the analogous subtleties of a Mozart string quintet; and what "dictated" the composition of music like "Romeo and Juliet" was the stimulation of the composers' musical imagination by poetry.

And now, as I mentioned last week, the falsifying schematization is being done with jazz. The Rudi Blesh article in the Herald Tribune began by describing the classic jazz of New Orleans: an improvised instrumental polyphony in which there was an equilibrium of African, Afro-American, and Western (European) elements, with the African predominant. Expansion to Chicago and New York brought change: "With its difficult balances held by delicate inner tensions and not yet firmly fixed into a stable form it was to be an easy prey everywhere outside New Orleans to the deforming and denaturalizing influences of popular Tin-Pan-Alley song and the nineteenth-century romantic harmonic tendency from which this song derives, however remotely." And change meant alteration of the equilibrium in the direction of Western "serious" music: "[The] classic instrumentation, one or two trumpets, clarinet, and trombone over a firm percussive-rhythmic section, so logical and essential to jazz polyphony, was expanded into the larger orchestra with two or three trumpets, a like number of trombones, and the ineffectual and inappropriate saxophones replacing the clarinet. The music changed, unobserved, but immediately; polyphony perforce dropped out and its improvisation with it; a new scheme was set up, a hybrid of harmonic-symphonic procedure, and improvisation lingering only in the solo which became a meaningless vehicle to display individual virtuosity." In the schematization, then, deviation from New Orleans jazz meant large-band "swing"; whereas in fact it meant also the jazz of Louis Armstrong's Hot Five and Savoy Ballroom Five, of the Chicagoans, and of any number of other small groups.

Besides recent reissues there is Victor's album (Set HJ-7; $5) of newly recorded performances by Bunk Johnson's Band—the living original New Orleans collective improvisation, which I have enjoyed, but without feeling impelled to throw out my Armstrong-Dodds "Wild Man Blues" and Teschmacher "I've Found a New Baby."

CONTRIBUTORS

HARRY M. JOHNSON is assistant professor of sociology at Simmons College. He is now working on a book about the social structure of France between the two World Wars.

KENNETH BOULDING, author of "The Economics of Peace," is a member of the Department of Economics of Iowa State College.

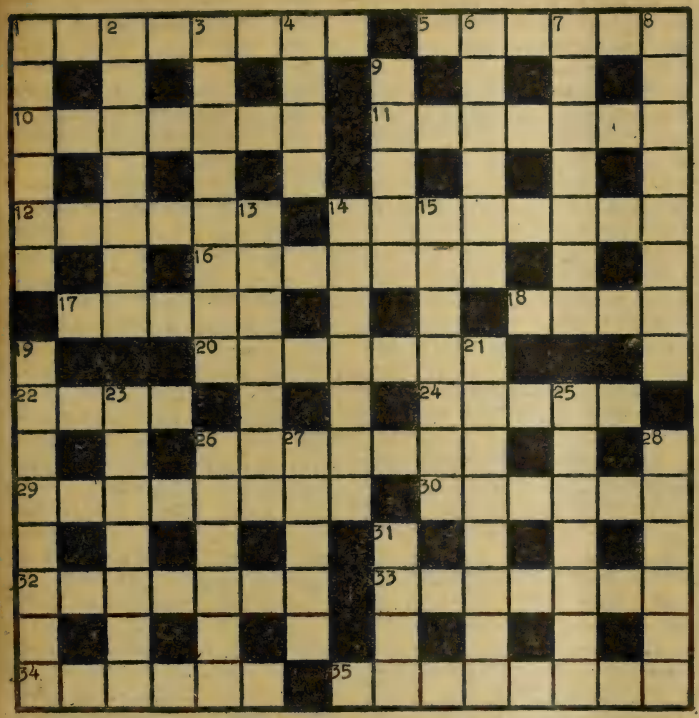
GRAYSON KIRK is professor of government at Columbia University.

CHARLES MORRIS, author of "Signs, Language and Behavior," is on the staff of the Graduate Faculty of Political and Social Science of the New School for Social Research.

BENJAMIN HARROW is professor of biochemistry at the College of the City of New York.

Crossword Puzzle No. 171

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 1-Down's feminine counterpart
5 Shut, it will keep out most of itself
10 One who obtrudes unfairly
11 As it happened
12 Take by compulsion
14 Your so-called double
16 Mix lover an opiate
17 Coal residue
18 Non-flowering plant
20 Corporation
22 Decays
24 Hams
26 A bee, for example
29 Rather hidebound in their business views, no doubt
30 Kidnap (slang)
32 Loiterer
33 Constructor
34 Most uncommon, this
35 Object of Love's wishful thinking

DOWN

1 Members of the Platelayers' Union?
2 Imputes (anag.)
3 Second string
4 The slave who would not obey Canute?
6 Is not Miss Cain
7 Death
8 Fool birds
9 Broken victuals
13 Having left a will
14 Defeated Harold at Senlac
15 Striking contests
19 He gets one down
21 Naval dance of peace and plenty
23 A pressing matter for the infantryman
25 No good Katherine's denying her action when this creature is about 26 Imparters of secret information
27 I read a Turkish decree
28 Split
31 Scottish town

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 170

ACROSS:—1 AGLOW; 6 JUDGE; 9 RISIBLE; 10 AMBLE; 11 TIMES; 12 THRONGS; 16 MENACE; 19 RAMSAY; 22 WHAT A GAME; 23 SPIN; 24 AJAX; 25 ISINGLASS; 26 BORN; 27 UPON; 28 GRENADIER; 31 TEASES; 33 EVELYN; 36 ASPERSE; 39 BROOD; 40 NEVER; 41 EXIGENT; 42 SPEAR; 43 SERVE.

DOWN:—1 ALARM; 2 LABAN; 3 WRETCH; 4 TSAR; 5 OBAN; 6 JETSAM; 7 DUMPS; 8 ESSAY; 13 HEAVINESS; 14 ORANGEADE; 15 GRANARIES; 17 EXPLODE; 18 AWNINGS; 20 MEASURE; 21 ANATOMY; 29 READER; 30 EVENTS; 31 TUBES; 32 AFORE; 34 LIVER; 35 NORSE; 37 PRIM; 38 REEK.

BOOKS

"HAWAII TO HEAVEN"
by GUALTERIO QUINONAS, Hawaiian Writer
Lovely Hawaiian-American novel—Delightful story of a Hawaiian boy who found a beautiful romance awaiting him in this land of democracy, the Heaven among nations. A charming, inspiring book, filled with Hawaiian and American incidents, history and romance.
Cloth, illustrated, $2.00
HOBSON BOOK PRESS
51 Vanderbilt Avenue, New York City 17

OUT-OF-PRINT and hard-to-find books located free of charge. Send list of wants to J. Thompson, 1 Hillside Ave., Pelham, N. Y.

VARIOUS AND LOVE SONNETS by Richardson Savell. 64 immensely substantial, hauntingly beautiful, tenderly passionate evocations. $1.00. Grand Print Publishers, Box 542, Brookline Village, Mass.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

10 ROOM HOUSE; 12 ROOM HOUSE; 3 barns; garage; 380 acres; brook; woods; bridle paths; excellent for private homes or collective use. Bargain at quick sale. $12,500. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA. 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocational psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

LANGUAGES

ALL LANGUAGES. Phonograph Courses. Linguaphone, other makes. Sold, bought, rented. A. Alin, 475 5th Avenue, New York 17. MU. 3-1093.

MAGAZINE SUBSCRIPTIONS

SUBSCRIBE to all your favorite magazines and newspapers with one order. One bill to pay after orders or renewals are accepted. Catalog free. John Crehore, Postbox 2329-N, Washington 13, D. C.

MERCHANDISE FOR SALE

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.40 per carton, postpaid. Send check or money order. Ace Mail Order Co., East Orange 1, N. J.

There are more than 45,359 readers of The Nation doing what you are doing — reading this advertisement. If you have something of interest to offer them—call The Nation Advertising Department for particulars as to space, cost and closing date of next issue.

THE NATION
20 Vesey St., N. Y. C. 7 BArclay 7-1066

SITUATIONS WANTED

EXECUTIVE, capable handling executive position, personnel, public or industrial relations. Salary open. 901 Jefferson Hotel, Dallas, Texas.

WASHINGTON REPRESENTATIVE, wide bus. P. R., and assn., exp. References. Regular or special assignments. 4853 Crescent St., Washington 16, D. C.

WRITER, 34, newspaper, institutional publication, administrative experience, desires job liberal publication. Veteran. Satire, polemics, objective reporting. Box 1634, c/o The Nation.

RESORTS

WOODED ESTATE ON JERSEY SHORE

THE OAKS

INTIMATE ATMOSPHERE, COCKTAIL PARTIES

BEACH CLUB MEMBERSHIP, ALL SPORTS

ADULTS. 55 MILES FROM N. Y.

5 MINUTES FROM RACE TRACK — ELBERON, N. J. Tel. LONG BRANCH 2433

Attention Please!

Train leaving on Track 31 for

. . . . . .

Are they calling out the location of your resort?

Those vacationers are heading for two weeks of rest and fun. Do they know what good times they can have at your place?

Tell them about it through the resort advertising pages of The Nation.

Phone BArclay 7-1066 today

or

Write to 20 Vesey St., N. Y. C. 7

for information as to space, rates and closing dates.

Don't delay . . . those vacationers are planning their vacations

NOW

RESORTS

The Glenmere

Your private country estate while you are our guest.

In the Ramapos

CHESTER, N. Y.

51 Miles from New York City

Your private lake with beautiful white sand beach. Your private golf course. We offer you excellent accommodations, superb cuisine and every facility for your entertainment. Glenmere is a glorious place for your vacation.

N. Y. Office: RE. 2-5047

Stonegate LODGE

On LONG LAKE, N. Y.

NEW ADULT RESORT IN THE ADIRONDACKS

Limited Accommodations • Rates $65 to $85.
Open in September
GEORGE KLEINSINGER, Musical Activities Director
Fishing • Motor Boating • Tennis • Golf
New York Office: 150 Nassau Street, WO. 2-2900
LOUIS A. ROTH Director

HATHAWAY LODGE

OPEN ALL YEAR

Formerly the palatial 500-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Winding Mountain Trails. Delicious food Easy Transportation.

Attractive Rates • Make reservations now

For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 299

The Fieldstone

On Round Island Lake

A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.

ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR

MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

DEUEL HOLLOW HOUSE

In Berkshire foothills, 70 miles from N. Y. City. Delicious food served on terrace overlooking our private lake. Free swimming instructions, rowing, fishing and other sports. A completely informal atmosphere.

SOME AUGUST RESERVATIONS AVAILABLE
Raisel Cohen David Sacks
Wingdale, N. Y. Phone 3691

ALL ABOARD

For our 40 acre private lake where you swim in cool, clear waters, fish for pickerel or just relax in one of our grand canoe boats and drift almlessly with the breeze.

SOUTH WIND

P. O. Box Woodbourne, N. Y.
All Sports—four fast clay tennis courts
Make reservations now for Labor Day week-end

For a Glorious Vacation

BELLA VISTA LODGE

SEAVIEW & CLIFF AVE. NEWPORT, R. I.

Delicious home cooked meals.
Moderate rates, friendly and informal atmosphere. Write for your Reservations immediately.

RESORTS

August Attractions

TO SUIT EVERY TASTE AT

Camp LOG TAVERN

TENNIS • GOLF • RIDING • HANDBALL • SWIMMING • CANOEING • SHOWS • MOVIES • CONCERTS • COZY BUNGALOWS • DELICIOUS FOOD

Write or phone for Illustrated Booklet N

Phila. phone: TRINITY 0621

CAMP LOG TAVERN

Milford, Pa. 9 E. 40 St., New York. LE. 2-8668

Return from a Vacation

Looking Fine — Feeling Fine

From

WESTERN VIEW FARM.

high in the Connecticut Hills, you can return tanned, glowing and invigorated, and with happy memories of the warm hospitality of an Inn which is in its Twenty-seventh season under the same ownership and management.

Rates per person, $12.00 a day, $70.00 a week
Week-ends, Friday evening to Sunday evening, $24.

TED OHMER

New Milford, Connecticut Tel.: New Milford 440

LAKE VIEW LODGE BOLTON LANDING on Lake George, N. Y.

A delightful, secluded spot for a quiet, relaxing vacation, intimate, informal. Near all sports, including golf — tennis — boating — riding — fishing. Newly furnished—modern appointments. Excellent home cooking and baking. RATES FROM $40

For Free Illustrated Folder
write F. MARTIN, Mgr. at above address

RO-ZEE LODGE

CENTRAL VALLEY, N. Y.

43 MILES from N.Y.C.

A 200-acre estate, friendly, informal retreat for vacationing. Fine American-Jewish food, comfortable accommodations. Horses, water sports, Hiking, Tennis, Skeet Archery, Handball. Movies, Square and Modern Dance Band. Open Year 'Round. Write or phone Highland Mills 7895

SACKS FARM

Saugerties, N. Y. Tel. 590-J

Unusually beautiful countryside, pine woods, good, homey Jewish-American cooking. All conveniences. Intimate and restful. Swimming, horseback, tennis and other sports. Adults. Booklet.

BREEZEMONT PARK

ARMONK N.Y.

35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY

"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"

The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.

OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 955

SUPERB VACATION

ROTH FARM . . . in Beautiful Pennsylvania . . . Three Hours from New York City.

An ideal vacation on magnificent estate: 14 acres of landscaped and wooded land, with spring water, swimming pool and lagoon for free boating. Splendid meals, well planned and imaginatively prepared. Tastefully furnished rooms with inner-spring mattresses.

RATES: $40 per week
ROTH FARM
Lehighton, Pa. Tel.: Mantzville 25R41

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 3, 1946 NUMBER 5

The Shape of Things

THE SECOND PARIS PEACE CONFERENCE IN the memory of this generation has opened under omens which can hardly be called asupicious. Even the optimism of Mr. Byrnes will be severely tested by the road-blocks already thrown up in the way of a decent, durable settlement. But some favorable circumstances exist this time which were missing in 1919, and it would be reckless to ignore them. One is American unity. For all our heated discussions of international issues, for all our short-sighted attempts to doubly insure our national security by unilateral devices, we are at the same time committed irrevocably and almost unanimously to the principle of collective action to make and maintain the peace. Another is Soviet participation. One may deplore the tensions and misunderstandings that impede our relations with the Russians, but no sane person would willingly substitute the situation which existed at the last peace conference, when Russia, our recent ally, was not only absent in fact and spirit but was the victim of an ugly diplomatic and military offensive camouflaged as support for "democratic" opposition forces. The echo of that battle can still be heard: it must be silenced if possible by today's peacemakers. A third hopeful factor is the sharper awareness of the peoples of the world, their increased political maturity. The rise and fall of fascism, the pre-war mistakes of the democracies, educated a whole generation of Europeans. They suffer from few of the illusions that made the deceptions of 1919 so easy to perpetrate and so devastating in their after-effects. This time the people are watching; they are better organized; their common fight during the resistance has toughened them and given them self-confidence. They may be tired, but they are not indifferent or helpless, and the conference will do well to remember their existence as it debates boundaries, and adds up reparations.

✶

"LYNCHINGS," SAYS LIFE IN THE COURSE OF a rather complacent editorial about Southern progress in its current issue, "have declined almost to the vanishing point." But while the magazine was being distributed news came from Georgia of one of the most ghastly lynchings in history. A young Negro, out on bail on a charge of wounding his employer, another colored farmhand, and the wives of the two men, were seized and shot by a large gang of whites—the women, apparently, solely because an assassin thought one of them had recognized him. This was no hot-blooded, impulsive crime; it was cold, deliberate murder. "It looks like it was a rehearsed affair," said Major William F. Spence, Chief of the Georgia State Police, after his preliminary investigation. The old desire "to teach the niggers their place," stirred up by Gene Talmadge's inflammatory campaign for governor on the issue of "white supremacy," was, perhaps, the chief motive. Governor Arnall, who promptly offered large rewards for information about the murderers, has ordered Major Spence to stay on the job until they are arrested. Attorney General Clark has instructed the FBI to carry out an inquiry. Yet it is probable that this crime will go unpunished like so many others of the same kind. For lynching is a community crime, and the criminals are protected by the fears and prejudices of their fellow citizens. Major Spence has stated that, in the present case: "The best people [sic] in town won't talk about this; they have an idea who it is." He added that he was getting no cooperation from the local authorities. Once again bloody emphasis has been given to the need for Federal legislation against mob violence.

✶

TO SIGN OR NOT TO SIGN? THAT WAS THE tough question that President Truman had to answer when confronted by the revised price control bill. Another veto would have left prices and rents at the mercy of the free market, for it was certain that Congress could not be induced to pass any better bill. Yet to sign meant setting the OPA an almost impossible task in view of the restrictions with which Congress had circumscribed its authority. It meant, also, as David Lawrence candidly points out in his syndicated column, "helping the Republicans out of a hole"; for, as he explains, "had the measure been killed, the Republicans would have been gambling with the prospect that lack of controls would not produce stabilized prices . . . before the autumn Congressional elections. . . . As it is, the OPA remains and the country will infer that whatever prices prevail, they are the result of President Truman's policies." We do not think, however, that the President should be criticized for the decision he reluctantly reached. The message which accompanied his signature shows that he

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS
The Shape of Things 113
Time to Go Home 115
Russia and the Atom 116

ARTICLES
The Battle of Palestine by Freda Kirchwey 117
Washington Peep Show by Tris Coffin 120
British Labor's First Year by Aylmer Vallance 122
Mexico: Ballots Without Bullets by Anita Brenner 124
Small-Town America V. Los Alamos, New Mexico by Alden Stevens 127
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 129

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
The Death of the Sheriff A Poem by Robert Lowell 130
Neo-Pagan in the Forties by Wylie Sypher 130
Here Lies TNEC by Boris Shishkin 132
Briefer Comment 132
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 134
Music by B. H. Haggin 136
Films by James Agee 136

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 138

CROSSWORD PUZZLE NO. 172 by Jack Barrett 139

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon — Washington Editor I. F. Stone — Literary Editor Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors
Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch — Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors
Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editor: Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx
Advertising Manager: William B. Brown
Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

is under no illusions about the efficacy of the measure, although he rightly insists that it represents some improvement over the vetoed bill. It cannot, obviously, prevent a general advance in the price line during the next six months but it does offer the OPA some weapons with which to check the rate of that advance. Those weapons will be given a sharper edge if consumers retain the price consciousness they have shown in the past four weeks and refuse, individually and collectively, to submit to profiteering.

*

THE PRESIDENT ALSO PROPOSES TO GIVE renewed attention to anti-inflationary fiscal measures that will supplement price controls by bringing "spendable income more closely in balance with the supply of goods." He suggests further reductions in federal expenditure and, if inflation continues to threaten, "a more rigorous tax policy." As our readers know, we have never regarded a balanced budget as an end in itself, but that does not mean that we consider it an evil to be avoided under all circumstances. Clearly, at a time like the present, when we have nearly full employment and a large excess of purchasing power, a budget which was not merely balanced but overbalanced, would exert an important stabilizing influence. There are undoubtedly many possibilities for reducing expenditure in Washington, including expenditure on the armed forces; there is certainly scope for increased taxation, particularly on unearned incomes and speculative profits. But Congressmen—who, incidentally, have just raised their own salaries—while willing enough to talk about economy in principle have shown little enthusiasm about economy in practice. And instead of thinking about increasing taxes, they are all set to cut them during the next session. We fear that Mr. Truman is likely to get as little cooperation on the Hill for sound fiscal measures to combat inflation as he has received in the matter of price control.

*

A BILL PROVIDING FOR THE STOCKPILING OF strategic raw materials has been passed by Congress and signed by the President. While the political wisdom of such open preparation for the next war may be questioned, the military value of a reserve of metals, rubber, wool, and other commodities cannot be gainsaid. Moreover, its existence should obviate uneconomical scrambling for supplies in emergencies and tend to check the kind of depletion of scarce resources that we suffered in the war just ended. The inclusion in the bill of a "Buy American" clause serves to defeat these ends, for domestic production of many of the metals it is most important to stockpile is already inadequate in relation to normal demand. Hence the Joint Army-Navy Munitions Board in making purchases for the stockpile will be forced to compete for supplies with industry with the result that prices will be increased and the mining of marginal ores, much better left as underground reserves, encouraged. Again, this insistence on self-sufficiency, which in effect gives American producers an advantage additional to the tariff, is at variance with the international economic policies of the United States. No wonder Mr. Truman signed this bill with reluctance, a reluctance only overcome by his belief that power to acquire stockpiles was of "overriding importance."

*

THE WAGNER-ELLENDER-TAFT HOUSING BILL was passed by the Senate several weeks ago, but action by the House has been held up because certain Republican members of the House Banking and Currency Committee, to which it was referred, have followed a course of deliberate obstruction. Their tactics seem to be inspired by the powerful real estate and building lobbies who always make their lavish presence felt in Washington when housing is under discussion. To them the bill is just a "communistic" measure even if Senator Taft is one of its sponsors. Actually the proposed legislation seeks to facilitate private as well as public housing and, at the same time, to consolidate federal housing activities. As the New York Times has pointed out, of the 12½ million houses which the program envisages, 11 million will be built by private enterprise with some federal aid in the form of loans and mortgage insurance. This bill has received the widest kind of non-partisan support in and out of Congress. It will be of immense assistance in stabilizing the whole construction industry, one of the main pillars of our economy. It can harm only those whose interest it is to maintain a housing famine in order to secure monopoly rents. The President has appealed to the Democratic leaders of the House to expedite action on this measure. We hope they will find means to circumvent the saboteurs and will refuse to allow adjournment until a vote has been taken.

*

JAMES CLEMENT DUNN IS TO BE OUR NEW Ambassador in Rome. We would have thought he would be more acceptable and more at home in Madrid, but we are pleased that he is not going there. He has given inestimable aid and comfort to Generalissimo Franco over the past ten years and we would not care to see him in a position to be of further service in that quarter. We are still more pleased to have him relieved as Assistant Secretary of State in Charge of European, Near-Eastern, Far-Eastern, and African Affairs—of the affairs of the world, in short, beyond the Americas. This grandiose title, even though broader than the job it covers, was fantastically inappropriate to the man whose greatest diplomatic triumph remains the decision that a Vice President's half-sister is entitled to precede a Speaker's wife to the dinner table. Dunn's unwarranted power was built on his generally conceded skill as a technician in the mapping out of international agreements and on the influential patronage of Cordell Hull, with whom he has for years been on terms of the most cordial, if incongruous, friendship. Narrow in his social views, addicted to the society of Europe's decaying aristocracy, and a consistent reflector of Vatican policy, Dunn waged a prolonged but successful fight to keep the embargo clamped down on the Spanish Republic until it suffocated. His subsequent record included the securing of loans for Franco and a stubborn defense of the Vichy regime. Secretary Byrnes is to be congratulated on Dunn's promotion," which we trust will not be fatal to the infant Italian Republic.

Time To Go Home

WHAT has happened in China during the last two weeks should convince Americans that we must decide what we are going to do there, and decide what it is that we have been doing there all along. Madame Sun Yat-Sen—who, as Evans Carlson has said, is better qualified to speak for China than any other person—has asked the United States to withdraw its forces from China and give neither arms nor money to what President Truman himself, last December, described as a "one-party government" that had to be reorganized on a representative basis before it would be aided by the United States.

Few Americans realize that this reorganization has never even begun; nor do many of them understand that, while General Marshall has been trying to move mountains and charm away abysses by the exercise of a lot of unimplemented persuasiveness, character, and good will, the United States has been wasting its whole-hearted military assistance, plus four billion dollars worth of supplies, on a totalitarian government which has given us in return a few promises which it neither means nor keeps. In some districts the Kuomintang has entirely disregarded the truce General Marshall got it to consent to, while in others it has used this truce as a breathing spell during which it could move in troops (in United States transports), pile up supplies (made in the United States), and prepare for that war of extermination against the Chinese Communists which—it has continued to state publicly—is both inevitable and desirable. The sale to speculators, by Chinese officials, of most of the UNRRA food shipments to China; the persistent offensive against the Chinese Communists, now beginning to assume the proportions of that full-scale civil war our policy was supposed to avert; the steady rise to dominance of the most reactionary elements of the Kuomintang; the political murders of prominent liberals; the systematic obliteration of any remaining shred of democratic rights—all this has caused even Time, heretofore the Kuomintang's unctuous apologist, to deplore the corruption, inefficiency, and brutality of the present Chinese government.

The Kuomintang plainly believes that, no matter what it does, the United States must continue to support it, since we must choose between it and the Russian-supported Chinese Communists. It has done what it could to make this choice seem absolutely clear and absolutely necessary, by attempting to crush all the liberal elements between it and the extreme left—meanwhile pretending they do not exist—and by attempting to convince us that the Chinese Communists are bloody-handed totalitarians. (Qualified eye-witnesses have testified, with surprising unanimity, that compared to the Kuomintang the Chinese Communists are honest and democratic.)

The attitude of certain segments of our army and State Department seems to have convinced the Chinese government that the United States will support the blackest reactionary government in preference to any that could be called, by anybody, Red. The Kuomintang thoroughly understands—just as Madame Sun Yat-Sen, the Chinese liberals, the Chinese Communists, and great masses of the Chinese people understand—that there is no possibility that General Marshall alone can effect any real compromise in China, or transform the present one-party government into a democratic one. All of them realize that the longer American troops "guard railways," the longer American vessels bring in material, the nearer they are getting to what the Kuomintang has worked and waited for: the extermination of the Chinese Communists and the consolidation of China under a totalitarian government supplied with American munitions, with American loans, and with American-trained armies. We have reached the point where the best thing for us to do is to do nothing at all, to get out of China.

American newspapers are fond of remarking that during the war, while we had Uncle Joe where we wanted him, we should have forced him to make specific promises that he would not do whatever he happens to be doing right now. Few newspapers bother to say this about China; yet there we had an opportunity to obtain for the Chinese a democratic and unified government, and instead went on with the policy, or lack of policy, that has led to the present debacle. One wonders how much our policy has been disinterested but ineffective, how much an incoherent composite of the conflicting pressures inside our own government, and how much simply bad, a typical example of a government working (as governments so often do) at levels below either ideology, idealism, or common sense. Faced with countries like Greece or China—where reactionaries, Communists, liberals, agrarian democrats, and God knows what else are engaged in a confused struggle—the democracies are foolish enough to give the most reactionary elements an unwilling but thorough support because they can see nothing but one mesmerizing fact: that helping the left will be helping Russia. Actually American and British stupidity of this sort can do as much to help Russia as some of Russia's recent triumphs of indigenous stupidity have done to hinder it. If we want to make sure that the people of such countries have no alternative but reaction or Communism, this is the way to do it.

Russia and the Atom

SO SWEEPING was Mr. Gromyko's rejection of the modified Baruch plan for controlling the atom that congenital optimists profess to see in it a hope that he was merely breaking ground for protracted bargaining. Without sharing that inverted hopefulness, we find it hard to believe that Gromyko really meant some of the things he said. We are not so much appalled by the flat declaration that the proposal "cannot be accepted in any way by the Soviet Union, either as a whole or in separate parts"—that could be merely an inept invitation to further concessions—as by the fantastic tenor of Gromyko's objections.

The Soviet delegate takes exception to the American view that atomic matters are of "international and not of national importance." This view, he argues, is merely an American device for getting around the Charter provision which guarantees member states against interference by the United Nations in their internal affairs. The American proposals for giving the rights of control and inspection to a semi-independent Atomic Development Authority would therefore be a breach of the sovereignty of the member nations. And "the principle of sovereignty," he adds, "is one of the cornerstones on which the United Nations structure is built; if this were touched, the whole existence and future of the United Nations would be threatened." The atomic bomb is a nation's own business and the hope of the world lies in clinging to our ancient sovereignties! Colonel McCormick could not have put it better.

In place of this "dual organization," which would "undermine the Charter" by giving it a spine, the Russians propose a treaty to outlaw the manufacture and use of atomic bombs, just as the Kellogg treaty outlawed war altogether. Violations would be cited to the Security Council, which would then take action unless one of the five permanent member states—any one of which might be the accused power—chose to exercise its right of veto.

The Russians surely understand as well as anyone else that this is no plan at all. What, then, is their purpose in offering it and in taking so intransigent a position? We can only believe that what they are trying to tell the world is that, while they want atomic control as much as any other nation, they will not buy it at the expense of the veto. This is their crutch and they dare not throw it away until they are certain that they can walk without fear.

We can condemn that fear, we can call it pathological, and we can even show that it is in good part self-generated. But there is no sense in denying that the fear is there, and that in its presence the Russians would rather be free to make bombs in spite of the treaty, if they suspected that other nations were doing so, than to put their faith in a mechanism which they couldn't control and which might in some undefined way be used against them. This is the weakness of all mechanical approaches to peace—no gadget can take the place of trust.

Yet we cannot go along with those who glibly condemn the Baruch plan as "utopian" and propose instead that we come to a "genuine understanding" with the Russians before trying to construct our international machinery. Such an understanding, in the play of forces existing today, could only be one that rested on a basis of big-power politics, one that accepted the principle of security through expansion, and that ruthlessly brushed aside the claims of less-favored peoples.

Since we can neither in conscience concede to the Russians this kind of false security nor in good sense allow the beginnings of world collaboration to be abandoned with a holy washing of the hands, we have no recourse but to work patiently with them in the United Nations and at the peace table, demonstrating in every legitimate way that their security is as vital to the world as our own and extracting from them every last possible concession in the direction of international controls. It is ironic that the "Socialist Fatherland," clinging desperately to an anachronistic "sovereignty," should have to be pulled and hauled into a system of world collaboration, but this is not the first time that events have made fools of prophets.

The Battle of Palestine

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE partition plan for Palestine, as it was described in the New York Times last Friday, is almost too bad to be believed. The story was not carried in any other paper and the full text of the plan has not been published as I write, so it is possible that the Times correspondent, who evidently benefited by a news leak in the Anglo-American Cabinet Committee, was misinformed as to the details. Indeed it seems almost incredible that the new committee, after weeks of labor, should have brought forth so vicious and provocative a mouse; far better to have adjourned without any decision. For the plan outlined in the Times invites immediate rejection by Jews as well as Arabs and is guaranteed to inflame the anger of both. It would divide the country into Zionist, Arab, and British districts with a British-controlled central government holding final and all-but-absolute power over the whole country. The Jewish and Arab areas would, says the Times, "have considerably less autonomy than was enjoyed by Britain's American colonies in the eighteenth century." The British would directly control defense, foreign relations, excise taxes, police, prisons, communications, customs, civil aviation, broadcasting, and antiquities for the whole country. They would run the Jewish port of Haifa. They would also, according to the summary, retain final authority over immigration, "but the provincial governments would have the right of appeal to the United Nations Trusteeship Council"—if and when.

> The provinces would have their own assemblies but the central government would appoint speakers without whose approval no bill could become law. The executive authority in the provinces would be vested in councils of ministers appointed by the British High Commissioner. He would have emergency power to supersede a provincial government in whole or in part.

The Jewish province under the plan would be a thin strip of territory zigzagging north and east and north again, from the coast below Jaffa to the Lebanese border. It would include about 1,500 square miles, a little more than half the area proposed in the Peel partition plan in 1936. To put the final touch on this constitutional monstrosity, the report is said to provide that the admission of 100,000 homeless Jews now in European camps, urged as an immediate step by the Committee of Inquiry, be made conditional on acceptance of the "federalization" scheme.

THIS IS FREDA KIRCHWEY'S third article on Palestine and the Middle East following her recent tour of that area.

One can only hope the full text, which may have appeared before this comment does, will dispel the fears aroused by the preliminary report. For Palestine is in no state to survive much more stupid and ill-considered treatment; politically, its condition is already desperate. Even in June when I left there it was easy to predict steadily increasing trouble. In my first article, commenting on the British Foreign Minister's speech at Bournemouth, I wrote: "Reading this, one realizes how little Bevin has learned from the [Anglo-American] inquiry, indeed from the long record of British colonial policy: he still believes that order is a prerequisite to policy, an idea easily converted into the theory that order is a substitute for policy. This mistake was responsible for the Black and Tan terror in Ireland, for the Amritsar massacre, and for a dozen other bloody events easy to recall. If persisted in, it will have the same ugly results in Palestine." The prognosis took no particular foresight, but events have borne it out more precisely and rapidly than I could have guessed then.

RAIDS SHOWED BRITISH INTENTIONS

First came the British raids on the Zionist organizations and the arrest of leading officials of the Jewish Agency, clearly announcing the intention of the government to create a situation which would rule out early application of the Inquiry report. Second, the bombing of the King David hotel. This stupid crime cannot be condoned on grounds of intolerable provocation, nor can the Irgun try to hide behind alleged "warnings" which are unprovable and have been flatly denied by the British. The bombing was calculated with nicety to hamstring the efforts of Zionist leaders, in Palestine and London, to crack the fatal circle of terror and reprisal. Just as the British drive on June 29 weakened the influence of the moderate leaders over their Jewish followers, so the Irgun bombing weakened their position vis-a-vis the British authorities. But it is impossible to doubt, none the less, that the first tragic error played an important part in bringing about the second. Palestinian Jews, seeing their leaders in jail and their defense organization threatened with suppression and the seizure of its weapons, undoubtedly moved closer to the position that counsels of moderation had failed and violence was inevitable. Terrorism began to take on the dangerous and attractive guise of justified reprisal.

Representatives of the Agency and other Jewish leaders have expressed unqualified condemnation of the bomb outrage. Whether they will officially cooperate in rounding up members of the terrorist organizations has not been decided as I write. But whatever they say or do, their efforts will be effective only in the degree to which their prestige is reestablished by action in London. They cannot be discredited by continued failure and still be expected to win their followers to a new trust in the virtues of restraint. They cannot say: "Look, we have got nowhere; but will you please lay down your arms and leave everything to us and the British?"

The latest White Paper was clearly intended to justify the British army's raid on the Jewish Agency and Haganah. The evidence it presents of acts of violence condoned and even supported by the Zionist officials and of limited cooperation between the Agency and terrorist groups would indicate, if proved valid, that the undeclared war in Palestine has partly closed the ranks of the Jewish "resistance forces."

The Jewish Agency has indignantly denied the authenticity of the incriminating telegrams published in the White Paper, and no one has a right to accept them on their face value. The mood of British officials as I encountered it in Palestine is one which would lead them to give ready credence to fabricated evidence of Zionist conspiracy. But, true or false, the document may well serve to justify British toughness in the mind of the general public. Unfortunately, it will at the same time blur the issue, for the common or strap-hanging reader will not make nice distinctions between Jewish violence that might at least have had some military purpose, and violence that had no reason other than sheer terror. The broader effect of the White Paper will be to discredit, along with the "dissidents," men who have tried to carry on the fight with as little bloodshed and general destruction as possible.

JEWISH LEADERS ARE MILITANT

Britain's strategy of repression and delay has turned every Jewish leader into a militant; even those known as "moderates" unanimously and openly back illegal efforts to circumvent the immigration restrictions and resist military measures. But if the British intend to offer concessions in Palestine—in other words, if the new proposals from London turn out to be more generous and realistic than the Times' story indicates—it would seem reckless to toss into disrepute the Jewish leaders still capable of compromise. Such men are not expendable. Nothing but their prompt rehabilitation will prevent power from slipping into the hands of the elements whose anger and intransigence they have attempted to offset. If that happens, the struggle in Palestine can only become more and more bloody and embittered.

For Jews are not Arabs, full of noisy threats but incapable of united, organized, sustained action. And the Jews of today are not the Jews of 1936 to 1939, so eager to prove their pacific and constructive intentions that they all but fell backward in their effort to avoid violence. Today the Jews trust no one but themselves. They are organized and prepared. They believe that they are fighting, not just for their families and their homeland as in the thirties, but for the survival of their people. The horror of the past six years is alive in every Jew in Palestine whether he suffered it in his own person or through the bodies and minds of his fellow Jews in Europe. His feeling is inflamed by every sign of easy indifference, in Britain or elsewhere, to the fate of the remnant of refugees in Europe. It is reinforced by each boatload of survivors that slips into Haifa harbor.

THE SPECIAL QUALITY OF PALESTINE

The impact of Jewish Palestine strikes you in full force the moment you cross the Lebanese border. Perhaps that is the best way to meet it, for with Lebanon as a background, Palestine takes on a special quality; the contrast is startling. In "free" Lebanon, the Christian community lives in a state of constant apprehension and constraint. In British-ruled Palestine, the Jews are obviously a "free" people. I had expected to find courage and determination, even confidence, for it is out of these ingredients that the miracle of Jewish Palestine has been compounded. But I was surprised to find the Jews "free" in the full moral meaning of the word. Where Christians in Lebanon discuss in unhappy undertones their chance of survival, reduced to the thinnest sliver by the ousting of the French, Jews in Palestine talk openly, without restraint, in not-too-well-modulated voices, about the whole state of affairs in their occupied country. Their press is free as the wind, until it is censored or suspended; in Lebanon the press, with a few notable exceptions, is both timid and corrupt. The Lebanese Christians expect to be submerged in a Moslem flood if they are not rescued by some outside agency. The Jews walk the earth of Palestine as if they belonged there, not like refugees or immigrants. This phenomenon of Jewish freedom in one of the world's least free lands gives the visitor an impression of solidity and permanence which every other circumstance tries vainly to erase.

I talked to political leaders in Palestine—several of them now in prison—and to men and women in a dozen or more collective farms and cooperatives. I saw refugees from extermination camps serving their apprenticeship in the colonies. I saw Jews at work in factories owned by the labor organization. I visited the hospital and the Hebrew University on Mt. Scopus. I talked to the newspaper men and women of Jerusalem. The sum of these varied contacts produced a surprisingly homogenous impression upon me. And since this article cannot deal in details, I shall try to make a composite of the attitudes I find recorded in my notes.

First, the assumption that the survivors of Nazi terror would eventually surely get to Palestine. Not a single Jew even suggested that the immigration could be stopped. Legally or illegally, under protection or as smuggled goods, the DP's would come and the other would-be refugees would follow, and all Palestine Jews would help them.

A leader in Haifa asked me if no American shipowner could be found who would go into refugee-running on a big scale. He pointed out that we were not bound by Britain's restrictions, and marvelled that no American Jew had yet launched such an enterprise.

Every Jew openly defended illegal action to assist the refugees in landing and prevent their deportation if that should again be attempted.

Every institution, from the magnificent Hadassah hospital to individual homes in cooperative farms, was preparing to make room for the 100,000 or whatever number, smaller or greater, might arrive. New quarters were being built in collectives; new land acquired within the strangling limits of the White Paper restrictions. Plans for training and settling the future arrivals were rapidly taking shape, together with realistic preparations to provide for the physical and psychological rehabilitation of people who have been seriously damaged by the horrors they have lived through.

Second, the determination of Jewish Palestine to survive at whatever cost. I have said the Jews are now all militants. What this means in practice is that they are prepared to fight for the right to control their own institutions and decide their own destiny. I put it in these imprecise terms because Jews disagree about the exact political basis on which their future should rest. Most of them, of course, want a democratic state with a Jewish majority within Palestine's present boundaries. An earnest minority wants a bi-national state, equally balanced in population and political power between Jews and Arabs. Some Jews are quite prepared to accept a partition plan which would limit the Homeland to an area containing a Jewish majority or able to attain a majority when the 100,000 have been added. The suggestion of a democratic federated state embracing separate Jewish and Arab administrative areas would be regarded by many Jews as an unhappy but acceptable compromise. The proposal set forth in the Times would be rejected by both these groups.

NO SURRENDER OF BASIC RIGHTS

No Jew I talked to would agree that the community should surrender its basic right of self-government and self-defense. Training for defense is as nearly compulsory as social pressure can make it. Every young person gives a year's service to the community, and if he is needed for the defense forces, that is where he goes. No secret is made of the existence and activities of Haganah; the fact that it is outlawed under British regulations merely induces a moderate discretion in talking about it.

Jews are filled with bitter contempt for the government's condemnation of "illegal armed forces." For Haganah supplied the British army with thousands of able fighters. The chairman of the Jewish Agency, Dr. Bernard Joseph, told me that the recruiting drive of the Zionist organizations was limited only by British reluctance to accept Jewish soldiers in numbers so totally disproportionate to the handful of Arabs who served. Haganah was, of course, fully recognized during the Arab raids in the late thirties. It was this force, then ill-equipped and poorly trained, that defended the scattered settlements while British troops concentrated on the maintenance of general order and the protection of pipe lines. Today Haganah has come to be looked upon not only as a defense organization to be held in readiness for possible future trouble with the Arabs, but as an Army of Liberation upon which the Jews will depend if negotiations fail and the British try to maintain the status quo by force of arms.

There are other things the Jews want.

They are passionately eager to reclaim the land; one of the reasons partition would be a hard concession to make is that it would endanger if not end the hope of putting into effect the Jordan Valley plan and other large-scale projects designed to open great desert areas for farming.

They want to raise the standard of living of the whole country and level up to their own the standard of the Arabs. This is partly altruistic; partly it is in order to make possible an economic and political stability which can only be reached if the Arab masses are somehow drawn into the twentieth century.

Some Jews, wiser than the majority, want to make common cause with other threatened minority groups in the Arab states—particularly with their neighbors, the Christians of Lebanon.

But the basic desires of the Jews I talked with are wrapped up in the first two attitudes I have described. Put together they were expressed briefly by one of the wisest Palestinian leaders. He said to me: "Under no circumstances will we give up. We will fight to open Palestine to all Jews who want to come. We will fight to maintain Jewish Palestine. We have no other choice. We cannot go on from here. This is the stopping place—the end of the road. We will stay here or die."

Washington Peep Show

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, July 28

A BUSTLING little man with a harassed look was the most important man in Washington last Thursday. Congressmen and correspondents treated him deferentially; secretaries sidled up to him coquettishly. He was the Captain of the Capitol Police, the man in charge of arrangements for the biggest hit show of the season—the well-advertised appearance of Congressman Andrew Jackson May before the Mead Committee of the Senate. The captain was the man to see to be sure of getting a seat in the large Senate caucus room.

Washington is not an early-rising city, but many officials, hangers-on, and reporters were setting their alarm clocks for 7:30 Friday morning. The hearing would start at 9 sharp. The queues would begin forming at 8:30. When Friday came the Captain was a crushed man. He said plaintively, "There aren't any crowds." Another Capitol aide wailed, "We've got everything all set, and the actor doesn't show up." Congressman May was ill abed, suffering from a heart attack.

Senator Mead is an optimist. He opened the hearing by standing up and calling out in a clear voice, "Is Representative Andrew J. May in the room?" A useless question as the Senator could see by looking over the one row of spectators. The Congressman's attorney, a nervous young man with tightly pressed lips, told the committee that his client had suffered a stroke; the strain of recent weeks had been too much for him.

The Mead committee needed the personal appearance of the big Congressman to bolster a very badly sagging play. The first act had been as fascinating as a peep show. Fabulous characters were introduced and whisked out again. The breath of scandal blew tantalizing bits onto the copy paper. It was very refreshing to a Washington tired of serious thinking about such controversial issues as atomic energy and price control.

Most amazing of all the characters was Murray "Wolf" Garrson, the big-time promoter of the munitions combine which drew government contracts totalling $78,049,101. He is no stranger to Washington. He was some kind of a confidential agent for the Department of Labor in the Hoover Administration, and described himself to impressed strangers as an Assistant Secretary of Labor. The Department of Labor files on Garrson are voluminous and contain accusations that he was an arms smuggler, an alien smuggler, an intimate of gangsters, and a shake-down racketeer himself. Investigations were made by the FBI, but each complaint wound up with the notation that nothing could be proved.

The investigation reports did say that Garrson was more aggressive than he needed to be, that he operated in an irregular way, and that his associates were strange and shadowy characters. But the Wolf was elusive. It was obvious that he had two qualities necessary to a successful promoter: he had all the brass in the world and the kind of overwhelming geniality that impresses politicians. When Senator Ferguson introduced the Garrson files into the hearing, he said sarcastically, "I understand that some people have had difficulty in finding out the character of Murray Garrson. There has been a woeful lack of interest on the part of certain representatives of the War Department in ascertaining the character and morality of people with whom they dealt." Such people, for instance, as Ben Fields, a friend of Garrson and an alumnus of the Lewisburg Federal Penitentiary. Senator Mitchell charged that Fields approached him and tried to bribe him as a member of the Mead committee. Another former inmate of Lewisburg, Sam Beard, was also in the picture. Then there was May's liaison agent, dapper Joseph Freeman, Washington representative of the Garrson interests. Like his friend, the Congressman, Freeman is currently suffering from heart trouble.

TRIS COFFIN is a Columbia Broadcasting System commentator. He writes a weekly Washington report for The Nation.

The cast even included a comic character, Louis Sarelas, the young government clerk who was made office manager for the Washington office of the Garrson's at a salary higher than a Senator's. He testified eagerly that he was "a sensitive soul" and that what he really yearned for was a Hollywood contract as a singer. Feminine charm was injected into the hearings by the two very good looking young secretaries in the Washington office. Their testimony was damaging to May, and contained charges that May would call up the office asking abruptly about money. They also told of the Alice in Wonderland atmosphere of the office: thousand-dollar bills waved about, calls to Capitol Hill, whiskey for generals, no files.

Andy May was certainly a handy-andy for the company, if the testimony was correct. He was alleged to have "contacted" the War Department and secured contracts for the Garrsons, to have gotten Sarelas out of the army, and to have interceded with General Eisenhower when Murray Garrson's son was involved in a court martial. It is difficult to understand just when May had any time for legislating or the Pentagon brass moments for doing anything but looking after Andy's friends. Just what May got out of the job of being errand boy is not exactly clear. He was agent for the Cumberland Lumber Company, a mysterious organization which had $48,000 advanced to it by the Garrsons. According to the pretty stenographers in the Washington office of the Garrson outfit, the Congressman seemed to have money on his mind when he called. On one occasion a Mrs. Hall heard him ask, "What about the $3,000?"

And there the first act ended. The second act has been bumping along like a flat tire. Nothing has been proven. There is no evidence thus far that the Garrsons defrauded the government out of millions. What might have been a shocking and tragic scandal washed out when the War Department was not able to trace defective mortar shells to the Garrson companies. The Navy Department issued a press release announcing with an air of haughty respectability that its dealing with Messrs. Garrson had been honorable and aboveboard, and there had been no trouble. Thus the case against Congressman May is still inference. No one has testified of seeing any money pass from the Garrsons to May.

The final act is coming up within a few days. The committee still hopes to have Representative May on the stand. Lindsey Warren, the aggressive Comptroller-General, is going to testify, and he has promised to give important information to the committee. Senator Mead has obtained permission from the White House to examine the income-tax returns of those connected with the Garrson empire.

If it has not yet confirmed the existence of a major scandal, the committee has already shown several sad weaknesses in the legislative and administrative systems of the government. But since they are not sensational enough to compete with murders and Hollywood news, they have been generally overlooked. The record shows:

(1) It is comparatively easy for any promoter with enough brass to make a monkey out of Washington. Murray Garrson had Congressmen and generals step obediently to his tunes. He understood the weaknesses of Washington, the subservience of any government department to the mighty men on the hill who control policy, appropriations, and promotions. The army could no more tell Andrew J. May to go to hell than a private could thumb his nose at a general. The War Department was forced to depend on the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee to steer its bills through the House. It is no secret that at one time the Secretary of War asked President Roosevelt to appoint May to a vacant Federal judgeship to get rid of this domineering autocrat who demanded favors for his friends in return for his support. The contempt with which the Garrson people held those who did their bidding for them was indicated by the code word for May. It was a Yiddish word, "yeichel," which means "sucker."

(2) The independent General Accounting Office has no authority to investigate war contracts until after they are terminated, and then only if there is evidence of fraud. Since one of the few ways to determine fraud is to examine the records, the GAO was almost powerless to look into billions of dollars of war contracts to see if Uncle Sam was cheated. It was only after the Mead Committee hearings that the GAO undertook to examine the Garrson contracts.

(3) The ancient Congressional traditions of courtesy and immunity from attack permitted Chairman May, at a time when his integrity was under a shadow, to control the House debate on one of the most important bills ever presented to any Congress, the atomic-energy control bill. He was fighting vigorously and using the proxies of absent committee members to try and defeat civilian control of atomic energy. Yet no one rose in the House to question the propriety of having a man under suspicion of selling influence dominate debate on atomic energy control and head the House conferees.

Another case before the Mead committee involves West Coast politics. Representative John Coffee, Democrat, of Washington, is accused of accepting, through his former secretary, Paul Olson, a $2,500 check from a Washington state contractor. Senator Brewster, Maine Republican, has laid before the Mead committee this check together with letters from Coffee and Olson to the donor, Eivind Anderson.

Anderson is a contractor who shared in the construction of Fort Lewis, Washington, one of the largest army installations in the country. He made several trips to Washington when the contracts were being awarded and called on Congressmen. In 1941, after one of these trips, he sent the check to Olson. Coffee contends that the money represented a campaign contribution, and says that he did not declare it officially because it was received after the campaign. The two letters speak of the heavy financial burden on a Congressman in conducting campaigns.

The check and letters came to light five years later after a bitter primary fight for the mayoralty of Tacoma, Washington. In the non-partisan primary, two of the candidates were Olson and Anderson. Anderson was badly defeated, and Olson was out in front. After the primary, Anderson called on Mayor Harry Cain of Tacoma, who is now the Republican nominee of United States Senator, and turned over the check and two letters. Cain consulted the Department of Justice, which informed him if there was a criminal offense involved, the statute of limitations barred any action. He then made the letters and check public. They created a big stir in Tacoma, and Olson was defeated in the election.

The story has now been revived on the eve of the election campaigns. The Mead Committee is fully aware of the political implications and Senator Brewster has more or less withdrawn from active prosecution of the case.

British Labor's First Year

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, July 24

BEFORE me lies a letter sent me last week by a Socialist friend in Prague. He wrote: "Czech Socialists are watching with keen interest to see whether the British government goes through with its bread-rationing scheme. This is regarded here as a test case whose results will show how far Britain is determined to pursue the policies of orderly planning. The abandonment of bread rationing would be viewed here as tragic evidence that the Labor government is beginning to yield to extra-parliamentary pressure groups and is prepared to allow Britain's economy to be assimilated gradually to unfettered United States free enterprise."

My Prague friend has not been disappointed. There were certainly last-moment hesitations on the part of some members of the government. They feared the electoral effects of the intensive anti-rationing campaign worked up by the Tory press and urged that the Canadian promises of additional wheat exports to Britain should serve as an excuse for dropping an admittedly unpopular measure. Happily wiser counsels prevailed. Attlee, taking his courage in both hands, insisted that if bread rationing were dropped the government would be defenseless against the charge of a spineless surrender to the bakers' rebellion and would face a devastating loss of prestige.

The inherent weakness in the case for bread rationing lies, of course, in the fact that unless the present scale is reduced, there will be very little saving in bread consumption. Some abnormally large bread consumers, such as miners and agricultural workers who take their midday meal from home in the form of sandwiches, will probably have to make out with fewer loaves. But the average middle-class family's experience suggests that barely two-thirds of the allocated quota of coupons will be expended on bread, leaving an ample margin for cakes and confectionery flour at the normal rate of consumption.

It would, however, be wrong to suppose that the government decided to impose such an unpopular scheme simply for the purpose of impressing America with the sincerity of Britain's professions of maximum austerity in the cause of other starving peoples. Food Minister John Strachey has insisted throughout that his primary motive in rationing is to insure against the possibility either of a poor British harvest or interruption—through labor disputes or the removal of OPA ceilings—in supplies of grain from America. If all goes well he undoubtedly hopes to end bread rationing before the winter, but meanwhile it is essential to have in force a flexible machinery to deal with unforeseen contingencies.

AYLMER VALLANCE is a staff contributor and regular London correspondent for The Nation.

This argument is cogent but difficult to put across to Britain's war-weary housewives, harassed by the necessity of arithmetically working out bread budgets and clipping three different sets of coupons with variable loaf values from ration books.

As it was, the seemingly needless complexities of the proposed system, coupled with the government's inability to prove the absolute inevitability of a future wheat shortage, gave full opportunity to the less responsible elements of the opposition press. Bidding correspondents abroad to file stories depicting luxurious black-market meals and luxury-piled shelves in continental shops, they appealed to the public's basest emotions in an attempt to prove that the government was imposing one more unnecessary control for doctrinaire reasons. Simultaneously, so-called housewives' associations and organizations, some of whose promotors had previously been linked with anti-Semitic, anti-alien agitations, bombarded Parliament with letters and petitions against bread rationing. The culmination of this pressure was the threat by the Association of Master Bakers, representing forty per cent of all bakery employers, to refuse to cooperate in the rationing. The Master Bakers were confident of full support from the Tory Party in this revolt against Parliament. Actually, however, more responsible leaders of the Tory opposition realized that if they gave their blessing to a political strike by bakery employers, they would have a poor case against any future strike by organized labor for political reasons. The influential Yorkshire Post published a solemn warning against unconstitutional action, and in the final Parliamentary debate on rationing Churchill exhorted the bakers to obey the law.

Nevertheless, though the sale of rationed bread began on Monday in orderly fashion, with the public philosophically accepting the nuisance of coupon clipping, anti-rationing agitation provided the keynote for the opposition in three by-elections this week, at Bexley, Pontypool, and North Battersea. In each case the Tory candidate's appeal to the electorate was: "Last year Labor candidates promised you Socialist planning and prosperity. Did you think then that a year hence you would have less bread, less coal, less beer, less fun; that your petrol would still be rationed; and that you would still be subject to a host of war-time restrictions and shortages?" Backed by the mass circulation of the press combines, whose organization and influence the National Union of Journalists has now urged the government to investigate, this campaign attributing all grievances to the government might well have caused a sizable swing in votes.

This, however, has not been borne out by the results. In Pontypool, a Labor stronghold, the drop in the government majority from nineteen to fourteen thousand was due entirely to abstentions of Labor voters in a small poll denoting apathy. The Tory vote was identical to that of last summer. In Bexley, near London, a suburban constituency including a large proportion of lower middle-class electors susceptible to Beaverbrook-Rothermere propaganda, the government majority was reduced from eleven to two thousand, but this again reflected a five thousand drop in the Labor poll. Last summer, it was a three-cornered contest with the Liberal Party polling nearly six thousand votes, the majority of which have probably now been transferred to the Tories; hence, the combined anti-Labor poll was actually no larger than before, even though the Tory vote was greater. Finally, the Labor totals in North Battersea showed a drop of about three thousand votes, representing the loss of some lukewarm supporters. The opposition vote, however, remained static despite the platform circus that was put on by Tory ex-ministers during the closing stages of the campaign.

Taken together, these by-election results support the conclusion that there has been some swing toward the opposition of the unstable, floating vote which Labor gained last summer, but that the government's solid supporters are sufficiently satisfied with the record of the past year to withstand the anti-Labor press campaigns. My Czech friend, living in the capital of a country that is experiencing a remarkable economic and social renaissance under a left government, would probably find a lack of enthusiasm for the government's achievements reflected in the current drop of Labor polls. Admittedly there has been nothing sufficiently revolutionary in the government's program to justify rooting on the political campus. Nevertheless, the electors who voted Labor into power in 1945 appreciate the fact that in one year of office the government has put through an unparalleled program of social legislation, either already enacted or nearing the statute book. The Bank of England and the coal mines have been nationalized. Comprehensive measures establishing social insurance and state medical service will soon be law. After a slow start, municipal construction of houses to let at reasonable rents to working-class tenants is well under way. Demobilization has proceeded smoothly, if slowly, with frictional unemployment below three per cent. Chancellor Dalton has already found it possible to remit some taxes and promises further remissions next April. Finally, thanks to booming exports, Britain's balance of payments is in much better shape than seemed likely a year ago.

It is necessary, however, to note that this week's by-elections were fought on issues exclusively of domestic policy. The question is whether the present qualified endorsement of the government's policy will be reaffirmed one or two years hence when the consequences of Bevinism have begun to impinge more forcibly on the mind of the man in the street. Retrospective examination of twelve months of Labor's foreign policy leads to the regrettable conclusion that with remarkable consistency in every issue, Bevin, with the support of Cabinet right-wingers, is adopting a strategy which will ultimately result in Britain's becoming friendless, powerless, and morally bankrupt. His aims are not consciously evil. Sincerely anxious to preserve the living standards of British workers, he considers that this entails maintaining, first, the inviolability of Britain's control of Middle Eastern oil and the Mediterranean sea route; and secondly, maximum British trade with western Europe, whose purchasing power is vitally dependent on the economic rehabilitation of Germany. From this general proposition, with which the majority of Laborites here would agree, he argues that (1) in the Middle East Britain must counter Russian infiltration by seeking "reliable" Arab support; (2) the Mediterranean must be secured by having in Greece and Spain governments supposedly loyal because they are grateful for British backing; (3) western Germany, at least, must be saved from inclusion in the closed Russian economy by the revival of industry under the management of German elements desirous of trade with the West.

The lamentable results of this policy are already visible. For the sake of Middle Eastern oil Britain is acquiescing in the savage repression of all Greek and Egyptian progressives by semi-fascist regimes and is risking a disastrous and bloody war with the Palestine Jews. In Europe, having antagonized every Russian-inclined country by ineffective interference in the name of "democratic liberty," we are now drifting into enforced reliance in Germany on unpurged Nazis and managements of the big, still-undissolved industrial trusts. Everywhere, instead of seeking, as Socialists, friendship with the workers of all countries, we are wooing, appeasing, leaning on, the worst elements of reactionary landlordism and feudalism.

It is possible that this policy may yield short-term dividends. But the long-term consequences are seen by many Laborite M. P.'s as catastrophic. First, neither the German capitalists nor the feudal leaders of Greece and Arabia can be counted as staunch friends of Britain even if they are capable of resisting their own Russian-inspired working-class forces. Second, the success of Bevinism implies continued American support for British imperialism. But, it is commented here, this is unlikely to be forthcoming in relation to Palestine and is bound ultimately to be forfeited by impending Anglo-American commercial competition and, probably, the inevitable recourse by the British government to every escape clause in the recently concluded loan agreement and consequential trade pact. And last, the full fruits of Bevinist power politics will disintegrate the moral self-respect of the whole British Labor movement. On the present showing, the Foreign Secretary's epitaph is likely to be, "He destroyed Labor's soul and failed to save Britain's oil."

Mexico: Ballots Without Bullets

BY ANITA BRENNER

Mexico City, July 20

ON THE AFTERNOON of July 6, Mexico City pulled down its iron shutters, laid in a stock of food, and bolted its doors, prepared for elections next day. Women and children were warned off the streets and extra troops were moved in as the army got ready to take over. The president had given his word that this time (at last!) elections would be orderly, free, and fair; but among average, non-political people the customary attitude prevailed: "Me? Go out to vote? I'm a peaceable citizen!"

Late that night cordons of jeeps and armored trucks swung out along the deserted avenues. Platoons deployed quietly into the "delicate" spots and squads went to guard each polling-place.

Soon after sunrise the next morning, strings of buses marked Servicio Especial proceeded slowly toward union headquarters, one in each main zone, and there emptied, parked, and stayed parked. Some of the men who got off said that they had been called in for a mammoth Alemán victory parade that night, but that the army had forbidden all demonstrations and it had been cancelled. At Padilla's house correspondents were told that the buses were to take voters with phony credentials en bloc from district to district to roll up Alemán totals. At the munition workers' union, where there was a particularly large concentration, they explained that the bus-drivers' union was providing courtesy transportation service, because everything was so new and voters might have trouble finding their polling places.

The truth was that the bus-loads were shock-troops: ten thousand peasants and union men mobilized and held

ANITA BRENNER, an authority on Mexico, has contributed to The Nation for many years. She has written several books on Mexico, the most recent of which is "The Wind That Swept Mexico: The History of the Mexican Revolution, 1910-1942."

in readiness for—for what? Well, in the first place, there had never been an election that had not deteriorated, early in the day usually, into street fighting. Six years ago in the Ávila Camacho-Almazán contest the police had melted away, and Almazán, had he so chosen, might have stormed the National Palace with his crowds and perhaps taken the government. In the second place, Padilla had been talking quite frankly about impending inevitable violence. A few days before, he had told correspondents that though he was well satisfied with the new electoral law (which follows the outlines of normal democratic suffrage) and pleased that the army would guarantee its peaceful functioning, and though he trusted the President to keep his word that elections would be fair, nevertheless it seemed unlikely things would work out this way because Alemán had the entire government machinery behind him, and nothing but fraud could be expected of the same old gang. He insisted that the masses were filled with civic fervor and would not stand for it, and the country would very likely fall into "grave uneasiness and insecurity."

Caricature by Seligson

President Alemán

Some of us had tips, from other sources, of putsch-plots, which the government was evidently taking seriously. It was our impression—and pretty generally taken for granted—that Padilla had no intention of conceding an Alemán victory under any circumstances, and that he intended to fight, perhaps by the traditional method of setting up a rump Congress somewhere, by the other traditional method of an uprising, or perhaps by a sergeants' revolt with air-force support. He clearly expected United States sympathy and backing, and said in several interviews that he felt it necessary and proper for other American governments to intervene by refusing to recognize a regime established under suspicion of force—the Wilsonian doctrine of "orderly process," which is dynamite in Mexico and not much cherished in any Latin American country.

The electoral line-up was:

Miguel Alemán. Backed by the government party and a coalition of other parties, including all the unions plus leading business men and intellectuals. His strength: a job of organization such as had never been seen before, and personal popularity. His weakness: endorsement by the "status quo" groups, as well as by prominent left-wingers.

Ezequiel Padilla. Backed by a curious combination of "outs," including many government employees, in a party called the Partido Democrático Mexicano, holding Tory opinions. His strength: leader of opposition feeling. His weakness: slipshod organization, too many semi-fascists in his train (including the discredited Dorados), and the widespread notion that he was the United States candidate.

General Augustín Castro. Backed mostly by personal followers. His strength: anti-government sentiment and personal popularity. His weakness: the impression that he was stooging for Alemán.

General Enrique Calderón. Also backed by personal friends. His strength: anti-government sentiment. His weakness: not much of a record in public life.

The other parties in the field, Accion Nacional and Fuerza Popular (official name of the Sinarquistas), are both strongly anti-government and strongly Catholic in make-up. However, Manuel Gomez Morín, Accion Nacional leader, follows the Rerum Novarum, social-reform line of Catholic thinking, while the Sinarquistas flatly repudiate the Mexican Revolution and all its works. Accion Nacional tried to launch a coalition-opposition candidate —somebody picked from among the old revolutionaries —but its choice, Luis Cabrera, declined. Both Accion Nacional and the Sinarquistas then shrewdly refrained from the presidential contest and threw all their strength into the Congressional elections.

The campaign developed into an Alemán- Padilla race, with the complex Congressional struggles much in the background. The presidential candidates ran sharply dissimilar campaigns. Alemán's mass meetings followed the fiesta pattern: girls, music, flowers. On the next day he would hold an industrial or economic forum, conducted much like a seminar, implying that his main interest would be to bring, through increased production, the cost of living down, the standard of living up.

Nearly everywhere, governors, deputies, old revolutionaries, unions, peasant leagues, and chambers of commerce were so solidly and confidently riding this bandwagon that the Alemán committee could afford to push, as it did, the electoral-reform law and every other method of guaranteeing democratic suffrage. Their machine was such that they had scarcely more need for violent means to victory than, say, the Democrats in Texas. They were obviously, because of the underlying national sullenness over inflation, shaping their strategy by the knowledge that their government would be more tenable, more stable, and much better able to perform on its large promises, if it came to power down a broad new highway of popular suffrage, under no dubious shadow of strong-arm stuff.

Padilla, on the other hand, campaigned like an apostle. His followers supplied overtones of martyrdom, crying out often that they were being threatened, persecuted, and hounded. They offered no specific evidence of this, but their campaign was tough sledding because wherever Padilla went he had to buck union boycotts—no transportation, closed restaurants, failure of electric current, and so forth. His crowds, considerably smaller, were given no fiestas. They were keyed up to a sacrificial, defiant mood. The women wept and the men yelled in desperate fury. Above them the benign, faintly clerical figure of Padilla eloquently described their misery, emphasizing the graft and corruption that coined millions out of their hunger, warning them of the Red Menace, and accusing union leaders and government bigwigs as their exploiters. He offered "democracy" as the remedy for all this and invoked God.

Such crowds, whipped to an hysterical pitch on election day by an incident, might easily proceed (with clubs and a few tommyguns concealed in cars, and a banner of the Virgin of Guadalupe ahead) to—maybe more than riots, much more. Considering the dreadful gap between what most of Mexico earns and what it now costs to eat, Padilla might, after all, set off a blaze that had nothing to do with who should be president.

Some of us felt, when we started out early election morning, that perhaps the army ought to have lent us jeeps, or at least helmets and steel vests. We soon found that our press arm-bands allowed us free entry everywhere: past the mask-faced Indian soldiers into the polls, behind the official tables if we liked, to police headquarters, to the Red Cross, into the Electoral Vigilance Board. We moved around as we pleased all day, and between us—all the foreign press and a host of Mexican reporters—we covered the city pretty thoroughly, finding everywhere the same picture: long lines of citizens queued up to vote, waiting with extraordinarily cheerful patience and rather proud of the quiet Sunday manner in which Mexico was at last performing its civic duties.

The polling places were primitive affairs: long tables or counters, with watchers of every party around, and soldiers watching grimly for any sign of disturbance or coercion. Most voters marked their ballots quite in the open, so it was possible for any watcher, or any reporter, to tally. It was going as one might expect: in the richer districts, a close race, impossible to forecast totals; in the workers' districts, Alemán way ahead. We all noted a heavy split vote; Accion Nacional was getting Congressional votes on both Alemán and Padilla ballots, thus forecasting a brand new prospect in Mexican politics—real opposition in Congress.

By mid-afternoon the city began to look like any Sunday; boys and girls going to the movies, children out buying balloons. There was a queer look on many faces, a suppressed and skeptical delight. The voters' queues were still blocks long, perhaps longer now. The turn-out, patently, was much bigger than the electoral machinery could handle, so that many voters stood all day and some all night, and voting was still going on late next day. This was stretching the law, but, in view of the circumstances—and inasmuch as the opposition had charged that the slowness was a maneuver to blockade the polls with early-rising Alemanistas—it was doubtless the only safe and reasonable thing to do. Several of us went out of our way to track down reports of fraud and violence given out at Padilla headquarters. But at the addresses where we had been told Padilla watchers had been driven away, we found these gentlemen at their posts, wearily eating sandwiches.

Late that night three of us wedged past the crowd, the soldiers, and the piled-up boxes on which the soldiers were sitting, into the central board. We had been told that ballot boxes all over the city were being hijacked, with military and police connivance. We found about half the boxes in, and more coming steadily with armed escort and in custody of all watchers. Some were being opened and counted inside because, the counters told us, they had felt a little "unsafe" about performing this delicate operation at the polls. Complaints were coming into all party headquarters—including Alemán's—that in many zones military commanders had seized the boxes and locked them up under guard. Hijacked boxes turned out to be the principal complaint afterwards, and the courts may now have to listen to thousands of suits in order to find out where it was a case of military woodenheadedness, where it was over-enthusiastic rough stuff on the part of the local bosses, and where it was sheer mechanical confusion, due to the newness of the whole procedure.

The first national reports, on the following day, accurately forecast the final results: first, the astounding news, no violence; second, in the industrial centers, the same picture as in the capital—a close race, pointing to a heavy protest vote aimed, evidently, at the unions, or maybe specifically at Toledano and his group; third, in the rural districts—where the great majority of the vote was cast—a big Alemán lead, but in those where Sinarquistas are numerous, a heavy split vote, with probable Congressional representation for either Accion Nacional or the Sinarquistas themselves. The total count, arrived at over a week later, gives Alemán close to two million and Padilla about half a million, and so far shows three opposition winners in Congress. The count won't be official until September, when the Chamber of Deputies meets as an electoral college and, independently of the courts, attempts to unravel the districts and zones in dispute, perhaps increasing the opposition representation.

Meanwhile, all three of the leading opposition parties are charging fraud. Padilla claims wholesale fraud and calls for popular action; and though his predicted uprisings do not now seem likely, his followers are a latent, potent source of anti-Red, anti-union, anti-government violence. The other two oppositions carefully disassociate themselves from the Padilla position. They are sticking to legal procedures, pushing only specific claims. They also repudiate rather vehemently the idea of action by a foreign government. "That," Accion Nacional's Gomez Morín told this correspondent, "is intervention. I personally would hate to be called upon to decide on the legality of an election, say, in some part of the United States. No, our way—teaching the people the meaning of law—is slower at the start but faster in the end. Next time. . . ."

Small-Town America

BY ALDEN STEVENS

V. Los Alamos, New Mexico

ON A 7,000-foot mesa between deep canyons honeycombed with prehistoric cliff dwellings, in a land of ancient ways and ancient people, is the most important small town in America.

Here is the birthplace of a new world. Here have gathered not only the brains of this new world but its conscience—for only those who created it are able to comprehend it fully and understand their responsibility toward it. They have touched the lives of every one on earth.

In the autumn of 1942 Los Alamos was an exclusive ranch school. The next spring it was even more exclusive, for it was becoming the best-equipped nuclear-physics laboratory in the world and was scheduled to be the cradle of the atomic bomb.

To reach Los Alamos you descend from Santa Fe through hot, sandy land and cross the Rio Grande at the sleepy Spanish-American town of Espanola. The new blacktop road twists and winds past the brown adobe houses of the ancient Indian pueblo of Santa Clara, famous for black pottery and beautiful ceremonial dancing. The road runs parallel with the river, dipping sharply into dry stream beds and rising with equal sharpness on the far sides. To the east the cottonwood and Indian-tilled fields make a green strip along the river. Now you begin to climb on a shelf-road up the canyon wall to the Pajarito Plateau, a gently sloping mesa backed by the high, green Jemez Mountains.

At the guarded outer gate your passes are minutely examined and your car carefully checked. The piney perfume of piñon, the cedar-sweet juniper odor, and the spicy smell of sage dominate even after you enter the town. They have not succumbed to the new odors of gasoline, whirling volcanic dust, and sweating humanity.

Stretching over the mesa from the original congested center of the project—where dark-green, plainly-rectangular, four-apartment buildings huddle beam to beam with administration buildings and barracks—are the shopping center, theaters, fire station, and more housing units. The asphalt and gravel streets of Los Alamos plunge down crazy slopes, wind among the houses and the tall pines, intersect with no apparent design. Zooming jeeps, heavy trucks, and passenger cars fill the narrow roads. The immense car and truck pools, the jammed-together buildings, the whirling dust all give a first impression of bustle and confusion.

Los Alamos is a living monument to Franklin D. Roosevelt. No one but he could have shouldered the responsibility for the decision to set up this enormous organization and the two even larger plants at Hanford and Oak Ridge, that fed it with raw material.

Once the decision had been made, Major General Leslie R. Groves and the army did a herculean job of expediting the work and (possibly an even more difficult job) of keeping it secret. They were completely successful. The scientists lacked nothing they needed, and they got whatever they wanted fast. And the secrecy was maintained.

We had dinner with several members of the Association of Los Alamos Scientists. Dr. Willard Stout, a broad, quiet young physicist, told us of a fifteen-minute weekly radio program on Albuquerque's KOB, recorded for the use of other stations as well, on which he had spoken. ALAS also publishes a weekly newsletter, and one member is technical consultant on an atomic bomb film now being made in Hollywood. Afterwards we went to Dr. Stout's cubicle in one of the log school buildings, once a schoolboy's room, and talked. We mentioned that the town seemed completely unplanned.

"How could it be planned?" Dr. David Hawkins, the blond, curly-haired historian of the project, asked. "Even Dr. J. Robert Oppenheimer, the director, had no idea at first how large it would be—he thought maybe 300 people would be enough. There are about 7,000 here now. It always grew much faster than anyone could anticipate. It doubled, tripled, quadrupled before anyone could figure out what was happening."

Stout and Lester Guttman, a brilliant little black-haired boy with owlish eyes who has been doing vital work at Los Alamos since the earliest days, told us how every day more scientists, more technicians, more machinists were brought in. The army men found housing and set it up wherever they could—fast. In addition to the ten log-and-stone houses of the school (known now as "bathtub row" because there are only showers elsewhere) and the army-designed apartment houses, there are square hutments, round-roofed Quonset huts, TVA-type prefabricated houses, and some fifteen other kinds of living quarters, including barracks and a large variety of government and privately-owned trailers. The desperate urgency of the work, which for two years meant no day off but Christmas, gave no time for community planning.

The army built Los Alamos and, with the aid of the purely advisory town council, the army runs it. This town council, elected every six months, was most revealing to some of the scientific personnel who served on it.

"We were all individualists," Stout told us. "Most of us had lived in big cities where we didn't have to worry about traffic control or sewage disposal or sidewalks. Here we were thrown together in an isolated little community—mixed with two or three thousand GI's, hard-boiled machinists from Detroit and Chicago, and a lot of local Spanish-American labor. We had to figure out how to make the town function. It was a real microcosm, and in a small way it taught us all something about how the world solves its problems."

Stout and Guttman are both leaving Los Alamos soon for jobs at the University of Chicago. But they both feel strongly that the isolation of the atom-bomb town had formed permanent friendships and associations. They had to find everything within themselves. They had to be concerned with schools and church services. For recreation they produced plays as a little theatre group, and they sang as a choral society. When babies were born or mothers were ill, other women always helped out. They took care of each other's babies and bought each other's groceries. The women's auxiliary of ALAS does typing and letter-writing because the men are too busy. The spirit of cooperation is very strong.

The strict security measures, which successfully kept the great secret, called for monitored phone calls and censored mail. Yet within the necessary limits old settlers say the town is a democratic one. The army-run cafeterias, supermarket, beauty shop, barber shop, and two theatres are open to all and all stand in line. There are no exclusive shops or clubs. Signs on many buildings are in both English and Spanish.

"There was a democracy of obligation," Assistant Director E. J. Demson told us. "The workers felt the job they were doing was extremely important to their friends and relatives in uniform, even when they didn't know what it was. There was mutual respect between the top brains and the top skills. Scientists and machinists would sit on nail kegs and work out problems together. There were misfits and there were arguments, of course. We worked closely with the shop grievance committees."

The list of scientific workers includes almost every important name in nuclear physics—Oppenheimer, Fermi, and Bohr merely begin the roll. "For a long time," David Hawkins recalled, "no one was really sure the bomb would work. In fact, the scientists had a pool on the amount of energy that would result from the New Mexico test. Some of the guesses were zero."

Since the bomb has been proven, their first concern has been with the control of atomic power to maintain peace. Atomic research has done something more than open a fresh and broad frontier for science: it has brought scientists into world politics.

For these young men (the average age of Los Alamos scientists is less than thirty) are perfectly conscious of what they have brought about, they are more aware of it than anyone else. In long night sessions they have hashed it over and seen it as a new problem which must be solved by new means. Most of them believe that world government will come eventually, but that the bomb exists now, and some workable scheme of international control must be effected immediately. They regard the Acheson proposals for technical safeguards, ownership of raw-material sources and production plants by an international authority, and licensing of "denatured" material for "safe" activities only, as the most promising interim approach. In fact, the presence of Dr. Oppenheimer on the board of consultants which prepared the report upon which Acheson's proposals were founded suggests that these ideas may have originated in Los Alamos.

A complete revision of the world is not something even a nuclear physicist undertakes every day. And this artificial little town of Los Alamos, where more brains were assembled than have ever before worked in such close quarters on such a vital project, has bound these families together indissolubly. For the bomb was no one man's work—it was the work of the town. And these people can laugh together over the few Los Alamos prima donnas, they can think grimly about the endless, grinding days and nights without rest, they can recall the tense moments before the first test, and they can take satisfaction in the fact that their work together at Los Alamos helped bring a swifter end to the war and saved many American lives.

The little town on the Pajarito Plateau has time now to build permanent houses, to put in a more reliable water supply, to build a broader and shorter highway to Santa Fe. It will be a calmer and more settled place than the one these men knew. But it will always be the town that changed everything, the town that invented and fabricated the atomic bomb, the town that taught individualistic scientists to work together and to take an active part in the management of the world.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

King Cotton in a Balloon

TEN YEARS ago old King Cotton was sitting on a very shaky throne and his days as autocratic ruler of the South seemed to be numbered. But the war has restored his prestige, his revenues, and the confidence of his followers who, rejoicing in the return of a prosperity which they thought had gone forever, have embarked on a speculative spree with little thought of what tomorrow may bring.

Few commodities have risen more in price since the war started than cotton. It has never been subjected to ceilings, for every effort by OPA to fix the price was strenuously and successfully resisted by the powerful cotton bloc in Congress. Even attempts to check speculation in cotton by an order compelling traders to put up larger margins were bitterly opposed, although margin trading in securities has been banned altogether. So cotton prices soared from an average of 14 cents a pound in 1941 to almost 30 cents on June 28.

The lapse of OPA provided a fresh stimulus for, although that did not change the market status of cotton itself, it made possible increased prices for cotton goods and so encouraged manufacturers to bid up the price of the raw material. On July 19 the spot quotation touched 36 cents a pound, a 23-year high, and the friends of cotton started talking it up to 50 cents—a level not reached even in the 1920 inflation. Since then, however, some of this enthusiasm has evaporated, as a wave of selling struck the over-extended market, pulling prices back to 32.20 cents on July 27. Such swift fluctuations are characteristic of a boom period, and we have not yet seen the high-water mark.

The speculative pace has proved rather alarming to the manufacturing interests who fear they may become the targets of public wrath when they adjust their prices to the higher cost of raw cotton. "In the event that OPA is not revived," wrote the Journal of Commerce on July 16, "and the public is forced to pay what it may regard as excessive prices for its textiles, the blame for this will properly be handed to the raw cotton speculator." Actually there hasn't been much hesitation to adjust quotations on a wide range of cloths upwards during the past four weeks. A list on my desk shows that the most modest advance over OPA ceilings has been one of 9 per cent in denims, the greatest one of 18 to 25 per cent in cotton blankets. And there are numerous examples of increases ranging from 10 to 20 per cent. Now that OPA is reestablished cloth manufacturers and finishers are beginning to worry about possible roll-backs. They want the higher prices they have set confirmed and hint that if attempts are made to enforce lower ceilings goods will be withdrawn from the market. In the campaign against OPA the textile interests have been prominent from the first despite the fact that ceilings have not hindered them from making a brilliant profit record.

With or without OPA it seems to me that everyone connected with cotton, from the planter to the retailer, would, if far-sighted, do his utmost to dampen down the current boom. For if most of the short-term factors in the situation are bullish, the long-term prospects for this fiber are far from favorable. The current shortage on which the upward movement of prices has been based is local rather than universal. The 1945 United States cotton crop was small and this year's is not expected to be much larger. It will, in fact, be insufficient to meet the requirements of domestic spinners, not to mention a rising export demand. Thus stocks which have been reduced by 3½ million bales in the last year to 8,659,000, will be pulled down still further.

That is the cheerful side of the picture from the speculators' point of view but it is not the whole story. According to the Wall Street Journal of July 7 total world supplies of raw cotton on August 1, 1946, will stand at 48 million bales. This is equal to two years' supply at the current rate of consumption. True, the world has been starved of textiles for years and consumption may expand as war-damaged mills are restored and workers demobilized. But high prices bear hard on the Asiatic and African buyers of textiles, who make up an important part of the world market and, at the same time, they encourage the extension of cotton acreage in such countries as Brazil. A year hence the statistical situation may be far less favorable than now, even though American mills continue to devour material at their present record rate. And a sudden decline in the American appetite for textiles cannot be ruled out. Look what happened in 1920! At the beginning of that year wide print cloths, a typical product, sold at 21 cents a yard; at the end they were quoted at eight cents after reaching a high of 26 cents in between. The corresponding course of spot cotton prices was: Opening, 39.25 cents; high, 43.75; low, 14.50; close, 14.75. That summary ought to remind King Cotton that balloons can fall as well as rise.

In the past fifteen years, domestic prices for American cotton have been artificially sustained, but the result has been the loss of a large part of the foreign market to countries which could produce at lower costs. Now the home market is threatened by a competitor not susceptible to tariff treatment—synthetic fiber. Constant research is making rayon an increasingly flexible raw material and it is encroaching on the domain of cotton at many different points. On July 10, H. Gordon Smith, vice-president of the United States Rubber Company, told a meeting that at current prices rayon was more economical for tire cord than cotton. In fact, about fifty per cent of the tires being made are using rayon and the only reason the percentage is not larger is the inadequate supply of high-tenacity rayon yarn. But production is rapidly rising. In 1945 rayon output totalled 792 pounds and today an annual production rate of 850 million pounds, equivalent to 1.7 million bales of cotton, has been achieved.

If King Cotton is to meet successfully competition of this caliber, his courtiers had better stop worrying about how to keep prices up and do more hard thinking about getting costs down. The means by which this can be done are known: in parts of Texas mechanized plantations are already producing at six to seven cents a pound. But the general application of these means requires modernization of the whole social structure of the south.

KEITH HUTCHISON

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Death of the Sheriff

"forsitan et Priami fuerint quae fata, requiras?"

I

NOLI ME TANGERE

We park and stare. A full sky of the stars
Wheels from the pumpkin setting of the moon
And sparks the windows of the yellow farm
Where the red-flannelled madmen look through bars
At windmills thrashing snowflakes by an arm
Of the Atlantic. Soon
The undertaker who collects antiques
Will let his motor idle at the door
And set his pine-box on the parlor floor.
Our homicidal sheriff howled for weeks;

We kiss. The State had reasons: on the whole,
It acted out of kindness when it locked
Its servant in this place and had him watched
Until an ordered darkness left his soul
A tabula rasa; when the Angel knocked
The sheriff laid his notched
Revolver on the table for the guest.
Night draws us closer in its bearskin wrap
And our loved sightless smother feels the tap
Of the blind stars descending to the west

To lay the Devil in the pit our hands
Are draining like a windmill. Who'll atone
For the unsearchable quicksilver heart
Where spiders stare their eyes out at their own
Spitting and knotted likeness? We must start:
Our aunt, his mother, stands
Singing O Rock of Ages, as the light
Wanderers show a man with a white cane
Who comes to take the coffin in his wain,
The thirsty Dipper on the arc of night.

II

THE PORTRAIT

The whiskey circulates, until I smash
The candelabrum from the mantel-top,
And scorch Poseidon on the panel where
He forks the blocks of Troy into the air.
A chipmunk shucks the strychnine in a cup;
The popping pine-cones flash
Like shore-bait on his face in oils. My bile
Rises, and beads of perspiration swell
To flies and splash the Parmachenie Belle
That I am scraping with my uncle's file.

I try the barb upon a pencilled line
Of Vergil. Nothing underneath the sun
Has bettered, Uncle, since the scaffolds flamed
On butchered Troy until Aeneas shamed
White Helen on her hams by Vesta's shrine . . .
All that the Greeks have won
I'll cancel with a sidestroke of my sword;
Now I can let my father, wife and son
Banquet Apollo for Laomedon:
Helen will satiate the fire, my Lord.

I search the starlight . . . Helen will appear,
Pura per noctem in luce . . . I am chilled,
I drop the barbless fly into my purse
Beside his nickel shield. It is God's curse,
God's, that has purpled Lucifer with fear
And burning. God has willed;
I lift the window. Digging has begun,
The hill road sparkles, and the mourners' cars
Wheel with the whited sepulchres of stars
To light the worldly dead-march of the sun.

ROBERT LOWELL

Neo-Pagan in the Forties

THE CONDEMNED PLAYGROUND—ESSAYS: 1927-1944. Cyril Connolly. Macmillan. $2.75.

DURING his last chapel at Eton, Cyril Connolly did not bow his head at the creed, and the autobiographical "Enemies of Promise" reveals that during the leaving hymn he read, as usual, from his choice edition of Petronius Arbiter bound in black crushed levant. Connolly the Irish romantic, the neo-pagan, has remained a literary epicure with an exquisite taste for sophisticate Romans and the French. After Balliol he escaped into the hot south of France and there settled his debt with the nineteen-twenties by depositing residues of a "deepening passion for low life" in a "Mediterranean" novel, "The Rock Pool," with its character of the Pernod addict Naylor. Presently Angst set in—sloth, boredom, tears in the eyes in the morning—with those insistent frustrations lamented in "The Unquiet Grave" causing Connolly to feel that, like Virgil's Palinurus, he might resign the struggle, that he lacked the herd instinct, that there might be something vulgar in success. Besides, he was approaching forty. Yet he could still "concentrate on his vocabulary," arranging his opinions into classical simplicities. His vocation could still be Art.

Then the blitz ravaged Chelsea, the literary scene of the nineteen-thirties. Art itself seemed to be a condemned playground. In this retrospective collection of thirty-seven fragmentary reviews, parodies, and occasional pieces Connolly looks wistfully backward from 1944 to 1927 over his period of "ebullience, mediocrity, frivolity, and talent" and detects "the dawn of a social conscience" in himself about 1935 while he was reviewing a life of Lord Knebworth, whose abilities were perverted by the stupidity of the governing class. In the following year Connolly is reporting the situation in Barcelona, and by 1943 he is dreading that statism in the new Europe may continue to thwart Art.

In this collection the early criticisms of Joyce and Gide, and even those of Rimbaud and Mann written in the "decadent" thirties, are talented; the parodies on the novel are ebullient; and in the controversy over Housman's poetry Connolly comes off very well indeed. His taste for the French and Romans always sets him a cosmopolitan standard. But even under a concession of frivolity he did not need to exhume mannerisms like his journal for 1927, when he was "just twenty-four and dangerously happy" and "had a perfect moment as the boat moved out" for Dunkirk. Connolly, the critic as artist, is often at confessional. He once defined imagination as nostalgia for the past, and is so tolerant of Permanent Adolescence that his interpretations are occasionally second springs, returns upon Eton and salad days in the Midi, elegiac offerings to the Great God Peter Pan.

His facility in the pensée, his depressions, his raptures are, like Bunthorne's, a little yallery-greenery: "I am," he intimates while speaking of the "treacherous" air of Firbank's novels, "secretly a lyricist; the works to which I lose my heart are those that attempt, with a purity and a kind of dewy elegance, to portray the beauty of the moment, the gaiety and sadness, the fugitive distress of hedonism." This was written in 1936. With hedonist acumen he identifies "the strange, bitter-sweet intensity emerging from Sterne's most artificial sentences that forms his particular signature." Connolly admires the urbanity of Chesterfield and Pope, who serve as "the second line of defence of paganism" (Rochester, Horace, Catullus, Martial being the shock troops). Because he lacks the essential toughness of Pope or Chesterfield, he often appears le dernier des délicats lineal from the '90's—and from Housman. Paradoxically, one of his most lapidary essays exposes beneath the "classicism" of Housman's verse a cyrenaicism "hopelessly romantic and sentimental." At times Connolly himself looks oddly like a Shropshire lad among critics: "Only by giving the whole of myself to the moment can I make it give its best to me . . . Life has no moral, and the moral of art is that life is worth while without one." Thus he indulges what he calls his envie for Paris, the Midi, the blossoming Can-Can, the "arranged world" of Toulouse-Lautrec.

The blitz has imperfectly transformed the journalizing neo-pagan into the journalizing intellectual with a creed that "all occupations which do not serve the greatness of the intellect are so much waste of time." As intellectual, Connolly is fully aware of being "post-war, post-Freud, post-Einstein, post-twentieth century." He considers as impartially as Matthew Arnold how for a century English literature has been provincial and trivial compared with French. He had already seen that Baudelaire and Rimbaud, a "spiritual Dillinger," signified the failure of romanticism; now he admits the irresponsibility of genius in Joyce and Proust. Connolly understands that we have cracked up.

Yet he has not the suppressed tragic valuations of Scott Fitzgerald, for example—rather, a continuing uneasy sense that he is what he called Gide: a spiritual hybrid "haunted by a conviction of exile" wasting itself in sensationalism. The intellectual and artist remain for him "a kind of life-giving parasite," not "politically minded" even under a new social order. Connolly's view as critic and as editor of Horizon is that of "the right left people," unhappily "smart." He maintains that socialism will not do because materialism "does nothing for the spiritual life of humanity," and a few pages later that "the most sensible cure for materialism is a surfeit of it." His accounts of revolutions in Athens and Spain, although he presumes his attitude toward them so different, both have an irony that appears unconscious—an impersonal irony of reportage.

The irony regarding Connolly the intellectual is his incomprehension that revolution, or the possibility of revolution, has occurred. On a spring evening he walks through blitzed Chelsea with gentle regret that "here the life that has vanished . . . was of some consequence; here there existed a fine appreciation of books and pictures, and many quiet work-rooms for the people who made them. Here was one of the last strongholds of the cultivated haute bourgeoisie." For him, Art flourishes in these strongholds; not only the great official authors and epicures, but "the wild and exquisitely gifted young writers who come to an untimely end through passion." Sometimes among the cultivated haute bourgeoisie "at great garden parties, literary luncheons, or in the quiet of an exclusive gunroom, a laugh rings out. The sad, formal faces for a moment relax and a smaller group is formed within the larger. They are admirers of Dornford Yates who have found out each other." If this miscellany represents his development, it is evidently going to take more than revolution to exclude Mr. Connolly from the playground, from the pagan rock pool. WYLIE SYPHER

An antidote to DECLINE OF THE WEST

THE Future in Perspective

by Sigmund Neumann

This lively, brilliant—and hopeful—book will do much to counteract the cynicism and despair that are likely to be war's aftermath. In it an eminent European scholar makes clear through a vivid examination of the recent past what we may justifiably hope to achieve in the future.

Illustrated with drawings of famous statesmen by Derso, world-famous caricaturist.

At all bookstores • $4.00

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS
2 WEST 45th STREET NEW YORK 19

Here Lies TNEC

THE CONCENTRATION OF ECONOMIC POWER. By David Lynch. Columbia University Press. $5.50.

THIS is a friendly warning to those anxiously waiting for an up-to-date analytical study of the rise of big business before the war, its speeded growth during the war, and its alarming further gains in reconversion: David Lynch's studious book will tell them little about concentration of economic power. If the catchy title entices them to pay the price it will not gain them admission to a panorama of monopoly on the march. They will find, instead, that it is the price of admission to a monumental sepulcher wherein Mr. Lynch performs an artful autopsy on the Temporary National Economic Committee (TNEC), a body political no less than economic, dead five years, its ambitious career largely unfulfilled.

The TNEC did start out as an investigation of monopolistic big business. It was created by Congress in 1938, mainly in response to President Roosevelt's monopoly message. Economic concentration was to be its main theme. But as the mountainous record of its hearings piled up to thirty-seven volumes, capped by forty-three special monographs, that theme somehow slipped out of focus. The accumulation of facts piled into its record proved too vast to be related into a significant sequence by the committee's decentralized staff. As the scope of its inquiry met no bounds, the committee's interest became diffused. And most important of all, perhaps, its purpose was confounded by the hybrid make-up of the committee itself, composed as it was of the members of the Senate, the House, and the executive agencies.

The useful service David Lynch has rendered in his summary and appraisal of TNEC will be cherished by many. His book is more than a ready guide to the unwieldy, and therefore neglected, five-foot shelf of significant statistics which TNEC culled mostly from previously published sources. The needed guide that he does provide is prefaced by a well-woven background of the committee's origins, the changing cast of its characters, and a sketch of the growing public recognition of the forces stifling competition in the upper and the nether strata of finance, industry, and trade. His study ends with a nostalgic postlude—an appraisal of TNEC's wasted opportunity.

TNEC was the biggest investigation ever undertaken by our government. It set out to study "concentration of economic power." Yet it never even attempted to find out what concentration was and how it should be measured. "The question whether concentration is inevitable, beneficial, and desirable from the standpoint of productive efficiency and the use of modern technology went quite unexplored," runs the Lynch indictment. "Little attention was given to its effect upon economic, social, and political life, and in particular upon the distribution of income, the mechanism of investment, the stratification of social classes, and the stability of democratic institutions." A few of TNEC's efforts did bring results: some monopoly prices were reduced, some patent restrictions removed. But the TNEC ended, Lynch concludes, "as it began—as a fruitless quest for a panacea." Averse to surgery, what its composite mind really sought was a home remedy which would cure all our economic ills and yet preserve a complete status quo in the organization of our economic society.

The Council of Economic Advisors under the (formerly Full) Employment Act of 1946 is about to be appointed. Whatever recommendations this council might formulate will be reshaped for adoption by another joint Congressional committee, not altogether unlike TNEC. The new post-war agency must not repeat the multiple failures of its pre-war precursor, forcefully brought out in Lynch's timely study. It must not be allowed to shy away from its real task of reaching the source of failure in the power-drive of our peacetime economic engine. It must not be permitted to content itself, as TNEC did, with designing better mousetraps for bigger monopolies.

BORIS SHISHKIN

H. G. WELLS— Prophet of the Atomic Bomb

Read his latest book:

"CRUX ANSATA — An Indictment of the Roman Catholic Church."

A historical summary of the Catholic Church's political intrigues leading to its tie-up with the Nazi-Fascist-Shinto Axis. Cloth Binding $1.75

Also get a copy of

"BEHIND THE DICTATORS," by L. H. Lehmann.

A fully documented analysis of Vatican-Fascist collaboration. Cloth Binding $1.75

COMBINATION OFFER — Both Cloth Bound Books $3.00

New Pamphlet

"VATICAN POLICY IN THE SECOND WORLD WAR"

48 pages of Documented Facts . . . . . 25¢

Free to those who return this ad with their order for the above books

Order From:

AGORA PUBLISHING CO., Dept. 851

229 WEST 48TH STREET NEW YORK 19, N. Y.

BRIEFER COMMENT

Dialectic of Love

THE UNEVEN QUALITY OF GENIUS, even very great genius, is already familiar to us from Dostoevski, whose support of Tsarism was both infantile and barbaric; and Kierkegaard, who was in actual life an intransigent and thoroughly blind reactionary, provides another illustration. Nevertheless, the doctrine expounded in his "Works of Love" (Princeton University Press, $3.75) could have formed the basis, as Douglas Steere points out in an excellent introduction, of a much wiser and more Christian social philosophy. The task of Christian love, Kierkegaard holds, is to permeate the whole social body until the injustices and abuses of power wither away: thus Christianity helped abolish slavery from ancient society not by proclaiming revolution but by reconciling master with slave until the old relation, in its human aspect itself, became superseded and impossible. The trouble, however, with this view is that spirit must make use of body, and Christian love, if it forsakes the instrumentalities of politics, will sooner or later find itself pronouncing benediction over the putrefaction of what is. The committed Christian ought to put himself occasionally in the position of having to cut off a head—and in the name of Love itself.

A series of homilies on the various New Testament injunctions to "love thy neighbor as thyself," this is perhaps the most traditionally Christian of all Kierkegaard's books, and the reader who is looking for his distinctive philosophic and existential message will find little of it here. But page after page is incandescent with the author's habitual brilliance and passion of statement; Kierkegaard's strength is never in the range, structure, or development of his ideas, but in the intensity of experience and irony he is able to concentrate on isolated particular points; which is not only the quality of his literary genius, but the real secret of his philosophic message.

However, the injunction to "love thy neighbor as thyself" has dialectical difficulties which Kierkegaard does not explore. He lays great weight upon the "as thyself," but fails to consider that my attitude toward myself can hardly be described simply as one of "love." I am chained to this self, it is the object of my care and anxieties, but also of my contempt, hatred, and impatience; and I doubt very much whether my neighbor would want to be saddled with all this complex burden of attitudes. I, for my part, would not care to carry the burden of his. Significantly, the Old Testament, in its Jewish wisdom, commands only to treat your neighbor justly and let him alone. Maybe that is enough.

WILLIAM BARRETT

The Works and Days of William Wilde

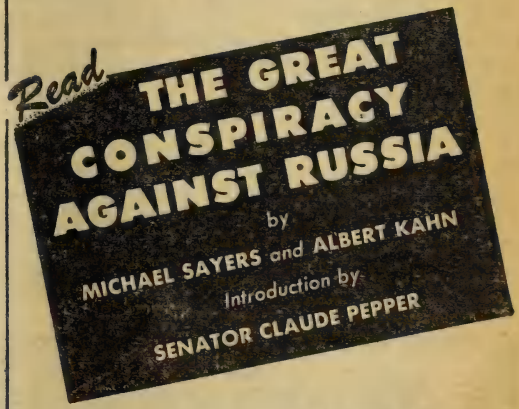
SIR WILLIAM WILDE seems to have been a brainy, homely, energetic little man, with a passion for exact science and an appetite for loose women. To the average layman, the doctor's latter pursuits are more interesting than his researches in otology, ophthalmology, and archaeology. T. G. Wilson's terse and sober biography ("Victorian Doctor," L. B. Fischer, $3.50) most properly puts the major emphasis on Dr. Wilde's professional career, without either looking down the nose at the scandals nor dismissing them as insignificant and irrelevant. He manages, by virtue of his sincerity and directness, to convince the reader that Sir William was an important figure in the history of Irish medicine, to say nothing of his avocational findings in Irish archaeology; but for all his earnestness and good will, most people will be inclined to remember his subject as the husband of "Speranza," the lover of God knows who all, and as the father of Oscar, than as the inventor of the Wilde aural snare.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

FOR THE ANSWER TO THE QUESTION

Who wants war with Russia?

The documented, hair-raising story of a small powerful group of international war makers. Their activities made World War II inevitable. Their continuing intrigues may destroy civilization.



★ "More fascinating than fiction and yet...documented and indisputable."
—Prof. Frederick L. Schuman of Williams College

★ "Documented evidence of intrigue and terror.... Reads like an E. Phillips Oppenheim thriller."
—Newsweek

★ "The excitement of this narrative should not overshadow its serious contribution."
—New York Herald Tribune

51,000 copies already sold!

Now $1.00 AT YOUR BOOKSELLER OR MAIL THE COUPON

BONI ▪ GAER 15 East 40th St., N. Y. 16, N. Y.

Send me_____copies of THE GREAT CONSPIRACY at $1.00 each.

I enclose $_____

NAME_____

ADDRESS_____

CITY_____ STATE_____

N8

FICTION IN REVIEW

IN the writing career of Howard Fast we trace the unusually rapid decline of a pleasant fictional talent into dull political servitude. Of the five novels Mr. Fast has published in the last four years (the muse of propaganda is strangely lavish!), I have read all but one. They show his eye to have been ever more tightly shutting itself to the kind of truth with which fiction is properly concerned, his heart increasingly hardening under the strain of pumping such a steady stream of practical benevolences, until now with "The American: A Middle Western Legend" (Duell, Sloan and Pearce, $3) all that remains of any original creative gift is some kind of crude energy of intention, a shallow but complex urge to pedagogic power. Mr. Fast has come of literary age in a period in which to be a radical or even a liberal is to feel no need to smile when one says patriotism. He concentrates upon the American past—it is the material of all his books—with a genealogist's zeal and a genealogist's ability to find what he seeks, and gloss over what he dislikes, in our national heritage.

"The American" is about John Peter Altgeld, one-time Governor of Illinois and leader of the National Democratic Party, famous for his pardon of the remaining victims of the Haymarket trials and for his opposition to Cleveland's use of Federal troops in the Pullman strike. Altgeld's career was a dramatic one, an excellent subject for an historical novel. He was a self-made man, after a boyhood of incredible hardships. He was a party politician who, near the zenith of power, had the courage to act according to conscience. The study of any change of heart, but especially in a person who would seem to have everything to gain by remaining unchanged, is always an interesting study for the novelist who is concerned with human realities and possibilities and not with myth-making. But Mr. Fast even calls his book "The American" rather than "An American," and subtitles it "A Middle Western Legend." He is all too obviously in the business, not of understanding, but of influencing. Altgeld is to be impressed upon us as the symbol of a militant liberalism, even at the cost of being lost to us as a man, and even though his liberalism was the crown rather than a continuing ideal of his life.

That Mr. Fast tells us as much as he does about Altgeld prior to the pardon of the accused anarchists might, I suppose, be chalked up to his credit as an historian. He does tell us, for instance, that as lawyer and judge Altgeld amassed a considerable private fortune, though he doesn't dwell on the financial methods that were employed; and he makes no attempt to disguise the nature of the process by which Altgeld achieved his political power. That is, although Mr. Fast doesn't try to explain, in novelistic terms, the conversion of a straight party man into an independent thinker but says, instead, that certain changes in people cannot be explained, he still gives us sufficient evidence that for a large part of his life Altgeld was not the champion of freedom and justice he later became.

In this connection, however, it is worth noting that since Altgeld's life was to culminate in a staunch defense of labor, Mr. Fast is able to contemplate all the long years of Altgeld's opportunistic self-advancement with a benign tolerance. It is the end that counts—that counts so fully, indeed, that it is presumed to lend a retroactive moral worth to whatever means were employed to arrive at it. There are actually two American biographies in "The American," that of Parsons, one of the condemned anarchists, as well as that of Altgeld: if our faith in Mr. Fast's chief hero needs sustenance as we await his moral rebirth, it can draw strength from his companion. The two figures are so closely interwoven, in fact, that their moral colors subtly begin to merge in our minds.

Mr. Fast, as an editor of the New Masses, announces himself committed to the Communist Party. The connection raises interesting speculations about "The American" as Communist Party line. I had thought that the slogan Communism is 20th Century Americanism was now outdated: yet Mr. Fast still seems to write by it. Then too I had thought that the day of capitalistic cooperation had quite given over to the day of revolutionary intransigence: Altgeld's political "realism," his playing ball with the economic barons and party bosses, would seem to me to unfit him for the heroic place Mr. Fast lets him fill. Finally, there is the confusion Mr. Fast permits among the various groups of the left—Communists, Socialists, Anarchists: one would think we were still living in a period of united front of all the democratic forces against fascism! Can Mr. Fast be trailing the line, can he even be guilty of a touch of Browderism? Or is Browderism perhaps no longer to be considered a guilt?

DIANA TRILLING

Horizon

OUTSTANDING REVIEW ON LITERATURE AND ART

Edited by

Cyril Connolly

Brilliant Critic

Don't Miss A Single Issue
Subscribe Today

Subscriptions Limited in Number

BRITISH PUBLICATIONS, INC. D
150 E. 35th Street, New York 17, N. Y.

Enclosed is my check or money order, amount $6.50 for one year's subscription to HORIZON.

Name_____

Street Address_____

City and Zone No._____

State_____ ☐ Check if you wish this to be gift subscription

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

BUD ABBOTT · LOU COSTELLO
'LITTLE GIANT'
— WITH —
BRENDA JOYCE • JACQUELINE deWIT
ELENA VERDUGO
— AND —
'TANGIER' — STARRING —
Maria Montez • Robert Paige • Sabu

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
ALDEN
Jamaica
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

"Exciting and Engrossing." —N. Y. Herald-Tribune
"Story Has Dash and Sweep." —PM

GARY COOPER · INGRID BERGMAN
in EDNA FERBER'S
'SARATOGA TRUNK'
with FLORA ROBSON
From the Novel by EDNA FERBER

EUGENE O'NEILL says:
"The finest picture I have ever seen. I enjoyed it so much I went a second time... and I am going to see it again."
The THEATRE GUILD presents
LAURENCE OLIVIER
in William Shakespeare's
"HENRY V"
IN TECHNICOLOR • Released Thru United Artists
PRICES: Evgs. (at 8:30) $2.40, $1.80 Mats. daily (at 2:30) $1.80, $1.20
ALL SEATS RESERVED
NOW! N. Y. CITY CENTER 131 West 55th St.

BARBARA STANWYCK · VAN HEFLIN
LIZABETH SCOTT
— IN —
HAL WALLIS' Production
"THE STRANGE LOVE OF MARTHA IVERS"
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

— IN PERSON —
DINAH SHORE
— Plus —
GIL LAMB
— Plus —
The Acromaniac
EXTRA!
DICK STABILE
and his Orchestra

NOW PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

STAGE PLAYS

THEATRE GUILD PRODUCTIONS
THE MUSICAL HIT
CAROUSEL
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
with Harold Keel — Iva Withers
Jean Darling • Eric Mathus • Norma Howard • Jean Clarke
AIR-COND. MAJESTIC Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT
OKLAHOMA!
Based on Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs"
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
Jack Kilty • Owen Martin • Betty Jane Watson • Ruth Weston
AIR-COND. ST. JAMES Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." — Ward Morehouse, Sun.
MAX GORDON presents
BORN YESTERDAY
The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40. AIR-COND.

"A SMASH HIT!"—Life Magazine
RICHARD RODGERS and OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd Present
ETHEL MERMAN in
"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"
Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON
Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN
IMPERIAL THEA., 45th St. W. of Bway. Mats. Wed. & Sat. Air-Cond.

Buy Your Books through THE Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price, post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible.

•

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
The Nation
20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

READING Roger Fry's "Vision and Design" not long ago, I was struck by a number of acute observations which seemed to me as true of other arts—and particularly of music—as of painting, and which, therefore, I hope Mr. Greenberg will not mind my referring to in this column.

In an essay called "The Artist's Vision" Fry describes how the artist operates; and though he is talking about the painter, the analogous operation of the composer is clear. "The artist's main business in life is carried on by means of . . . the creative vision. . . . It demands the most complete detachment from any of the meanings and implications of appearances. Almost any turn of the kaleidoscope of nature may set up in the artist this detached and impassioned vision, and, as he contemplates the particular field of vision, the (aesthetically) chaotic and accidental conjunction of forms and colors begins to crystallize into a harmony; and as this harmony becomes clear to the artist, his actual vision becomes distorted by the emphasis of the rhythm which has been set up within him. Certain relations or directions of lines become for him full of meaning; he apprehends them no longer casually . . . but passionately, and these lines begin to be so stressed and stand out so clearly from the rest that he sees them far more distinctly than he did at first. Similarly colors, which in nature have almost always a certain vagueness and elusiveness, become . . . definite and clear to him, owing to their now necessary relation to other colors. . . . In such a creative vision the objects as such tend to . . . lose their separate unities, and to take their places as so many bits in the whole mosaic of vision."

This lies behind the statement, in another essay, that "all art depends upon cutting off the practical responses to sensations of ordinary life, thereby setting free a pure and as it were disembodied functioning of the spirit." And it is, then, as "a creator of purely ideal and abstract works," that the artist is "the medium of inspiration and source of revelation . . . the articulate soul of mankind." These last phrases are from the essay "Art and Socialism," in which, having made clear what he means by the artist's work, Fry writes: "It is impossible that the artist should work for the plutocrat; he must work for himself, because it is only by so doing that he can perform the function for which he exists"; to which he then adds: "It is only by working for himself that he can work for mankind." Properly, then, "the Great State [the essay appeared in 1912 in a volume called 'The Great State'] aims at human freedom; essentially it is an organization for leisure – out of which art grows; it is only a purely bureaucratic Socialism that would attempt to control the aesthetic lives of men." And it is this bureaucratic socialism that he fears: "There is in truth . . . a gross and wanton waste under the present system. . . . But there is . . . a blind chance that the gift and the opportunity may coincide; that Shelley and Browning may have a competence, and Cézanne a farm-house he could retire to. Bureaucratic Socialism would, it seems, take away even this blind chance that mankind may benefit by its least appreciable, most elusive treasures, and would organize into a universal and all-embracing tyranny the already overweening and disastrous power of endowed official art."

Astounding that in 1912 Fry should prophesy those paintings of "Stalin Halting the Cowardly Flight of Trotsky from the Battlefield of Tzaritzin," "Stalin Demonstrating to the Leningrad Academy of Sciences that $E=mc^2$," "Stalin Receiving the Pleas of Churchill and Roosevelt for Assistance at Teheran," "Ivan the Terrible Gently Admonishing His Son for Cutting Off the Ears of His Pet Rabbit"—and their musical counterparts.

Films

JAMES AGEE

IT seems impertinent to discuss even briefly the excellence of Laurence Olivier's production of Shakespeare's "Henry V" without saying a few words, at least, about the author. If Shakespeare had been no more gifted with words than, say, I am, the depth and liveliness of his interest in people and predicaments, and his incredible hardness, practicality, and resource as a craftsman and maker of moods, rhythms, and points, could still have made him almost his actual equal as a playwright. I had never realized this so well until I saw this production, in which every nail in sight is so cleanly driven in with one blow; and I could watch the film for all that Shakespeare gave it in these terms alone, and for all that in these terms alone is done with what he gave, with great pleasure and gratitude. But then too, of course, there is the language, of a brilliance, vigor, and absoluteness that make the craftsmanship and sometimes the people and their grandest emotions seem almost as negligibly pragmatic as a libretto beside an opera score. Some people, using I wonder what kind of dry ice for comfort, like to insist that "Henry V" is relatively uninteresting Shakespeare. This uninteresting poetry is such that after hearing it, in this production, I find it as hard to judge fairly even the best writing since Shakespeare as it is to see the objects in a room after looking into the sun.

The one great glory of the film is this language. The greatest credit I can assign to those who made the film is that they have loved and served the language so well. I don't feel that much of the delivery is inspired; it is merely so good, so right, that the words, set loose in the graciously designed world of the screen, like so many uncaged birds, fully enjoy and take care of themselves. Neither of the grimmest Shakespearerian vices, ancient or modern, is indulged: that is to say, none of the text is read in that human, down-to-earth, poetry-is-only-hopped-up-prose manner which is doubtless only proper when a charter subscriber to PM reads the Lerner editorial to his shop-wise fellow traveler; nor is any of it intoned in the nobler manner, as if by a spoiled deacon celebrating the Black Mass down a section of sewer-pipe. Most of it is merely spoken by people who know and love poetry as poetry and have spent a lifetime learning how to speak it accordingly. Their voices, faces, and bodies are all in charge of a man who has selected them as shrewdly as a good orchestrator selects and blends his instruments; and he combines and directs them as a good conductor conducts an orchestral piece. It is, in fact, no surprise to learn that Mr. Olivier is fond of music; charming as it is to look at, the film is essentially less visual than musical.

I cannot compare it with many stage productions of Shakespeare; but so far as I can they were, by comparison, just so many slightly tired cultural summer-salads, now and then livened, thanks to an unkilled talent or an unkillable line, by an unexpected rose-petal or the sudden spasm of a rattlesnake: whereas this, down to the last fleeting bit of first-rate poetry in a minor character's mouth, was close to solid gold, almost every word given its own and its largest contextual value. Of course nothing prevents this kind of casting and playing on the stage, except talent and, more seriously, the money to buy enough talent and enough time to use it rightly in; and how often do you see anything to equal it on the Shakespearian stage? The specific advantages of the screen are obvious, but no less important for that. Microphones make possible a much more delicate and immediate use of the voice; reactions, in closeup, can color the lines more subtly and richly than on the stage. Thus it is possible, for instance, to get all the considerable excellence there is out of an aging player like Nicholas Hannen, who seemed weak in most scenes when, on the stage, he had to try to fill and dilate the whole Century Theater with unhappy majesty; and the exquisiteness of Renée Asherson's reactions to Olivier's spate of gallantry, in the wooing scene, did as much as he did towards making that scene, by no means the most inspired as writing, the crown of the film. When so much can be done, through proper understanding of these simple advantages, to open the beauties of poetry as relatively extroverted as this play, it is equally hard to imagine and to wait for the explorations that could be made of subtler, deeper poems like "Hamlet," "Troilus and Cressida," or "The Tempest."

Speaking still of nothing except the skill with which the poetry is used in this film, I could go on far past the room I have. The sureness and seductive power of the pacing alone and its shifts and contrasts, in scene after scene, has seldom been equaled in a movie; the adjustments and relationships of tone are just as good. For just one example, the difference in tone between Olivier's almost schoolboyish "God-a-mercy" and his "Good old Knight," not long afterward, measures the King's growth in the time between with lovely strength, spaciousness, and cleanness; it earns, as craftsmanship, the triumph of bringing off the equivalent to an "impossibly" delayed false-rhyme; and psychologically or dramatically, it seems to me—though my guess may be far-fetched—it fully establishes the King's coming-of-age by raising honorable, brave, loyal, and dull old age (in Sir Thomas Erpingham) in the King's love and esteem to the level of any love he had ever felt for Falstaff.

Olivier does many other beautiful pieces of reading and playing. His blood-raising reply to the French Herald's ultimatum is not just that; it is a

ANNOUNCING A NEW EDITORIAL PROJECT—THE AMERICAN JOURNALISM SERIES

THE KANSAS CITY STAR. A Literary Enormity that Parades its Benign, Pontifical Purity and Saintliness. By Charles H. Hogan, Kansas City newspaperman. This charming, delightful, amusing, bone-crushing, eye-gouging manifesto contains the following scabrous, blistering, merciless chapters:

1. The Cathedral of Frustrated Journalism. 2. The "Star Style." 3. A Plunge Into a Bubbling Fountain of Bilge. 4. The Woman's Page—A New High in Journalistic Obscenity. 5. Lord Roberts—All-Powerful Deity. 6. The Star's Limited News Coverage. 7. William Allen White—the Saintly Star's Pet Disciple. 8. The Oracle of the Jesus-Shouters. 9. The Star's Rape of Myrtle. 10. The Star's Snake-Phobia. 11. The Star's Chaste, Virginal Editorial Department. (The second part of this booklet contains the following chapters.) 12. Kansas City—Hick Town on the Kaw. 13. Smut-Smellers Take Over the Bordellos. 14. Kansas City's Final Fling Before It Turned Saintly. 15. The Star's Angelic Battle for Pure Womanhood. 16. Pope Roberts' Citadel of Godliness. 17. Sunday in the Star's Bailiwick. 18. The Star's Brand of Uplift Is on the Boom.

THE KANSAS CITY STAR costs only 25c per copy, prepaid.

THE NEW YORK TIMES EXPOSED. Is There a Free Press? Where? In America? In Russia? A Critical Examination of Capitalism's Greatest Newspaper, by Walther Victor.

This important booklet discusses the most fundamental of all freedoms—that of expression, the press. Without a free press true freedom is impossible. Here we have a complete, factual survey of the cartelization of the mind of America by a few score people who dominate the press. At the top stands The New York Times, a paper that is an institution, that wields tremendous influence, and that is recognized as the best-edited capitalistic organ in all printing history. The Times represents capitalistic journalism at its best, and it is precisely for this reason that the author—Mr. Walther Victor—takes up its policies regarding freedom of expression for purposes of analysis and criticism. Let's not forget that Mr. Sulzberger, publisher of the Times, said, according to the author of this essay, that freedom of the press to him means the right for him to print what he pleases, and if you little people don't like it, you can—what? You can PRINT A HANDBILL!

Mr. Victor shows that, in plain English, the Times' policy means: You may have just as much freedom of speech and expression as you are able to pay for. This is an important situation that Mr. Victor is treating—it really amounts to this: your and my freedom of speech and expression may mean peace rather than a third World War. The Times is more subtle, intelligent, dignified and efficient than the Hearst-McCormick-Patterson-Gannett poison press—and that's what makes it much more dangerous to those who really believe in freedom of expression.

THE NEW YORK TIMES EXPOSED costs 25c per copy, prepaid.

THE CASE AGAINST THE McCORMICK-NEW YORK NEWS PRESS. Sampling The Chicago Tribune and N. Y. Daily News Fascist Propaganda Line Over a Period of Years. By L. M. Birkhead, Director, Friends of Democracy.

While this book devotes itself mainly to Robert R. McCormick's Chicago Tribune and the N. Y. Daily News, Dr. Birkhead writes plenty about "Cissy" Patterson's Washington Times-Herald and the Hearst press.

The behavior of these papers represents one of the most flagrant cases of editorial irresponsibility in the history of our country. These papers feed prejudice, bigotry, distrust and defeatism to the American people day after day.

Here are some of the chapter headings you'll find in this book by Dr. Birkhead:

1. And What Do You Call "Aiding the Enemy," Gentlemen? 2. The Daily Drip of Poison of the McCormick-New York News-Hearst Press. 3. We Speak for Angry Americans. 4. McCormick is Pro-Axis; the Axis is Pro-McCormick. 5. Check-List for Inkpot Sabotage. 6. What About Inkpot "Aid to the Enemy," Mr. McCormick? 7. The Chicago Tribune's Anti-Semitism. 8. McCormick's Anti-British and Anti-Russian Propaganda. 9. McCormick—Defender of Seditionists. 10. McCormick's Pro-Native Fascism. 11. Sabotaging the Peace. 12. The Fascists Work for the New York News. 13. How the New York News is Useful to the Fascists. 14. Hitler Echoed the New York News. 15. The New York News Paralleled Hitler. 16. The Nazi-German Line and the New York News Line. 17. The N. Y. Daily News' Defense of Jap Fascism.

This pamphlet, "THE CASE AGAINST THE McCORMICK-NEW YORK NEWS PRESS (15,000 words, 5½ x 8½ inches), is hot as a pistol and as timely as a good newspaper. L. M. Birkhead knows more about McCormick and the New York News than any other man in the country. Thoroughly documented. Here's a complete exposure of the most sinister element in American life—a force that would destroy American democracy and make the world safe for totalitarianism, 25c per copy, prepaid.

Each of these three booklets contains 15,000 words, page size 5½ x 8½ inches. 25c per copy. All three booklets 75c, prepaid.

AMERICAN JOURNALISM SERIES—E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS, Box 2325, Girard, Kansas

AMERICAN JOURNALISM SERIES

E. Haldeman-Julius, Box 2325, Girard, Kansas

Enclosed find 75c, payment in full for all three journalism booklets, as follows: 1. The Kansas City Star. (25c.) 2. The New York Times Exposed. (25c.) 3. The Case Against the McCormick-New York News Press. (25c.) Prepaid.

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State.....

frank, bright exploitation of the moment for English ears, amusedly and desperately honored as such, in a still gallant and friendly way, by both Herald and King. His Crispin's Day oration is not just a brilliant bugle-blat: it is the calculated yet self-exceeding improvisation, at once self-enjoying and selfless, of a young and sleepless leader, rising to a situation wholly dangerous and glamorous, and wholly new to him. Only one of the many beauties of the speech as he gives it is the way in which the King seems now to exploit his sincerity, now to be possessed by it, riding like an unexpectedly mounting wave the astounding size of his sudden proud awareness of the country morning, of his moment in history, of his responsibility and competence, of being full-bloodedly alive, and of being about to die.

This kind of branching, nervous interpretive intelligence, so contemporary in quality except that it always keeps the main lines of its drive and meaning clear, never spiraling or strangling in awareness, is vivid in every way during all parts of the film.

It is tantalizing to be able to mention so few of the dozens of large and hundreds of small excellences which Mr. Olivier and his associates have developed to sustain Shakespeare's poem. They have done somewhere near all that talent, cultivation, taste, knowledgeability, love of one's work—every excellence, in fact, short of genius—can be expected to do; and that, the picture testifies, is a very great deal. Lacking space for anything further I would like to suggest that it be watched for all that it does in playing a hundred kinds of charming adventurousness against the incalculably responsive sounding-boards of tradition: for that is still, and will always be, a process essential in most, though not all, of the best kinds of art, and I have never before seen so much done with it in a moving picture. I am not a Tory, a monarchist, a Catholic, a medievalist, an Englishman, or, despite all the good that it engenders, a lover of war; but the beauty and power of this traditional exercise was such that, watching it, I wished I was, thought I was, and was proud of it. I was persuaded, and in part still am, that every time and place has since been in decline, save one, in which one Englishman used language better than anyone has before or since, or ever shall; and that nearly the best that our time can say for itself is that some of us are still capable of paying homage to the fact.

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Bilboes Defined

Dear Sirs: It is interesting, sad, and ironic that we have in our nation an individual who is desperately attempting to put us into bilboes. Senator Bilbo of Mississippi is actually living his name. Funk & Wagnall's definition of bilbo is "a fetter consisting of two sliding shackles attached to an iron bar."

The danger of "bilboism" is making itself apparent and we must, as active participants in the creating of a greater governing body, take steps to prevent such arrogance, vileness, and rank stupidity to continue. Otherwise, all of us will eventually suffer.

NICHOLAS MOCHARNIUK

New York, June 30

Action Needed on China

Dear Sirs: "Report from China" (The Nation, June 29, Letters to the Editors) confirmed my views regarding the unreliability, corruption, and undemocratic nature of the Chiang Kai-shek set in China. The Kuomintang is misusing both American relief supplies and military aid to oppress the Chinese masses, rather than using them in building a democratic, unified China.

These facts call for change in your editorial policy. The same issue which contained "Report from China" also calls for the passage of a bill by Congress authorizing American aid in modernizing the Chinese army. The argument in favor of this bill is that it calls for partial demobilization, and for the training of some Communist as well as Kuomintang divisions.

The hollowness of this argument should be clear. Just as UNRRA supplies intended for the whole Chinese people have been used for political ends, so American military aid will be used by the Kuomintang to foist a repressive military dictatorship over the Chinese people.

The greatest contribution America could make to the building of a democratic China would be the withdrawal of all armed forces from that country, and the distribution of relief on the basis of need, irrespective of political consideration.

The Nation, an old advocate of democracy in all parts of the world, should come out for the termination of American military intervention in China, instead of the present ambiguous policy of paying lip-service to democracy while in reality helping to suppress it.

STEPHEN VARGA

New York, N. Y., July 5

Toscanini Recordings

Dear Sirs: Reading an article recently by your superb music editor, Mr. Haggin, published in 1940, I find reference to a situation which is of grave significance to the cause of art today and in the future.

Mr. Haggin wrote "in view of the fact that His Master's Voice had recorded the majority of Schnabel's great performances of Beethoven's piano works, it was monstrous to conceive that the same had not taken place with the performances of Toscanini."

The preservation of the work of the greatest musician of the 20th century is a significant problem. It is tragic to conceive of the irreparable losses that have been caused by the failure to capture on record many of Toscanini's performances with the New York Philharmonic, while he was its conductor from 1926 to 1936 (although a few were released after his final year with that orchestra—such as the Wagnerian excerpts and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7). But of the great performance of Romeo and Juliet by Berlioz (at the opening of the 1942-43 season) we have no records, nor of the other performances made since 1936 by Toscanini with the Philadelphia Orchestra—a few recordings were indeed made in 1942 but have been withheld for "technical reasons."

But what of the performances with the NBC Symphony—have they been preserved by file recordings and how and when are these to become property of the musical public?

What we need is the formation of an organization to preserve the art of Toscanini, not only for this time, but for generations yet unborn, so that his contribution to music may be available to mankind, as Muck's, Mahler's, and many other performing artists' is not.

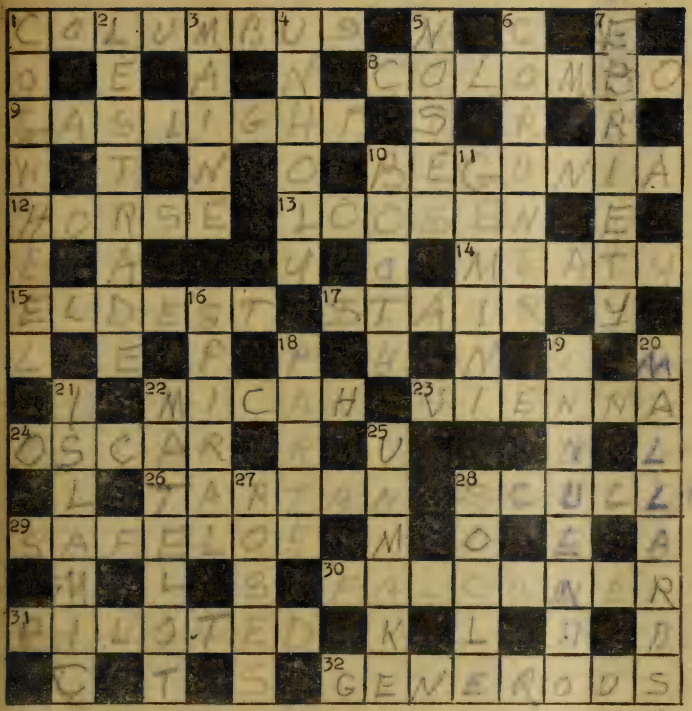
Time is short. What can be done?

FRANCIS L. LOEWENHEIM

Cincinnati, Ohio, June 23

Crossword Puzzle No. 172

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Discovered America (or perhaps America discovered him, trying to sneak in?)
8 There's a cool mob in this foreign capital
9 Brilliantly effective in a mantle
10 Flower with an ego
12 Stable animal, though not always 13 Relax
14 Fleshy
15 First-born
17 Step on it
22 Mr. Clarke
23 Anne turns to Vi in another foreign capital
24 Cora's boy friend
26 Sailor with a sunburn like a Scot
28 Charon's oar?
29 It originally took brains to make this sausage
30 He set a bird to catch a bird
31 Steered
32 Bountiful

DOWN

1 Likely to be engaged in revolutionary activities
2 Detective in Sherlock Holmes' stories
3 State of the U. S.
4 Sinful
5 Men haven't got none, sang Quoodle
6 He presides at inquests
7 Beery it may be 10 Soccer prize?
11 The twins
16 Goes 'round in a circle yet never quite returns to its starting point
18 A single individual, or a group
19 O, you hike through the country all day long, and at an --------
20 Drakes
21 Simla rebuilt, I see
22 French sailor
25 Take to pieces
27 June's flowers
28 Close (anag.)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 171

ACROSS:—1 WAITRESS; 5 WINDOW; 10 IMPOSER; 11 CHANCED; 12 EXTORT; 14 NAMESAKE; 16 VERONAL; 17 ASHES; 18 FERN; 20 STOMACH; 22 ROTS; 24 HOCKS; 26 STINGER; 29 SKINNERS; 30 SNATCH; 32 LAGGARD; 33 BUILDER; 34 RAREST; 35 INTENDED.

DOWN:—1 WAITER; 2 IMPETUS; 3 RESERVES; 4 SERF; 6 ISABEL; 7 DECEASE; 8 WIDGEONS; 9 SCRAN; 13 TESTATE; 14 NORMANS; 15 MATCHES; 19 WRESTLER; 21 HORNPIPE; 23 TRIGGER; 25 KATYDID; 26 SNEAKS; 27 IRADE; 28 SHARED; 31 OBAN.

SITUATIONS WANTED

SOUTHERN COLORED DOMESTIC and hotel workers desire jobs. Write for list today (stamps). QUALITY EMPLOYMENT ASS'N. 214 East Clay Street, Richmond 19, Va.

WRITER, 34, newspaper, institutional publication, administrative experience, desires job liberal publication. Veteran. Satire, polemics, objective reporting. Box 1634, c/o The Nation.

ROOM WANTED

PROFESSIONAL MAN, mature, seeks room with a private family. Must have access to shower bath daily. Give details and rate. Box 1635 c/o The Nation.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES

•

62c a line (six words)
Minimum 3 lines
$6.16 per inch

•

Attractive discounts for multiple insertions.

•

THE Nation
20 Vesey St., N. Y. 7, N. Y.
BArclay 7-1066

The New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review may now be obtained through

THE NATION

20 Vesey Street
New York 7, N. Y.

•

Yearly subscription
$6.50 including postage

SPECIMEN copy or request

BOOKS

"HAWAII TO HEAVEN"
by GUALTERIO QUINONAS, Hawaiian Writer
Lovely Hawaiian-American novel—Delightful story of a Hawaiian boy who found a beautiful romance awaiting him in this land of democracy, the Heaven among nations. A charming, inspiring book, filled with Hawaiian and American incidents, history and romance.
Cloth, illustrated, $2.00
HOBSON BOOK PRESS
52 Vanderbilt Avenue, New York City 17

FREE CIRCULAR explaining "WHO WANTS THE ATOMIC WAR" and giving suggestions how HONEST INTELLIGENT PEOPLE should unite themselves to stop "WAR-CONSPIRACY" the greatest and cruelest CRIMINALITY AGAINST MANKIND. ORDER from P.O. Box 1335, St. Louis, Mo.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

12 ROOM BRICK COLONIAL; heat; bath; electric; fireplace; view; privacy; 6 miles from Tanglewood. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

LANGUAGES

ALL LANGUAGES. Phonograph Courses. Linguaphone, other makes. Sold, bought, rented. A. Alin, 475 5th Avenue, New York 17. MU. 3-1093.

MERCHANDISE FOR SALE

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.40 per carton, postpaid. Send check or money order. Ace Mail Order Co., East Orange 1, N. J.

REAL ESTATE FOR SALE

AN INVALUABLE HOME – Executive office site, No. 139 East 43rd Street. Immediate occupancy, 4-story Building, opposite Chrysler Building, Grand Central Depot, etc. $90,000 – cash. Also, 55,000 square feet, immediate occupancy. $82,500. With about 16 acres land at Stuyvesant Falls, N. Y. Two 4-story brick and stone buildings. Formerly used as textile mills and battery manufacture. Elevators. With perpetual use of 400 h. p. to owner without cost. L. N. Rosenbaum & Son, 565 Fifth Avenue, New York 17.

Attention Please!

Train leaving on Track 31 for

. . . . . .

Are they calling out the location of your resort?

Those vacationers are heading for two weeks of rest and fun. Do they know what good times they can have at your place?

Tell them about it through the resort advertising pages of The Nation.

Phone BArclay 7-1066 today
or
Write to 20 Vesey St., N. Y. C. 7
for information as to space, rates and closing dates.

Don't delay . . . those vacationers are planning their vacations

NOW

RESORTS

Gayly Informal
All Sports Facilities
Comfortable Cabins and Lodges
Excellent American-Jewish Cuisine
WOPOWOG LODGE
on Lake Salmon, East Hampton, Conn.

Indian Lake Lodge
In the Heart of the Adirondacks
INDIAN LAKE, N. Y.
Ten Mile Long Lake, a backdrop of 3500 foot mountain ranges, a hundred acres of lawn and woodland. Scenic beauty plus all water sports, tennis, hiking, informal atmosphere, good food and comfortable quarters are yours to Sept. 15th. TELEPHONE: INDIAN LAKE 2412

KINAPIC LODGE
LOVELL VILLAGE MAINE
On LAKE KEZAR, one of America's most beautiful lakes
Cabins on the lake. American plan, informal, for adults and family groups. Water sports, good golf, fine lake and stream fishing. Excellent Hungarian cuisine.
Open June 1 to Oct. 15. Reserve now.
Booklet by Mail, or Phone Lovell: 7 ring 12 A

HATHAWAY LODGE
OPEN ALL YEAR
Formerly the palatial 592-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Winding Mountain Trails. Delicious food. Easy Transportation.
Attractive Rates • Make reservations now
For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 299

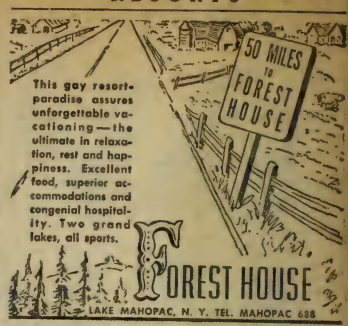
PLUM POINT
ONLY 55 MILES FROM New York City
MAKE RESERVATIONS EARLY
NEW WINDSOR, N. Y. NEWBURGH 4270
"YEAR-ROUND VACATION RESORT"

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.
ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

MAMANASCO Lake Lodge
Ridgefield, Conn. • Phone 821
A resort of distinction fashioned from a country estate. Water sports, hiking trails, tennis. Library, open fireplaces. Congenial atmosphere. Famous cuisine.

HUNNS LAKE HOUSE
STANFORDVILLE NEW YORK
90 miles from New York via N. Y. Central. Charming lake and countryside, rustic, restful. Directly at lake, bathing, boating, fishing, other sports. Beautiful walks on grounds. Excellent American cuisine. Ideal for week-ends and vacations. Adults only. Rate $35.00.
Management GRETE POPPER
Telephone Stanfordville 2831

RESORTS



This gay resort-paradise assures unforgettable vacationing—the ultimate in relaxation, rest and happiness. Excellent food, superior accommodations and congenial hospitality. Two grand lakes, all sports.
FOREST HOUSE
LAKE MAHOPAC, N. Y. TEL. MAHOPAC 638

Yours for Vacation Enjoyment
HILLTOP LODGE
On beautiful Sylvan Lake
HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.
65 mi. from N. Y. C. • R. R. Station Pawling, N. Y.
Every conceivable Sport and Recreation . . . with intimate, congenial people
Many improved features for the new season!
Open from May thru October
Under direction of: PAUL WOLFSON & SOL ROTHAUSER
New York Office: 277 BROADWAY COrtlandt 7-3958

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK, N. Y.
35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.
OPEN ALL YEAR Phone Armonk Village 958

CASA MANOR
On Beautiful LAKE COSSAYUNA
COSSAYUNA, NEW YORK
Only 20 miles from famed Saratoga 50-guest limit to preserve comfortable, restful, informal atmosphere. Excellent cuisine. Swimming, boating, fishing, table tennis, etc. Family accommodations available. Write or call.
JACOB M. OLSHANSKY
93 State Street, Albany, New York. Phone: 5-0363

BYRAM LODGE
ARMONK, N. Y. Tel. Armonk Vill. 906
Only 35 miles from N. Y. C. in Westchester. Completely remodeled, all conveniences, new furnishings. Beautyrest mattresses, all sports, bowling.
Rates $60 weekly; $10 daily. American Plan.
American-Jewish Cuisine
N. Y. Office 11 West 42nd Street PE 6-3243

OAKWOOD
NEW WINDSOR, N. Y. Newburgh 4477
Delightful...Boating and swimming in our private lake.
Different...The colonial atmosphere.
Delicious...Our unexcelled cuisine.
Diverting...Recordings for listening & dancing.
All this only 53 miles from New York City
A Resort for Adults Only

SACKS FARM
Saugerties, N. Y. Tel. 590-J
Unusually beautiful countryside, pine woods, good, homey Jewish-American cooking. All conveniences. Intimate and restful. Swimming, horseback, tennis and other sports. Adults. Booklet.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 10, 1946 NUMBER 6

The Shape of Things

THOUGH THE RECORD OF THE SEVENTY-NINTH Congress is far from spotless, its last action—approval by the Senate of the Morse resolution on the World Court—serves to remind us how much history it has made in the field of international relations. In the years between the wars United States adhesion to the World Court represented the irreducible minimum of the internationalists' program; they fought long and painful battles to secure it, but the isolationists were always successful in blocking it. Now by a vote of 60 to 2 the Senate has agreed that the United States shall accept compulsory jurisdiction of the Court of International Justice for disputes among nations over the interpretation of treaties, over any question of international law, over alleged breaches of international obligations, and over cases of claims for reparations to be made for such breaches. Even though two rather unfortunate reservations were included in the resolution—one of them might block efforts to refer different interpretations of the peace treaties to the Court—this vote gives emphatic proof of how far we have swung away from isolationism. And the seventy-ninth Congress has provided many other proofs. It ratified the Charter of the United Nations and indorsed American participation in the International Bank Fund. It agreed to extend the Reciprocal Trade Agreements Act on terms which gave the President greater latitude in reducing tariffs, and it approved the British loan, though only after an unedifying series of debates. All in all, it is a distinguished record which was made possible by the broad agreement on international policies which existed between conservatives and liberals in both parties. The dwindling band of die-hards provided a bitter opposition but they were fighting vainly against a tidal-wave of public opinion. In the next Congress they seem likely to be conspicuous by their absence.

*

BY CONTRAST THE DOMESTIC RECORD OF this Congress has been blotched by many sins both of commission and omission. In the second session, particularly, the coalition of Southern conservatives and Republicans seized practical control of both House and Senate and illustrated once again the tendency of our constitution to produce legislative stalemates. A large part of the program presented last January by the President has been blocked while he, in turn, by the use of his veto, has rendered ineffective the passage by Congress of several important bills. Actually of twenty-one measures requested by Mr. Truman only six have become law and some of these were badly mangled when they reached his desk. A notable example is the Full Employment bill which was sadly watered down and is likely to prove of but limited utility. On the other hand, thanks in large part to freshman Senator Brien MacMahon, the Atomic Control bill came through in pretty good shape, with civilian control assured and provision made for the prevention of patent abuses. Another useful piece of legislation, though not as useful as its sponsors, Senator La Follette and Representative Monroney, tried to make it, was the Congressional Reorganization bill which aims at increasing efficiency on Capitol Hill by decreasing the number of standing committees. It also provides new rules for the registration of lobbyists. Among the more important measures left in suspense are the Wagner-Ellender-Taft Housing bill, to which we referred last week, the Services Unification bill, the bill instituting a permanent Fair Employment Practices Committee, and the bill embodying the President's national health-insurance program. We hope that, in the months that remain before the election, the voters will study carefully the individual records of their own representatives with a view to insuring that the eightieth Congress will be better than the seventy-ninth.

*

THE REVERSAL BY THE ALL-INDIA MOSLEM League of its previous decision to accept the British Cabinet Mission's constitutional plan adds a new boulder to India's rocky road to freedom. Since the decision involves a boycott by this powerful minority party of the Constitutional Assembly, the meeting of that body, scheduled for next month, may have to be postponed. The League's action was justified by the assertion that the "spirit of cooperation" necessary to carry the plan through was missing. In addition, it appears that the Moslems were deeply chagrined by the Viceroy's refusal to form an interim popular government after the Congress leaders voted against participation. As Shiva Rao pointed out in The Nation, they thought the Viceroy had definitely committed himself to the interim government scheme even though Congress rejected it. Sir Stafford Cripps, one of the members of the mission, has, however,

IN THIS ISSUE

EDITORIALS
The Shape of Things 141
After UNRRA, What? 144
Palestine Partition 145
The Issues at Paris by Freda Kirchwey 145

ARTICLES
Rebellion in Tennessee by Jennings Perry 147
The Crusader from Down Under by Robert Bendiner 148
Men Against Unemployment by John J. Corson 151
In the Wind 152
Holland's Last Chance by Andrew Roth 153
Of Peace and the Balkans by Rustem Vambery 155
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 157

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
Hope and Wisdom by Robert S. Warshow 158
Contemporary Constitutional Theory by William Seagle 159
Poets by Arthur Mizener 160
Light from the East by R. W. Flint 161
Briefer Comment 162
Music by B. H. Haggin 165

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 166

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 173 by Jack Barrett 167

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon — Washington Editor I. F. Stone — Literary Editor Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors
Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch — Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors
Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editor: Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx
Advertising Manager: William B. Brown
Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

since told the British House of Commons that the plan was for a coalition government and, therefore, conditional on the acceptance of both major parties. Wherever the truth in this somewhat confused situation may lie, it is obvious that the Moslem League feels that it was out-maneuvered and is seeking a more advantageous bargaining position. Under these circumstances, the demands for "revolutionary action" heard at its Bombay convention need not be taken too literally. Mohammed Ali Jinnah is obviously anxious to hedge his threats. He told the convention: "Never have we done anything except by constitutional methods. Today we bid good-bye to them." But in a subsequent press conference he was careful to explain that the convention's resolutions were not intended as a declaration of war against anybody. That the Moslem League will try to gain its ends by armed uprising is, indeed, most improbable; that it will exploit its very considerable nuisance value to the utmost, is certain.

*

THE SENATE, PROMPTED BY SENATOR HART, has struck out all references to the social sciences in its revised version of the National Science Foundation bill. This action is a disturbing and ironic symbol of our legislators' confusion about both the physical and the social sciences. Few truisms are more familiar than the statement that all our troubles are caused by the fact that we can control matter but not man, that the social sciences have lagged a hundred years behind technology; yet Congress proposes to subsidize technological research only, and thus increase the gap as much as it can. The Senate's action is all the more inexplicable in the light of the exception record of war-time "operational research" projects, in which mixed teams of mathematicians and economists, physicists and psychologists, combined their discipline for assaults on problems in their entirety, with conspicuously successful results. Certainly the foundation for any science of civilization must be sought, as Waldemar Kaempffert has pointed out in a recent pamphlet ("Should Government Support Science?" Public Affairs Pamphlet No. 119), in a combination of the natural and social sciences. It is to be hoped that the Senate will reconsider its unfortunate action.

*

HEARING THAT GERTRUDE STEIN IS DEAD is like hearing that Paul Bunyan has been eaten by his ox Babe. Certainly she is not really dead: legends never die, and Miss Stein had made herself into an American legend more lasting than anything Barnum himself ever created. She sat in Paris as the Pythoness used to sit at Delphi: everybody in the world, from Picasso to a sergeant of marines, came asking for a sign, and went away happy with some oracular utterance which he could finger as if it were a Chinese puzzle. (If you believe in yourself hard enough, the world will beat a path to your door—especially if you live in Paris.) An obstinate and homely shrewdness ran through everything Gertrude Stein said, and glittered at random throughout her writings, which seemed to the average reader an unusually idiosyncratic and concrete nonsense, the sort of massive whimsy a stomach would think up if it could ever stop digesting. But in our secular, commercial, and merciless age she came somehow to stand for Wisdom, which doesn't sell itself in the streets, but gives itself away at home, in cypher. Who else ever became famous by writing his own biography, or influenced dozens of writers by treating words, so far as it is possible to do so, as objects without meaning? Who else would say that a friend's one-man show was "rather epoch-making"; or would gravely decide that the Americans are today the oldest nation on earth, since they entered the twentieth century ten years before anybody else did? The world will be a duller place without her; her sins harmed no one; at this moment she is sitting in the Elysian Fields talking to Samuel Johnson, the only man who could ever be her match.

*

IT IS NO DISPARAGEMENT OF THE MEAD committee to suggest that the fish it has so far netted are distinguished by their smell rather than their size. The Garrson "empire," about which we have heard so much, was not in the major league of war contractors; its government orders totalled less than $100,000,000 while those of some of the really big fellows ran into billions. Possibly these leviathans swallowed no more public money than was their exact due, and never used shady methods of influencing public servants. Certainly the temptation to do so was diminished in their case by the predeliction of the War and Navy Departments for giantism. Even so, there are reasons for believing that cost-padding was a fairly general practice among large contractors as well as small, and it is good to know that the Mead Committee plans to make a series of "spot-checks" in the aluminum, automotive, aircraft, and shipbuilding industries to determine how much success Congress achieved in its professed effort "to take the profit out of war." According to Controller-General Lindsay C. Warren, who gave evidence before the committee last week, Congress stultified itself when it excluded the General Accounting Office from any part in contract termination proceedings. In this it followed the advice of Bernard Baruch who suggested that, except in cases of obvious fraud, contract settlements should not be audited by the Controller-General. Mr. Baruch's point was that we had to choose between the risk of overpayment and intolerable delay in reconversion. Perhaps so, but the procedure laid down by Congress was calculated to assist the concealment of fraud and to encourage collusion between contractors and government officials. Mr. Warren has asked for authority to recheck settlements and Congress should see that he gets it.

THE REVOLT IN BOLIVIA HAS DONE MORE than replace a bloody fascist tyranny with a regime pledged to democratic processes and economic reforms. It has succeeded in upsetting several other dictatorial apple carts and, in the process, has changed the balance of power in South America. The first sharp reaction was in Paraguay where President Moriñigo, faced with mounting political tension, has reorganized his government to make room for representatives of various democratic parties. One of the continent's most ruthless autocrats, Moriñigo was certainly spurred to action by the ugly picture of his fellow dictator across the border hanging head-downward from a lamppost. The new set-up in Paraguay is not yet completed; but Moriñigo promises to retire as soon as he makes certain that the ordinary Paraguayan has something to say about his own affairs; a praiseworthy if astonishing condition. But the most important aspect of events in both Paraguay and Bolivia is their effect on the policies of the government of Argentina. These two countries were Perón's most faithful satellites, the nucleus of his carefully planned anti-United States bloc. Today, with the bloc visibly crumbling under his feet, Perón is preparing a new line. He has announced that hemispheric cooperation is the thing. He promises that should another world war break out, Argentina would fight on the side of the United States. For all these encouraging sentiments we doubtless have Bolivia partly to thank, although it is also well to keep in mind Argentina's traditional fear of Russian influence in South America, as well as its desire to qualify for United States military aid when the long-delayed conference on hemisphere defense finally convenes at Rio.

*

IN THE TEXAS AND TENNESSEE PRIMARIES some sturdy reactionaries have once more got there "fustest with the mostest," and the scattered liberals are looking forward as bravely as they can to the next election. That Santa Claus in very good disguise, Boss Crump, has again pulled from the inexhaustible ballot boxes of Shelby County the gift which Tennesseans have been receiving as long as most of them can remember—Senator Kenneth D. McKellar. The other Crump candidates met with an equally expected success. However, the grass roots revolt at Athens, described elsewhere in this issue, may prove ominous of a dim future for old-style boss rule in Tennessee. In Texas an honest and intelligent liberal, Homer Rainey, ran a bad second after a campaign in which his rivals brought to bear sectional feeling, racial prejudice, accusations of immorality, and opposition to free enterprise, and everything else but the kitchen stove; as Rainey, a former university president, Baptist minister, and professional ball player, remarked: "They even said I was a bad pitcher." The economic basis necessary for the success of liberals hardly seems to exist in Texas, and their defeat is as little remarked on as was the nomination of Senator Connally. In Alabama the Democratic whip of the House Representatives, John J. Sparkman, supported by the C. I. O.-P. A. C., won such a sweeping victory that he nearly made a runoff unnecessary. There are, therefore, some drops of Southern comfort to be squeezed out of the past week's primaries.

After UNRRA, What?

INCREDIBLE as it may seem, a responsible member of the United States government is said to believe that the impending liquidation of the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration means simply the end of "the gravy train." This, according to a Washington report in the New York Times, is the considered view of William L. Clayton, Assistant Secretary of State, who nevertheless has been retained as the American representative at the farewell meeting of the UNRRA Council, which began August 5 in Geneva.

A statement subsequently issued in Washington on Mr. Clayton's behalf informs us that he is opposed to any country's going hungry as long as there is food in the world. Let us hope that this more humane view reflects his true sentiments. Nevertheless he has not challenged the disclosure that the United States, along with Great Britain and Canada, has already decided that the worst of the post-war starvation period was over, and that countries now receiving UNRRA food will hereafter have to buy their own. UNRRA is to be disbanded on schedule, in Europe on December 31, in China on March 31.

In view of the mutual ill-feeling that prevails in the world, it is useless to raise objections to the liquidation of UNRRA. The date of its demise was fixed a year ago, at the London meeting of its Council, and Mr. Clayton served notice at its Atlantic City meeting last spring that the United States would not furnish any more money. The United States has supplied nearly three-fourths of the $3,900,000,000 that UNRRA will have spent since its establishment in November, 1943, and appropriations have been obtained from Congress with more and more difficulty. It may well be that discontinuance of UNRRA is the only practical policy.

What is intolerable, however, is the bland assumption by Mr. Clayton, and by the British and Canadian officials who took part in the Washington conference, that the worst is over, and that various agencies of the United Nations can now take over UNRRA's work. This conclusion has apparently been reached without even the most cursory examination of the situation. On the subject of relief supplies—UNRRA expects to have shipped more than 14,000,000 tons by the end of September—we have to choose between the views of the Washington conferees, and a report by UNRRA to the member nations which says that at least $750,000,000 worth of food, not to mention clothing, will have to be sent to Europe to take care of minimum needs between January 1 and the 1947 harvest. Mr. Clayton may know better, but he is taking a risk, and millions of people, who have been saved until now by UNRRA supplies, may perish if he is mistaken. It will be too late for Mr. Clayton to change his mind after January 1; the Food and Agricultural Organization of the United Nations has no funds or means to get any.

There is no uncertainty, however, about the effect of the liquidation of UNRRA on the 850,000 refugees and displaced persons of Europe now dependent on it. The International Refugee Organization, which has been established under the vague sponsorship of the United Nations, is not even supposed to do anything about them unless they are fortunate enough to be chosen for permanent resettlement overseas. If the Palestine controversy is not settled, there will be very few of these. As for the rest, no help at all, unless the Inter-Governmental Committee, which is already responsible for several hundred thousand pre-1939 unfortunates, can expand its membership and its financial support. (The United States and Britain at present are the sole members of the I. G. C., with Britain bearing most if not all the expense.)

Other United Nations agencies are supposed to take over other UNRRA duties. But the World Health Congress cannot send out nurses and doctors to replace those that UNRRA already has in Greece. The International Bank of Reconstruction, which is supposed to finance the rebuilding of war-ravaged regions, has made plain what it thinks of UNRRA, or any recommendations by the United Nations sub-commission on devastated areas, by refusing even to send a representative to the final UNRRA Council meeting. It is obvious, therefore, that if things are allowed to rock along until the conclusion of United Nations General Assembly, which does not meet until September 23, we will suddenly wake up to find that UNRRA has vanished, and that there is not even the semblance of an effective United Nations agency to take its place. Above all, there will be no money and no food, except for the food that Allied occupation armies are already supplying the refugee camps. Without UNRRA's trained personnel to administer the camps, however, even army rations are insufficient to pay the world's debt to these victims of fascism.

Fortunately, we may expect declarations from the Geneva meeting that will show the way to a United Nations that is still fumbling with organizational problems; with some luck, we may even hope that the grants of powers to the various agencies supposed to take over UNRRA's work can be broadened so that they can do effective work. The cardinal difficulty, however, is lack of money, and this is mainly the responsibility of the United States, although we can certainly expect other nations which were not invaded to contribute. It is a responsibility that we hope President Truman will not shirk. And if Mr. Clayton's views on UNRRA were distorted by the Times, he has an opportunity at Geneva to make his repudiation sound convincing.

Palestine Partition

THE terms of the British partition for Palestine are evidently quite as unsatisfactory and dangerous as the early unofficial summaries indicated and its reception has been exactly as bad as Freda Kirchwey predicted in her comment last week. Jews and Arabs have rejected the plan even in advance of the final text, and the rumor that President Truman was prepared to agree to it roused a storm of disapproval, not only among Zionist groups in this country, but among Senators and Congressmen of both parties and interested individuals outside the government. As a result the President, who at first appeared merely irritated by the protests, summoned the Cabinet Committee to return from Paris and discuss the whole situation before he made a decision.

One of the most curious aspects of the partition plan is its bland disregard of the recommendations made in April by the Joint Committee of Inquiry—curious, because the Cabinet Committee was appointed and dispatched to Britain for the express purpose of working out methods of implementing those recommendations. The Joint Committee not only never suggested partition as a solution; it actually discussed the question on and off for several weeks, in the light of its own findings and the report of the Royal Commission of 1937, and in the end specifically stated that it was unable to recommend partition. When the inquiry began its work, a partition plan very similar to that now put forward was known to have been considered and dropped. The Joint Committee naturally supposed that its recommendations would supercede any such prior proposals; why, otherwise, should it have been called into being? It will be interesting to learn how the Committee feels about the new (or old) plan; so far its members have discreetly kept their mouths shut, at least in public.

But the latest proposal is not only a repudiation of the Anglo-American Committee; it also ignores the President's reiterated request for the immediate admission to Palestine of 100,000 displaced Jews. Instead it makes their admission contingent upon Arab acceptance of a proposal which the Arabs have time and again flatly refused to consider. Assuming the possibility that they could be won over by dangling before their eyes the large sum of American money suggested in the report, and assuming that Congress could be induced to vote for the donation, the process of bringing about a reversal would be bound to be slow. Meanwhile Jewish refugees would wait in German camps while new thousands pressed in from Eastern Europe. The proposal also makes the admission of the 100,000 contingent upon Jewish acceptance. This will never be given to a scheme which deprives the Jews of the possibility of democratic self-government even within their own district and, by limiting their territory to a meager 1,500 square miles of densely populated land, sharply curtails the possibility of absorbing new immigrants.

It seems clear to us that President Truman should immedately hold a joint conference with the Grady committee, the group of advisors who accompanied it to Europe only to have their advice totally ignored, and the American members of the Committee of Inquiry. With that he should work out a plan of Anglo-American cooperation which adopts as its unalterable basis the recommendations of the Joint Inquiry and the commitments of the Balfour declaration, endorsed over and over by Congress, the major parties, and the President himself. We should not refuse to share responsibility for Palestine —though we have a right to scrutinize with care and skepticism demands for military intervention. But responsibility implies approval. We have no obligation whatsoever to accept even partial responsibility for a scheme which goes back on all our professed purposes and sets up an even tighter form of crown-colony rule in Palestine.

The Issues at Paris

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE conference in Paris is, of course, not a peace conference at all. It is a conference to try to get agreement among the nations that joined in defeating the Axis as to the terms of peace they will hereafter enforce upon the vanquished. The treaties are more important as a test of the relations existing among the Allies than as a set of conditions to be met by Hitler's junior partners in crime. If the conference is able to mitigate the tensions which have tightened to the snapping point between the Soviet Union and the West and between the great powers and the small it will have justified itself no matter what decisions are reached about boundary lines in Venetia Guilia or Bulgarian raparations. It is more important that Russia and the United States should agree about Trieste than that Yugoslavia or Italy should keep or lose it. And the same holds true for all the terms laid down in all the draft treaties under negotiation.

This is not to say that the terms have no intrinsic significance. That would be going too far. They are important for their direct effect on the countries concerned, and they are also important because they express the interests and ambitions and fears of the powers that framed them, and so serve to tie the ex-enemy countries into the political network which those powers are weaving. To use again the simplest and handiest example before us: The problem of Trieste may in fact be best met by establishing a free territory under some form of international control. But the solution was not reached by looking at ethnic maps or by consulting the wishes of the population. It emerged as the only possible compromise between the desire of the Western powers to keep Russia away from the shores of the Adriatic and Russia's desire to be there. The arrangement finally agreed upon favors the Soviet ambition but does not permit it an unqualified victory.

So far the best one can say about the treaties as a whole, about the organization of the conference and its procedure, about the area of participation reserved for the smaller nations, is that they are the result of bargains, often hard-driven, among the Big Four. They represent the lowest common denominators of agreement among powers whose differences have come to outweigh, almost to obliterate, their mutual interests. This is not a prescription for achieving peace—either peace with our late enemies or peace among the late allies. If it promises any advantage at all, it is only that of bringing to an end one phase of the war and of showing the victor powers, small and large, where they stand in relation to one another before they begin the much more difficult attempt to reach an agreement about Germany.

What the pessimistic outlook in Paris really indicates is this: The war as a whole is not over. And since the war is not over, the nations gathered at Paris cannot be expected to make peace. The so-called peace conference is, inevitably, merely a new battlefield in the political war which was never ended. The military defeat of the Axis powers shifted the lines and blurred some of the issues; but the struggle goes on with no essential change.

It is convenient in the present phase of the fight to cast Russia in the role of totalitarian menace, and group Britain and ourselves and the lesser Western powers in the other camp—the camp of the defenders of democracy. But this alignment is a little too simple. For the political fight is only partly one between dictatorial and democratic political methods, between repression and freedom. It is that, but it is also a fight in which feudalism and capitalism, weakened under the crushing blows administered by a lost war and harsh military occupation, are struggling against revolution—against socialism in one form or another. The lines are not so sharply drawn as on the field of military battle. And Russia's brusque efforts to push outward its zone of influence or control—undoubtedly a drive that is itself compounded of power politics and revolutionary purpose—collides not only with the will of Britain and the United States to stop this expanding force before it engulfs the West and ends the economic system on which Western strength depends, but also with their desire to maintain individual and political freedom.

So confused, so difficult to follow, is this political war whose front is now the ornate Senate Chamber in the Luxembourg Palace! For even the summary I attempted above is misleading. It gives the impression that there are two fairly well-defined camps, but that, too, is not quite so. Although America is the leader of what I suppose we must call the anti-Russian camp, our representatives in Paris know they must carry on their diplomatic counter-offensive without forcing an open break or driving Moscow to extremes of suspicion and fear which will end all possibility of peaceful accommodation. Consequently their behavior is likely to be a discreet mixture of toughness and conciliation. Nor can they afford to precipitate a showdown in terms that will frighten or antagonize our democratic cohorts. For their ranks are not the solid democratic-capitalist divisions Washington might wish. On the contrary, the smaller countries, particularly those of Western Europe, are sharply divided within themselves, since this political war is a revolution and not only a national struggle. Most of them have powerful Communist parties; all have powerful Socialist parties; several, Britain among them, have Socialist governments. They are only partly in America's camp: their dominant hope may be for a Europe in which political democracy maintains its rule, but one dare not take it for granted that they will accept even this on American terms. Indeed, many powerful democratic elements firmly believe that their only chance of holding on to political freedom is by moving as fast as possible toward a Socialist economy. The heavy weight of America on the capitalist and reactionary side is losing us allies among these groups just as repression is losing Russia a large section of the popular support its revolutionary drive would otherwise surely have won.

These are the issues behind the deliberations in Paris, however remote they may seem from the particular points under discussion. They will be fought out there in the coming weeks, as they are being fought out everywhere in the world every day; they will play a part in every major decision and many lesser ones. And in the end they will have to be decided in their own terms; otherwise peace will not be made in Europe.

Del Vayo Reports from Moscow

For three weeks, J. Alvarez del Vayo, European Editor of The Nation, has been in Moscow discussing the internal and world situation with Russian leaders. His first cabled article will appear in next week's issue of The Nation. Others will follow in early issues.

Rebellion in Tennessee

BY JENNINGS PERRY

Nashville, August 4

IT WAS to have been a nice, quiet, machine-made election on August 1 in Tennessee—a state in which the people actually are fined for voting, and the votes of one-tenth of the adult population suffice to elect. Three hundred thousand dollars had been shaken out of the state and federal employees, the liquor dealers, the road contractors, the insurance brokers, to keep Boss Crump's aged flunkey, Kenneth D. McKellar, in the United States Senate for one more term. Every machine in the state, Democratic and Republican, had closed ranks, as usual, with the big Shelby County machine for the happy kill. And then, down in little McMinn County, in the southeast corner of the state, there was a terrific explosion.

What happened in McMinn, mainly at Athens, the county seat—a gracious, well-shaded valley town—was a popular revolt against tyranny which is already being described in Tennessee as "another Boston Tea Party." It was an armed revolt and entirely successful. It smashed to smithereens one of the most arrant political machines of the state and rattled the teeth of every boss in the vicious ring which, under the domination of Boss Crump of Memphis, has fixed an iron grip upon Tennessee.

The revolt was led by young men freshly back from the wars—Jim Buttram, 24, a grocer's son, ex-corporal twice wounded overseas; J. P. Kennedy, former lieutenant-commander in the navy; young ex-GI James Edward Vestal, two-time winner of the Purple Heart—men like that. The tyranny overthrown at Athens was that of Paul Cantrell, a state senator whose machine has been stealing elections in McMinn at pistol-point for a decade.

Early in the spring a number of veterans who, during the war, had been "thinking about things back home," formed an all-GI ticket to "rescue" the county offices from machine control. The ticket campaigned vigorously, received Republican and Democratic support. The veterans served notice that the polls would be watched.

The machine's answer was to deputize 300 thugs, some from out of the state, and put them in charge of the voting places on election day armed with pistols, shotguns, and blackjacks. This had been seen before in McMinn—and in Polk, the next county, where another Crump ally, Sheriff Burch C. Biggs, had bloodily put down all political opposition. The situation was loaded and primed. At three o'clock in the afternoon, with the GI ticket reportedly leading by a wide margin, the thugs made their play. Watchers for the GI ticket were beaten and driven from the polls; deputies, brandishing arms, seized the ballot boxes and hustled them to the jail. The veterans demanded that the votes be counted in public. A shot was fired from the jail. It was then that the outraged veterans went to arm themselves.

They fought the deputies with their bare fists and took their guns. The people of the town and of the countryside brought them shotguns and shells. They besieged the jail and poured their fire through its windows. Exactly twelve hours after the showdown began, the thirty deputies who formed the garrison came out, hands in the air. The ballot boxes were put under guard by the victors to await the honest, public count the veterans had vowed would be had.

This was the end of the battle of Athens—as true an "uprising of the people" as any history relates. Boss Cantrell, escaping from the embattled jail, fled into hiding. His chief allies, the sheriff and George Woods, speaker of the Tennessee House of Representatives, also high-tailed it from the county and have not yet returned. Troops of the State Guard, started to the scene by Governor Jim McCord, were turned back when it was evident that the Cantrell machine, part of the ring supporting the Governor for renomination, was broken beyond retrieving. The militia cheered the word that they were not to attack the McMinn veterans.

There was little bloodshed at Athens—and the people of Tennessee, by and large, are filled with admiration for the young men who did not come home to be robbed of the rights they had been told they were fighting for. For over half a century Tennessee has not seen a free election: under the poll tax, the suffrage has been given up by the vast majority; as the electorate has withered away, the power of the machine has risen. The people of Tennessee now have been reminded that the ballot was originally won with the bullet and that when the ballot is lost, the people are without any means, save bullets, with which to win it back.

As to the impact of the Tennessee Tea Party in McMinn upon the political future of the state, these straws have been noted in the wind: Burch Biggs of Polk and other bosses of the state have ostentatiously washed their hands of the fallen Cantrell machine; and it was reported on Sunday that Senator McKellar presently will journey from Washington to Athens to ease the situation.

This much may be foreseen: if the veterans stand firm in their cause and example, the next elections in Tennessee will be different from the juggernaut cruise of the machines they have been since the early thirties.

JENNINGS PERRY, noted Southern liberal, is an editor of the Nashville Tennessean.

The Crusader from Down Under

BY ROBERT BENDINER

UNTIL six years ago Australia's role in world diplomacy was roughly comparable to the position of Switzerland in the world of naval affairs. Today it is impossible to pick up a paper without spotting some such headline as "Aussies Hit Britain on Franco," "Australian Delegate Cautions Gromyko," or "Australian Offers Plan for U. N. Atom Pact." A country whose foreign policy until 1940 consisted solely of faith in Singapore and the British Navy has established its autonomy in foreign relations, formulated a coherent policy, laid the foundations of a diplomatic service, and become chief advocate in the United Nations for the Little Forty-Six vis-a-vis the Big Five. For all of which Australians can thank the nature of the war and the energy and vision of one man—Dr. Herbert Vere Evatt, judge, diplomat, biographer, connoisseur of post-impressionist art, and authority on the science of cricket.

To appreciate the sensational nature of Evatt's career—the swiftness of his rise and the blend of vitality, idealism, and political sophistication that has marked his course—translate his progress into American terms. You will have to imagine a boy from a genteel but poverty-stricken family, product of a small coal town, in, say, the anthracite district of Pennsylvania. After a brilliant passage through the elementary and high schools of the community, he gains entrance to a leading university and proceeds to win top honors, not only in the law, which he has chosen to follow, but in literature, philosophy, and mathematics as well; at the same time he serves as president of the student organization and wins his letter in football. At the age of 23 he has his master's degree, opens a practice, and associates himself with the political left. At 31, now a Doctor of Laws, he goes before the Supreme Court to prevent the deportation of two labor leaders and acquires a national reputation. He is elected to the legislature of his state and five years later—at the age of 36—takes his place on the highest bench in the land. After ten years, with a brilliant record behind him and an illustrious career ahead, he grows restive, with his country at war, and (here the imagination is taxed severely) steps down from the Supreme Court to run for Congress. He is elected, and with the success of his party at the polls in the following year, he is a natural choice for membership in the Cabinet, drawing no less than a dual appointment—as Attorney General and Secretary of State.

Substitute New South Wales for Pennsylvania and identify the "political left" as the Australian Labor Party, and you have there the framework of Evatt's swift career down to 1945. But the framework only; the warmth and color of the man, the drives that motivate him, and the uses to which he turns his acquired power are the substance of the story.

THE UNPEDANTIC SCHOLAR

In Australia Herbert Evatt is thought of as a bookish man, an intellectual in politics. He is the learned justice who stepped down from the High Court to mix in the rough-and-tumble of the vote-catcher's art. He is one of the Empire's keenest authorities on constitutional law. He is the author of a biography of William A. Holman, one of the founders of the Labor Party, which is nothing less than a political history of Australia since 1890. He is the prime mover in a campaign to provide Australians with better libraries; he is a critic of modern art.

Yet these scholarly attributes by no means leap out at the interviewer. Dr. Evatt is an easy man to talk with. He is not without a touch of boyish vanity, perhaps, but there is no pompousness in him, no pose of the learned judge or the world statesman. And certainly there is nothing of the pedant in his readily tapped stream of Cockney-like vowels. "Naow you tike this bloody business todye," he will say by way of introducing some rather earthy remarks on an afternoon's session of the Security Council. His interests are wide and wonderfully varied, and they draw on a youthful eagerness uncommon in a man of 52. An hour's conversation with him is likely to range from the day's baseball scores, through the personality of the late Oliver Wendell Holmes, to the rank injustice that history and fable have done to William Bligh, villain of the Bounty but hero of one of Evatt's historical volumes. He is extremely fond of the United States, a prejudice undoubtedly enhanced by two major considerations: America's role in warding off the Japanese in the dark days when invasion looked certain, and an Iowa-born wife of charm and distinction. Mrs. Evatt, incidentally, accompanies her husband on nearly all his missions and during the war won a commendation from Prime Minister Curtin for "the part she has played in every phase of the [Evatt] Delegation's activities overseas."

Evatt's informality of speech—and dress—is an integral part of his personality, the reflection of a profound repudiation of formalism in all his thinking. It is a characteristic that runs through all his activity and gives it a consistent quality: as a jurist he is emphatically more concerned with justice than with precedent or the letter of the law; politically he considers himself a Socialist without dogma; diplomatically he shuns the striped-pants-and-protocol approach and goes directly to the essence of the matter at hand. For a man with a reputation as an intellectual he is thus curiously elastic, un-anchored to any established body of thought. But in place of the arid rigidity that marks the truly professional intellectual there is in Evatt a more emotional and warmer drive—the urge not so much to justice itself, which can be cold and retributive, but rather to the eradiction of injustice. He is instinctively moved to take up the cause of the weak against the strong, the small against the great: he is everlastingly the champion of the wronged, whether the victim suffers from a whole system of social inequalities or merely, as in the case of Captain Bligh, a personal slander that has passed into history.

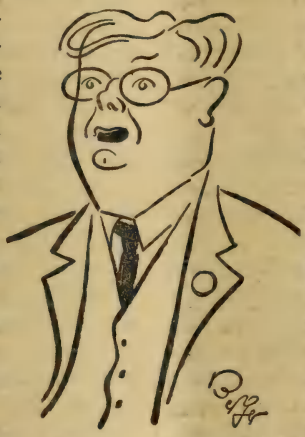
COUNSEL TO THE UNDERDOG

Referring me to a book by Doctor Evatt, a friend of his of long standing advised me to read it as "a key to Evatt's political and social character." Appropriately enough the title of the volume is "Injustice Within the Law," and is a legalistic and none too lively little study of the case of the "Martyrs of Tolpuddle." These were six British trade unionists who in 1834 were sentenced to seven years' transportation to Australia, which in those times and circumstances was almost certain to mean a lifetime in exile. Technically the men were charged with administering unlawful oaths, but it was perfectly and widely understood that this was merely a happy device for breaking up "the dangerous and alarming combinations," as the rising trade unions were described. It is characteristic of Evatt to turn his scholarship precisely to this case and just as characteristic for him to draw the conclusions he does. He scrupulously clears the prosecution of technical flaws and illegalities of any sort, and then points out that "There was no violence in the Dorchester Case save the extreme and horrible violence of the law itself." He recommends the case to lawyers today on the ground that "in one sense the case represented the very coronation of injustice, and yet there was no technical breach of the law."



Herbert Vere Evatt

Defender of constitutionalism as opposed to the unwritten law of England, Evatt nevertheless is far from a strict constructionist. Of our own Supreme Court justices of the recent past, he admires Stone for giving Congress a loose rein, and incidentally for his personal qualities, but his greater admiration is reserved for those giants of dissent who in one degree or another regarded the Court as a weapon of social justice: Holmes, Brandeis, Cardozo.

Evatt was hard put to tell me which of his own opinions seemed to him the most significant, but it was obvious that he got most pleasure out of the case of the Hungarian writer Egon Kisch, who, unwanted in Nazi-ridden Hungary for both racial and political reasons, sought refuge in Australia. Primarily to keep out Asiatics the Australians have long resorted to tricky immigration laws, one of which requires that every entrant must take dictation in some one European tongue arbitrarily selected by the immigration authorities. Not too keen about Kisch's politics, the official in charge refused him entry on the ground that the unfortunate Hungarian Jew was unable to take down a passage in Gaelic! Mr. Justice Evatt ruled out Gaelic as a European language within the meaning of the law and chalked up another triumph for the underdog.

Like his law, Evatt's politics is rooted in social justice, but he is unwilling to trade political freedom for economic. He is just as unwilling to trade present principles for future hopes. "Democratic procedures," he says, "are as important as democratic ends." He explains certain Russian behavior that he has encountered in his term as a delegate to the Security Council as an expression of the Communist inability to accept even the most temporary defeat in the give-and-take of the democratic process. "Ultimately, decisions have to be made by ballots or bullets," he says. "We believe in ballots. We may be beaten, but we can take a beating and try again, and we're always willing to take that chance."

Evatt's socialism, if it is socialism, is of the Fabian sort. "Meliorism" is his own word for it. "New Deal" would be ours. He is opposed to governing families, concentrated corporate wealth, and interference with civil liberties; and he favors the gradual socialism that comes by way of social legislation and public ownership of railroads, electric power, and major natural resources. This program hardly constitutes Marxism, and he doesn't pretend that it does. The greatest world figure of the generation, for him, is Franklin D. Roosevelt, and after him, Australia's late Prime Minister John Curtin, under whom Evatt took office and whom he regards as one of the greatest speakers of his time. Asquith, Wilson, and Hull are other stars in the Evatt galaxy. But with the possible exception of Curtin none is in a class with Roosevelt, whose loss, he believes, was a blow from which the world is still reeling.

INDEPENDENCE—WITHIN THE EMPIRE

Evatt's congenital indifference to precedent was in evidence two months after he took office as Minister of External Affairs. When the war had broken out in Europe two years earlier, the Menzies government had simply announced that since Britain had declared a state of hostilities with Germany, Australia was automatically at war. But when the Japanese struck in December, 1941, Evatt did things differently. Taking the initiative, though drawing his authority from Curtin, of course, he ordered the Australian Minister in London to submit to King George declarations of war against Japan, Finland, Hungary, and Rumania. No British official took part in the matter, and it was explained to the Australian Parliament that this procedure was chosen in order "to make it clear that the King was acting exclusively on the advice of his Ministers in the Commonwealth."

The incident may not seem significant here, but it was rightly regarded as foreshadowing a new relationship within the Empire. The immediate sinking of the Prince of Wales and the Repulse greatly accelerated the Labor government's drive toward autonomy in the prosecution of the war, and even before the fall of Singapore in February, 1942, Prime Minister Curtin was announcing to the world: "Australia looks to America free of any pangs as to our traditional links of kinship with the United Kingdom." The plan to get MacArthur out of the Philippines and place him in command of the southwest Pacific theater was proposed by the Australians directly to President Roosevelt, without any prior sanction in London. Evatt was sent to Washington to plead for immediate aid of all sorts and also for Australia's right to sit in the Pacific War Council on equal terms with Britain and the United States.

The British were shocked, but they were not the only ones. Australia's Tories, who prefer a share in the prestige of Empire to autonomy as a small power, have always looked upon the Labor Party as "nationalist." If Evatt is typical, the party's nationalism is mild indeed. It is anti-imperialist, of course, in the sense that it stands squarely opposed to exploitation anywhere in the Empire, and it is determined to steer an independent course within the United Nations. But despite the large Irish Catholic bloc in the Australian population—particularly in the Labor Party—there is no trace of the rabid anti-British feeling of our own Middle West and of parts of Canada. Evatt is fond of speaking of the British Commonwealth as a "family partnership," and over the BBC a few months ago he quoted an Australian poet to describe the attitude of the people of the Dominions:

> They came to show to all the world that > kinship conquers space,
> And he who fights the British Isles must > fight the British race.

Despite this bond, the keystone of Australia's first genuinely independent foreign policy is not the Commonwealth at all, but the United Nations. Evatt is almost passionately convinced that the U. N. offers the only hope for a fearful world. And he is equally convinced that to realize that hope the U. N. will have to be considerably overhauled. Bringing to San Francisco his feeling for justice, his brash approach to diplomacy, and his instinctive defense of the weak, it was inevitable that he would stand out from the first as the champion of the small nations. He will tell you at once that he does not look upon himself in this light at all and believes that he has been somewhat misunderstood on this point. He fully realizes that the power of the major states gives them added responsibility and that this in turn entitles them to a greater share of control than the smaller nations have a logical right to expect. But he is devoted to upholding the principles of the Charter, and, as he shrewdly points out, these principles are generally of more concern to the little states, which depend on them for security, than to the larger powers, which depend on them for rhetoric.

TILTING AT THE VETO

On two fronts Evatt has carried on a fight within the U. N. that has made him easily its most colorful figure (no intention here to damn with faint praise). At San Francisco he was one of the chief architects of the Economic and Social Council, designed to foster better living standards and as close an approach as possible to "full employment." He is Socialist enough to believe that "peace is not merely the absence of war," that "a permanent system of security can be made effective and acceptable only if it has a foundation in economic justice."

The Council was set up, but Evatt was to discover before long that the over-all pattern of the United Nations was to present a question that dwarfed the problems of any of its subordinate agencies. This was the question of the veto—the right of any one of the Big Five on the Security Council to overrule a decision of all the other members combined. Identified in the public mind as the champion of the anti-veto forces, Evatt has been variously portrayed as a St. George and a Don Quixote, but the fact is that he was not intransigently opposed to the principle at the start, nor is he so today.

What Evatt refuses to countenance is not the principle of unanimity itself, but what he regards as the abuse of the veto in practice. His feelings on the matter came to a boil in the Security Council over the handling of the Spanish question. Evatt has always been belligerently and vocally hostile toward the Franco regime. He fought for strong action in the Council, and came up with the best compromise attainable in view of the coolness of the American and British delegations, only to have Gromyko scornfully apply the veto, thus leaving Franco unbothered by any action whatever. With all the suave diplomacy of a magistrate in traffic court, Evatt addressed his Soviet colleague. "Because the thing doesn't go quite the way you like it," he advised, "don't brush aside the views of the majority."

Once resigned to the so-called "unanimity principle," Evatt is now convinced that it will have to go if the U. N. is to be made a workable instrument. "It is a travesty of democratic procedures," he told an international NBC audience shortly before his departure for the Paris peace conference, "when any one nation can block the unanimous opinion of the remainder of a Council of eleven when it is endeavoring solely to conciliate and adjust international disputes and situations."

What started out to be merely a defense of a point of view is now taking on the proportions of a crusade. Evatt appears, not without reason, to feel that the smaller powers were foxed into an acceptance of the veto principle at San Francisco in the belief that it would be used with discretion. He is determined now that it will not be carried over into whatever international agency is established for the control of atomic energy. If he gains his point—and he is persuasive, persistent, and pugnacious in debate—a diplomatic triumph of historical proportions will have been won by a nation that didn't own a diplomat ten years ago. If he doesn't he will at least have proved that political wisdom, far from being a monopoly of Washington, London, and Moscow, is to be found in a much purer form in Canberra, population 14,000.

Men Against Unemployment

BY JOHN J. CORSON

Washington, August 2

THOSE who viewed the Full Employment Act as a fundamental plank in the Rooseveltian "economic bill of rights" are dismayed by the President's choice of men to serve on the Council of Economic Advisors. The names of none of the appointees—Dr. Edwin G. Nourse, Dean John Davidson Clark, or Leon H. Keyserling—figured in the speculation that took place during the six months the President required to make his selections. Their appointment comes as a surprise. That dismay and surprise is evoked by the fact that Nourse and Clark seemingly lack the daring, imagination, and willingness to experiment which the Council will need if it is to advise as to how the free enterprise system is to provide fuller employment in the future than in the past.

However, Messrs. Nourse and Clark are sound and experienced, if conventional. Together with Keyserling, they possess a variety of competences which effectively supplement one another, and may well fit the period in which the Council is to be established. Men such as Alvin Hansen, Leon Henderson, or Robert Nathan, more given to experimentation and less addicted to conventional approaches, would have difficulty adjusting to the psychological climate of the times.

Dr. Edwin G. Nourse is an economist who represents "respectable" economic thinking. Most of the twenty-three years he has spent at the Brookings Institute, and his earlier career as well, have been devoted to the study of agricultural economics. By numerous writings he has demonstrated a conservative predilection but also open-mindedness and fairness in appraising new ideas. His brand of economics is perhaps best revealed in his most recent book, "Price Making in a Democracy," published in 1944. There he presents a courageous analysis of the interrelationship of prices, wages, and profits in a free enterprise system, and worries aloud as to what is to be done about it. Even enlightened businessmen, he recognizes, seldom can look at their own affairs in terms of achieving the social objective of a high level of employment, production, and purchasing power. Their trade associations have more often been organs of restrictive practices than of flexible, farseeing economic policy. Perhaps, he reasons, the role of balance wheel in the economy might be played by such agencies as the United States Chamber of Commerce or the N. A. M. To meet his obligation of advising the President on business and government action to forestall unemployment and maintain a healthy economy, however, he will surely need a better answer than that.

Leon Keyserling, young (38) and well known in Washington, is schooled in the liberal traditions. He won his spurs while serving the doughty Robert Wagner as legislative assistant. Then (1933-37) he worked on the National Labor Relations Act and legislation creating the United States Housing Authority. Since 1938 he has served as general counsel for the successive federal housing agencies. In 1945 he won second prize in the Pabst Post-War Employment Award Contest with a brilliant essay, "The American Economic Goal." Yet Keyserling is a lawyer by trade, not an economist. His interest and competence lie in the development of governmental machinery which will produce concerted policies to lift production, employment, and the standard of living. He alone worked the miracle of joining the names of Senators Wagner, Ellender, and Taft on the much-discussed housing bill. Perhaps his deft touch will bring equally strange bedfellows together in the name of full employment.

John Davidson Clark, dean of the College of Business Administration at the University of Nebraska, is less widely known by either bureaucrats or Congressmen than his colleagues. Congressional cloak-room gossip has it that when queried by Senators examining his qualifications for this post, he professed an inability to voice any judgment as to the values of the TVA as an institution. He explained, it is said, that he had not had an opportunity to compare its operating costs with analogous private businesses. Other Washingtonians have learned from Who's Who that at the age of forty-four, after a successful business career in oil, he studied economics at Johns Hopkins and embarked on a career of teaching. Senator O'Mahoney has known him, however, from the time he was city attorney of Cheyenne, Wyoming, in 1907. This acquaintanceship apparently explains his emergence as one of the President's principal economic advisors.

JOHN J. CORSON is director of research for the Washington, D. C., Post. A veteran of ten years in the civil service, he was formerly director of the United States Employment Service.

There is not a political hack in the trio. Each is a capable professional man. Together they constitute what the President described, when announcing Dr. Nourse's appointment, as "a fact-finding agency." This choice of words offers an ironical comment on earlier promises that the Full Employment Act was "an historic Congressional declaration . . . of the Federal government's responsibility . . . to utilize all its resources for the purpose of maintaining employment opportunities for those able, willing, and seeking to work." Hence, observers suspect the Council may prove no more than a focussing point for the government's fiscal, monetary, labor, wage, and social-insurance policies as they affect employment, production, and purchasing power. It will collect reports from various governmental agencies, weigh the trend of events, and submit to the President appraisals of economic conditions, which he, in turn, will review with Secretary of the Treasury Snyder. There will be little forecasting of the economic tides and even less in the way of a program to insure that all public administrative and legislative policies "promote employment, production, and purchasing power."

In the immediate future, this may not be too serious. Little unemployment has accompanied reconversion. The fears of deflation which supported the advocates of the Full Employment Act throughout 1945 are for the time minimized. The problem in 1946-47 is that of boom control. That requires coordinated governmental economic policies if we are not to sow now the seeds of the next depression. Yet the Truman administration and, perhaps, the boom psychology of public opinion will not support an aggressive governmental effort to preserve full employment.

The best that can now be anticipated is that the Council will corral a competent and imaginative staff and establish within the federal structure its responsibility for coordinating governmental economic policies. Then, when the economic cycle has again run its course, some subsequent president may replace Messrs. Nourse and Clark with men who will constitute the kind of economic general staff which the federal government certainly requires if the system of free enterprise is to continue without subjecting our society to periodic blights of depression.

In the Wind

WHAT? NO DISCOUNT? Bread and Butter, Consumers Union's weekly, reprints the following letter to a Congressman from an irate citizen in Melrose, Mass., who had been comparing his June and July food bills: "Congressman Angier L. Goodwin, Debtor, House Office Bldg., Washington, D. C. For the money you have picked from my pocket by your votes to sabotage price control as a ventriloquist dummy for the National Association of Manufacturers, balance due, July 1-20—$18.07. Please remit promptly. (Signed) A long suffering victim of Congressional misrepresentation."

BEDFELLOWS HALL: The New Leader, which calls itself "America's Leading Liberal-Labor Weekly," is featuring the European correspondence of William Henry Chamberlin. So is America's leading conservative-capitalist daily—the Wall Street Journal.

LONG ARM OF THE LAW! A New York Sun story about a police officer's malfeasance reads: "He was found five blocks off post, in uniform, when he should have been on duty, with his arms around a woman's neck. Two women, who remonstrated with him, said that he waved his nightstick at them and said, 'Get along, or I'll arrest you for interfering with an officer in the performance of his duty.' "

WHAT PRICE VISION! Philip W. Pillsbury, president of the Pillsbury Mills, makes this comment in his firm's annual report: "For American agriculture, we should already have planned—and should be planning now—what to do with the coming grain surplus." An admirable thought; perhaps something should be done, instead of letting the grain rot.

INSURANCE FOR A BEST SELLER. The New York Times comments: "With all the books pouring off the presses nowadays, a person whose time is not all his own would certainly miss out on some of the most absorbing ones, if it weren't for the anti-vice societies. The deuce of it is that other people also read the anti-vice news, and before a busy man can find time to get to the book store, there isn't a copy left."

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind —either clippings with source and date or stories that can be clearly authenticated. We will pay $1 for each item accepted.—EDITORS THE NATION.]

Holland's Last Chance

BY ANDREW ROTH

The Hague

THE EYES of all Dutchmen are focused these days upon their former premier, Professor Willem Schermerhorn; for they see in him Holland's last chance to retain its link to the fabulously rich Indies without a long, bitter, and costly war. The new Catholic-Labor cabinet—formation of which was delayed five weeks by wrangling over Indonesia—has given him the special title of Commissioner-General for the East Indies and unprecedented power to reach a settlement with the Indonesian Republic.

There is no doubt that attachment to empire is much more widespread in Holland than in England. There are, of course, the extreme jingoes in the picturesquely-named organization "Indies in Danger—No Time to Lose" and among the young bloods who chant, "We'll meet on Sukarno's grave." But far more important is the fact that a very large proportion of the middle class feels a strong sentimental and economic desire to hold on to the Indies. Quite a few say frankly that Holland will be merely another Denmark if she loses the Indies, from which she derived about one-fifth of her income. The feeling of others can best be exemplified by the true story of a Dutch lawyer who, in his youth, went to Batavia to practice law. He was very successful, came to love the country, and built himself a beautiful home and swimming pool in the expectation that he would settle down there in his retirement. The Japanese came and he was interned; but during his entire internment he looked forward to returning to his fine Batavia home. When he was released at the war's end he hurried back, only to find armed Indonesians at the gate and President Sukarno disporting himself in the pool. The natural reaction in such circumstances is a determination to retake the possessions into which went so many years of effort.

The problem of Dutch-Indonesian relations is complicated, and, if he is to succeed, Professor Schermerhorn will have to overcome two Dutch habits which have dogged all past negotiations: first, to yield too little and too late; second, to regard the Indonesians through 1940 eyes—as amiable, attractive, but fundamentally inferior persons who cannot really be trusted to exploit their own riches efficiently.

In the past Dutch offers have never been able to catch up with the development of nationalist feeling. Most skilled observers agree that a generous and specific offer last summer would have offset Japanese sponsorship of the Indonesian Republic. But it was not until November that the Indonesians were offered a very junior partnership in the Dutch Empire, with some say in the internal affairs of the Indies, and even this belated offer was vague and full of loopholes.

On February 10—by which time the breadth and strength of nationalist feeling was painfully evident—the Dutch took another timid step. They promised the establishment of a Commonwealth of Indonesia within the Dutch Kingdom consisting of member countries enjoying different degrees of autonomy, the commonwealth to have a parliamentary body, guaranteed freedom of speech and worship, and legal and educational equality. After a transitional period (time unspecified) the commonwealth would be free to decide its own destinies.

But here again the details were so drawn that it was obvious the Indonesians would get the shadow of self-government without the substance. The constitution for the commonwealth was to be drawn by the Netherlands government "in consultation" with Indonesian groups selected by the Netherlands government. There was no indication of the extent of the franchise contemplated. The parliament would have had an Indonesian majority, but the cabinet would not have been responsible to it. Furthermore the chief executive was to have been a representative of the Dutch crown with special powers reserved to guarantee "fundamental rights, efficient administration, and sound financial management."

It was at this point that the British government stepped into the negotiations. They were concerned about Indonesia, not only because their troops were involved, but because they feared that a real breakdown and open warfare might touch off the nationalist powder-kegs in Malaya, Burma, and India. Feeling that the Dutch could not arrive at a satisfactory compromise unaided, London sent Sir Archibald Clark-Kerr (now Lord Inverchapel) to Batavia with Acting Governor H. J. Van Mook to assist him.

The conference had a good chance of success because Indonesian Premier Sutan Sjahrir felt it was better to come to terms with the comparatively weak Dutch "little brothers" than to have Indonesia taken before the UN with the likelihood that it would wind up under the economic domination of the infinitely stronger American "big brothers." Before formal conferences began in Batavia on March 13, Premier Sjahrir broadened his cabinet and secured sweeping powers to conduct nego-

ANDREW ROTH, a regular contributor to The Nation on Far Eastern affairs, is now en route to Asia for a first-hand view of developing events. He is the author of "Dilemma in Japan."

tiations. On March 27 he went as far as he could to meet the Dutch and agreed that the Indonesian Republic would take its place as a dominion or free state within the Indonesian Commonwealth contemplated by the Dutch. However, he did insist on certain guarantees which were, in fact, the minimum he could accept in view of the insistent demands of the young, fervent nationalists for "complete independence." These were: first, recognition of de facto Republican control of Java and Sumatra, with other Indonesian territories allowed after three years to vote on joining the Republic; and second, a treaty between the Netherlands and the Republic covering economic, military, and foreign affairs.

H. J. Van Mook

Lord Inverchapel declared that Sjahrir was "wise, cool, and reasonable" and made it clear he felt "the proposed solution was a very good one." Dr. Van Mook had not been authorized to recognize Republican control of Sumatra or agree to a treaty with the Republic but apparently felt that Sjahrir's terms were about as good as could be secured. "The points of view," he said on the eve of his departure from Batavia, "have now become close enough to justify consultations in the Hague with a view to bridging the remaining difficulties."

But it was impossible to sell the Batavia agreement to the Dutch cabinet. The Labor Party members, including Premier Schermerhorn and Minister of Overseas Territories Logemanns, favored conciliation but the Ministers of the Catholic Party and other conservatives would have nothing of it. Irate conservatives reviled Van Mook as "more Indonesian than Dutch," and in Parliament the spokesman for the Anti-Revolutionary Party shrilled "We cannot accept this republic—a made-in-Japan product of force, murder, and robbery."

The May elections which followed made a compromise seem all the more remote for they showed that Holland, virtually alone among the occupied countries of Europe, had scarcely moved leftward at all. The dominating influence of religion remained virtually untouched: the Catholic Party won thirty-two of the hundred seats in the lower chamber; the Calvinist Anti-Revolutionary Party (which is still fighting the French Revolution), thirteen; and assorted other rightist-religious parties, sixteen. The Labor Party, which expected to make large inroads among middle-class liberals because it had abandoned Marxism for the Fabianism of the British Labor Party, succeeded in raising its number of seats from twenty-three to twenty-nine but lost part of its left wing to the Communists, who now have ten seats.

The elections were no mandate for a conciliatory policy because such a policy was supported only by the Labor Party, which favors Indonesian self-government within the Dutch kingdom, and by the Communists, who favor an alliance with an independent Indonesia. And together they received under forty per cent of the poll.

Since the elections, however, a number of factors have intervened to push the Dutch toward a more conciliatory policy, one being military weakness. Lieutenant General Sir Montague Stopford, British commander in Indonesia, has estimated it would take three army corps (roughly 150,000 men) and a year to retake Java from the Nationalists. The Dutch now have 36 inadequately armed and trained battalions (some 30,000 men) there, and another division in training here and due to be shipped in the fall. It is difficult to raise more because this is a small, war-battered country with a man-power shortage. Obviously the Dutch cannot retake the Indies unaided.

It is similarly obvious that Britain and America are anxious for the Dutch to pursue a more conciliatory policy. It is significant, of course, that Premier Beel visited London two weeks before his cabinet was formed. The British have been applying pressure by withdrawing their troops from the Indies before the Dutch can replace them. The United States has made it difficult for the Dutch to get shipping for military forces and equipment being sent to the Indies and has apparently made it clear that Holland will not be considered a good loan risk if it embarks on a colonial war. This Anglo-American pressure has softened up Dutch conservatives, who are very much afraid that the Indonesian question will be taken up by the UN and that the upshot will be expanded United States and British penetration.

Furthermore, Indonesian developments have demonstrated that prior failure to reach an agreement has strengthened nationalists who favor complete independence. The Indonesians are now asking virtually an alliance between two sovereign states and de facto control, not only of Java and Sumatra, but all other areas in the Indies voting to join them.

The Labor Party has utilized these pressures to secure acceptance of their policy. Just after the election the Catholics asked Labor to join a coalition cabinet, but Labor replied it would join only if its conciliatory Indonesian policy were accepted and applied by persons acceptable to it. The Catholics were unwilling to go it alone or align themselves with the rightists because they have a left wing which might split off under such conditions. Finally, after five weeks of wrangling, a cabinet was formed with J. R. Jonkman (Labor) as Minister of Overseas Territories. Even more important was the appointment of former Premier Schermerhorn as Commissioner-General to reach an agreement with the Indonesians. Professor Schermerhorn—who is widely admired in Holland and trusts, and is trusted by, Sjahrir—has told his friends that he accepted this assignment only on condition that he would have full powers to secure as good a treaty as he can, even if its terms are not as favorable as those brought back by Van Mook.

It is true, of course, that Premier Beel has declared that Holland would not go beyond the instructions sent Van Mook in March, which recognized Republican control only in Java and did not provide for a treaty. But well-informed circles here feel that this is merely a way of soothing the public. The state of public opinion in Holland today is such that if Schermerhorn grants the minimum terms of the Indonesian Republic—and thus avoids a costly and probably unsuccessful colonial war—he is sure to be attacked violently for having sold out the Dutch Empire to a group of worthless, Japanese-inspired brigands. But strange as it may seem, only by loosening the ties can the connections be preserved.

Of Peace and the Balkans

BY RUSTEM VAMBERY

WHY our age should be called the atomic instead of the moronic age is not easy to explain. After all, the Dark Ages were not dark because the electric light had not yet been invented; the eighteenth century is not termed the Age of Enlightenment because of Benjamin Franklin's invention of the lightning conductor; and the nineteenth century is not called the Century of Liberalism because of the liberal profits that industrialism made possible. Today the rocket plane has antiquated the Diesel engine, the energy of the atom has been harnessed. But what mental or moral values, what human understanding or social systems of cooperation, has this "atomic" age created?

The Allies had up-to-date weapons with which they could win the war, but for lack of an ideology which will help to reconcile the ex-Allies they apparently are entirely unable to win the peace. Their haggling and stickling is due not so much to the clash of capitalist and Communist economies as it is to the power politics concealed behind their flimsy veil of obsolete arguments. There was unanimity in refusing to return the Pusterthal, with its German-speaking population, to Austria, because a strategic railway runs along the valley beside the highway which Caesar's legionaries built 2,000 years ago. To refer to a "strategic railway" in the age of the atom bomb, of rockets, and of airborne troops is as anachronistic as to resurrect Caesar's legions. All members of the Paris conference would be equally shocked if anyone dared to doubt that their efforts to establish peace are based on justice, or asserted that their methods are as antiquated as a force of lancers or musketeers would have been on D-Day in Normandy.

RUSTEM VAMBERY is the author of the recently published "Hungary—To Be or Not To Be." A noted sociologist and criminologist, he has written extensively on European problems.

It is illogical to expect a just peace from nations that demanded an "unconditional surrender" which included the unpublished provisos that served as loopholes for the House of Savoy and Admiral Horthy. Justice is the fair application of a rule; which rules or principles are the architects of peace supposed to apply? For many weeks the world was kept on tenterhooks because of Trieste and the Balkan treaties; yet these were minor questions on the fringe of the real problem. The facts were clear: Trieste, with an overwhelmingly Italian population, is a port that is essential to Yugoslavia, Austria, and Hungary. Internationalizing the city leaves the fundamental principles of the future treaties as obscure as ever.

Inexact as it is to speak of "Balkan treaties"—as neither Rumania nor Hungary is a part of the Balkan Peninsula—it is still less admissible to ignore the difference in the ethnic, economic, social, and political structures of the three satellite countries. Their national sensitiveness cannot be satisfied, yet obviously some means must be found to curb the recurrent feuds between these countries and their neighbors, if the peacemakers are preparing for peace and not for a future war.

Let us assume that the ethnic principle is paramount. Bulgarians insist that the majority of Macedonians are Bulgarians both "in speech and sympathy"; the Greeks claim that the Macedonian civilization is Greek; the Albanians say that the Macedonians are, racially, Albanian; and we are told by Hugh Seton-Watson that "the Macedonian problem is essentially an internal problem of Yugoslavia." Can it reasonably be assumed that the Bulgarian treaty is going to settle this controversial issue? Rumania claims Transylvania because the majority of the population is Rumanian, but refuses for strategic reasons to return a purely Magyar strip of territory adjacent to the frontier of Hungary. Is it not odd that, in preparing a peace treaty, the elimination of causes of friction should be overruled by considerations of the strategy of the next war? While the Rumanian and Hungarian governments are on friendly terms, the chauvinistic spirit of both populations has by no means abated. In spite of the candid statement by the Hungarian premier that the readjustment of the frontiers is improbable, the ghost of revisionism is still very much alive.

Reports on the Paris Conference have made it plain that strategic, economic, and political considerations weighed heavily in the Big Four decisions. None of the Big Powers likes all the decisions by which "possible seeds of furture strife have been sown," and consoling references to the fair application of conflicting principles are frequent. This game is transparent enough, as the references are merely a cloak for power politics. To ease its conscience the American delegation has inserted a clause permitting future revision of treaties, overlooking the futility of Clemenceau's similar proviso in 1919.

If for the "Free Territory of Trieste" a UN-guaranteed internationalization seemed the only possible solution, a similar solution must be found for the difficulties which the so-called Balkan treaties offer. Quod uni justum, alteri aequum—what is just in one case should be fair in the other—was the axiom of Roman jurists. Sumner Welles called the Trieste decision disastrous because of the "bitter friction between Italians and Yugoslavs" that it provokes. Apparently he overlooks the bitterness that would have been provoked by recognition of either the Italian or Yugoslav claim.

No matter how carefully the frontiers of the contiguous ethnic areas are drawn, the new borderline will disappoint both the interested countries, and areas with mixed populations will remain in each. In any case, territorial adjustments should be made only in a friendly way, by mutual understanding; adjustments imposed by the Big Powers will be resented by one country or the other, regardless of the justice or fairness of the decision.

For the Danubian and the Balkan region there is no justice, no solution, except in an internationally controlled federation. This is certainly not a new suggestion. Louis Kossuth was the first to advocate it, and Palacky, Masaryk, and many others have followed suit. Some years ago the Soviet Union opposed a Southeast European Federation, lest it turn into a cordon sanitaire; and the federation of democratic countries with such reactionary ones as Rumania and Hungary seemed impracticable to the Russians. Since then the scenery has changed. Russia has recognized these two countries as truly democratic, and there is no reason why she should put more trust in any of her "independent" neighbors than in a federation whose members are as overwhelmingly Slavophile as the Bulgars are fanatically pro-Russian. The question asked by Professor Laski,* in a recent issue of The Nation, is perfectly justified. Such a federation, controlled by the U. N., would dispel the suspicion of the Western Powers that the Soviet Union might use her friendly neighbors as an iron curtain or even as a spearhead against the West. Another objection raised by Mr. Hugh Seton-Watson, that "no federation will succeed unless it insures minimum standards of good government and an educational system which fosters loyalty to itself," is no objection at all; without these prerequisites unfederated states cannot prosper either.

But the existence of a Danubian or a Southeast European Federation depends not only "on its treatment of the two vital problems of social change and relations with the Great Powers" but even more on the relations between the Great Powers themselves, who have to agree upon fundamental principles and get rid of their own distrust and suspicion before they can set forth terms for their ex-enemies. In view of the post-war revival of hectic chauvinism, it is unlikely that the Danubian or Balkan countries themselves could initiate this federation unless the Great Powers use douce violence to instigate the scheme. Douce violence, however, is always preferable to the forceful violence which would inevitably follow if, by a repetition of the blunders of 1919, these countries were delivered to the mutual jealousy of the ex-Allies.

Whether the Big Four can agree upon some kind of federation in one of Europe's storm-centers is a test of just how serious the Paris peace-making is. A federation need not be a political federation to begin with, as an economic federation guaranteed by the U. N. is likely to develop into some kind of political union. Neither the question of disputed territories nor the protection of national minorities can be solved in any other way. Though it may sound paradoxical to say so, small nations cannot preserve their independence without first sacrificing it. This is what Señor Araquistain meant by saying: "Many states of Central and Eastern Europe cannot be independent; some of them are so dependent upon the others that they have no freedom of determination. Thus they must federate." World War I disrupted three empires to satisfy the appetite of nationalism. Now these liberated nations have to be liberated once more; to save their national existence, they must be integrated.

If this Atomic Age is to produce more convincing intellectual results than the knowledge that the atom bomb can destroy vessels massed in a lagoon or that goats can remain alive where human beings would have been killed, it must show that splitting the atom does not imply the atomization of mankind. Vetoing, getting tough, pounding the table, and similar paraphernalia of sovereignty are no substitutes for a serious endeavor to establish peace with our ex-enemies and our ex-allies. Tocqueville's patrie intellectuelle is of greater value than that sovereignty which Jean Bodin contributed to political science. Sovereignty has become both progenitor and idol of nationalism, until today it resembles that primitive god of Greek mythology who devoured his own children.

* "Does he [Molotov] assume that a regional arrangement under the principles of the United Nations is evil, but that the organization of Russian satellite states in the east is good?" [Information Please, Mr. Molotov. The Nation, June 15]

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

British Press Trusts

A FINE hullabaloo arose in Fleet Street recently when Herbert Morrison, No. 2 in the British Labor Government, indicated that a public inquiry into the newspaper industry was under consideration. The press lords sprang to their dictaphones yelling "the free press is in danger" and charged Morrison with tyranny. Beverley Baxter, Tory M. P. and "trained seal" employed by the Kemsley newspaper combine, asserted that, since all the salient facts about the press were already known, "an inquiry can only have as its purpose a threat to the continuation of its independence." A curious argument, although one that is familiar enough to students of the newspaper industry, British or American. The press which boasts that it exists for the enlightenment of the public hates to have the spotlight turned on its own activities.

As a matter of fact, the origin of the statement that caused such a furore was a demand, backed by a large part of the British press, for an investigation of the British Broadcasting Corporation, which is a government monopoly. Mr. Morrison, while refusing this demand on technical grounds, promised an inquiry before the Corporation's charter was again renewed and added blandly: "I think all good channels for the dissemination of opinion to the public would benefit by having their state of health inquired into by an independent body. We do not exclude the press from that consideration."

Whether a Royal Commission on the press, with authority to subpoena witnesses and documents, will really be appointed is still uncertain. There appears to be a division of opinion in the Cabinet about the wisdom of such a step but, it is said, the doubters are wavering, thanks to the disgraceful campaign of distortion that some newspapers indulged in following the government decision to institute bread-rationing. This didn't just take the form of editorial criticism; nobody would complain about that. The anger of Labor ministers was aroused when some papers, ignoring the dictum that "the news is sacred," devoted their front pages to selected reports designed to "prove" that there was no need of rationing or, if there was, it was because the government had created a grain shortage. Day after day, items to this effect were presented under inflammatory headlines together with stories purporting to show that, while Britain suffered, Europe was wallowing in plenty.

This performance pointed up the demand for a press inquiry which the National Union of Journalists had put forward at its annual conference in April. Its resolution suggested specifically that information should be sought on newspaper ownership and finance, on the effects of the growth of chain-publishing in relation to competition, on the influence of advertising and financial interests, and on methods of distorting and suppressing essential facts. The great value of such an investigation would be educational. It would allow the public a glimpse behind the "iron curtain" that protects so many editorial and publishing sanctums and enable it to see just what interests influence the making of the news. I can think of nothing more enlightening than the presentation at a public hearing of samples of the daily directives which editors of some of the mass-circulation British papers receive from their owners. When I was in London in 1944 I was told that one press lord had issued instructions to play up all black-market cases involving Jews. The existence of such orders is common gossip among newspaper men but there is no way of letting the public know the extent to which what they take as "pure news" is tainted at the source.

With regard to the ownership of the British press, the average newspaper reader knows that control of a large part of it is concentrated in the hands of a few men. But a thorough airing of the methods by which that control has been achieved and is now exercised would be of great public interest. For British newspaper finance is an intricate affair involving many holding and sub-holding companies. For example, the principal company in the Rothermere group is Associated Newspapers, Ltd., which owns the Daily Mail, London Evening News, and the Sunday Dispatch, and, through subsidiaries, owns or controls eight provincial evening papers and six provincial weeklies. A large part of the capital of this company is widely distributed among the public but a block sufficient to insure control is held by Daily Mail and General Trust, Ltd. The present Viscount Rothermere is chairman of both these companies but it is not known how much of the latter's capital he personally owns. It appears, however, to be sufficient to give him a decisive voice in the direction of the group.

Before 1937 another of the great British press empires was known as the Berry Group since it combined the interests of the two Berry brothers whose fortunes originated in South Wales coal and iron. In that year, however, the partnership was dissolved. The older of the two, who had been ennobled as Viscount Camrose, took over the stodgy, conservative Daily Telegraph and control of the Financial Times. The younger, Viscount Kemsley (his services to the Tory Party had also earned him a peerage), spread himself much wider. He now owns or controls, through a variety of companies, the London Daily Sketch, a morning tabloid, four "national" Sunday papers and two local ones, six provincial morning papers, seven evening, and six weeklies. The whole combine claims a circulation of over nine million copies and it is, perhaps, not surprising that Mr. Morrison has expressed himself as "especially unhappy about the Kemsley gramophone chain of more than twenty newspapers." In a reply Lord Kemsley defended "the principle of chain newspapers as Mr. Morrison would defend the existence of cooperative chain stores. By increased efficiency, increased buying power, and greater distributive power, they can give a greater service to the public."

The analogy Lord Kemsley chose is enlightening as well as alarming. His premise, obviously, is that newspaper production is a business like any other business and must be judged solely by business criteria. But while the public may well benefit from standardized brands of soap or cereal, standardized news and opinion is a menace to democracy. A newspaper monopoly which places "freedom of the press" at its masthead is sailing under false colors. Since knowledge must precede reform, public review of this monopoly would be invaluable.

KEITH HUTCHISON

BOOKS and the ARTS

Hope and Wisdom

THE OLD COUNTRY. By Sholom Aleichem. Translated by Julius and Frances Butwin. Crown Publishers. $3.

IF THE Gentile often fails to understand Jewish humor, it is because the Jewish joke rests upon knowledge he does not share and assumptions he is not prepared to recognize.

The line that divides Jew from Gentile also defines the moral complexities of our world. The acceptance or exclusion of the Jew—the precise area of acceptance and the precise area of exclusion—characterizes the moral structure of a society with particular sharpness, not because the Jew is a saint (or a sinner), and not simply because it is a bad action to exclude the Jew, but, in a more complicated fashion, because of the Jew's "omnipresence," and because everyone, friend or enemy, regards the Jew's existence as a moral rather than a practical issue. (That is why it matters so little whether the Jews "really" have power or "really" are cheats.)

The Jews have developed, during all those years in their half-world of history, one special competence: they know the nature of society. They know without thinking and without formulation; the knowledge is as habitual to them—and as necessary—as the mechanic's knowledge of his tools. Often enough they have misunderstood the incidental (but not unimportant) values of the larger world; often enough they have been duped by their own compulsion to hope; but in the back of their minds they have always known the basic facts. Marx was no surprise to them: how could they not have understood capitalism? Freud was no surprise to them: who knew better how the mind moves against itself? Even Hitler, the final horror, was not precisely unexpected: to the logical mind that cared about the problem one murdered Jew implied six million.

Their knowledge is not theirs exclusively, but they come to it earlier and more inevitably, having fewer illusions and fewer of the graces of security to shake off. They are not better than others, or worse, or wiser, or more intelligent. They are older.

Like old men, they are pessimists. Whatever the ultimate affirmations of the Jewish religious tradition (and the religion is significantly lacking in personal promises), individual Jews are strongly aware of the need to live in this world from day to day; and in this world, though never without hope, they expect the worst. Like old men, they can be sour or anxious or wise, depending on how they accommodate themselves to their knowledge of the possibilities. And they express themselves best in complex and ironical humor, that characteristic expression of mature pessimism, in which all the sad conclusions are assumed and nothing remains but to arrange them over and over again in new poetic configurations.

In America the Jewish joke means: I make believe I am a gentleman, but the joke is I am just a miserable Jew. And this means: the attempt was a bad idea and it is too late to do anything about it.

In the ghetto of eastern Europe—Sholom Aleichem's world—the joke was different.

The ghetto was dark and dreary and narrow, and it had its own vices—after all, no one really enjoyed it—but it had its own mind, too. There, where almost everyone was hungry and the smallest processes of survival demanded every day new prodigies of manipulation and exertion, the individual was protected from demoralization by the suffering community. Everyone was worth something, everyone could raise his voice in the synagogue or argue about the interpretation of the Talmud. Poverty was no shame and Jewishness was no shame.

There developed in the ghetto a special type of worldly wisdom, in which a pervasive pessimism existed side by side with persistent (and unreasonable) hope and a certain indulgent acceptance of misery and evil. With what seems almost equal tolerance the Jews accepted God's injustice and their neighbors' cruelty, having suffered exceptionally from both. (The Jews have jokes about Gentiles, but they have never produced anything like the Gentiles' jokes about Jews.) And they were sure of their own value, as they have not been since.

The ghetto was conscious of its idiosyncrasies and felt very strongly the tension of its relationship to the larger world, but it also had to take its position very seriously. The ironies and absurdities of ghetto experience could not become entirely clear until the ghetto itself began to break up. Sholom Aleichem was not a folk artist; he was an "enlightened" Jew who looked at the ghetto in terms of the larger world. His audience stretched from Ukrainia to New York—the whole length of the path of migration—precisely because he expressed the dilemma of the generations that felt the inadequacy of the ghetto and had to make a choice: the ghetto was wrong in every detail, but it was "essentially" right.

"No," Sholom Aleichem writes, "the Kasrilevkites have never heard of canals or water works or electricity or other such luxuries. But what does that matter? Everywhere people die the same death, and they are placed in the same earth, and are beaten down with the same spades. Thus my Rabbi, Reb Israel, used to say—when he was happiest, at a wedding or other celebration, after he had had a few glasses of wine and was ready to lift up the skirts of his long coat and dance a kazatsky. . . ."

In the end, this is what all great humor says: death makes us all ridiculous together, even Rothschild, so Reb Israel is not the most ridiculous because he stays in Kasrilevka and dances a kazatsky when there is a wedding or other celebration.

For Sholom Aleichem, the Jewish joke meant: I have to live like a miserable wretch, and I am a miserable wretch, but the joke is that I am also a king among men—a Jew. This means: considering the circumstances, I have not done badly.

"As we say on Yom Kippur," say Tevye the Dairyman,

"the Lord decides who will ride on horseback and who will crawl on foot. The main thing is—hope! A Jew must always hope, must never lose hope. And in the meantime, what if we waste away to a shadow? For that we are Jews—the Chosen People, the envy and admiration of the world."

ROBERT S. WARSHOW

Contemporary Constitutional Theory

THE GROWTH OF CONSTITUTIONAL POWER IN THE UNITED STATES. By Carl Brent Swisher. University of Chicago Press. $2.50.

A FEW years ago Professor Swisher published a general constitutional history of the United States called "American Constitutional Development." The academic critics of this volume, who otherwise found it excellent, noted the author's predilection for the contemporary period in American constitutional history which led him to treat rather scantily the early constitutional controversies. In the present work he does not appear as a repentant sinner. Invited to lecture at the University of Chicago, he chose as his subject the whirligig of contemporary constitutional theory. These lectures constitute the present volume which is really an expansion of the concluding chapters of the earlier one. Their primary purpose is to show how the Constitution has survived the stresses of the First and Second World War.

Professor Swisher is not one of those teachers of political science who ignores economic realities. He seems to be a liberal, left of center, and is aware of the economic aspects of state-federal relations, and of the real import of the issue of freedom of enterprise versus governmental control. He therefore refuses to join in the ululations of the N. A. M. and the A. B. A. He stresses the Supreme Court's recognition of the fact that the Constitution does not provide for the maintenance of a nice balance between the Federal government and the states. He even calls attention to the extra-constitutional existence of administrative areas.

Nevertheless it must not be supposed that Professor Swisher is a critic of the fundamental scheme of American government. He believes in the whole political philosophy of checks and balances and of the separation of powers. He observes with evident satisfaction that the Constitution drafted in the 1780's continues in the 1940's to serve as the Constitution of the most highly industrialized and powerful of the great nations of the world. He thus ignores the significance of those constitutional amendments which shifted the balance of political and economic power by broadening the electorate and by expanding the scope of Federal taxation. He is not even one of those who has toyed with the idea of grafting the British cabinet system upon the stock of the American constitution. Indeed, like almost all experts in political science, he defends and justifies the deliberate cultivation of inefficiency in government. This was perhaps a fine philosophy in the eighteenth century but the most pressing contemporary need is to reconcile efficiency in government with the preservation of political democracy. Professor Swisher does not contribute much, however, to the solution of this problem. One of his concluding chapters is indeed entitled "New Horizons for the Judiciary" but its moral turns

A literary event

CYRIL CONNOLLY'S

The Condemned Playground

The publication of The Condemned Playground will be considered by many critics as one of the most important events of the current publishing season. For Cyril Connolly is the brilliant editor of Horizon, the English literary magazine which has become the rallying point for everything that is young and vital in present-day English thought. Jacques Barzun opened a recent Atlantic Monthly article by saying, "The name of Cyril Connolly should be better known to American readers"—and The Condemned Playground undoubtedly will accomplish this purpose, for it contains 36 of Mr. Connolly's finest essays.

"This is an intelligent and amusing book, doubly welcome at a time when high thinking and low writing are the general rule."—

George Orwell, London Observer

CONTENTS

Introduction; The Position of Joyce; Les Faux-Monnayeurs; Distress of Plenty; New Swift Letters; Lord Chesterfield; Imitations of Horace; Illusions of Likeness; A. E. Housman: A Controversy; Thomas Mann; Onus Vallis Visionis; French and English Cultural Relations; Ninety Years of Novel-Reviewing; More About the Modern Novel; Defects of English Novels; Reviewers; Mr. Mossbross Takes the Class; Felicity; The Novel—Addict's Cupboard; Felicity Entertains; Told in Gath; Where Engels Fears to Tread; Year Nine; What Will He Do Next; An Unfortunate Visit; Ackermann's England; Spring Revolution; Barcelona; England Not My England; Conversations in Berlin; The Fate of an Elizabethan; A Tyrant of Taste; Psycho-Analysis; The Ant-Lion; "1843"; The Art of Being Good; Writers and Society, 1940-3.

$2.75 at your bookstore MACMILLAN

out to be that "the task of the judiciary . . . remains fundamentally what it has always been."

It must be apparent that there is considerable confusion of thought in Professor Swisher's book. At times he maintains such a stringent objectivity that it is difficult, if not impossible, to determine his own position on many controversial issues. At other times, however, he betrays a surprising partisanship. Thus at one point he explains a decision of the Supreme Court limiting the late President Roosevelt's power of removal as due to a desire on the part of the Court to curb a President accused of yearning for dictatorship "whose administration was probably justly condemned for a lack of proper concern about the orderly processes of law." The decision in question is, however, perfectly explicable in terms of sound legal principles. Professor Swisher also notes without qualification that the report of the American Bar Association on the much advertised abuses in administrative agencies was "well substantiated in fact," and reveals a marked friendliness towards the doctrine of contempt of court as applied to the extra-forensic publication of editorial opinion.

WILLIAM SEAGLE

Poets

COLLECTED POEMS. By Henry Treece. Alfred A. Knopf. $2.50.

LOUGH DERG AND OTHER POEMS. By Denis Devlin. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.

ALONG about 1938 a small group of young English writers, under the literary influence of Dylan Thomas and the ideological influence of Herbert Read, started a movement called The New Apocalypse; at least they went through all the motions. There were manifestoes, anthologies, log-rolling. About 1943 the same group started another movement called Personalism; this was more of the same. "Apocalyptic writing," wrote J. F. Hendry, one of the group, "occurs when expression breaks through the structure of language to become more organic without thereby impairing language as a means of communication"; which is to say that when perfect authority and complete freedom coexist the world will be a very nice place. The whole group, in a rather touching, amateur way, took itself intensely seriously (they compared their critics to people "who would have attacked the courage of Christ, the visions of Joan, and the love of Abelard"). All the good in everything, from the Georgians to the Surrealists, was to be incorporated into their work, and the "modish mannerisms" of Auden's generation were firmly condescended to.

It must be because, of all the group, Treece took himself most seriously that Knopf decided to publish (but not to proof-read) a book of his poems; it is certainly not because he is a good poet, or even the best of the group: G. S. Fraser is a far better and much less pretentious writer. Treece has all the faults and almost none of the virtues of Thomas. There is in him the same tendency to surround a very simple idea with a fog of rich imagery which has no source save his own forced emotions. But he lacks almost completely Thomas' gift of phrase and entirely his great rhetorical vigor. He suffers, in addition, from a kind of pompous and naïve interest in himself which makes him believe that the universe is only a convenient device for allowing him to explain his feelings; nothing less than the stars ever listens to any observation he makes about himself: they even bent a sympathetic ear to his "silver scream" when he was a baby. The ideas in his poems are few and simple. He worries about his own soul, his special gift as a poet, and the fact that life is sometimes disappointing to sensitive people like himself. He can be astonishingly verbose over the simplest ideas on these subjects:

> Before my tails began, before the light
> Burst like a devil's howl behind my lids,
> Words flickered in my skull and tied my tongue;
> Twisting my garment's hem to gain a blessing, etc.

The irrelevance of the "wit" and imagery here is characteristic. There is no meaning in the puns on tales and tongue-tied: they are euphuistic in the worst sense; there is no point to the "devil's howl": anything loud would do as well to trick up the stock and mechanical use of the transferred epithet; and the idea that even at this stage he wanted words must surely be only a part of Treece's humorless delusion about himself, for there is little to support it in these 155 closely printed pages. An English critic has said that Treece's poetry reminds him of a man who, "being inarticulate . . . satisfies his craving to be noticed by snivelling fortissimo." This is about it.

Denis Devlin's poetry is quite another matter. Here is maturity, seriousness, and talent. The development between what he was writing in 1930, when he and Brian Coffey had a few of their poems printed, and what he writes now is remarkable. He has a gift of phrase and a fine ear:

> Courage kills its practitioners and we live,
> Nothing forgotten, nothing to forgive . . .
> One of the best the worst had never feared . . .
> Among them a bold, a billboard baggage . . .

He can manage equally well a number of styles. There is the wit and virtuosity of meter of "Bacchanal":

> Those that are not so sure that the Poor in Pogrom will not be Rather a Bore, > Lips bitter-sweet, they Know by Culture, they know Human Nature can Grow no More;
> Those that are Game to Grin and Bear it, those that the Wear and Tear of, that hesitate . . .
> Those that My Country, that Let Us Pray, that Drop by the Way, those that are Late . . .

There is the gravity and eloquence of "On Mount Muckish":

> This hill could stage the end-play of a move
> Of tribes their lifelong by the sagas haunted . . .

There is the fine, subtle movement of "Meditation at Avila":

> Magnificence, this terse-lit, star-quartz universe,
> Woe, waste, and magnificence, my soul!
> Stand in the window. Fountain waters
> Bloom on invisible stems. Soul, my dear friend, > Welcome as always . . .

Devlin shows some tendency to fall back on the slight and static descriptive piece, like "Boy Bathing," in which the style becomes somewhat elaborate and decorative; even such good poems as "Annapolis" and "Daphne Stillorgan" seem to me to suffer a little from too much impression and too little conviction. Perhaps this is because, suspended between "the men of God" and "the priests of mankind," he finds it very difficult to write out of his whole mind. In any event, all the long poems here, and many of the short ones too, are as good as anything we have had in a long time. The danger for Devlin, I would guess, would be the occasionalness of his poetry. It is nine years since "Intercessions," yet seven of these poems—three of them long ones—are reprinted from that volume. However, poetry as good as this is worth waiting for. ARTHUR MIZENER

Light from the East

THE MEETING OF EAST AND WEST: AN INQUIRY CONCERNING WORLD UNDERSTANDING. By Professor F. S. C. Northrop. Macmillan. $6.

IN HIS new book "The Meeting of East and West: An Inquiry Concerning World Understanding" Professor F. S. C. Northrop takes his cue from the Herder-Hegel-Vico-Spengler tradition; but his book is both more and less than what the jacket calls "a significant achievement by an American in the philosophy of culture": more because its goal is harmony at all costs, and less because this goal, at the present time, must be dictated by interests outside of philosophy. The book tackles, on a variety of levels, a problem which many orientalists are beginning to consider the ultimate bugaboo, which will be here to hex us long after relatively minor troubles such as present differences with Russia have been resolved. Professor Northrop writes from a wholesomely pragmatic bias with more than pragmatic sympathies, and behind them is a faith in the moving power of philosophical first principles that makes recent studies of the "place" of philosophy in college curricula seem slightly absurd. In these times the book should be read for that reason alone.

Like a Fifth Avenue traffic signal, Professor Northrop's book is surmounted by a vision of grace and sheds light from several angles. But the light is not all the same color, and not all the vehicles that might legitimately reach the celestial traffic circle are allowed to get through. The critique of contemporary cultures—Mexican, Anglo-American, Marxist-Russian, Aristotelian-Catholic, Idealist-German, and Oriental—is excellent on the whole and would make a good college text in itself. His style is spare, direct, and occasionally put to dramatic uses, as befits such a study, but beyond the criticism a certain professional naïveté enters in. Unity, pursued through many devious abstractions, too often appears to be only the factitious unity of the classroom, as if the desire, with the aid of a few technical phrases, could accomplish the deed.

Professor Northrop commits the kind of sin that Existenzphilosophie came into the world to combat: making a problem in physics and epistemology out of cultural relations, instead of referring them immediately to the nexus of man-loving, man-hating, and man-exploiting.

Instead of teaching Americans to appreciate the aesthetic factor in the Oriental tradition, it would seem more practical to bring them to an appreciation of the moral factor in their own. He gives religion its place, but his own positivistic

THERE COMES A TIME when the reading public is ready for a warm and human book that is bright but not spot-lit, that is pleasant but not sugar-coated; that is forthright without vulgarity, that is happy without fantasy. THERE COMES A TIME when, in every community, there are men and women who have discovered liberalism and who want to read about a hero and heroine from their own liberal world. THERE COMES A TIME when thousands of readers exist for a novel in which the pursuit of happiness is a living adventure. THERE COMES A TIME when readers are ready to believe that a family can live in a railroad flat on a bank clerk's salary and still be vivid and individualistic and quite glamorous people. THERE COMES A TIME that's ripe for a story as warm as love, as real as a pay envelope, as modern as a white-collar union and as vital as children racing down the hall. We think this is such a time. We think that Thomas Bell, who wrote ALL BRIDES ARE BEAUTIFUL, has written such a book. Little, Brown and Company is publishing it; it's on sale at all bookstores at $2.50. And it's called THERE COMES A TIME.

temper leads him to sympathize with similarly positivistic Eastern religions, and this blinds him to the essential point of religious difference between East and West. That difference lies not so much in the use of two complementary components of the human intellectual faculty, as Professor Northrop maintains, as in two irreconcilable views of the meaning of religious truth. Western theism cannot be exorcised by an enumeration of its abuses. We can abdicate our intolerance, but not our temperament. Within a reasonable theistic faith, intolerance should be no problem.

R. W. FLINT

BRIEFER COMMENT

I Remember, I Remember

GENE FOWLER'S surname is Devlan, and thereby hangs the tale that wags in and out of this story of his youthful days in the Rocky Mountain West, "A Solo in Tom-Toms" (Viking, $3).

Some months before Gene was born, his father, Charles Francis Devlan, after a row about a cup of coffee, stamped out of the Denver home of his mother-in-law and went up in the mountains to live the life of a hermit. Gene did not see Devlan again for thirty years. A good part of his boyhood was spent in looking for a substitute father in the persons of successive heroes he picked from among his Denver acquaintances, ranging from Buffalo Bill to Judge Ben B. Lindsey.

Fowler can always tell a good story; reading this book is like lining up before a Denver bar and listening to a first-rate reporter reminisce. It's loads of fun while it lasts, but you come away with an empty taste in your mouth.

Fowler presents what has become, since Lincoln Steffens, a rather conventional set of unconventional Western characters: the pioneering, dominating grandmother who took him in charge, the dominated grandfather who was always prospecting in them thar hills, the run-o'-the-mine oddities who drifted around Denver in the first years of this century.

For some reason, perhaps glandular, Fowler now prefers to present himself as an ancient of days for whom the hearse is just around the corner, and he tells of men, women, and events in the early 1900's as though they were part of the Lewis and Clark expedition. Surely even in the Rockies fifty-six years—Fowler's present age—is not the time of life when a man drags himself out into a sunlit square, there to mumble his gums over his youthful indiscretions. But there are times when Fowler comes dangerously near doing just that. Keep the old chin up, Gene; you are not really, as you were once described, "the last of the bison." According to the latest report of the Department of the Interior, the herd is increasing so fast that they are thinking of letting some hand-picked hunters loose on it. There are plenty of stories in your system, decrepit as you may take it to be.

MCALISTER COLEMAN

The Consumers' Answer to Boom and Bust is MONEY, GOODS and PRICES
by
E. R. BOWEN
General Secretary of The Cooperative League USA with the answers for today to solve the problems which are driving us toward inflation and a program for action today which will save us from the deflation of tomorrow.
25c per copy — order from
THE COOPERATIVE LEAGUE OF THE USA
167 West 12th Street, New York City 11, N. Y.

Six Million Murders

IN MARCH, 1943, THE FIRST CREMATORIUM was opened at Maidanek: "Prominent guests were present at the inauguration. . . . The program consisted of the gassing of 8,000 Cracow Jews. The guests, both officers and civilians, were extremely satisfied with the results, and the special peephole fitted into the door was in constant use. They were lavish in their praise of this newly established installation." This precious item, one of hundreds of gruesome details contained in "The Black Book: The Nazi Crime Against the Jewish People" (Duell, Sloan, and Pearce, $5), is not an "atrocity story," but was taken verbatim from a United States War Refugee Board Report. Just because this volume is composed exclusively of incontestable, well-annotated facts and figures, supported by about 150 photostats, photographs, maps, and other visual aids, it ought to be studied by those naïve G. I.'s who have been shouting that Hitlerism can't have been so bad after all. This story of the cold-blooded murder of six million European Jews should also be read by the optimists who are not disturbed by "restricted" labels: the German plot that ended with gas chambers started with similar "innocent" signs of bias. So-called Christians who do not mind attacks on the Jewish religion may learn from this volume that the Nazis' vituperative assault on the Old Testament was followed by a "crusade" against the New Testament, "laden with the filth of Near Eastern Jewish and African life." Workers, finally, who may be ready to swallow anti-Semitism if it is served under a layer of pseudo-socialism are told here how a demagogue like Father Coughlin received the material for his un-American broadcasts directly from the Nazi World Service and often used it without any major alteration.

"The Black Book" was sponsored by four major Jewish groups—the World Jewish Congress, the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee (U. S. S. R.), the National Council of the Jews of Palestine, and the American Committee of Jewish Writers, Artists, and Scientists. The anonymous editors begin their horrible tale with the Jew-baiting of the 1870's, and give a comprehensive survey of the vast madness that developed into homicidal mania in the past twelve years. The reader is warned that the danger of a repetition of these crimes, whether directed against the Jews or against another group, is not yet eliminated: "Let us remember that fascism will emerge from this war not only with all the bitterness of defeat but also with the sweet memory of the facility of mass murder." Of particular interest is Section Six, Resistance, which contains a great deal of almost unknown material on the courage displayed by the poorly equipped, often completely unarmed Jewish partisans in their fight against their powerful enemy. The story of the Warsaw ghetto battle is of course well known, but there existed hundreds of heroic ghettos in Hitler's Festung Europa. ALFRED WERNER

A Liberal Philosopher

LIBERALISM as Professor Morris R. Cohen conceives it in "The Faith of a Liberal" (Holt, $3.75) is at once a philosophy of method and a philosophy of civilization. It is not immediately or exclusively a theory of politics as conventionally understood, although much of the illustrative material considered in the book is directed to this central area of human concern. The faith of a liberal is synonymous with faith in reason and the critical method of science. It is that method which lies at the base of and insures the conditions for the flowering of those humane values we identify with civilization. Its essence consists in the liberation of the mind from bondage to a restricted range of possibilities and to a too ready acceptance of inherited modes of thought, where these are defended by authority, tenacity, and appeals to self-evidence.

So conceived, liberalism takes on a logical hue, and it becomes instructive to compare Cohen's approach with that of our other great philosopher of liberalism, John Dewey. While both regard intelligence as crucial in the definition of liberalism, there is a significant contrast in the points they emphasize in analyzing that method. For Cohen the value of critical intelligence lies in its liberalizing of the imagination, its enrichment of our vision and understanding. For Dewey its value lies primarily in its use as a principle of protest and control, its service to social action in the liberation of individuals from oppressive conditions. Dewey takes his cue from the social arts and technologies, and stresses the role of experiment in the overt manipulation and redirection of affairs. Cohen takes as central the lessons taught by the mathematical and physical sciences—especially the development of non-Euclidean geometries—with respect to the importance of a critical examination of basic assumptions in the light of their possible alternatives.

It is this aspect of Cohen's views which comes out with characteristic brilliance and learning in the variety of topics treated in this volume: socialism, academic freedom, Zionism, law, literary criticism, the role of philosophy in education, religious institutions, and science itself. In a series of papers that are made up of short notes, reviews, and lengthy articles, Cohen displays the acumen and polemical verve for which he is well remembered as both teacher and writer.

MILTON K. MUNITZ

Escape to the Resistance

GEORGE MILLAR gave up a job as war correspondent in order to take a more active part in the war. He felt an irresistible urge to make this switch, an urge which his wife, perhaps correctly, characterized as "boy-scout." He himself made no effort to understand it; he merely acceded to his not uncommon wish to participate in a more lively way in the history of his own time. He lost nothing professionally, as it happens, for he turned his experiences into dense and masterful journalistic narrative. Of his first trials, chronologically, one may read in his more-recently published "Horned Pigeon" (Doubleday, $2.75); of his later, in "Waiting in the Night" (Doubleday, $2.75).

Lieutenant Millar was early captured on the Libyan desert, was passed from German to Italian hands through a series of prison camps, and escaped through a series of French Resistance hands over the Pyrennees into Spain and safety. Throughout these two long volumes, he indulges in little speculation, gives no evidence of a historical perspective, comes to no conclusions either of a political or philosophical nature; but surely he has written here, for any uses whatever, two very impressive and valuable source books. He is extremely observant and matter of fact, of a remarkable detachment and honesty; and these qualities, together with his gift for unequivocal description and his happy freedom from the encumbrance of stylistic self-consciousness, make these books something very special in themselves. It is true that any endlessly factual account tends to pall, but his encounters are on the whole so richly interesting, and the communication of experience is so immediate and sharp, that the excitement is almost unendurably cumulative.

When Millar decided after his return to England to join the Maquis, he did so to seek balm for a deep emotional wound—the shock of his wife's desertion—but there was a valid enough reason for going back to France in his own history as a recent refugee. "Waiting in the Night" covers his life with these fighting groups from the early summer of 1944 until the "liberation" of France. From the time he was parachuted onto a dark field near Dijon until he was flown back, Millar kept a nice eye on the ball, as he had previously, to such effect that it would seem possible for anyone who had never been to France to go to this area, map indelibly in mind, and seek out all the ways resourceful Millar went, all the people he knew and worked with there. And there are many one would want to know—for Millar has shown himself in these two books keen to the virtues of human beings. Without being profound, he is still very sensitive to the expression of character (though not altogether critical of his faculty, for his occasional injected epithets tend to be sentimentally inadequate, stock, and rather laughable—of the "decent fellow," "brave soul" variety) and of a just temper, so that the quality of his adventures comes through with more than a visual and tactile clarity, extraordinary as this alone is.

But these are accounts to read, not to describe, for the blow by blow description is well enough in Millar's hands. And much of significance that is general resides, implicit, in this wealth of the particular. GERTRUDE BUCKMAN

The Atom, Peaceful or Otherwise

UNLIKE SMYTH, whose classic report on atomic energy was confined to its use for "military purposes," Gamov, in his book—"Atomic Energy" (Macmillan, $3)—has no such limitations. It is a fairly technical report of the evolutionary elements leading up to the discovery and deliberate use of the energy within the atom, with an emphasis on possible ways of utilizing such energy for peaceful purposes. The book is a well written and authoritative exposition of the most dramatic discovery in the history of the experimental sciences. BENJAMIN HARROW

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
[illegible] ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
[illegible] ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"UTTERLY ENCHANTING . . . MAGNIFICENTLY EXECUTED." —N. Y. Herald-Tribune

WALT DISNEY'S
Full Length Comedy Musical
'MAKE MINE MUSIC!'
In TECHNICOLOR
presenting the talents of
BENNY GOODMAN • DINAH SHORE • THE ANDREWS SISTERS • NELSON EDDY • JERRY COLONNA • ANDY RUSSELL • THE KING'S MEN • STERLING HOLLOWAY
THE PIED PIPERS
— AND —
'BADMAN'S TERRITORY' Randolph Scott Ann Richards

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL B'way & 62 St.

BUD ABBOTT • LOU COSTELLO
'LITTLE GIANT'
— WITH —
BRENDA JOYCE • JACQUELINE deWIT
ELENA VERDUGO
— AND —
'TANGIER' — STARRING —
Maria Montez • Robert Paige • Sabu

NOW! AIR CONDITIONED
The THEATRE GUILD presents
LAURENCE OLIVIER
in William Shakespeare's
"HENRY V"
IN TECHNICOLOR • Released Thru United Artists
PRICES: Evgs. (at 8:30) $2.40, $1.80 Mats. daily (at 2:30) $1.80, $1.20
ALL SEATS RESERVED
NOW! N. Y. CITY CENTER 131 West 55th St.

BARBARA STANWYCK • VAN HEFLIN
LIZABETH SCOTT
— IN —
HAL WALLIS' Production
"THE STRANGE LOVE OF MARTHA IVERS"
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

— IN PERSON —
DINAH SHORE
— Plus —
GIL LAMB
— Plus —
The Acromaniac
EXTRA!
DICK STABILE and his Orchestra

NOW PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

STAGE PLAYS

THEATRE GUILD PRODUCTIONS
THE MUSICAL HIT
CAROUSEL
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille with Harold Keel — Iva Withers — Jean Darling • Eric Mattson • Norma Howard • Jean Casto
AIR-COND. MAJESTIC Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT
OKLAHOMA!
Based on Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs"
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
Jack Kilty • David Burns • Betty Jane Watson • Ruth Weston
AIR-COND. ST. JAMES Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." — Ward Morehouse, Sun.
MAX GORDON presents
BORN YESTERDAY
The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way CH 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40. AIR-COND.

"KEEPS AUDIENCE ROARING"—Hawkins, World-Telegram
RICHARD RODGERS and OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd Present
ETHEL MERMAN in
"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"
Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON
Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN
IMPERIAL THEA., 45th St. W. of Bway. Mats. Wed. & Sat. Air-Cond.

Buy Your Books through THE Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price, post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible.

•

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
The Nation
20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

ON page 230 of his autobiography, "Bad Boy of Music" (Doubleday, Doran, $3), George Antheil describes the way the project of his opera "Helen Retires" originated. At Capri, in the spring of 1929, he read in the Paris Chicago Tribune of John Erskine's visit to Paris:

> He [Erskine] had been interviewed there and had expressed his extreme interest in writing new opera librettos.
>
> In another item, just beneath, it stated that John Erskine was president of the mighty Juilliard Foundation, an institution for giving money to worthy musical projects—such as producing concert pianists en masse, concert violinists en gros, and concert singers by the bushel.
>
> Also the Juilliard provided half of the money by which the mighty Metropolitan Opera Company subsisted!
>
> This latter item caught my eye.

And so he wrote to Erskine suggesting an opera about Helen of Troy.

The book is full of such extraordinary incidents, the truth or untruth of which I am in no position to say anything about. But I can say that Antheil never read in that issue of the Paris Chicago Tribune an item about the Juilliard giving money to the Metropolitan; because in 1929 the Juilliard was not giving money to the Metropolitan. And I may suspect, therefore, that a lot of other incidents did not happen in the extraordinary way Antheil says they did. But his way makes entertaining reading; and the book should be read strictly for entertainment—for example, the entertainment of reading about the young carpenter who looked like "Bronislav Nijinsky" and sure enough turned out to have been in the Monte Carlo Ballet Russe.

Just as the book mingles truth with fantasy, so it mingles keen perception with things like the concluding discussion of Stokowski (who has played Antheil's music): that "very great man" who is "being constantly and unreasonably wounded by the world"; "one of the two greatest orchestral conductors in the world, from many points of view the greatest," who, "never satisfied with one accomplishment . . . had created, in succession, the Philadelphia Orchestra and the American Youth Orchestra, two of the finest orchestral units in the world . . . had lifted the technique of radio-broadcasting, movie-film, and wax recording from a lowly to a fine art," and "was even now in the process of forming a new orchestra—which . . . would, I felt, become even greater than his previous creations, provided that he did not leave the country before then." For "I hope I can stay here," says Stokowski, "but if I cannot, if unjust criticism continues, we may leave America." And, Antheil tells us, "I thought of one of our greatest men leaving our country—for what? For having dared so much, done so much for American music, for all music?"

When Edwin Denby began to write about the dance for the Herald Tribune I pointed out the value of his criticism: "Mr. Denby has an eye that sees; and looking at anything through this eye is an excitingly illuminating experience." Grace Robert, the author of "The Borzoi Book of Ballets (Knopf, $4.50), has no such eye. This is evident, first of all, in what she says about the ballets, which is not only unilluminating but often inaccurate (two examples are her incorrect

JUST OFF THE PRESS

Two Booklets by Bertrand Russell

1. IDEAS THAT HAVE HARMED MANKIND. Man's Unfortunate Experiences with His Self-Made Enemies, Including Sadistic Impulses, Religions, Superstition, Envy, Economic Nationalism, Pride, Racism, Sex Superiority, Creeds, and Other Evil Things. 25c.

This new booklet (5½x8½ inches in size), by Bertrand Russell, contains the following sub-heads: 1. Principal Causes Are Human. 2. Man's Worst Enemy—Man. 3. Our Sadistic Impulses. 4. The Place of Religion in Man's Cruel Record. 5. The Psycho-Analysts Take a Look. 6. Emotions and Superstition. 7. Envy as a Source of False Beliefs. 8. The False Philosophy of Economic Nationalism. 9. False Beliefs Bred by Pride. 10. Pride of Race. 11. The Superstition of Male Superiority. 12. Some Bad Effects of Male Domination. 13. Class Distinctions. 14. The Delusion of Divine Favor. 15. The Chances Are That Our Ideas Are Wrong. 16. What Social Science Can Do. 17. What the World Needs.

2. IDEAS THAT HAVE HELPED MANKIND. A Philosopher Looks at Man's Long History, Points to the Things That Moved Him Forward, and Shows What We Must Do in the Near Future if Civilization Is to Continue to Grow. 25c.

This second booklet (also 5½x8½ inches in size), by Bertrand Russell, contains the following sub-heads: 1. How is Mankind Helped? 2. What Civilization Has Taught Us. 3. Man's Great Steps. 4. The Art of Writing. 5. What the Greeks Did. 6. Aristotle's Four Kinds of Cause. 7. The Contributions of Galileo, Descartes, Newton, and Leibniz. 8. The Law of Inertia. 9. Knowledge of Natural Laws. 10. Geology and Darwinism Undermine Faith. 11. Our Stock of Moral Ideas. 12. The Brotherhood of Man. 13. Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity. 14. Religious Toleration. 15. Free Press and Speech. 16. Democracy. 17. Wanted—An International Government. 18. The New Freedom.

The above booklets were written especially for Haldeman-Julius Publications by Bertrand Russell, the distinguished philosopher, logician, mathematician, and Freethinker. These freshly written essays are now published for the first time.

If you want both booklets, remit 50c and they will be sent prepaid. Be sure to quote the titles you want—1. IDEAS THAT HAVE HARMED MANKIND. 2. IDEAS THAT HAVE HELPED MANKIND.

Bertrand Russell recently said that he enjoyed writing booklets for E. Haldeman-Julius because he is given the fullest freedom of expression. In fact, it is only in essays written for Haldeman-Julius that Dr. Russell can give circulation to the mind-liberating thoughts he feels should be made known to the average person. Most standard publishers are afraid to issue works that are frowned on by the orthodox and conventional. Such a restriction is never encountered in the editorial department of the H-J. Publications. In the booklets listed in this announcement Dr. Russell offers the literate a feast of reason, information, logic, wit and rollicking humor.

In addition to the titles listed above, we have eight Bertrand Russell booklets, as follows:

THE VALUE OF FREE THOUGHT. How to Become a Truth-Seeker and Break the Chains of Mental Slavery. 25c.

AN OUTLINE OF INTELLECTUAL RUBBISH. A Hilarious Catalog of Organized and Individual Stupidity. 25c.

HOW TO READ AND UNDERSTAND HISTORY. The Past as the Key to the Future. 25c.

HOW TO BECOME A PHILOSOPHER, A LOGICIAN, AND A MATHEMATICIAN. 30c.

WHAT CAN A FREE MAN WORSHIP? 6c.

WHY I AM NOT A CHRISTIAN. 6c

HAS RELIGION MADE USEFUL CONTRIBUTIONS TO CIVILIZATION? 6c.

A LIBERAL VIEW OF DIVORCE. 6c.

Take your pick. If you want all 10 booklets by Bertrand Russell send $1.75 and they will be shipped prepaid. Ask for BERTRAND RUSSELL'S 10 BOOKLETS. Mail orders to:

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS, BOX R-1938, GIRARD, KANSAS

descriptions of the action of "Le Baiser de la fée" and "Billy the Kid"). It is evident also in her choice of ballets for discussion: she includes unimportant works that have not been given for years and are not likely to be seen again, but omits important works in the active repertory ("The Nutcracker," "Mozartiana," "Le Bourgeois gentilhomme"); she gives eight pages to the satire of "Gala Performance," and barely seven to an omnibus account of a number of Balanchine's works, in which "Concurrence" and "Cotillon" share a one-sentence reference. And it is most evident in her choice of photographs, which not only is tasteless but does not properly document the text.

The reviewers' statements about William Walton's score for "Henry V" led me to think he had produced something original; but the music, when I heard it, seemed to me to be the conventional type of film music for each situation, only done with Walton's technical expertness and fastidiousness.

CONTRIBUTORS

ROBERT S. WARSHOW is a staff member of Commentary magazine.

WILLIAM SEAGLE is the author of "The Quest for Law."

ARTHUR MIZENER is a member of the faculty of Carleton College. He has contributed to the Kenyon Review, the Partisan Review, and the Southern Review.

R. W. FLINT is a Navy veteran who is now on the staff of St. Paul's School.

McALISTER COLEMAN, a left-wing journalist, is the author of "Men and Coal."

THE AMERICAN FREEMAN

Monthly Magazine, edited by E. Haldeman-Julius. Each issue contains about 50,000 words. Contributors: Bertrand Russell, Joseph McCabe, Paul Eldridge, E. Haldeman-Julius, and others. Always on the side of libertarianism and freethought. $1 per year (Canada and other Foreign, $1.25). Sample copy 10c. The most outspoken publication in the U. S. It is a fearless and uncompromising truth-seeker. It pulls no punches. It hits hard. It is well-written and appeals to intelligent readers who aren't afraid of candor. Mail subscription to: The American Freeman, Box 4013, Girard, Kansas.

The
New Statesman and Nation
England's Leading Weekly Review may now be obtained through
THE NATION
20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.
■
Yearly subscription $6.50, including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Germany's Hope

Dear Sirs: Saul K. Padover in his article on the German Social Democrats (The Nation, June 29, 1946) states that:

1. The S. P. D. is as dependent on London as the German Communist party is on Moscow.
2. Its leaders are repudiating Marxist doctrines.
3. The party intends to transform itself into a bourgeois movement with a liberal outlook.
4. Schumacher believes in a non-Socialist democratic policy along conventional Western European lines.
5. German Social Democrats are, on the whole, good nationalists.

It would be interesting to know how the author arrived at these rather stupefying conclusions. Anyone who ever took the pains to interview leading Social Democrats or to read the party's public statements must come to directly opposite results, namely:

1. While the British Labor party has now at last understood that it must support the S. P. D., the German Social Democrats take great care in defending their political and moral independence. In the dependence of the S. P. D. on London and the Communists on Moscow there is not only a difference in degree, but in kind.
2. The S. P. D. refuses to make Marxism a catechism and admits that socialism may very well be founded on ethical principals, but Schumacher has repeatedly defended the basic truth of Marxism and has called it the most efficient of all modern sociological doctrines.
3. There cannot be the slightest doubt that the S. P. D. is, and intends to remain, a Socialist party. No responsible Social Democrat has ever said or written anything to justify Padover's assertion.
4. Schumacher not only does not believe in a non-Socialist democratic policy, but advocates socialism now with more insistence than any other German in a leading position.
5. German Social Democrats repudiate nationalism and advocate internationalism. Often they have denounced the new German nationalism from which the Communists try to profit.

For proof I invite you to study the resolutions of the S. P. D. party convention in Hanover, May 8-11, 1946, and the speech delivered by Schumacher. I really cannot understand why Padover conveys such an unsympathetic and untrue impression of the Social Democrats if he believes, as I do, that they form one of the few sectors of the population that are not poisoned with fascism and that they are the people on whom the Western powers must mainly rely if they wish to reconstruct Germany along democratic lines.

HERMAN EBELING

New York, N. Y., July 7

Gold Coast Item

Dear Sirs: In your issue of July 6 Andrew Roth writes: "In the Gold Coast [British West Africa] there will be a majority of natives in the legislature for the first time in Africa." Someone has deliberately substituted the word "legislature" here for legislative council. No British Crown Colony has a legislature; the right to make laws lies in the governor and above him in the Colonial Office in London. The governor usually has associated with him an executive and a legislative council, to whose advice he listens, but is under no legal compulsion to follow.

Members of the legislative council used to be entirely official or appointed by the governor. Lately on the Gold Coast, a majority of the council are elected, but the council still remains an advisory body and not a legislature.

W. E. B. DU BOIS

President of the Pan-African Congress

New York, N. Y., July 8

Oops! We Dropped One

Dear Sirs: I note with dismay that the solar system has now been reduced to eight planets. General Chisholm doesn't specify which one is gone, but I'll bet I know the villain who did away with it—the BOMB. I look forward to your next gala "one of our planets is missing" number, wherein General Chisholm will doubtless reveal the victim.

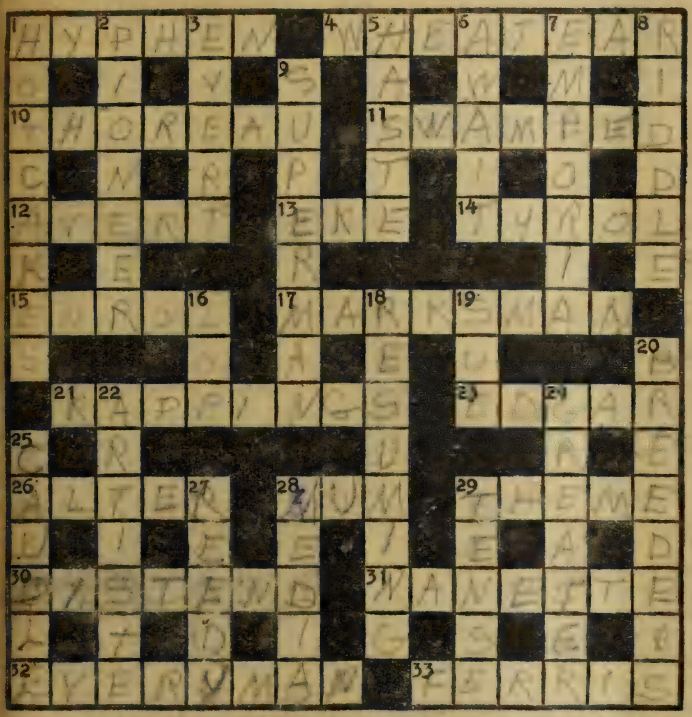
Seriously, if the kind of thinking exemplified by the General's article does not become general soon, the little family around old Sol may well be reduced to seven.

CHESTER G. MOORE

Annapolis, Md., July 20

Crossword Puzzle No. 173

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 It joins one word to another. Or perhaps it separates them?
4 Farmers should not object to this bird in the harvest fields!
10 Literary result of a thunderstorm?
11 Inundated
12 Ward off
13 Likewise
14 Where the beginner makes a beginning in mountaineering, perhaps 15 Sign up
17 Best keep out of his sight
21 Spirited reproofs
23 He should make the grade
26 Reform and just escape the noose
28 Not speaking as a parent
29 What it is all about
30 Blow out
31 Fancy saying, "No! no!" to this play girl!
32 An unexceptionable fellow
33 Joy wheel

DOWN

1 Non-literary best sellers (3 and 5)
2 A go-ahead sort of chap
3 Turn inside out
5 Rashness
6 Watch for a carol singer
7 Shops in Kansas
8 A puzzling question
9 No mere male walker-on in the Shavian drama
16 Curtail
18 Carrying on
19 Make legal claim
20 They are good at beastly multiplication
22 She might stage a show at the Academy
24 "Allah is great, but juxtaposition is -------"
25 Famed for her curtain lectures
27 Musically weak
28 Advertising agencies, perhaps
29 Keyed up

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 172

ACROSS:—1 COLUMBUS; 8 COLOMBO; 9 GASLIGHT; 10 BEGONIA; 12 HORSE; 13 LOOSEN; 14 MEATY; 15 ELDEST; 17 STAIR; 22 MICAH; 23 VIENNA; 24 OSCAR; 26 TARTAN; 28 SCULL; 29 SAVELOY; 30 FALCONER; 31 PILOTED; 32 GENEROUS.

DOWN:—1 COGWHEEL; 2 LESTRADE; 3 MAINE; 4 UNHOLY; 5 NOSES; 6 CORONER; 7 EBRIETY; 10 BOOTY; 11 GEMINI; 16 SPIRAL; 18 PARTY; 19 INNUENDO; 20 MALLARDS; 21 ISLAMIC; 22 MATELOT; 25 UNMAKE; 27 ROSES; 28 SOCLE.

SCHOOL

LAKEWOOD
MODERN SCHOOL
A residential school for boys and girls from 7 to 13 years of age. Small group. Personal supervision.
Write:
JAMES and NELLIE DICK
115 Carey Street • Lakewood, N. J.
Phone: Lakewood 1007

There are more than 45,350 readers of The Nation doing what you are doing — reading this advertisement. If you have something of interest to offer them—call The Nation Advertising Department for particulars as to space, cost and closing date of next issue.

HELP WANTED

FOREIGN AFFAIRS WRITER NEEDS SECRETARY familiar with throes of composition; shorthand, typing essential; research knowhow and interest in matters European desirable; erratic hours, discouraging salary but good commission on all checks from publishers. Phone Plaza 5-9638, 8-9 A.M.

SITUATIONS WANTED

SOUTHERN COLORED DOMESTIC and hotel workers desire jobs. Write for list today (stamps). QUALITY EMPLOYMENT ASSN. 214 East Clay Street, Richmond 19, Va.

WRITER, 34, newspaper, institutional publication, administrative experience, desires job liberal publication. Veteran. Satire, polemics, objective reporting. Box 1634, c/o The Nation.

VET seeks full-time summer job or permanent part-time job in economic research or related field. Graduate student, BSS, married. Experience as cartel investigator in Germany. Fluent in French and German. Box 1636, c/o The Nation.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocational psychological probelms. Fee $3.00.

CLASSIFIED
ADVERTISING RATES

•

62c a line (six words)
Minimum 3 lines
$6.16 per inch

•

Attractive discounts for multiple insertions.

•

THE Nation
20 Vesey St., N. Y. 7, N. Y.
BArclay 7-1066

FARMS AND ACREAGE

12-ROOM BRICK COLONIAL; heat; bath; electric; fireplace; view; privacy; 6 miles from Tanglewood. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

LANGUAGES

ALL LANGUAGES. Phonograph Courses. Linguaphone, other makes. Sold, bought, rented. A. Alin, 475 5th Avenue, New York 17. MU 3-1093.

MAGAZINE SUBSCRIPTIONS

SUBSCRIBE FOR PERIODICALS simply by asking me for them; any number in one order. Pay after I bill you at publishers' lowest prices. Catalog NA, Free. John Crehore, Walpole, N. H.

PUBLICATIONS

VARIOUS AND LOVE SONNETS by Richardson Savell. 64 tender lyrics. 3 years in preparation. $1.00. Grand Print Publishers, Box 542, Brookline Village, Mass.

REAL ESTATE FOR SALE

AN INVALUABLE HOME — Executive office site, No. 139 East 43rd Street. Immediate occupancy, 4-story Building, opposite Chrysler Building, Grand Central Depot, etc. $90,000—cash. Also, 55,000 square feet, immediate occupancy, $82,500. With about 16 acres land at Stuyvesant Falls, N. Y. Two 4-story brick and stone buildings. Formerly used as textile mills and battery manufacture. Elevators. With perpetual use of 400 h. p. to owner without cost L. N. Rosenbaum & Son, 565 Fifth Avenue, New York 17.

FOR SALE nine-room house, garage, acre land, private lake, Westchester County. Write Box 88, Goldens Bridge, New York or call Katonah 570J, evenings.

RESORT

AUGUST 9 THROUGH LABOR DAY. $35 weekly. Homestead, Carmel, N. Y. Private lake, tennis, handball, volley ball. Good food. Modern conveniences. Phone GR 5-6782; Socialist Party, 303 4th Ave., N. Y. 10.

RESORTS

The Glenmere

Your private country estate while you are our guest.

In the Ramapos

CHESTER, N. Y.

51 Miles from New York City

Your private lake with beautiful white sand beach. Your private golf course. We offer you excellent accommodations, superb cuisine and every facility for your entertainment. Glenmere is a glorious place for your vacation.

N. Y. Office: RE. 2-5047

---

45 Miles from New York City

Zindorest Park

Monroe N. Y.

Telephone 4421

A Resort for Adults Only

Exclusive location, 150 acres of unusual beauty. All sports. Lake and Pool on premises. Delicious food, relaxing atmosphere, dancing, horseback riding on premises, modern accommodations.

Greyhound, Adirondack Trailway and Short Line Buses stop at our Entrance.

CRESTWOOD HOTEL

LAKE HUNTINGTON, SULLIVAN COUNTY, N. Y.
Phone: Lake Huntington 78

A picturesque place, 97 acres of choice ground, offers a Cool Vacation in a Warm Atmosphere. Good, wholesome food, swimming, rowing and all other sports. Entertainment and dancing. August and Labor Day weekend reservations now accepted. R. JANOV, Owner-Manager. City Phone: Eves. only, OL. 2-8915.

For a Glorious Vacation

BELLA VISTA LODGE

SEAVIEW & CLIFF AVE. NEWPORT, R. I.

Delicious home cooked meals. American-Jewish style

Moderate rates, friendly and informal atmosphere. Write for your Reservations immediately.

RESORT OWNERS!

Are you taking reservations for

LABOR DAY WEEKEND

Our Readers Want to Know

Advertise Your Resort in

THE NATION

RESORTS

Return from a Vacation

Looking Fine — Feeling Fine

From

WESTERN VIEW FARM.

high in the Connecticut Hills, you can return tanned, glowing and invigorated, and with happy memories of the warm hospitality of an Inn which is in its Twenty-seventh season under the same ownership and management.

Rates per person, $12.00 a day, $70.00 a week
Week-ends, Friday evening to Sunday evening, $24.

TED OHMER

New Milford, Connecticut Tel.: New Milford 440

MAUD'S SUMMER-RAY

North Branch Sullivan County, N. Y.

Telephone: Callicoon 95 or 148

MUSIC, DRAMA, DANCE, SPORTS, ARTS AND CRAFTS, LAKE, ORCHESTRA, LIQUOR BAR.

Gala Labor Day Weekend

For travel information and rates, call City Office:
Daily, ORchard 4-0970 • Sunday, PResident 4-6290

Timberland

AN ADULT CAMP IN THE ADIRONDACKS
LIMITED TO 100
ALL SPORTS • PRIVATE LAKE
DANCING • LECTURES • CONCERTS
N. Y. OFFICE: 33 W. 42nd St. LOngacre 5-3674

The Rare Charm of an Intimate Congenial Group

MERRIEWOODE

A CAMP FOR ADULTS STODDARD, N. H.

FOR YOUR ENJOYMENT: Beautiful Highland Lake, 10 miles long, with good fishing and free use of boats and canoes; interesting hiking objectives thru woodland trails; fine tennis and handball courts, badminton, shuffleboard, archery, riflery, croquet, ping pong, square dancing.

OLIVE H. G. BARON, Director

SCHROON Crest

IN THE ADIRONDACKS
POTTERSVILLE, N. Y.

OPEN UNTIL SEPTEMBER 15th

Private Beach, Canoes, Rowing, Motorboating, All Sports, Recordings, Playhouse, Bar, Entertainment, Dancing Nightly, Harry Alshin and Orchestra. Excellent Cuisine. "Folk Dancing" with David and Augusta Hahn. PHONE: Chestertown 2830

LEAH OKUN, IRV. SCHOENBERG, Mgr.

An Adult Resort — on Schroon Lake

DEUEL HOLLOW HOUSE

In Berkshire foothills 70 miles from N. Y. City. Delicious food served on terrace overlooking our private lake. Free swimming instructions, rowing, fishing and other sports. A completely informal atmosphere.

SOME AUGUST RESERVATIONS AVAILABLE

Raisel Cohen Wingdale, N. Y. | David Sacks Phone 3691

CAMP ANNISQUAM

Gloucester, Mass.
ABRAM RESNICK
Director

This Adult Camp...

Sheltered cove near picturesque Gloucester. Salt water swimming, sailing, boating and fishing on premises. Dancing, tennis, trips and all sports.

Write for booklet and rates.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 17, 1946 NUMBER 7

The Shape of Things

PRESIDENT TRUMAN IS STILL STRUGGLING toward a decision on Palestine as this issue goes to press. In the nature of things his reaction to the proposal for a "federation" tightly controlled by Britain will carry no finality. If he agrees in substance with the British proposal, the Attlee government will still have to use force to impose the plan on both Jews and Arabs, neither of which can accept a scheme that would effectively change Palestine from a mandate into the most autocratically governed crown colony in the empire. On the other hand, if the President rejects the proposal, as the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry rejected it, the British appear grimly determined to proceed unilaterally with their solution. They have taken drastic steps to stop all further immigration, with an air and sea blockade laid down for the Palestinian coast, threats to board and search vessels of other nations suspected of carrying illegal immigrants, and a concentration camp set up in Cyprus for luckless fugitives caught in their net. The audacity of the British policy, in complete disregard of the findings of the Joint Committee, cannot be disassociated from the equally truculent position adopted last week with respect to Iran. In the words of a Foreign Office spokesman, Britain is ready to meet any threat to the Anglo-Iranian Oil Company in that country with "unilateral action" on the ground that "there may not be time to consult the U. N." and anyway "the Security Council has no troops." To point up these remarks—as cynical as any that have come out of Moscow—British troops have been rushed into Southern Iraq, near the Iranian border.

*

COMMERCIALISM IN THE AMERICAN PRESS has always been one of our favorite targets. So has the habitual distortion of news in the Hearst and McCormick-Patterson papers, and the occasional twisting of facts in more respectable journals. We intend to go on exposing such fakeries, and we welcome discussion of American mistakes, but not for a moment do we agree with Mr. Molotov that the defects of our own press preclude us from condemning the total absence in the Soviet Union of freedom of the printed word. There can be no comparison between a freedom abused and a freedom that does not exist. Mr. Molotov should, and probably does, know that even the most irresponsible section of our press must publish facts unpalatable to it or go out of business, while the vast majority of American papers constantly print news items that fail to confirm the prejudices of their owners. Let him read in Southern papers the full account of the recent Georgia lynchings; let him read in the Republican New York Herald Tribune every word uttered by him in his bitter exchange with Byrnes at Paris; let him read elsewhere in this issue of The Nation an admiring article on his own country such as no Soviet paper or magazine has ever carried on the United States. Then let him admit that until Byrnes publicly threw down the challenge, not one syllable of the American case in the current dispute over voting procedure at the peace conference ever found its way into a Soviet journal; let him admit that the historic Baruch Report, sweepingly condemned in the Russian press, has yet to be printed in a Soviet publication. What sense is there in the words of a Moscow broadcast that "the Soviet press considers the press to be free if it expresses the opinion of the people," as long as the people are denied the facts on which to base an opinion?

*

WHEN THE DEMOCRATS OF THE MISSOURI Fifth District, aided by a few thousand Republicans, denied a renomination to Representative Roger Slaughter, President Truman scored a notable personal victory and liberalism won a draw. The original choice of the C. I. O. Political Action Committee, and of the district's liberals in general, was Jerome Walsh, former OPA attorney. The President had good reason to want the defeat of Slaughter, who had used his position on the powerful House Rules Committee to gut the Administrations's program, but he was dubious of the P. A. C. blessing on Walsh's head. Rather than risk an ideological campaign, he privately urged the Pendergast machine to pick another candidate and then publicly urged his nomination. The machine, as much indebted to the President as the President is indebted to it, picked Enos Axtell, an obscure assistant county prosecutor, and saw him through to victory. Local P. A. C. leaders appreciat-

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things 169
South Africa Challenged 171
Peace Conference Tactics by Freda Kirchwey 172

ARTICLES

Please Omit Flowers by Tris Coffin 173
Report from Moscow by J. Alvarez del Vayo 175
Paris Looks at Everyman's House by Ida Treat 178
Prairie Socialism by J. King Gordon 180
MVA: Stalled But Not Stopped by Ernest Kirschten 183
Research in Happiness by Martin Gumpert 185
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 186

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Our Southern and Western Colonies by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. 187
Sun Yat-sen: A Partial Portrait by Agnes Smedley 187
Art as Experiment by Wylie Sypher 188
Briefer Comment 189
Paul Rosenfeld by Marianne Moore 192
Records by B. H. Haggin 192
Films by James Agee 193

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 194

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 174 by Jack Barrett 195

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon — Washington Editor I. F. Stone — Literary Editor Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch — Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editor: Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

ing the Pendergast strength and agreed on the prime importance of Slaughter's forced retirement, had no choice but to go along. Axtell himself was none too happy over P. A. C. support, but the fact that he won indicates a mistaken estimate on his part and the President's. Had Truman favored Walsh to begin with, he would not only have rid Congress of a truculent reactionary, but he would at the same time have secured at least the nomination of a genuine progressive. Two other primaries of the week produced results of national interest. Senator Byrd will return to the Senate, as everyone expected, but he will go back irritated, if not chastened, by the first Senatorial contest Virginia has had in 24 years. The issue was state domination by the hitherto sacrosanct Byrd machine, which now stands condemned by something like 37 per cent of the Dominion's Democrats. In West Virginia, liberal Senator Harley M. Kilgore was the overwhelming choice for Democratic renomination despite the glowering silence of John L. Lewis.

*

ON AUGUST 6, 1946, THE SURVIVORS AT Hiroshima held a festival that commenced with a moment of silent prayer; everywhere in the rest of the world there was business as usual. The Air Force sent a flight of unmanned planes from Hawaii to California; next day it tested the B-36, a bomber with a range of 10,000 miles and a bomb capacity of thirty tons. The gratified General Richardson stated: "The atom bomb is a warhead. We fully expect some day to have larger guided missiles with atomic warheads." Admiral Blandy released the information that most of the ships at Bikini are "radioactive stoves" which would have burned to death everybody aboard, and which will remain dangerously radioactive for a year; he remarked, with professional ambivalence, that this radioactivity constitutes one of "the best—or worst—features of the bomb." It is now practicable to manufacture atomic bombs several hundred times as powerful as those used at Bikini; research in guided missiles has gone ahead so fast that Air Force experts say that, within five years, they will be able to send rockets anywhere on earth. Meanwhile attempts to prevent the use of the bomb limp around and around in a dizzy and nauseated circle; meanwhile the average newspaper reader, fooled by the front-page stories that accompanied the first half-strength, misdirected bomb at Bikini, has decided that the bomb may not be so bad after all. How different it all is from those absurd stories in which a Mad Scientist, opposed by everybody, is trying to destroy the earth from a secret laboratory in the middle of the Sahara. Today, the old lunatic would instead be working in a government laboratory established by the Joint Chiefs of Staff, with the approval of everybody except a few sentimentalists and impractical dreamers.

HARD ON THE HEELS OF THE PROMISE HE gave when signing the new OPA Act, President Truman has taken steps to attack inflation with fiscal weapons. He has issued peremptory orders to department heads to diminish contemplated expenditures by at least $2.2 billion and on his instructions Reconversion Director John R. Steelman has ordered a sixty-day moratorium on new federal construction commitments. In view of the fact that, despite an upward revision in revenue for the current year of $8 billion, a deficit of $1.9 billion is still expected, even after the proposed cuts, no apologies are needed for an effort to bring the budget nearer a balance. At the same time we hope economy will be practised in a discriminating manner. We cannot afford for instance to cut any expenditures which contribute to a solution of the housing problem; and there would certainly be no sense in rendering an agency like OPA more ineffective than it has already been made by Congress by starving it of funds. Actually the chief victims of the President's economy campaign will be the Army and Navy which between them account for no less than 44 per cent of the total budget outlay. "The Brass," as is only to be expected, is grumbling loudly about this and collecting figures to show that any reduction in their expenditure would be fatal to the national interest. On this point we hope the President will stand firm. Admittedly, we cannot reduce the cost of the services to the 1939 level or anything like it. But it is certain that large economies could be achieved if the Army and Navy reconverted from the "expense-no-object" frame of mind in which they fought the war. The lavish set-up of the Bikini experiments, for instance, cannot possibly be justified.

South Africa Challenged

A DISPUTE between two units of the British Commonwealth—India and the Union of South Africa—will present the United Nations Assembly, which meets on September 23, with one of its most testing issues. The cause of this dispute is a recently adopted South African law which in effect confines the Indian community of some 250,000 to a series of ghettoes by severely restricting their right to purchase and occupy property. After protests had proved fruitless, the Indian government withdrew its High Commissioner from South Africa and terminated the trade agreement between the two countries. Now since a situation has arisen which obviously "is likely to impair the general welfare or friendly relations among nations," it is asking the U. N. Assembly to act under articles ten and fourteen of the Charter.

There is little doubt that when this matter comes to the floor of the Assembly the South African representatives will claim that the problem is a purely domestic one and therefore excluded from review by the U. N. The South African government has frequently made it clear that it resents appeals by South African Indians to New Delhi and rejects the right of the Indian government to act as their champion. It insists that Indian settlers in South Africa are South African citizens with no right to protection by another country.

The glaring flaw in this argument is the very fact that has caused the dispute—the persistent refusal of the South African government to give citizenship rights to members of the Indian community, who suffer under a long list of disabilities. They are, for instance, restricted in movements from one part of South Africa to another; they are subjected in parts of the country to Jim Crow laws in public conveyances, restaurants, and so forth; they are barred from many occupations and from the Civil Service. And up to now they have been disenfranchised. The act which has caused the present trouble does, however, include provision for their representation in the Union Parliament. The 200,000 Indians in Natal Province in the future will be allowed the privilege of voting for three Europeans to represent them in the House of Assembly. Approximately the same number of Europeans in Natal elect seventeen representatives. No wonder the Indian community rejects this "concession" as a mockery and is determined to boycott elections.

Treatment of Indians in South Africa as third-class citizens contravenes many solemn obligations formerly undertaken by the Union of South Africa or its predecessors. In 1860, when the sugar planters of Natal were desperately seeking reliable workers, the Indian government of the day reluctantly consented to the emigration of indentured Indian laborers on condition that at the end of three years they would either be given passage home or allowed to settle in the country with the full rights and privileges of citizens. The Indians who entered the country from that time until 1913, when immigration was totally prohibited, turned Natal into a prosperous province. But the promises made to them were not kept. Year after year their rights were whittled down and new agreements were made only to be broken.

Thirty years ago one long campaign against anti-Indian legislation was led by Gandhi, then a resident of Natal, who there first developed and tested the strength of his technique of passive resistance. That technique is now being employed once again to defeat the ghetto act. Indian men and women are courting arrest, by camping on land which, under the law, they are forbidden to occupy. Up to the beginning of this month over 300 of them had been sentenced to terms at hard labor and many others to fines which they refuse to pay. The Indians know that they cannot afford to abandon this struggle; they know that they must stand firmly against further erosion of their human rights or lose even the few that remain to them.

Many of us will applaud their action but let us remember that we do so from within a glass house. For the issue that is being presented to the U. N. Assembly far transcends the boundaries of South Africa. That is not the only country which either by law or custom disregards the pledge of signatories to the United Nations Charter to promote and encourage "respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion."

Peace Conference Tactics

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

IN THE first test of strength at Paris, Russia lost, and lost by more than the two-thirds vote it had demanded as necessary to validate any recommendation from the Peace Conference to the Council of Foreign Ministers. Molotov's defeat ended one of the most acrimonious disputes yet staged by the Eastern and Western allies, and many critics of Moscow strategy have argued that, since the outcome of the row was foregone, the row itself was a meaningless display of stubborn bad temper. But unfortunately it was more than that—and more serious.

Molotov's most obvious and primary purpose was to repeat in a new context the argument made over and over at San Francisco, an argument whose roots had been firmly planted in Yalta: namely, that the "unity" of the four major allied powers—or five, by courtesy and political necessity—must form the solid basis of peace. Just as certainly as the war would have been lost had the leading Allies fallen apart, so the peace will be lost if they do not assume full and united responsibility for defending it. Even the veto—which can so readily be employed to prevent common action—is defended by Russia as an instrument to enforce unanimity: the major powers must act together or not at all.

It was upon this premise that Molotov, in the meeting of the Foreign Ministers in early July, insisted first upon completing the draft treaties before the general conference was called, and second upon fixing its rules of procedure ahead of time. He lost on both counts. The treaties were drawn up but with some twenty-six disputed points which must now be debated, along with all the agreed sections, by the twenty-one nations; and the procedure for the conference was not dictated, although the Big Four in issuing the invitations "proposed" that a two-thirds vote be required for recommendations affecting the texts of the treaties. When the conference assembled and the smaller countries, led by Evatt of Australia, won the slightly qualified support of Britain and the United States for their majority-vote demand, Molotov charged his colleagues on the Foreign Ministers' council with ganging up on the Soviet Union in defiance of their previous agreement.

But if Russia's fight was more than a noisy quarrel, it was also more than the reiteration of an old argument. Rather, Molotov used the unity argument in an attempt to advance his country's position in the continuing battle for power between West and East. This battle is not a one-way affair. Because the debate centered on the question of a majority as against a two-thirds vote, it was easy for correspondents to interpret it as a showdown between Western democracy and Soviet dictatorship. But this overlooks the quite apparent fact that the Western powers knew they could control the decisions of the conference if a majority rule obtained, while the Russians knew they could usually prevent a two-thirds vote for measures they disapproved. This diagnosis was borne out by two of the chief contenders at Paris: Attacking the Russian position, the Australian Foreign Minister sharply asserted that if the two-thirds rule were followed "nothing contrary to Soviet desires could be adopted," while the Russian Foreign Minister retorted, somewhat later, that "the simple majority constitutes a very simple means of securing the adoption of all amendments directed against the Soviet Union." Both were dead right.

The struggle for advantage among the major powers was not concealed by either the filibustering of the Russians or by Mr. Byrnes's outraged denial that any "bloc" opposed to Russia's interests. The blocs are there; they can be dissolved only by a changed attitude on both sides. Of this there is so far absolutely no sign, but until it comes nothing useful can result from acting as though either side were defending any disinterested ideal.

What one can never dare forget in the fateful days to come is a point made by del Vayo in his first article from Moscow: Russia's foreign policy is animated both by power politics and revolutionary aims. These are potent motives; taken together they present a challenge which the Western powers have not effectively met. While the British and Americans have gone through the motions of supporting the rights of the smaller nations, they have failed to demonstrate any willingness to adjust actual policy to the social and political currents sweeping through the world today. By ignoring or attempting to divert these currents they have given the Soviet Union a dozen issues it will not hesitate to use to its own advantage.

The weeks just ahead will show whether the Western Allies understand what the situation demands. One of the most critical tests will come this week when the Italian treaty, and especially the issue of Trieste, is laid before the conference. All four great powers are committed to the establishment of a "free territory" to include Trieste and a small area around it. No arguments are likely to alter this arrangement, but the kind of administrative set-up to be created is still in dispute and one can be certain that Russia will go as far as possible in support of Yugoslav demands for virtual control. If Britain and the United States are wise they will meet this attempt by advocating a genuine, unpacked international commission, on which Russia's interests are fully represented, as well as those of Italy and the Yugoslavs, and which will inspire confidence among anti-fascists in both countries. A form of internationalism that chiefly guaranteed the big investments of Italian and other capital in Trieste would stiffen the barrier between the big powers and intensify the deep-seated suspicions upon which Russian intransigence rests.

Please Omit Flowers

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, August 9

THE flag standards rising above both wings of the great grey building on Capitol Hill are bare; the gloomy halls of the Capitol are strangely silent; the wooden doors on the House and Senate chambers are folded shut and locked. No more angry noises rattle out into the corridors, for the Seventy-ninth Congress is dead, mourned by none.

The Congressmen and Senators have rushed out of Washington like men fleeing from a plague. The final hammer of the gavel was a release, a new freedom. Many members grew to hate the sight of the large restless chambers where they gathered to fight and worry over desperate problems.

This was the first Congress in twelve years to operate without strong guidance from the White House. The Congress in 1933, welcomed enthusiastically the program of Franklin Roosevelt, for it had none of its own to answer the rumble of discontent thundering on Washington. In the following years, there were motions of rebellion against White House "interference" with Congress; occasionally F.D.R.'s recommendations were ignored. But, on the whole, Congress was content to let the President plan legislation, organize its passage, and take the responsibility. This was true even of the Republicans and anti-New Dealers, despite their great shouts of rage at "dictation" from down the street.

Then three months after the Seventy-ninth Congress began, Franklin Roosevelt passed away and Congress was strictly on its own. His death had a strange effect on many of the Democratic leaders. Without the strong hand on their shoulders, missing the words of inspiration, they shrank to mere politicians. In the House, Speaker Sam Rayburn and Majority Leader McCormack looked dull and tired. Elderly little Congressman Sabath's splutters seemed more incoherent. In the Senate, many of the older New Dealers kept quiet and took little active part in the violent battles. Lister Hill, the majority whip, once hailed as a brilliant and forceful liberal from the South, sat meekly in his seat. Senator Fulbright, who had the reputation of being one of the most able and constructive men in Congress on foreign policy, was quiet. When he did speak, it was almost apologetically.

One Senator described for me what happened to him when Mr. Roosevelt died. He said, "When he was in the White House, I used to visit F.D.R. perhaps once or twice a month. He would encourage me and give me ideas. I don't think I realized how much I depended on him until he died. A few weeks later I went to the White House to talk things over with Harry Truman. He didn't know what I was talking about."

A few men have risen to true greatness in Congress since the death of President Roosevelt. One such is Senator Alben Barkley, the Democratic floor leader. All the burdens of getting some kind of Administration program through have fallen on this patient and infinitely tolerant man. When Congress came to the point of harsh name-calling, Barkley waited it out and then moved in to search for compromise. When the Senate was reluctant to pass a bill, Barkley held it in continuous session on into the night until it acted. He was on the floor explaining every major Administration bill. He led the fights. He outlined the strategy.

Another man who proved himself was Wayne Morse, the ruggedly independent Republican. At the start of the session he was shrugged off as just another maverick who would be tamed down. But Morse was not tamed down. He beat the Senate elders at their own game. He learned the Parliamentary tricks, and was able to secure passage of the World Court resolution despite the fact that both Connally and Vandenberg were against bringing it up. By himself he nearly forced a vote on the anti-poll-tax bill.

In this Seventy-ninth Congress there was almost a complete lack of party responsibility. Neither the Democrats nor Republicans tried to lay down a line and stick to it. They ducked the issues and did not hold caucuses on the big problems. Each little group went its own way. Except for the bills sent down from the White House with an OK on them, there was no Democratic program. The Republicans had none and were divided among themselves. This split was revealed by Senator Wherry's vitriolic attack on Senator Taft during the debate on the OPA conference committee report. Wherry, representing the extreme right wing of the G.O.P., impugned the good faith of Taft in an attack so bitter that he was chastised by Senator Tobey, the New Hampshire Republican.

TRIS COFFIN is a Columbia Broadcasting System commentator. He writes a weekly Washington report for The Nation.

Wherry is the Old Guard, opposed to everything the Democrats favor, against any form of government controls, isolationists, and wildly anti-New Deal. Taft is the thoughtful, shrewd conservative who realizes the Old Guard has grown out of favor with the public, and the Republicans cannot win elections by being chronic "aginners" on every measure. He was willing to support the conference report on the OPA so that some of the public heat on the price-control issue could be taken away from the Republican Party. In the final vote on this issue, eleven Republican Senators voted with Taft and twenty-one voted with Wherry.

The Seventy-ninth Congress was a field day for the lobbyists. They acted with more self-confidence than they have for many years, filling the galleries, swarming in the Congressional office buildings, giving orders to Senators and Congressmen. The oil lobby was so strong it was able to batter down the determined opposition of the War, Navy, and Interior Departments to get a clear majority on the tidelands bill. A good many professed liberals voted for this measure, which the President promptly vetoed.

Some of the major bills passed by this Congress were:

The revised price-control act. Congress did not want to pass any price-control bill. The pressures to exempt this and that commodity were so powerful that the new act is a hodge-podge and even industry is bewildered. In the last several days the OPA has been holding conferences with its industry advisory committees trying to explain what the new bill does. The industry men enter these meetings in a cheerful mood, but after a few hours take off their coats, throw aside their notes, and angrily denounce Congress. The bill is full of conflicts and vague words that are going to make price control a superhuman job of administration. Business men are saying now that under the old act they at least knew where they stood. The exemptions may make for a dangerously lopsided economy unless production reaches such high levels that competition will be a price leveller.

The atomic-energy-control bill. This was an example of how a bill should be written, studied, and acted upon. The Senate committee worked for five months on it, listening to testimony from scientists, military leaders, statesmen, and leaders of public opinion. Every possible alternative was studied. The big issues—military versus civilian control, and public versus private use of atomic inventions—were met and threshed out in a calm mood. As a result, the bill was adopted unanimously by the Senate. Much of the credit must go to young Senator Brien McMahon for his painstaking work. The contrasting lack of study in the House was revealed when Representatives went completely berserk and ripped up the Senate bill in a wild two days. Final passage of a satisfactory atomic-energy bill, with all of the main features of the McMahon bill intact, was obtained after the Senators held what amounted to a forum for the House conferees. When the bill came back to the House, the Representatives had talked themselves out and were a little ashamed of themselves.

The bills reorganizing the federal government and Congress. Neither of these bills went through in their original form but were watered down. Speaker Sam Rayburn weakened the Congressional reorganization bill because it would have cut down his power.

It was in the foreign-policy field that Congress passed some of its most constructive legislation. An understanding on basic foreign policy had been worked out while Mr. Roosevelt was still alive. Leaders of both the Republican and Democratic parties had agreed to a limited internationalism and thus much of the controversy had been eliminated by the time the bills reached the floor. The isolationists were never able to gain a majority in the Seventy-ninth Congress. The lineup was, for the internationalists, a very heavy Democratic majority plus eastern and west coast Republicans; for the isolationists, a thin smattering of Democrats and midwestern Republicans. The isolationists made a big noise, particularly in the House, but it did not gain them votes.

Bills changing the traditional policy of the United States in world affairs were:

Ratification of the United Nations Charter.

Approval of a $3,750,000,000 loan to Great Britain.

Approval of the Bretton Woods international monetary agreements.

Extension of lend-lease and the reciprocal trade agreements act.

Approval of a cultural-relations program throughout the world.

Approval of American participation in the World Court.

Appropriations for the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration.

Yet the limited scope of internationalism was shown by the fight over the World Court. Chairman Tom Connally of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee tried to keep the resolution pigeon-holed. He was joined by Senator Vandenberg, and even kindly Elbert Thomas was willing to let the session go by without action on the measure. It was not until Morse yanked the bill away from the committee that it even got on the floor. Connally immediately introduced an amendment giving the United States the right to determine whether or not any case brought before the World Court involving the United States is of a "domestic" or international nature.

If the United States declares the case is purely domestic, we can refuse to accept the jurisdiction of the court.

Making his speech, the old Texan did not sound like a convinced internationalist. He said he did not want any World Court telling us what to do with the Panama Canal. We had "bought" it with our money, he said. He drawled sarcastically that there were a lot of people around the world who would like to share our better living and would try to immigrate to the United States. Did we want any World Court telling us whom we should accept as immigrants, or how many? The Connally amendment passed.

Compared to earlier Congresses, the Seventy-ninth Congress was anti-labor. The House passed the harsh Truman labor bill with a wild whoop. The Senate would probably have passed it, too, had not Senator Taft blocked a unanimous-consent agreement to take it up right away. Over the week-end, the Senate had a chance to think the bill over, and it cooled down. The Senate did pass the Case bill with the Ball and Taft amendments, but it was vetoed by Mr. Truman.

Lack of concern of the Seventy-ninth Congress for the great mass of those who work for low or moderate wages was indicated by failures to act even more than by actions. Among the bills it did not pass were measures to liberalize unemployment-insurance benefits, establish a federal health and medical program, set up a long-range federal public-housing program, create special labor fact-finding boards, and establish a joint Congressional committee to study and recommend long-range labor legislation.

The Seventy-ninth Congress is not solely to blame for the confusion that filled all the debates. It had no strong leadership. It was confronted by an array of bewildering and far-reaching problems: reconversion, harnessing atomic energy, pushing the United States to the front as a world power in a troubled and angry time. From the galleries, it was obvious that the vast majority of Congressmen did not understand the issues and had not studied them. There were perhaps ten Representatives who revealed any knowledge of atomic-energy control when the bill came before the House. The others were plainly and frankly confused.

One remedy may be the Congressional reorganization begun by the La Follette-Monroney Bill. But a still more effective remedy depends on the voters: a discriminating electorate can wipe out the deadwood on Capitol Hill.

Today workmen are cleaning and painting the stately old building on Capitol Hill. A peaceful quiet has settled over Washington.

In five months a new Congress will come clamoring up the Hill to decide the policies of the United States. For the source of authority has shifted from 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue to the Capitol.

Report from Moscow

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Moscow, August 5

THIS is my sixth visit to Russia. I came here for the first time in 1922, when famine scourged the Ukraine; with the other members of the Nansen Mission I lived throughout my stay in a railroad carriage, for in the homes and inns the only hosts were typhus and death. I was last here in 1935; fifteen years of constructive effort had already given Russia the national quality which made me predict, on the day Germany attacked, that the Soviets would never be defeated. Thus, while this visit has been shorter than my previous ones, I had a basis for comparison and judgment. I could avoid the errors made by so many foreigners—of generalizing on the basis of unfavorable details or of using as criteria the standards and way of life of their own countries. And I was not likely to fall into that state of mystical rapture of the first-time visitor, so charmed by Russia and its people that he walks around in a dream, seeing everything in the same rosy glow that lights the Kremlin toward evening.

THIS IS THE FIRST of a series of articles by The Nation's European Editor. Mr. del Vayo will send his next article on Moscow's foreign policy. The third will deal with the new Five Year Plan.

The first thing I met on this trip to Russia was the war. I do not refer to the material destruction; not having been in the Ukraine, White Russia, or the Caucasus—the three most devastated regions—I saw physical scars only in Leningrad. Of course, the destruction has been frightful. The figures speak for themselves: 70,000 towns and villages entirely razed; 1,700 towns partially destroyed; 6,000,000 homes and buildings demolished; 30,000 industrial plants bombed or stripped. I refer rather to the fact that although I knew Russia had made a great contribution to the war, until I came here I had no clear picture of the extent of its sacrifices. Not a single Russian family was left untouched. I asked about a painter who showed great promise in 1935 when still just a lad—"killed"; about two or three poets who were beginning to be talked about in those days—"killed"; program. The Republicans had none and were divided among themselves. This split was revealed by Senator Wherry's vitriolic attack on Senator Taft during the debate on the OPA conference committee report. Wherry, representing the extreme right wing of the G.O.P., impugned the good faith of Taft in an attack so bitter that he was chastised by Senator Tobey, the New Hampshire Republican.

Wherry is the Old Guard, opposed to everything the Democrats favor, against any form of government controls, isolationists, and wildly anti-New Deal. Taft is the thoughtful, shrewd conservative who realizes the Old Guard has grown out of favor with the public, and the Republicans cannot win elections by being chronic "aginners" on every measure. He was willing to support the conference report on the OPA so that some of the public heat on the price-control issue could be taken away from the Republican Party. In the final vote on this issue, eleven Republican Senators voted with Taft and twenty-one voted with Wherry.

The Seventy-ninth Congress was a field day for the lobbyists. They acted with more self-confidence than they have for many years, filling the galleries, swarming in the Congressional office buildings, giving orders to Senators and Congressmen. The oil lobby was so strong it was able to batter down the determined opposition of the War, Navy, and Interior Departments to get a clear majority on the tidelands bill. A good many professed liberals voted for this measure, which the President promptly vetoed.

Some of the major bills passed by this Congress were:

The revised price-control act. Congress did not want to pass any price-control bill. The pressures to exempt this and that commodity were so powerful that the new act is a hodge-podge and even industry is bewildered. In the last several days the OPA has been holding conferences with its industry advisory committees trying to explain what the new bill does. The industry men enter these meetings in a cheerful mood, but after a few hours take off their coats, throw aside their notes, and angrily denounce Congress. The bill is full of conflicts and vague words that are going to make price control a superhuman job of administration. Business men are saying now that under the old act they at least knew where they stood. The exemptions may make for a dangerously lopsided economy unless production reaches such high levels that competition will be a price leveller.

The atomic-energy-control bill. This was an example of how a bill should be written, studied, and acted upon. The Senate committee worked for five months on it, listening to testimony from scientists, military leaders, statesmen, and leaders of public opinion. Every possible alternative was studied. The big issues—military versus civilian control, and public versus private use of atomic inventions—were met and threshed out in a calm mood. As a result, the bill was adopted unanimously by the Senate. Much of the credit must go to young Senator Brien McMahon for his painstaking work. The contrasting lack of study in the House was revealed when Representatives went completely berserk and ripped up the Senate bill in a wild two days. Final passage of a satisfactory atomic-energy bill, with all of the main features of the McMahon bill intact, was obtained after the Senators held what amounted to a forum for the House conferees. When the bill came back to the House, the Representatives had talked themselves out and were a little ashamed of themselves.

The bills reorganizing the federal government and Congress. Neither of these bills went through in their original form but were watered down. Speaker Sam Rayburn weakened the Congressional reorganization bill because it would have cut down his power.

It was in the foreign-policy field that Congress passed some of its most constructive legislation. An understanding on basic foreign policy had been worked out while Mr. Roosevelt was still alive. Leaders of both the Republican and Democratic parties had agreed to a limited internationalism and thus much of the controversy had been eliminated by the time the bills reached the floor. The isolationists were never able to gain a majority in the Seventy-ninth Congress. The lineup was, for the internationalists, a very heavy Democratic majority plus eastern and west coast Republicans; for the isolationists, a thin smattering of Democrats and midwestern Republicans. The isolationists made a big noise, particularly in the House, but it did not gain them votes.

Bills changing the traditional policy of the United States in world affairs were:

Ratification of the United Nations Charter.

Approval of a $3,750,000,000 loan to Great Britain.

Approval of the Bretton Woods international monetary agreements.

Extension of lend-lease and the reciprocal trade agreements act.

Approval of a cultural-relations program throughout the world.

Approval of American participation in the World Court.

Appropriations for the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration.

Yet the limited scope of internationalism was shown by the fight over the World Court. Chairman Tom Connally of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee tried to keep the resolution pigeon-holed. He was joined by Senator Vandenberg, and even kindly Elbert Thomas was willing to let the session go by without action on the measure. It was not until Morse yanked the bill away from the committee that it even got on the floor. Connally immediately introduced an amendment giving the United States the right to determine whether or not any case brought before the World Court involving the United States is of a "domestic" or international nature.

If the United States declares the case is purely domestic, we can refuse to accept the jurisdiction of the court.

Making his speech, the old Texan did not sound like a convinced internationalist. He said he did not want any World Court telling us what to do with the Panama Canal. We had "bought" it with our money, he said. He drawled sarcastically that there were a lot of people around the world who would like to share our better living and would try to immigrate to the United States. Did we want any World Court telling us whom we should accept as immigrants, or how many? The Connally amendment passed.

Compared to earlier Congresses, the Seventy-ninth Congress was anti-labor. The House passed the harsh Truman labor bill with a wild whoop. The Senate would probably have passed it, too, had not Senator Taft blocked a unanimous-consent agreement to take it up right away. Over the week-end, the Senate had a chance to think the bill over, and it cooled down. The Senate did pass the Case bill with the Ball and Taft amendments, but it was vetoed by Mr. Truman.

Lack of concern of the Seventy-ninth Congress for the great mass of those who work for low or moderate wages was indicated by failures to act even more than by actions. Among the bills it did not pass were measures to liberalize unemployment-insurance benefits, establish a federal health and medical program, set up a long-range federal public-housing program, create special labor fact-finding boards, and establish a joint Congressional committee to study and recommend long-range labor legislation.

The Seventy-ninth Congress is not solely to blame for the confusion that filled all the debates. It had no strong leadership. It was confronted by an array of bewildering and far-reaching problems: reconversion, harnessing atomic energy, pushing the United States to the front as a world power in a troubled and angry time. From the galleries, it was obvious that the vast majority of Congressmen did not understand the issues and had not studied them. There were perhaps ten Representatives who revealed any knowledge of atomic-energy control when the bill came before the House. The others were plainly and frankly confused.

One remedy may be the Congressional reorganization begun by the La Follette-Monroney Bill. But a still more effective remedy depends on the voters: a discriminating electorate can wipe out the deadwood on Capitol Hill.

Today workmen are cleaning and painting the stately old building on Capitol Hill. A peaceful quiet has settled over Washington.

In five months a new Congress will come clamoring up the Hill to decide the policies of the United States. For the source of authority has shifted from 1600 Pennsylvania Avenue to the Capitol.

Report from Moscow

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Moscow, August 5

THIS is my sixth visit to Russia. I came here for the first time in 1922, when famine scourged the Ukraine; with the other members of the Nansen Mission I lived throughout my stay in a railroad carriage, for in the homes and inns the only hosts were typhus and death. I was last here in 1935; fifteen years of constructive effort had already given Russia the national quality which made me predict, on the day Germany attacked, that the Soviets would never be defeated. Thus, while this visit has been shorter than my previous ones, I had a basis for comparison and judgment. I could avoid the errors made by so many foreigners—of generalizing on the basis of unfavorable details or of using as criteria the standards and way of life of their own countries. And I was not likely to fall into that state of mystical rapture of the first-time visitor, so charmed by Russia and its people that he walks around in a dream, seeing everything in the same rosy glow that lights the Kremlin toward evening.

THIS IS THE FIRST of a series of articles by The Nation's European Editor. Mr. del Vayo will send his next article on Moscow's foreign policy. The third will deal with the new Five Year Plan.

The first thing I met on this trip to Russia was the war. I do not refer to the material destruction; not having been in the Ukraine, White Russia, or the Caucasus—the three most devastated regions—I saw physical scars only in Leningrad. Of course, the destruction has been frightful. The figures speak for themselves: 70,000 towns and villages entirely razed; 1,700 towns partially destroyed; 6,000,000 homes and buildings demolished; 30,000 industrial plants bombed or stripped. I refer rather to the fact that although I knew Russia had made a great contribution to the war, until I came here I had no clear picture of the extent of its sacrifices. Not a single Russian family was left untouched. I asked about a painter who showed great promise in 1935 when still just a lad—"killed"; about two or three poets who were beginning to be talked about in those days—"killed"; about an able functionary I had known—"killed." Whether the number of Russian dead is 7,000,000, as Stalin has publicly stated, or more, as some not-too-friendly foreign circles would like to believe, the losses were well distributed among all the Russian families. Russia gave the war what no other country gave—everything it had. Its effort was more total, more complete than Germany's. Unless this is established in one's mind, it is impossible to understand the present situation or comprehend the role that the Soviet Union will play in world affairs.

The Russian people feel they have fulfilled their duty almost beyond all conceivable limits. An accent of pride is heard in every personal story of those three and a half terrible years—pride multiplied millions of times to encompass such unity of a people in a war effort as was never seen before anywhere in the world.

Critics on the left are apt to resent this exaltation of national sentiment and conclude that Soviet imperialism has replaced the old internationalism. That is too simple an interpretation. A good part of Russian pride is rooted in the knowledge that the country which gave the world this extraordinary example of resistance and heroism is the country of socialism. One cannot make a clear distinction between ideology and the big-power concept. To interpret Russian policy exclusively in terms of power politics is sure to lead to false conclusions; to interpret it exclusively from the point of view of revolutionary ideology would be equally misleading. It is only by viewing the problem from both angles that one gets a just perspective.

On the other hand, not only the nation as a whole, but the Russian man and woman have risen in their own estimation. They have discovered what they are capable of; they remained united in the darkest hours, when it seemed that the German war machine, still almost intact, could not be stopped, when cold and hunger gripped the land. No Vichy casts its shadow on their post-war period, bringing divisive recriminations and resentments, and offering a rallying point for the fascist forces that have survived. The road is clear for the great task of reconstruction; the Russians do not have to begin by draining off the muck of collaboration, and this gives them an immense self-confidence.

Russia is strong—that is the fundamental conclusion I drew from this new visit to Moscow. It is a strength reflected not merely in figures (I have already gathered far more statistics about the accomplishments of the last eighteen months and the fourth Five Year Plan than I shall be able to use in this limited series of articles). One feels it when talking both to the leaders and to the average Soviet citizen. It is a strength which in its outward expression has none of that dull, brutish air that characterized the Third Reich's show of power; Russia's renowned artistic temperament lends that strength an élan which public demonstrations under Hitler never possessed.

When I reached Moscow, the theater season was already over; everyone told me it had been a particularly brilliant season with more than a hundred new plays in the twenty theaters of Moscow, including such hits as "Under the Chestnut Trees of Prague," by Constantine Simonov, and "The Creation of the World," by Nikolai Pagodin. But I was fortunate enough to arrive in time for the annual sports parade. It was magnificent. Thousands and thousands of boys and girls performing as if in each of them athlete, warrior, and artist had fused. In the dozens of different tableaux there was a sustained richness and purity of color. Here was the glory of the Russian ballet extended to the masses. (Today a ballerina like Galina Oulanova continues the tradition of Ekateria Geltzer whom I saw twenty years ago on my first visit.) It was extraordinary to see these thousands of young people one moment marching by in ordered ranks as if on a battlefield, the next moment breaking into gigantic ballet patterns expressing their joy in the victory of youth over death and devastation. The festival had an important relationship to Russia's strength: the boys and girls who took part come from the working class, just as the generals who routed the monocled German officers come from the working class, just as the new directors of industy who are now taking the place of those fallen in battle come from the working class. This is a capital fact too often forgotten: that after twenty-nine years the Soviet system still conserves its essential character.

Before I left for Russia I had a discussion in Paris with one of those leftists who used to be aggressively pro-Soviet and have now become irritatingly narrow, prejudiced critics of the U. S. S. R. He denied that Russia was a socialist state but conceded that it was a "workers' state." Very well, for the sake of argument let us leave it at that. This workers' state, which has emerged victorious from the ordeal of a world war—as in its infancy it weathered the ordeal of foreign intervention and later successfully concluded three Five Year Plans—today is entering the post-war period with the impetus provided by a rising class to whom "the future belongs."

Many people make the mistake of applying the same yardstick to the Soviet Union as to any other country. In 1941 foreign experts on Russian affairs were dead sure that Russia would be defeated before the end of the year. Some of them had spent considerable time in the Soviet Union, knew the language perfectly, and had an enviable stock of information about the country. They knew everything. But the one thing they had never grasped was the superhuman will the working class can achieve when it is led politically with clarity and courage. The same thing is happening today. One foreign representative in Moscow gave me a long account of all the defects and objectionable features of the Soviet system from the point of view of the western democracies, beginning with salary inequalities and the lack of freedom in scientific discussions and ending with the prediction that the new Five Year Plan would fail because the Russians "are very tired." They are tired; but they believe that although great sacrifices still lie ahead, they have a future, while other nations face only sacrifices and an unending cycle of crises. The Russian tells himself, first, that there is no alternative but to make the Five Year Plan succeed, not only because it is the one way to make Russia stronger and protect it against another attack, but because it means an increase in the general well-being; second, that although Russia has a hard job before it, it has already passed the period of contradictions and internal conflicts in which the capitalist world is floundering. He believes that Russia's road goes with history, not against it.

After what they have been through, nothing frightens the Russians. A population increase of two million a year guarantees them the necessary labor reserves. As for raw materials and industrial potential, one foreign diplomat with whom I spoke, the representative of a Western European country who is neither sympathetic nor hostile but simply serious-minded and extremely well-informed, told me that Russia has not yet tapped a tenth of its resources. Being here, one feels that Russia and the United States are the only truly independent countries in the world. In a talk with a high Russian official I incidentally raised the question of an eventual loan from the United States. "Well," he said, "if there is a loan, fine. If not, we shall get along without it."

The people look healthy and in general better off than those of other countries which felt the real impact of the war. I am judging, of course, by Moscow, whose population has increased considerably during the war—there are now perhaps 6,000,000 Muscovites—giving the streets a lively air and offering a rich field for personal observation. This year's harvest will be larger than expected, despite a drought which for a time threatened to cut the yield drastically. Bread and potatoes, staples of the Russian diet, are abundant. The Moscow radio has just announced that bread, flour, and cereals will come off the ration list this fall. I know very well that in the devastated regions, especially in White Russia, the situation is still serious: 90,000 collective farms destroyed, 7,000,000 horses, 17,000,000 cattle, 40,000,000 hogs and sheep either stolen or destroyed by the Germans. At the end of the war conditions there were critical; since then they have improved tremendously, and each month new advances are registered. In any case, the rumors of a new famine in Russia are without foundation.

Politically, the Soviet regime is more firmly established than ever. Members of the foreign diplomatic corps who in the past spent their time trying to name the marshal most likely to bring off a coup have now abandoned their little game. Stalin's prestige is enormous; everyone in Russia recognizes his decisive role in the victory. If an election were held in the Soviet Union today, using American voting machines and eliminating any possibility of pressure on the electorate, Stalin would receive an overwhelming majority.

Equally unfounded are the stories of conflict between the army and the Communist Party reported from time to time in the foreign press. Both are part of the same body, firm pillars of the regime. Those who have a penchant for military coups d'état would be wasting their time here; they should go to Latin America. Nor does Stalin's state of health offer any comfort to those who since 1917 have been hoping for the worst. The day of the sports parade he was in the reviewing stand for six long hours and, football enthusiast that he is, stayed to see the last feature on the program, a match between the two leading Soviet teams. Stalin is already in his middle sixties, but he comes from Georgia, where the people are noted for their longevity. He has thrown himself into the battle of reconstruction with the same energy he displayed in the war.

Those who like to complicate the Russian issue and delight businessmen's clubs by lecturing on the enigma of the East and the mystery of the Russian soul should learn one simple fact: Russia wants peace. It wants peace passionately because the war interrupted the titanic effort of nearly thirty years, and because no country knows better than Russia what war on its soil means. I shall deal with various aspects of Soviet foreign policy in my next article, but I want to make this point clear at the outset: the Russian leaders want peace and the people want peace.

I can already hear the ironic comment: "But you are implying that there is such a thing as public opinion in Russia." Yes, there is. It does not express itself in the same way as in the western countries, but it exists and the Kremlin has many channels for sounding it. The war had a great influence on public opinion. Many Russians fought on foreign territory. Their contact with the outside did not change them, as some had hoped, into enemies of the regime. But it broadened their horizon. In contrast with previous visits, I was struck by the number of people who know foreign languages. English is the most widely spoken foreign language in Russia today; taxi-drivers are beginning to learn it.

The taxi-driver has almost completely replaced the izvozchik, the famous old Russian coachman. At the risk of being called a reactionary, I must say I miss the izvozchik very much. Perhaps there are still a few left in Moscow, but I was unable to discover them even though I traveled all over the city—without any feeling of restriction—just as I might wander about Paris. When I asked an old friend about the izvozchik he told me jokingly, "He was liquidated as a class." The old izvozchik does not fit into the tempo of today's Russia. Not only are automobiles increasing in number, but air lines are being extended throughout the country, even into the Arctic. Where formerly only explorers ventured, now thousands of Russian citizens live and work. The airplane with the red star on its fuselage links two hundred million men engaged in the most ambitious undertaking of all ages.

Paris Looks at Everyman's House

BY IDA TREAT

Paris, August 1

MICHEL thinks he would like to emigrate to America, so Raoul and I took him to the exhibition of American housing and town planning which showed at the Grand Palais. Raoul is just demobilized, but still in uniform—he has no civilian clothes. Michel is seventeen and still at school.

Both were eager to visit the exhibition. America's war record has given terrific prestige to American methods of production, and housing is everybody's problem these days. Raoul plans to get married if and when he can find a place to live. Why not a pre-fabricated house made-in-the-U.S.A.?

The exhibition was set out on a floor of bright yellow sand under the fire-blackened roof of the Grand Palais, rather like the intrusion of a colorful and intact New World in a gutted Europe. As we came in, a band was playing what the French still call jazz hot. With the music, the flags, and the crowds pouring through the turnstiles, there was a pleasant excitement in the air that suggested circus day.

I do not know quite what the crowd expected. Perhaps something on a scale with the flood of guns, tanks, jeeps, massed men and equipment that rolled into France two years ago. If so, I suspect that the first glimpse of the exhibition was disappointing.

Beyond the turnstiles opened a labyrinth of billboards: graphics and curves; stripes, circles, diagonals; patches of blue, black, red, and orange; schematic human figures and columns of print. This was the town-planning section.

IDA TREAT is an American writer who has lived in France for many years. She is the author of "The Anchored Heart."

"No doubt very interesting, if we could get near enough to make it out," Raoul said politely as the crowd pushed us forward. Raoul, like most Frenchmen, appreciates a neat graphic but is wary of over-elaborate simplifications. He suspects a catch. "The Germans are keen on this sort of thing," he remarked.

"Is this all there is to it?" asked Michel.

A GI elbowed past us, a Red Cross girl on his arm. "Nothing here for us," he said. "Just information and data."

We followed in his wake, towards other billboards with fewer graphics and more photographs. The crowd, too, preferred the photographs. The ranks ahead of us halted to take in views of timber-covered mountains, lake and forest, vast unfenced spaces. Farther on they were massed before air-photographs of Grand Central Parkway, Jones Beach, and Tennessee Valley farms. This was more in line with their idea of America. Vanport City before, during, after: "40,000 inhabitants, built in 120 days."

"It's stupendous," said Michel. He pointed to an excavator in a tumbled chaos of sand and rock, its operator comfortably seated, smoking a cigarette. "That's how they work over there."

A woman beside us was examining the photograph of the completed town.

"Ce n'est pas très joli," she said dubiously. "What do you suppose that it will look like twenty years from now?"

"In twenty years they will build another," countered Michel.

We pushed on to the next section—building materials. Foundations and floors, poured out of a mixer. Walls and partitions of pressed wood, plywood, cardboard, asbestos. Walls lined with paper and tinfoil, filled with a sandwich-like stuffing of cottony fiber. I thought of the three-foot granite walls of Brittany; I could understand that to French eyes all this looked startlingly fragile.

The visitors lingered, interested, a little skeptical. Perhaps they were thinking of the slow seeping of winter rains. "Chemically treated, water- and fire-proof," we read.

"If bugs ever get into that cotton...," someone remarked.

"It isn't meant to last. It's for now," Michel insisted.

We stopped to puzzle out the "minimum comfort requirements—space, air, central heating, bath, refrigeration." As Raoul pointed out, many of our homes might qualify for the first two. As for the rest—. Dutifully we compared the relative merits of different heating systems. We were getting farther and farther away from familiar ground.

A few steps ahead, a solid mass—chiefly women—clung like bees along a wooden railing. We had to work our way in. Everyone was very quiet, gazing intently at the exhibit. The dream kitchen: white lacquer and chromium plate, with electric stove, kettle, stream-lined flat-iron and mixer, all complete. But these were not what held the attention of the crowd. They were looking at the open door of the frigidaire. At the things inside. Bottles of milk, slabs of cheese, a long pork roast in a thick layer of fat, two chickens—only wax, of course, but poignantly realistic. I came to in time to hear Michel explaining to his neighbors: "In America, every worker's house has a kitchen like that. You can see now why they think we're so backward."

We came at last to the high-spot of the exhibition, the four pre-fabricated houses. After the dream kitchen, the dream village—at least part of one—standing in a plot of bright new grass dotted with shrubs, rose-bushes, and even a blue Vosges hemlock.

Four miniature houses—one sliced across like an anatomical figure, or a doll-house with the front removed, to show the construction. As flawless and perfect as the doll-houses of my childhood, fresh from the box and smelling of new paint. We joined one of the endless queues waiting outside and walked through the roped-off hallways, stepping gingerly on the blue linoleum. We admired the quiet tones of the wallpaper, the discreetly colorful chintzes, the simple lines of the furniture. We admired everything, speaking in subdued voices. No one mentioned "fragility" or the desire so deeply rooted in French home-builders—to build for at least two generations. Like everyone there, we were obsessed by the present. For some that meant makeshift quarters in a crowded Paris hotel, and for others the dingy paint and cracked ceilings, the leaky pipes and drains that needed attention after six years' neglect, not to mention the walls splotched with mildew and the floors that had bulged and warped during a succession of fireless winters.

Wistfully envious, we took in every detail of the "cheap, mass-produced American home."

Coming out, we stopped to read a notice: "the average American devotes one-twentieth of his year's income to rent; the price of a house represents, on an average, two years' total income." Then we saw the prices: $2,500 (300,000 francs) for the smallest of the doll-houses, $5,750 (650,000 francs) for the one we preferred—the one with neat white clapboards and green shutters. Like the thoughtful groups around us, we calculated. Raoul, in his university job, will earn 7,500 francs a month. The retired colonel at his elbow received less than twice as much. Respectively 90,000 and 144,000 francs a year. (What a sum that would have been in the old days!) Multiply those figures by two: neither Raoul nor the colonel could qualify for the humblest of the pre-fabricated houses. Not to mention the young railroad employee whose family allowances brought his monthly salary to 5,000 francs. Or even the waiter who totaled 400 francs a day in tips—as much as the colonel's pension.

"To live like that, we'll have to go to America," Raoul said finally. But Raoul has no intention of emigrating.

The sobered crowd drifted towards the exits. We had to admit it: the luxury of this "minimum of comfort" was not for us. Like the lovely things in the shop-windows of this Paris of ours, where a couple of armchairs cost as much as a house in the provinces before the war, and where the average woman cannot afford a new dress or a nightgown or a pair of sheets to replace the torn and mended because practically every penny of the family income goes for food. Not for us. Only black-marketeers could buy one of the elegant doll-houses—though being black-marketeers they would doubtless prefer something more elaborate.

Probably the bare-legged, bare-headed girl in the dyed coat who walked out ahead of us was thinking just that. She looked dejected: 4,000 francs a month as petite main in a famous dress-shop of the Rue de la Paix. For her, the pre-fabricated house that represents two years of an average miner's wages must have seemed as far away as heaven. She scuffed through the bright sand of the American village, yellow as the fabulous gold of the New World, still so alluring to would-be emigrants. It clung to the wooden soles of her high wedge-shoes. We tracked it out into the street. Only it wasn't gold—just common sand.

Prairie Socialism

BY J. KING GORDON

I

Regina, August 7

SASKATCHEWAN'S harvest has begun. South from Regina the prairie stretches out flat to the horizon. Now it is golden, as far as the eye can see. Saskatchewan farmers will have a good crop this year, although the 90° to 100° heat in the last few weeks will lessen the yield. Within a short time the wheat will start moving eastward—in freight cars, in the holds of Great Lakes grain ships, in ocean-going vessels from Montreal, towards hungry Europe. Saskatchewan is Canada's greatest wheat province.

Today Saskatchewan is thinking about other things besides wheat. Two years ago last June a new provincial government came into power. It was the first socialist government in the history of Canada. In the elections the candidates of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation (CCF) swept the polls, taking forty-seven out of the fifty-two regular seats. The government is headed by T. C. (Tommy) Douglas, a former Baptist minister who resigned his seat in the federal parliament to head the Saskatchewan CCF Party. In his two years as premier of the province he has shown remarkable gifts as an executive and an organizer. His cabinet is made up of men who share his convictions, solid men—farmers, teachers, labor leaders, a lawyer, two executives of the cooperative movement. And they have something to show for their two years in office. A conservative business man said to me, rather sadly: "If they just stand on their present record, they'll be in for twenty-five years."

Politics is in the air these hot August days. For the national convention of the CCF is meeting in Regina where thirteen years ago it was launched as a new Canadian party in the tradition of the great labor parties of the British Commonwealth. In 1933 the delegates from farmer, labor, and white-collar groups debated over fine shades of meaning in hammering out a fourteen-point manifesto. The manifesto has stood the test of time. It has saved the party from doctrinaire factionalism and from the temptations of political expediency. It has been restated in terms of immediate political objectives; it has been used as the broad basis of an educational program. Today with Canada facing the economic and social problems of the post-war period the Regina Manifesto is the one document providing a coordinated scheme of economic planning directed to the attainment of specific social objectives.

THIS IS THE FIRST of two articles on Canada's Cooperative Commonwealth Federation Party by J. KING GORDON, The Nation's managing editor. Next week he will write on the CCF as a national movement and report on the Regina convention.

The delegates to the 1946 convention have just begun their deliberations. The decisions reached may have important consequences for a party which, in the not-too-distant future, hopes to emulate the labor parties in Britain, Australia, and New Zealand and become the government of the nation. The solid achievements of the CCF government in Saskatchewan have done much to dispel the suspicion that the new party was a catch-all for starry-eyed theorists or dangerous radicals. And the delegates now in the city are going to have plenty of opportunity to see democratic socialism at work.

THE FIRST CCF GOVERNMENT

During two visits to this province in the last six months I have tried to find an answer to the question: "Why should Saskatchewan, the most agrarian of Canada's nine provinces, be the first to elect a socialist government?" I asked the Honorable Lachlan Fraser McIntosh, Minister of Cooperation and Cooperative Development. McIntosh, a native of North Dakota, is a quiet-spoken man who carries his Celtic ancestry in the rugged lines of his face as well as in his name. He said this:

"Saskatchewan farmers came gradually to the conclusion that they could handle their own affairs better than outsiders. We used to count on the big service organizations with headquarters in Eastern Canada to market our wheat, finance our farm operations, insure us against loss. Then we found that we were paying too high a toll. So we set up cooperative organizations. It's not a very long step from cooperatives to a government that applies the same principles in other spheres of activity."

There is something of the basic populist revolt in the CCF in Saskatchewan—a protest against the exploiting power of the big grain companies, the big mortgage companies, the manufacturers of the East, the high tariff men. This revolt is inherent in all western liberalism. What is new in the Saskatchewan CCF is the positive program of economic planning, the definite proposals for social security, the equal concern for the rights of labor and the rights of the farmer, the willingness to set up socialized industries so as to develop the province's resources in the interests of the people of the province.

PRAGMATIC SOCIALISM

Saskatchewan is still predominantly an agricultural province with wheat the main crop. I say "still" because the northern region—more than half the province—is a continuation of the rocky shield which in the provinces to the East has yielded enormous wealth from mines, forests, and lakes. The government has set itself the task of opening up this new north but just now is concentrating on the problems of the agricultural section.

The Saskatchewan farmer is solidly wedded to the idea of the family farm. To that extent he is a free-enterprising individualist. But, in general, what the Saskatchewan farmer wants is to be assured of security on his land and a reasonable price for his product. The operation of the various cooperatives and the wheat pool has given him some control over marketing. Now the new CCF government has passed legislation giving him security on his land. A crop failure carries with it not only the impact of financial loss but the threat of losing one's holdings. The new legislation frees the farmer from the necessity of paying interest on his mortgage in a crop-failure year. Moreover, it gives him absolute protection against foreclosure of his home and the quarter-section of land on which it stands.

Most Saskatchewan farmers had a hunch they were being too heavily taxed by the big insurance companies. On investigation it was found that fire losses over the period of a year were less than one-third the premiums paid out to more than two hundred insurance companies, most of them with head offices in Eastern Canada. The government, therefore, decided to go into the insurance business up to the neck. It took over an office building in the center of Regina and is now writing everything but life insurance.

A PEOPLE'S HEALTH

Shortly after coming to power the government invited Dr. Henry Sigerist, of Johns Hopkins University, to make a study of Saskatchewan's health problems. The immediate outcome of his study and report was the creation of a Health Services Planning Commission to meet the most urgent health needs and work out a long-term program of health insurance.

The province stands in a progressive medical tradition. The municipal hospital and the salaried doctor are established institutions. In fact, at the time the CCF came into office fully one-third of the rural population was covered by some form of health insurance. For a number of years the province has had free treatment for all cases of tuberculosis.

The most immediate needs arise from lack of trained personnel and facilities for hospitalization and specialized care. If the minimum standard of one doctor to one thousand persons is accepted, Saskatchewan needs four hundred doctors right away. Moreover, there is a heavy urban concentration of the medical profession—45 per cent of the doctors are serving the 15 per cent of the population living in cities. The province's hospital accommodation needs to be expanded fully 25 per cent. Improved laboratories, more public health clinics are urgently wanted. The medical school in Saskatoon carries the student only to the end of his second year.

After receiving the Sigerist report, the government went ahead energetically with its program. At the end of two years this program is well advanced: Free medical care for the 25,000 who are in receipt of government pensions—the aged, the blind, mothers on allowances, and their dependent children. Free medical services for those with diseases where treatment is usually long and costly—cancer (including diagnostic treatment, hospitalization, X-ray, and surgery), mental illness, venereal diseases, tuberculosis (previously established). Special aid is extended to municipalities that have set up their own health programs, particularly those least able to afford the cost of maintenance.

Now the Health Commission is implementing an overall program of health insurance which will eventually cover everyone in the province. Emphasis is placed on local choice and initiative in the belief that centralized administration defeats the ends of socialized medicine. Fourteen health districts have been mapped out. But before a region is actually constituted, a local referendum is taken to discover if the people in the region are willing to get behind the program and assume the added obligations. Each region is divided into a number of districts, and each district into health units with a health center, public health headquarters, nursing home or small hospital. Medical institutions in the larger centers will provide specialized laboratory, diagnostic, and surgical facilities.

SOCIALIZED FISH

When you look at Joe Phelps, he reminds you of a Grant Wood painting of a prairie farmer. That's what he is—a prairie farmer, converted into the Minister of Natural Resources and Industrial Development. Joseph L. Phelps came West from Ontario when he was a boy of nine and started farming with his father. He became active in the cooperative movement and developed a reputation as a radical political thinker. He entered the Saskatchewan legislature as a CCF member in 1938 and was raised to cabinet rank when the present government came into power.

When Joe Phelps thinks about natural resources, he thinks primarily about the men and women whose livelihood is dependent upon their development. Here's a case in point. There is an enormous lake in northern Saskatchewan called Lac LaRonge. It is teeming with fish. The trouble in the past has been transportation and an insecure market. A big fish company would buy the fish to suit its own convenience; the fishermen fared miserably, were constantly in debt, and in the summer went on relief.

The first trip north Joe Phelps took when he was appointed to his job was a flight to Lac LaRonge. The plane landed in the lake and came ashore at the little settlement. The settlers were Métis—half Indian, half French—whose forefathers had lived on the western plains long before the railway opened the plains up to the waves of immigrants from the East. The conversation, as told by Phelps, went something like this:

Métis: "I suppose you've come to talk about our relief money."

Phelps: "What relief?"

Métis: "Well, the last government gave us relief, and we'd like to know what this new CCF government is going to do for us."

Phelps: "Don't believe in relief. How about doing some work?"

Métis: "What kind of work is there to do here in summer?"

Phelps: "I want some wood cut—200 cords of it. I'll pay you five dollars a cord. There's a thousand dollars to start with. Then I want some timber cut."

Métis: "There's no timber around here."

Phelps: "Sure there is. I saw plenty when I was flying in. May have to go five or six miles to get it, but it's there."

Métis: "Well, what do you want timber for? You can't ship it out, and there's no mill."

Phelps: "I want it right here. And there's an old mill here that can be put into shape. Anyway, that's my worry. I want you to cut me 200,000 feet of timber and get it floated in to where the mill is."

Phelps said to me, "I don't know where I got the figure 200,000 but I wanted to show them that I meant business."

That was the way the fish-filleting plant and cold-storage locker got started at Lac LaRonge. The plant was built with lumber cut and sawed on the spot. The cold-storage locker meant that fish could be caught all year round. The fish was filleted, inspected, quick-frozen, packed in attractive waxed cartons, and stamped with the Saskatchewan government label. A regular transportation service was developed to take the fish out to the retail market. Result: a new industry operated by the province; security and regular employment for the fishermen of Lac LaRonge; good, reasonably priced fish for the people of Saskatchewan.

And Lac LaRonge is just the beginning. For the air-survey maps are blue with lakes, and thousands of tons of fish are waiting to be taken out every year.

FURS FROM THE TRAPPER

Furs are something else in Joe Phelps's special field of interest and for the same sort of reasons. For with the exception of migrant workers, I don't suppose that any class of American labor is subject to more exploitation than the fur trapper of the north. The romance of his calling is apt to conceal the fact that he is a virtual slave of the fur company that grubstakes him and takes his catch in payment on a debt from which he is seldom free. The Hudson's Bay Company and other big fur companies have for centuries regarded themselves as benevolent overlords of the wilderness territories in which they had their posts. Modern transportation has begun to break their monopoly over supplies. Now they are facing a government whose concern is for the lives and well being of the companies' "subjects."

Phelps shoved across the desk a letter he had just received from a missionary in one of the farthest north settlements. The letter asked if Phelps could help his parishioners get their furs out to a market where they would get a decent price. They were all in debt to the fur company and struggling along on the very edge of existence. And this season the skins were good and the market fur prices high.

To meet this situation the Saskatchewan government set up a Fur Marketing Service. It equipped a modern warehouse in Regina for the storage, grading, and cataloging of furs. Here regular auctions are held which are attended by buyers from all over the continent. A nominal service charge of 5 per cent is assessed: apart from that the full price paid goes to the trapper or fur rancher.

Now it is interesting that both these public enterprises, fish and furs, while representing direct government participation in the development of natural resources have aided rather than damaged small primary producers. The free-enterprising trappers are better off because the government has actually re-established, in its fur auction, the classic form of the free market so as to lessen the dictatorial power of the big fur companies.

The over-all policy on public enterprises is settled by an Economic Advisory and Planning Board which passes judgment on all proposed projects. It is now in the process of making an economic survey of the province and working out a ten-year plan of economic development. The key-man in the set-up is a six-foot-six Englishman, George Cadbury, of the famous Cadbury family that has traditionally combined business acumen with austere moral principles. A member of the British Labor Party of long standing, he served in Washington during the war on one of the British supply commissions. His job in Saskatchewan is two-fold. He heads the Advisory and Planning Board and acts as chief industrial executive on the board of directors of every government company. Besides developing the fish and fur services, the government has taken over the provincial lines of the Greyhound Bus company, acquired a woolen mill, a brick plant, and a shoe factory, set up a timber-marketing service and begun a survey of provincial resources. In its program for public power it has taken over one of the largest private power companies in the province and plans to speed the badly needed rural electrification.

PATTERN FOR DEMOCRATIC SOCIALISM

Space will not permit a description of Saskatchewan's program for the advancement of all forms of cooperatives. Today more than 250,000 persons—well over 25 per cent of the total population—are members of cooperatives.

The CCF is building a new society in Saskatchewan not according to any doctrinaire socialist blueprint but in accordance with certain basic social principles applied to the communal problems of daily living. The program is non-mechanistic. It begins with the needs of the individual and derives its strength from the initiative and willing support of individuals. And, one might say, not the state but the individual is the end of the program. If you want to find totalitarian manifestations of socialism you will have to look elsewhere than on the western Canadian prairies.

MVA: Stalled But Not Stopped

BY ERNEST KIRSCHTEN

St. Louis, August 8

ONE great boon which the Seventy-ninth Congress might have given the nation is the Missouri Valley Authority—a TVA-patterned assurance that the Big Muddy will be utilized for the enrichment of a region thirteen times as big as the Tennessee Valley, instead of contributing to its impoverishment. Work of a sort has been started on the river under divided auspices, but genuine hope lies only in the establishment of a single, integrated authority. Senator Murray of Montana and Representative John Cochran of St. Louis did introduce a bill for this purpose. But after a double-cross in committee, its supporters decided to wait for a more auspicious occasion. Will it take more floods, another emigration from the dust bowl, and further depletion of America's bread basket to bring to the valley President Roosevelt's dream of a plan "for the greatest benefit of its citizens, both present and future, and for the greatest benefit to the United States?"

Much of the blame for the legislative setback falls on President Truman. As Vice-President, he started the Murray bill on its way to frustration by assigning it to the hostile Commerce and Irrigation Committees in the Senate as well as to the Agriculture Committee, which had handled the original TVA legislation and regarded the MVA proposal with some favor. After Senator Overton had provided a three-ring circus for the bill's enemies before the first two, there was not much sense in starting hearings before the Agriculture Committee.

However, there are other obstacles in the way of speedy acceptance of the plan. For one thing, the people of the ten states in the vast Missouri Valley are not yet solidly united in support of a TVA for their region. In one of the earlier editorials with which the St. Louis Star-Times launched its MVA campaign, it admitted that while there were "at least some links of common interest that held people in the Tennessee Valley together," people in St. Louis have little in common "with the people who live in the foothills of the Rockies . . . or with the wheat farmers of the Dakotas and the corn growers of Nebraska and Iowa." Lines of communication cross the Missouri Valley from east to west instead of following the course of the river. The semi-arid states of the upper valley are primarily concerned with irrigation. The states of the lower valley are worried about flood control and navigation. Two years of persistent effort have done much to convince the people of the valley that irrigation and flood control, navigation and power production are all part of one big problem, but much remains to be done.

Political alignments have been a brake on the development of MVA sentiment. The Missouri Valley is the bailiwick of reactionary rural Republicanism. To its representatives in Congress the MVA smacks of the New Deal and is therefore anathema. (It is only fair to say that there is probably less favorable sentiment in Democratic Senator O'Mahoney's state of Wyoming than anywhere else in the valley.) While the Star-Times and the Post-Dispatch of St. Louis have given unremitting support to the MVA, the Kansas City Star, the Omaha World-Herald, and most other valley papers are hostile.

Wesley Price, writing in the Saturday Evening Post, was particularly effective in answering the favorite argument of the opposition that the MVA would create a "dictatorial, totalitarian super-state." Mr. Price pointed out that the very people who are now raising the cry of states' rights had long been looking to all sorts of federal agencies for funds to be spent in the valley. He also called attention to the "luxuriously financed lobbyists who went to work to head off the MVA." These gentlemen emphasized the sad plight of private power companies faced by the threat of public hydroelectric developments. One particularly nonsensical idea which they tried to plant with the "right people" was that the MVA would not help to industrialize the region since "industry really doesn't care what it pays for power; electricity is too small an item on the cost chart to be considered in locating a factory."

Public-spirited citizens have organized to fight this propaganda. Montana has an MVA Association under the direction of Jerome Locke. A similar organization in

ERNEST KIRSCHTEN is editor of the St. Louis Star-Times editorial page.

St. Louis is headed by Professor Raymond Tucker of the Washington University School of Engineering. A national MVA organization has been formed in Washington. Support has been obtained from James Patton's Farmer's Union, the Missouri Farmer's Association under the presidency of F. V. Heinkel, various trade unions, and groups like the League of Women Voters and the St. Louis Liberal Voters' League. The St. Louis Chamber of Commerce held a referendum which, rather surprisingly, resulted in a substantial vote for the MVA. Their energy and money, however, have not matched the efforts of the utilities, railroads, and other interests which feel directly threatened.

In the forefront of the opposition, stands the United States Chamber of Commerce—on behalf of which D. J. Guy proclaims that the MVA would have the power "to do everything but coin money, wage war, and amend the Constitution"—the Mississippi Valley Association, and the National Reclamation Association. In effect the last two are lobbying agencies for the Army Engineers and the Department of Interior's Bureau of Reclamation. These two federal departments fought over the waters of the Missouri for years but finally entered on a marriage of convenience to head off the MVA. The chief interest of the Engineers is navigation. They want to build a nine-foot channel from Sioux City to the mouth of the river just above St. Louis and to line this reach of the stream with high levees. Farmers insist that the narrowing and deepening of the channel has made floods much worse than they used to be. But the Engineers get strong support from the barge-line operators and the contractors who work for them up and down the 2,500 miles of the river. The Reclamation Bureau, on the other hand, is interested in irrigation in the upper states of the valley.

As it became more and more obvious that the solution of the problem of the Missouri could be achieved only through an over-all agency like the TVA, the army came forward with its Pick plan. This was a hodge-podge of old projects hastily put together by Colonel Pick, district engineer at Omaha, now General Pick, builder of the Ledo road. The Reclamation Bureau produced the so-called Sloan plan, a more carefully thought-out proposal on which W. G. Sloan, the bureau's agent at Billings, Montana, had worked for some five years. The Sloan plan calls for ninety dams and would cost about $1,257,700,000. It provides for seventeen power plants capable of producing 4,000,000,000 kilowatt-hours of firm power. In addition its sponsors claim that it would provide irrigation for 4,760,000 acres of arid land and would bring supplementary water to 538,000 additional acres. They estimate its annual benefits at $168,306,000 and its annual cost at $65,413,000. This cost, they say, could be amortized in fifty years with interest at 3 per cent. The Pick plan calls for twenty-two reservoirs behind multiple purpose dams but makes scant provision for irrigation. Its cost is estimated at $661,000,000. These figures should prove that no money is saved by opposing MVA. It's a question of a good job or a poor one.

The MVA proposal clamors for a trial because all other methods of coping with an alarming situation have failed. Missouri Valley states have been losing population for several decades. It is beginning to dawn on them that they need new industries and more prosperous farms to keep their sons at home. In the years between the wars, drought drove more than 300,000 people out of the valley and ran up a relief bill of $1,246,000,000. Since 1942 severe floods have been an almost annual occurrence; their cost is conservatively estimated at $150,000,000. The richest farm land in the United States has been washed under the Eads Bridge at St. Louis at the rate of twenty acres a minute.

The MVA has been stalled but not stopped. Other regions are going ahead with similar proposals. A decline in the productiveness of the Missouri Valley while other regions are striding forward should break down the opposition. In the long run it will take more than a Montana Power Co. to stop the people of that state from joining with the other people of the valley to check its economic decline. The farms which are now being carried away by wind and water can be pegged down and enriched. Electric power can bring new industries to many parts of the valley. Development of resources can create thousands of new opportunities for a good living.

But this will not come about without effort. To quote again from a Star-Times editorial: "As David Lilienthal said, the technical problems of this transformation are not beyond the resourcefulness of the engineers. But first there must be a common determination to set the engineers to work for a common purpose. This calls for men of vision up and down the valley. The Tennessee had its Senator Norris—paradoxically a man from the valley of the Missouri—who worked and preached until the dream of TVA was an actuality. We need hundreds of Norrises—business men and farmers and ranchers and public officials fired with the dream of an MVA, men determined to explain and to plead, to organize and to fight, until their dream, too, is a reality."

Research in Happiness

BY MARTIN GUMPERT

HAPPINESS is a medical problem. The social purpose of the practice of medicine is the promotion of happiness. We shall not attempt here to discuss the concept of happiness; it has historical reality. The Declaration of Independence has made the pursuit of happiness one of the sacred rights of our society. Happiness presupposes freedom from fear and want, freedom from anxiety. Happiness is expressed by a state of physical and mental health. It is the physician's task —and the basis of his professional dignity and social standing—to achieve and to protect health and thereby create happiness.

A good physician, therefore, ought to be seriously concerned with the condition of unhappiness wherever it is met. Unhappiness is a challenge to the physician's ability, knowledge, and conscience. His powerful privileges are obviously wasted if he permits unhappiness to develop into an epidemic symptom.

Strangely enough, not many physicians are aware of these vital, strongly political implications of medicine, which is in part applied understanding of scientific processes and in part applied understanding of sociological forces. Unhappiness, so much thought of and talked about as an acute emotional state, has never been recognized by medicine as a pathological entity, either curable or incurable. It is true that the psychosomatic movement in modern medicine has once again reclaimed the idea of the close interdependence of emotional and physical factors. Cobb, Bauer and Whiting (Journal of the American Medical Association, 1939), for instance, have concluded from the study of so-called life charts, connecting a patient's medical data and social data, that "environmental stress, especially poverty, grief, and family worry, seem to bear more than a chance relationship to the onset and exacerbations of rheumatoid arthritis." This relationship can be shown to exist, to varying degrees, in almost every disease.

But not much attention has been given to the tremendous social consequences of such findings and to the great social responsibilities which derive from them for the practicing physician. Medicine holds, indeed, a key position in the fight against social catastrophes. The medical study of unhappiness as a disease-provoking element, as a disease in itself, or as a clue in the search for disease, should be systematically undertaken. Very few investigations in this direction are, so far, available.

Periods of transition, individual or social, may cause unhappiness until a new equilibrium has been established. Where no hope for a new equilibrium is offered, as in old age, or in a desperate political climate, unhappiness becomes a constant and dangerous part of existence. J. T. Landis (School and Society, 1942) examined 450 individuals over 65 as to their "happiest" period of life. Fifty per cent named the period between 25 and 45; 20 per cent chose the years between 15 and 25; 18 per cent decided for childhood; 7 per cent were unable to make a choice; only 5 per cent selected middle and old age. M. Morgan interviewed recipients of old-age allowances in New York State (Annals of Psychology, 1937): 41 per cent chose the years from 25 to 45 as their happiest. Worries associated with financial insecurity were the greatest single source of worry.

Whoever agrees that neither childhood or old age should be unhappy by nature, must be convinced that there exist critical age groups, burdened by an unjustified load of unhappiness, for which remedies can and must be found. Similar critical areas of endemic unhappiness could undoubtedly be discovered by investigating economic groups, racial groups, cultural groups. Such an investigation would, in all probability, reveal relations between the regional prevalence of disease (e. g. tuberculosis, hypertension, psychoses) and the prevalence of happiness or unhappiness among certain groups.

The statistics of suicide and crime might be another source for the study of unhappiness, though these incidents can be influenced by many complex factors difficult to evaluate. In a chart in "Mental Disorders in Later Life" (ed. Oscar J. Kaplan, 1945), we find that suicide rates increase progressively with age. But there are strong fluctuations according to sex, to race, and to the general economic situation.

The material thus far available on this subject is so limited as to be inconclusive in almost every respect. However, it suggests a new aspect of medicine: medical sociology, a systematic effort by physicians to analyze the social causes of unhappiness which influence the health of their patients, and to fight these causes by active participation in the political strifes of their time and their social group. Scientific facts could perhaps have a clarifying influence on hate, prejudice, and selfishness in politics and might help to reconcile a chaotic reality with reason.

MARTIN GUMPERT, whose articles on medicine appear regularly in The Nation, is a New York City physician and author of a book on problems of longevity, "You Are Younger Than You Think."

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Can We Afford German Capitalism?

TOP American and British officials in Germany have begun discussions of the means by which an economic merger of their two occupation zones can best be achieved. This step was undertaken because it has so far proved impossible to obtain the kind of economic unification of the whole Reich which was envisaged by the Potsdam plan. The resulting stagnation of trade and industry, and delay in reconstruction, has led to a further depression of German morale creating problems for the occupation forces. In addition, it has slowed down the pace of recovery in other countries for it is impossible to subtract the economy of Germany from that of Europe as a whole without achieving a general loss of production.

Merger of two of the three western zones may lead to some alleviation of the situation but, unless Mr. Byrnes's hope that it will lead to the reintegration of the whole country is speedily fulfilled, it threatens to create more problems than it solves. For if economic division persists for any length of time, with eastern and western zones developing on divergent lines, it will be difficult to avoid total fission of the Reich. That threat may tend to soften Russian opposition to unification on Potsdam lines since the Soviets need the products of the western zone and are certainly unwilling to see its powerful industrial apparatus linked to the economies of America and Britain. On the other hand, the French, who have also blocked unification, may favor a stronger barrier between east and west since it means severance of the arteries which connect the political brain of Germany with its industrial heart. That might, indeed, prove a solution of the problem of preventing the revival of an aggressive Reich. But equally it might make insoluble the much more immediate problem of preventing a competitive struggle among the victors for the largest pieces of the German heritage.

It is not my purpose here, however, to review the political implications of the Anglo-American move. I wish rather to call attention to some of the economic difficulties it involves, difficulties which, up to now, do not seem to have been given official recognition.

Both America and Britain have been very disturbed by the cost of maintaining even a very meager standard of living for the inhabitants of their zones, both of which are food-deficiency areas. Merger, by itself, will not remedy this situation although it may do something to raise agricultural production by making possible better distribution of fertilizers and farm tools. But essentially, if western Germany is to live without Anglo-American doles, it must export enough industrial products to other countries to enable it to import minimum requirements of food and raw materials. At the present time the cost of such imports, paid for by America and Britain, is reported to be in excess of $500 million annually. But even this large sum allows for the distribution of very inadequate basic rations—around 1,000 calories in the British zone and 1,275 in the American. These may be enough to maintain life; they do not provide sufficient energy to enable the Germans to make the industrial effort needed if they are to become self-sustaining.

It follows, therefore, that in order to raise productivity in the merged western zones, and so provide a surplus of goods for export, an immediate increase in imports of food will be required. In addition stocks of raw materials will have to be replenished from foreign sources before many factories can resume operations. Thus only by a further investment of cold cash can the Anglo-American authorities enable their German proteges to fend for themselves.

Another vital necessity is Anglo-American agreement about the kind of economy western Germany is to have. The British New Statesman and Nation in its issue of July 27 expressed the fear that "partnership with the Americans . . . would, in effect, compel us to restore a capitalist Germany which would also be inevitably a dangerous Germany." That fear is natural in view of the neutral stand which the American occupation authorities have taken in regard to the ownership of industrial property in their zone. But the British attitude has been similar, except in the case of the Ruhr coal mines which were socialized by decree some months ago.

Both western powers have, in fact, taken the position that it is for the Germans to decide, after the restoration of a free political system, what sort of economic structure they want. This is good democratic theory but is it practical? And is there, in fact, much hope of achieving political democracy in Germany without prior reform of the social structure? For, we must remember, there is no longer in Germany a large, stable, middle class on which to build a free-enterprise system. Two wars in one generation have wiped out savings and other forms of intangible assets. The German state can never repay the gigantic debt that it is loaded with as a result of Hitler's adventures; it will probably have to repudiate a large part of its enormous pension obligations. The wealth that remains in Germany consists largely of physical assets, such as undestroyed industrial plants, and its ownership is concentrated in the hands of a comparatively few industrialists most of whom were fervent Nazis. If these men are left in control of their property, they will be left in control of the state as well.

The Russians have dealt with this problem in a rough and ready way and they appear to be getting results, not only for themselves but for the Germans. They have nationalized a large part of the industry in their zone and got production going. Most of the output goes to Russia but a modicum is left for German consumers and the workers at least have jobs as well as rather better rations than are available in western Germany.

If the merger of the American and British zone does not speedily produce at least equally good results, western democratic methods are not going to impress the Germans very forcibly. But it is very doubtful whether we shall make much headway as long as we rely on private ownership of industry and the profit-motive. For those institutions cannot be reconciled with the total planning of the economy necessary to prevent western Germany from remaining dependent on the reluctant charity of its conquerors.

KEITH HUTCHISON

BOOKS and the ARTS

Our Southern and Western Colonies

THE REVOLT OF THE SOUTH AND WEST. By A. G. Mezerik. Duell, Sloan and Pearce. $3.

ONE of the basic national frustrations which produced the New Deal was the profound need in the West and South to throw off Eastern financial control and embark on programs of local industrialization. Roosevelt was too busy with immediate depression questions to confront directly the problem of strengthening the underdeveloped sections until his second term. But he then began to move in on what he called the nation's number one economic problem, the South; and, before the war came to absorb his major energies, he showed increasing awareness of the need for electrifying and industrializing the West. The hopes and ambitions of these underprivileged regions provided an important source of New Deal momentum; and their problems constitute a large part of the New Deal's unfinished business.

A. G. Mezerik's "The Revolt of the South and West" brings the economic balance sheet among the sections up to date with admirable clarity and force. The war, he points out, created the great opportunity to liberate the South and West from their semi-colonial dependence on the East. The requirements of war production, against all the inclinations of the industry-dominated planning divisions of WPB, meant that plants were built outside established geographical and financial limits. Machines, labor, and experts migrated to the underindustrialized parts of the country. It looked as if the industrial unbalance might at last be corrected.

But, in spite of all, the East maintained and strengthened its central financial position. With the war over, secure in its economic and political power, in its control over financing and over patents, the East is reasserting its pre-war supremacy. When it cannot stifle the industrial burgeonings in Texas and California and Washington, it insures its absentee control; and it mobilizes to squeeze out such mavericks as Henry Kaiser who persist in struggling for industrial home rule. Yet the South and the West, Mr. Mezerik thinks, are in there pitching. Governor Arnall's freight-rate fight, the united regional support behind Kaiser, the demand for the Missouri Valley Authority—these are all aspects of the determination to break the Eastern stranglehold over the nation's productive energies.

"In the making, across and down the United States, is a new and strange industrial civil war . . . The benefits of industrialization, the main ingredient for prosperity, are withheld from the people of the Pacific West, the Intermountain States, the Southwest and the South alike. These regions look at the East with growing anger, convinced it is the East which today exercises the new tyranny, industrial domination." Truman's modification of the Roosevelt Cabinet in favor of the South and West, Mr. Mezerik suggests somewhat optimistically, may mean a new drive to build up the underdeveloped areas; and in the long run, he thinks, the alliance of South, West, and Eastern labor against Eastern capital may lead to a realignment of parties.

In his zest for his case, the author sometimes tends to repeat certain more extreme charges, not only as expressions of regional paranoia, but also as objective analysis. More important, he does not always make clear that the revolt of the South and West, like most other nationalist movements, is headed by people who oppose foreign exploitation in order to clear the field for themselves—a fact which makes his projected alliance opportunistic and his realignment of parties most improbable. But, within the space he has allowed himself, Mr. Mezerik has performed a considerable feat of fast, crisp, and intelligent political writing. "The Revolt of the South and West" is a basic for students of current American politics; and it should be read, in particular, by every one interested in the possible origins and hallmarks of the next New Deal.

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.

Sun Yat-sen: A Partial Portrait

SUN YAT-SEN, A PORTRAIT. By Stephen Chen and Robert Payne. John Day. $3.

THAT a well-written biography of Sun Yat-sen, the great Chinese revolutionary democrat, which shows him as the Chinese millions see him, is essential reading for Americans, goes without saying. But every informed person will be justly skeptical of any book "written with the help of Kuomintang Party members."

That such Kuomintang members are mouse-like liberals is proved by frequent false statements, such as one referring to Chiang Kai-shek as Sun Yat-sen's successor, or another to the effect that "the whole of China was united" three years after Dr. Sun's death.

With some exceptions, this book is nevertheless an excellent chronology of historical events through which the tenacious, self-effacing, and tragic figure of Sun Yat-sen moved. The most concise personal portrait of him is given in the words of one of his followers:

> He gave everything to others and received nothing for himself . . . he never amassed any property, he had no selfish desires, no thought of personal revenge. We may possibly be as learned as he was, but we can never be so full of tenderness.

Even a few weeks before his death in 1925, while cancer was eating out his wasting body, Dr. Sun was speaking forcefully in defense of a life-long struggle for his three principles —national liberation, democracy, and socialism. Before vast mass meetings he told > . . . of his plans to organize the country on a cooperative basis, with representation from all the progressive movements, a country in which the people would have complete power to decide their own fate.

Though this book contains many of the basic writings of Sun Yat-sen, it makes no mention of an article published by him in early 1912 during his brief term as provisional president of the Chinese Republic, in which he stated:

> Unless we take care right from the start to protect ourselves against the establishment of capitalism, a despotism a hundred times more frightful than that of the Manchus awaits us, and rivers of blood will be required to liberate ourselves from it.

Reading such prophetic words, as well as other writings of Dr. Sun urging the establishment of a people's democracy and expressing his ceaseless hatred of foreign imperialism, one quite naturally compares them with the practices of the present Kuomintang dictatorship, which traffics in his name while violating every concept for which he struggled for forty years. The authors make no such comparisons, nor do they mention that even when Sun Yat-sen's forces were weak and his domestic and foreign enemies powerful and menacing, still he never once invited foreign armies to occupy the soil of his country on his behalf.

With his life work unfinished, he died tragically in Peking on March 12, 1925, with his grief-stricken wife wiping the death-sweat from his face. Madame Sun Yat-sen still relentlessly fights for the realization of his principles.

After his death, write these authors, the western powers eulogized him as one of the six great pioneers and leaders of the world. During his life, however, all those foreign powers except Soviet Russia called him a "Cantonese theorist, visionary, crack-pot, and trouble-maker." They always refused to recognize any Chinese government save those headed by chosen "strong men," quislings. Nor have those foreign powers changed their spots today.

The book is sometimes marred by Robert Payne's adolescent political ignorance, which he smothers in phony "poetic" images, such as this:

> Revolutions are like flowers that grow where the wind listeth; they arise often inexplicably as the result of forces which cannot be measured, because they are related to the overtones of the human heart.

Reading such passages, one has to come up for air. Like all revolutions, the Chinese revolution was, and remains today, explicable; and it can be measured in concrete actions —the struggle between a Chinese fascist dictatorship supported by American imperialism, and a representative Chinese people's democracy. Every Chinese patriot who is today mauled, imprisoned, or shot down by Kuomintang thugs armed with American guns, is struggling for the still unrealized principles of Sun Yat-sen.

AGNES SMEDLEY

Art As Experiment

NEW DIRECTIONS 9. Edited by James Laughlin. New Directions. $3.75.

IN HIS annual gallery of experimental writing James Laughlin usually evades editorial responsibility by insisting that he does not judge what is "good" or "bad" but simply presents the diversity of the literary avant-garde. In "New Directions 9" the responsibility is more pressing because, as he admits, the experimental vein is running thin and because Farrell's leading essay on commercialized authorship involves the integrity of the non-commercial experimental writer—the intellectual, the literary rebel, the révolté of the "permanent revolution" in literature.

With understandable concern Farrell examines how commercial publication impedes the rapid growth of American literary taste and makes the writer a salesman. Yet his exploration of the dilemmas of the commodity vs. art opposition which cleaves low culture from high is inconclusive. After he demonstrates that philistine money can Hollywoodize literature until only "safe" books are printed on an industrial scale, Farrell addresses, with admirable quixotism, the "artistic conscience and honor," the artist as artist, in the name of "art as such." In so doing he minimizes the danger that art-as-such may terminate in the very literary bohemianism or skill-fetishism that he dreads. Though he observes how Marx demanded the emancipation of the press from commerce, the great issue is whether this emancipation can occur through the intransigence of the individual writer. Necessary and welcome as it is, the avant-garde is too often isolated in bohemia, that "cultural ghetto" of bourgeois society. In this instance Laughlin himself may offer a less naïve program when he argues that by developing a larger public concerned with serious writing we can somewhat mitigate the commercialization of authorship. In France, for example, La Nausée, Sartre's philosophic novel, has run to thirteen editions. The alternative to the industrialization of writing is not aesthetic rebellion, art as such. The bourgeois perspectives of J. Donald Adams will not be corrected by the cult of experimental or pure art.

The significant révolté is not avant-garde in this aesthetic sense. Henry Miller, who some time ago appeared to be only the révolté, never has appeared less so than in his present study of Rimbaud, himself a desperate révolté. Only Miller does not recognize him as such. He discerns in Rimbaud the voyant so finally alienated from the air-conditioned nightmare of the bourgeois world that he sinks into passivity and renunciation, with Miller's own conviction that "we are coming to the end." Here may be a better interpretation of Miller than of Rimbaud—but at least Miller can no longer be considered the arch-bohemian, or even experimental. His comments are almost academic in scope and precision.

At the other extreme from Miller is Eluard, the late surrealist, the alleged Stalinist of resistance poetry and as such, one presumes, "in line." Eluard, now in communication with his society, has like Aragon yielded his position as révolté. Incidentally, it seems certain that Eluard has accomplished a more satisfactory poetic clarity than Aragon. His ironies are less gross; the emotionalism is less shameless; the indirections and compressions and parallelisms, beneath the simplification of statement, are more extensive.

Both Miller and Eluard have, in their ways, emancipated themselves from the kept literary press and preserved their artistic honor. They are experimental in the only considerable sense of the term: their import cannot be summarized by referring to their method alone. In contrast is the "experimentation" of Patchen, with its freakish debasement of the portmanteau term, the Hemingway dialog, the Studs Lonigan milieu, the Sternian vignette and typography, and the surreal wisecrack, all of which give Patchen his "subterranean circulation." And is Berryman's prose "style" experimental: ". . . our visitor's grave words, repeated by me to the ceiling, like a rite, with envy and relief, as meaningless as for some stray from the street, crept into a church for a moment out of the sun, the Elevation of the Host"? Barnes, Eliot, James, Pater, and Advanced Composition?

This collection will be re-read for other kinds of non-commercial experimentation that are not merely new directions in technique but in vision: the spasmodic three poems by Tennessee Williams; the William Carlos Williams story which, unlike Patchen's vulgarization of the Hemingway dialogue, adopts a kind of Hemingway simplification to effect its relationship to life; Paul Palmer's galloping parody of Dos Passos. Or there is the trio of Kafka fables, very brief but very authentic in their malaise, their sense of helplessness, and their ominous, seemingly detached symbols. Over and above the gibberish formulated into theses in the new translation of Lautréamont's preface to the verses that never appeared, admirers of the Maldoror will find a number of phrases by which to interpret the dislocations of that fierce and melancholy poem: "Communicate to your readers only the experience resulting from pain, which is no longer pain itself." The pain is that of the révolté. But the experimentation is inevitable, and not alone for the sake of art.

WYLIE SYPHER

BRIEFER COMMENT

Quantitative Verse

MAXWELL BODENHEIM, John Gould Fletcher, and Alfred Kreymborg have been familiar figures in literary circles for three decades, in which time, between them, they have written just one short of sixty books. Their virtues are well known: they have had successful careers; one of them has been president of the Poetry Society, another has won the Pulitzer Prize. There is little new, or encouraging, that can be said, now, about the publication of Selected Poems (Bodenheim, Ackerman, $3.50), The Burning Mountain (Fletcher, Dutton, $2.75), and Man and Shadow (Kreymborg, Dutton, $5).

All three of these books assay a high percentage of rhetoric, or The Will Trying to Do the Work of the Imagination. None of the three authors has a very good ear: Mr. Bodenheim's ironic wittitudes are better set off in his rhymed couplets (rare) than in his free verse rhythms (prevalent); Mr. Fletcher, for all his talk about symphonic forms and his division of his longer poems into four movements, is no Mendelssohn, let alone Mozart, of the written word; Mr. Kreymborg, in his long autobiographical poem, uses the colloquial manner of Robert Frost without the latter's saving grace of racy idiom, and at times, especially when rhyming, descends into a very vulgar doggerel indeed. If Mr. Fletcher's poem on Spain can be interpreted as anti-Franco, all three writers are at least progressive politically, against Hitler, for Democracy (Mr. Kreymborg very much so), and not too pessimistic (though Messrs. Bodenheim and Fletcher have their dark moments) about Humanity. There is almost nothing about the Atom Bomb.

Young poets, even those whose manuscripts are only "promising," have a legitimate grievance, I think, against

"THE MOST IMPORTANT INTELLECTUAL EVENT IN THE UNITED STATES THUS FAR IN 1946"

—Howard Mumford Jones
New York Times

F. S. C. NORTHROP'S

The Meeting of East and West

In this monumental new work F. S. C. Northrop of Yale University has made a brilliant analysis of the philosophical, political, economic, and religious beliefs of America, Europe, and Asia, to arrive at a synthesis of values, free from the provincialism which would insist that one set of standards only has the right to exist.

"In my considered judgment the appearance of this volume is the most important intellectual event in the United States thus far in 1946," writes Howard Mumford Jones in the New York Times.

"The book is great because its theme is great," Mr. Jones adds. "It is important because it is, so far as I know, the only book by an American philosopher to state the fundamental ideological conflicts in world culture . . ."

CONTENTS

1. The Contemporary World
2. The Rich Culture of Mexico
3. The Free Culture of the United States
4. Unique Elements in British Democracy
5. German Idealism
6. Russian Communism
7. Roman Catholic Culture and Greek Science
8. The Meaning of Western Civilization
9. The Traditional Culture of the Orient
10. The Meaning of Eastern Civilization
11. Contemporary India, Japan and China
12. The Solution of the Basic Problem
13. Practical Wisdom

$6.00 at your bookstore

MACMILLAN

publishers who continue to bring out books like these in a time of paper shortage. What difference can it possibly make to anyone except Messrs. Bodenheim, Fletcher, and Kreymborg whether Messrs. Bodenheim, Fletcher, and Kreymborg issue 20 or 21 books apiece? I know the old argument—publishers lose money on poetry, and so, perhaps, they feel safer sticking to the old stand-bys; but I cannot feel they are going to get very rich off these three volumes, either. Still, Mr. Kreymborg's book, I notice, is offered for sale at five dollars; an innocent in such matters, I nevertheless feel that this looks suspiciously like Inflation.

ROLFE HUMPHRIES

Big Business and the West

WHEN WORD CAME to Wendell Berge, Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division of the Department of Justice, that the big government-financed steel plant at Geneva, Utah, had been sold to United States Steel for $47,500,000, the stout heart of the fighting little Nebraskan must have skipped a few beats. This was the plant in which we, the people of the United States, had invested $200,000,000. It was to be, with other smaller steel plants, a "center of economic gravity" for the industrial development of the West. Or such was Wendell Berge's vision as expressed in his book, "Economic Freedom for the West" (University of Nebraska Press, $2). Now that vision is blasted by this unpardonable sale of the plant to the Fat Boys of the East. It is ironic that this bargain sale—bargain, that is, for the Steel Trust—should have the blessings of Mr. Berge's boss, the bustling barrister from Texas, Attorney General Tom Clark, who announces that while the Geneva plant has an annual capacity of two million tons, or nearly 40 per cent of the total of the Far West, the sale does not constitute a monopoly in the technical sense of the word. That it does give U. S. Steel and the Pittsburgh gang a strangle-hold on any large-scale Western free enterprise is evidently not the concern of the Attorney General.

The welfare of Western war-born industries is, however, very much the concern of Wendell Berge. He is a genuine believer in free enterprise and in the effectiveness of the Anti-Trust Act in protecting the government-financed aluminum, magnesium, chemical, and steel works of the fifteen Western states; we paid two and a half billion dollars for them, whereas private concerns unwillingly put up about $656,000,000. Mr. Berge has written a strong appeal to all of us to save the big Western plants for our own use. But the Geneva sale is evidence of the resolve of Eastern special privilege to keep the West an industrial colony, paying its taxes, in the shape of "basing points" and exorbitant railroad rates, directly into the coffers of Wall Street.

This author has in him the crusading spirit of another great Nebraskan, George Norris. He is enlisted in a seemingly lost cause. Yet his faith in the resourcefulness and independence of the enterprisers on our last frontier makes his book heartening reading. It may well be that, disillusioned by such brazen sell-outs of our properties as the Geneva shenanigan, he will seek more drastic measures for curbing the monopolists than the antiquated Sherman Act.

MCALISTER COLEMAN

A Tactful Faith

QUITE RECENTLY THE SUPREME COURT ruled that Jim Crowism was illegal in vehicles operating in interstate commerce—yet throughout the South Negroes generally continued to move to the rear. Despite his Northeastern background and college education, Sergeant Logan, with his minimum demand ("A Negro's Faith in America," by Spencer Logan, Macmillan, $1.75) for equality of opportunity without social equality, is as humble and modest as his less advanced brethren in the South. Obviously, he does not see eye to eye with that unusual Negro woman who refused to sit in the rear of a bus, was fined for violating the Virginia Jim Crow statute, and finally won a victory for her race through her appeal to the Supreme Court. According to Mr. Logan, such people are guilty "of the gravest injustice to their cause if they attempt to gain by force of law alone the advantages of social equality from people who are not spiritually or morally prepared to grant it." He sounds defeatist as he assures the white reader that all the Negro masses need is bread and shelter, and that the Negro does not want to force himself "into the home life of white America." His desire to prove that the Negro does not expect any amalgamation of the two races even makes him strangely prejudiced against the "socially aggressive" light-complexioned Negro: "The lighter the color," he asserts, "the less stability of character and purpose." But how can the Negro ever achieve economic equality without social equality?

If Richard Wright's "Black Boy" was fraught with bitter rebellion, this other young Negro leans over backward. His book, which won the Macmillan Centenary Award for non-fiction, becomes far more valuable where the author leaves the field of Negro-white relations and starts to describe the life, hopes, and worries of his race. He depicts realistically the tragedy of Harlem, where college graduates and illiterate Southerners, law-abiding citizens and criminal elements are lumped together in one small terribly congested area, and he destroys the common notion that the Negro is just a happy-go-lucky: "The Negro laughs to forget his plight." Drinking, gambling, and prostitution were forced upon him by whites who took advantage of his predicament; as a proletarian, the Negro shares the lot of all proletarians, yet added to it is the burden of racial discrimination.

Mr. Logan, who spent several years in the army, is hopeful as far as the future of the American Negro is concerned. He found a great deal of inter-racial amity among the troops, and he believes that the Southern Negro soldier became more conscious of the rights and privileges of a democracy, of the ballot and the importance of using it. He is "convinced that many of the manifestations of race prejudice which we as Negroes experience would be greatly reduced if only those who yield to it could be brought face to face with the effects of this prejudice upon the human beings concerned." The author concedes that the road towards political and economic quality is a long and wearisome one, and that the changes towards the better are rather slow, but "in spite of all this I believe in America. My people believe in America. All the subtle persecution in the world cannot take our faith away from us."

ALFRED WERNER

MOTION PICTURE

DOROTHY McGUIRE • ROBERT YOUNG in The NEW Adventures of CLAUDIA and DAVID
Directed by WALTER LANG • Produced by WILLIAM PERLBERG
A 20th CENTURY-FOX PICTURE
— ON STAGE —
In Person — The Famous Screen Star
VIVIAN BLAINE
Lou WILLIS, Jr. • Bobby WHALING & YVETTE
ROLLY ROLLS
EXTRA!
Bob Hope's Radio Playmate
JERRY COLONNA
COOL
Now Playing ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

STAGE PLAYS

THEATRE GUILD'S PRODUCTIONS
THE MUSICAL HIT
CAROUSEL
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
with Harold Keel — Iva Withers
Jean Darling • Eric Mattson • Norma Howard • Jean Casto
AIR-COND. MAJESTIC Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway, Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT
OKLAHOMA!
Based on Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs"
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
Jack Kilty • David Burns • Betty Jane Watson • Ruth Weston
AIR-COND. ST. JAMES Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." — Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents
BORN YESTERDAY
The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40. AIR-COND.

"MERMAN'S A WOW!" — Chapman, News
RICHARD RODGERS and OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd Present
ETHEL MERMAN in
"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"
Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON
Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN
IMPERIAL THEA., 45th St. W. of Bway. Mats. Wed. & Sat. Air-Cond.

BUY YOUR BOOKS through The NATION

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible.

•

Please address your orders to
THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
The NATION
20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW
"Delightful Film Comedy"—N. Y. Times
JENNIFER JONES
CHARLES BOYER
in ERNST LUBITSCH'S
'CLUNY BROWN'
Based on MARGERY SHARP'S Novel
— AND —
"It's a Killer-Chiller"—PM
JOHN HODIAK • RICHARD CONTE
LLOYD NOLAN • NANCY GUILD
'SOMEWHERE IN THE NIGHT'

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
ALDEN
Jamaica
Keith's
FLUSHING
Keith's
RICH. HILL
STRAND
Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

"UTTERLY ENCHANTING . . . MAGNIFICENTLY EXECUTED." —N. Y. Herald-Tribune
WALT DISNEY'S
Full Length Comedy Musical
'MAKE MINE MUSIC'
In TECHNICOLOR
presenting the talents of these great stars
BENNY GOODMAN • DINAH SHORE • THE ANDREWS SISTERS • NELSON EDDY • JERRY COLONNA • ANDY RUSSELL • THE KING'S MEN • STERLING HOLLOWAY
THE PIED PIPERS
— AND —
'BADMAN'S TERRITORY' Randolph Scott Ann Richards

NOW! AIR CONDITIONED
The THEATRE GUILD presents
LAURENCE OLIVIER
in William Shakespeare's
"HENRY V"
IN TECHNICOLOR • Released Thru United Artists
PRICES: Evgs. (at 8:30) $2.40, $1.80 Mats. daily (at 2:30) $1.80, $1.20
ALL SEATS RESERVED
NOW! N. Y. CITY CENTER 131 West 55th St.

BARBARA STANWYCK • VAN HEFLIN
LIZABETH SCOTT
— IN —
HAL WALLIS' Production
"THE STRANGE LOVE OF MARTHA IVERS"
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

— IN PERSON —
DINAH SHORE
— Plus —
GIL LAMB
— Plus —
The Acromaniac
EXTRA!
DICK STABILE
and his Orchestra

NOW PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

Paul Rosenfeld

PAUL ROSENFELD was an artist. In his performances one finds "a level of reality deeper than that upon which they were launched"; his experiences have not been "made by fear to conform with preconceived theories." Now to be thus "strong in oneself is to be strong in one's relationships. Give and take is effected, that feeds the powers"; powers that have afforded us "a great panorama of conclusions upon the contemporary scene"; a "miscellaneousness" of acknowledgment that baffles enumeration. The mind which has harbored this greater than greatest Noah's ark of acknowledgments was characterized by an early compliment to it in The Nation, as "courageous, clear, and biased."

Biased? Biased by imagination; and the artist biased by imagination is a poet, as we see in Paul Rosenfeld's mechanics of verbal invention. Mass epithet would not do; sensibility fevered the noun or the adjective. John Marin was "a timothy among the grasses"; "The Enormous Room" had "a brindled style"; "love and aversion" were "darts of light on a stilly flowing stream, wave-caps cast up and annihilated again by a silently rolling ocean."

Matching the ardor of the method, there was in Paul Rosenfeld a republicanism of respect for that ignis fatuus, liberty; a vision of spiritual fitness without visa; of "inner healing" for white America's black victims, those "splintered souls" whose "elasticity of young rubber is weakened and threatened and torn, in bodies of young girls become self-centered and men playing in vaudeville theatres." Though a bachelor, Paul Rosenfeld was not inimical to woman, as Margaret Naumburg, Gertrude Stein, my timid self, and many another might well have testified ere 1946. He even understood children, their "infantine works and little houses"; their way of "cooking a meal without friction of personalities," since "the end irradiates the means."

The artist is no "lily-leaning wistful willowy waning sentimentalist," but "a man of stomach," producing "hard form which reveals itself the larger the more it is heard." "Heard" suggests music, and in this regard there is an Amazon to explore; an Amazon that was a river, flowing and branching throughout a continent. It was without "axes to grind and sadism to exhaust."

In objectifying what poets, critics, novelists, educators, painters, photographers, sculptors had "given" him, Paul Rosenfeld exemplified most touchingly his conviction that possession involves responsibility. He toiled to benefit his benefactors; or to put it exactly, to benefit benefaction; to justify justice. It is not merely D. H. Lawrence, E. E. Cummings, Gaston Lachaise, Nodier, El Greco, Marsden Hartley, Mozart, or Stravinsky, to whom he was grateful, but to sculpture, painting, writing, music.

Nor was critical rectitude in Paul Rosenfeld something apart from supposedly more prosaic manifestations of conscience. "Michelangelo," he said, "does not stand entirely besmirched for having ceased work on the Medici tombs in order to fortify Florence against brutal Emperor and treacherous Pope." Paul Rosenfeld cared what becomes of us. "America," he said, "must learn to subordinate itself to a religious feeling, a sense of the whole life, or be dragged down into the slime."

Flamboyant generalities are the refuge of the lazy, things that sound well, but in this instance are well. Paul Rosenfeld, in his impassioned and varied books, was a poet. He was a scientist of music; a musician; the rescuer of Tristram and Iseult from the half-scholarship of judicious translating; "contented," "refreshed," "rejoicing," "gladdened" by his multifariousness of gratitude—a figure best praised by his own myriad chivalries, drudgeries, and masteries. When everything has its price, and more than price, and anyone is venal, what a thing is the interested mind with the disinterested motive. Here it is. We have had it in Paul Rosenfeld, a son of consolation, a son of imagination, the man of deeds.

MARIANNE MOORE

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

COLUMBIA has issued the recording of Schubert's "Schöne Müllerin" cycle that Lehmann made a few years ago, before the Petrillo ban (Set 615; $7.85). More exactly, it is a recording of nineteen of the twenty songs: Lehmann could not record "Ungeduld" for Columbia because she had recorded it several years earlier for Victor; and this creates the difficulty that if one interpolates the Victor "Ungeduld" at the proper point one hears a different-sounding voice. But one hears worse differences in the Columbia performances. The entire cycle could not be recorded at one session; and most of the songs—from the first, "Das Wandern," to No. 15, "Eifersucht und Stolz"—seem to have been done on days when Lehmann was having trouble with her voice—when she did not have the control of breath necessary for steady tone and smooth legato. The voice is shrill; in the fast songs the singing is breathlessly choppy, quavering, explosive, and at times inaccurate in pitch (the groups of breathily staccato notes of indeterminate pitch in "Mein" are painfully ludicrous), and the phrases are breathlessly clipped (worst of all in "Der Jäger"); and even in the slow songs, where the legato and phrasing are better, the tone is not firm and some groups of notes with wide upward leaps are achieved only with explosive strain. These things, moreover, are made worse by recording in which there is no consistency in volume-level or in balance of voice and piano, but which usually makes the voice too loud for the piano, and in some instances so loud that the shrill tones leap out at one almost entirely deprived of piano context. (In addition, the recording provides "Der Neugierige" with a background of Congo drumming that Schubert's score does not call for.) But in No. 16, "Die liebe Farbe," it is as though one were hearing another voice; and in fact one is hearing Lehmann's voice on a day when she had it under control: it is lovely, firm, steady, manipulated with ease in wonderfully inflected phrases. That is what one continues to hear in those last great songs, to the concluding sublimity of "Des Baches Wiegenlied," which is realized in the most beautiful performance of the series. In these songs, moreover, the voice is excellently reproduced; but it is not properly balanced with the piano. And only English summaries, not the German poems, are provided in the album.

The first part of Aaron Copland's "A Lincoln Portrait" contains some fine-sounding music of the kind that he would write if the title were "A Roosevelt Portrait" or "Allegheny Autumn." Which is to say that its only connection with Lincoln is the quotations from his speeches that it leads up to; but the way of presenting them—the business of "He was born in Kentucky, raised in Indiana, and lived in Illinois. And this is what he said: This is what Abe Lincoln said:" and "When standing erect he was six feet four inches tall. And this is what he said: He said:"—had me writhing. And Lincoln's words would seem to me to call for something less than Kenneth Spencer's bombastic declamation. The performance of the music by the New York Philharmonic-Symphony under Rodzinski seems good and is well-reproduced (Set X-266; $2.85).

Rodzinski's performance of Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" with the New York Philharmonic (Set X-265; $2.85) lacks the sensitive fluidity of the previously recorded performances of Muck, Toscanini, and Walter. Its over-all recorded sound is agreeable; but there are a few places where important melodic strands in the contrapuntal texture cannot be heard; and on side 2 of my copy there is some very bad distortion.

Respighi's "Pines of Rome" is well-performed by the Philadelphia Orchestra under Ormandy, and the performance is well-reproduced (Set 616; $3.85); but the crescendo that Toscanini achieved in the finale is not on these records.

The Boccherini Sonata No. 2 in C major for cello and piano that Piatigorsky plays with Pavlovsky (71785-D; $1) I have found uninteresting; and though Piatigorsky's playing is unusually restrained, its mellifluousness is not to my taste. The performance is well-recorded.

Films

JAMES AGEE

IN "Caesar and Cleopatra" large million-dollar chunks of ancient Egypt are tossed around under Shaw's lines as casually as so many rehearsal campstools. They are often pleasantly gaudy, sometimes beautiful, and never, I think, primarily objectionable; yet to some extent, by their massiveness and their violence of complexion, they cloy one's attention and thus slow up the mind and the dialogue. The movie could have been as good, I am sure, and perhaps better, if the budget had been adequate only to take care of the players and their costumes, and their background had, with proper wit, been suggested and sketched in. But even as it stands, the show is excedingly good at the core, if you enjoy Shaw. Over that I am in no position to argue. I know of very little writing and not much music, for that matter, more pleasing than his work; nor do I expect to see his dialogue better used or his insights better understood than by most of the people in his cast, particularly Claude Rains and Vivien Leigh in the leading roles. Shaw's study of genius in Caesar, incidentally, makes most political leaders, and most studies of them, look about as well housebroken as a high-school debating society.

The Greatest Show on Earth

The Diary of a New York High School Teacher And Eight Other Books by Paul Eldridge

Paul Eldridge is the author of this fascinating, charming, exciting, dramatic, humorous report of what happened in the school where he, with 400 other teachers, had the prodigious task of pouring learning, civilized mores, ideals of citizenship, notions of decency, and hints of wisdom into the heads and characters of 10,000 young, blatant, magnificent, pathetic, heroic, erotic, neurotic, physically powerful, over-sexed, grand, witty, animalistic, emotional Americans. This book (15,000 words; pages 5½ x 8½ inches in size; 25c per copy) is tight with the warm juices of life. It bulges with the fatty tissues of living organisms, with cultural growth, with hidden Lesbianism, with painful manifestations of barbarism, with hatred, love, physical attraction, violence, toughness, self-poisoning jealousies, brief echoes of genius, rabelaisian humor, plain talk, exhibitionism, sadism, faculty politics, fawning hypocrisy, and sincere concern over the future of our chaotic, groping, mighty, struggling, ambitious, open-eyed generation. Scores of characters stalk across Paul Eldridge's huge canvas. The writing, as we've come to expect from Eldridge, is original, creative, beautiful, sardonic, epigrammatic, heterodox, cynical, laughing, jeering, poetical, imaginative, sophisticated, Wildean, scatological, sexually aware, uninhibited, and as free as flashes of lightning. This is Eldridge at his best. His fine talents permit him to stand as an equal with the freer spirits of European literature. Eldridge, in this little book, makes our language sizzle, crackle, cavort, dance, jump, twitch, dash, flow, leap and fly. A rare bird, this Eldridge—a genius in our midst—who's writing for an enthusiastic, eager audience that has surrendered to his greatness. Below is the complete list of the books Eldridge has written for the Haldeman-Julius press.

THE GREATEST SHOW ON EARTH. The Diary of a New York High School Teacher. 25c. Prepaid.

LANTERNS IN THE NIGHT. A Catechism for Cynics. More than 450 sophisticated, witty, charming epigrams. "Lanterns in the Night" is offered as a lantern to the spiritual descendants of Diogenes, fearless seekers of man. Paul Eldridge neither harangues nor preaches. Scalpel for pen, he cuts and exposes. 5½ x 8½ inches, in readable type. Card cover, 25c per copy, prepaid.

Paul Eldridge's short stories are masterpieces. He is the American de Maupassant. In all, these volumes contain 84 short stories. Each book is 5½ x 8½ inches, in readable type. Card covered. 35c per copy. "The Greatest Show on Earth," the seven volumes of short stories and the book of aphorisms described above ("Lanterns in the Night"), nine volumes in all, may be had for only $2.90, prepaid.

Here are the titles of the 84 short stories we are offering the discriminating public.

Vol. 1. VIRGINS, AND OTHER STORIES. Virgins, Birds of a Feather. And So—To Pasture. Grafting the Family Tree. Porcelain Hens. Harvest. Magnificent Beggar. But Not for Happiness, Fair to All Three. Unto Eternity! The Perfect Curtain. 35c.

Vol. 2. THE LAST SUPPER OF MARIANNE, AND OTHER STORIES. The Last Supper of Marianne. The Comedian's Last Act. Friends. He Who Was God. Sacrifice. Good Prey. Emperor of Micampca. Until Death Do Us Part. Mademoiselle Aperitif. The Matricide. The Fortune Teller. Author of Circles. 35c.

Vol. 3. HE WHO LOVED HIS NEIGHBORS, AND OTHER STORIES. He Who Loved His Neighbors. He Who Killed Time. Paradise Regained. St. Adele's Ring. Conte Giovanni Lapini, the Just. The Chinese Doll. The Golden Apple. He Who Knew Himself. The Forgotten Lyre. Worms and Butterflies. A Man and His Wife. Bobo and Bebe. Their Dreams. Time. The Star. Words. A Culprit. An Old Woman Falling Asleep. Back to Methuselah. Evil's Good. Three Men. The Secret of Eternal Youth. Pierre. The Seasons and Her Ashes. Art. Crosses. 35c.

Vol. 4. THE STORY OF A SIMPLE MAN, or Without Pride or Self-Pity. A 25,000-word novelette. 35c.

Vol. 5. WOMEN AIN'T NO FOOLS, AND OTHER STORIES. Hangman's Luck. Absolution. All that's Hell is Not Sulphur. Sampson's Locks Never Grew Back. Embers. Muffled Drum. Moonlight Drive. With Fife and Drum. The Last Creation. Sister Kate. "Nuts!" How I Killed My Sister-in-Law. Love. 35c.

Vol. 6. LOVERS' GIFTS, AND OTHER STORIES. San Puerco, being A Leaf from the Golden Bough. He Whose Desires Were All Satisfied. Mother Only. The Challenge. The Fifth Wheel. Chaff in the Wind. Virtue Is Its Own Reward. Joseph of New England. Celluloid Wife. In Full Payment. 35c.

Vol. 7. THE TRUTH ABOUT PHYLLIS WARREN, AND OTHER STORIES. Lesson Well Learned. Caviar and Death. Reported Missing. World War I, or The Hero Returns. Time and the Teuton. Lesson Well Learned. Resurrection. Generations. 35c.

We feel honored to have Paul Eldridge's stories appear under the Haldeman-Julius imprint. He stands with the greatest craftsmen in the difficult field of the artistic short story. It's these sharply etched short stories that have established Eldridge's reputation. He is a master in the field of sophisticated comedy, clearness of writing and absence of superfluous description.

The nine Eldridge volumes described above may be had for only $2.90 prepaid.

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS, Box 1876, Girard, Kansas

SEND ME ELDRIDGE'S NINE VOLUMES

E. Haldeman-Julius, Box 1876, Girard, Kansas.

Enclosed please find $2.90, payment in full for Paul Eldridge's nine volumes, as follows: "The Greatest Show on Earth, Being the Diary of a N. Y. High-School Teacher," (25c). "Lanterns in the Night," (25c). "The Virgins, and Other Stories," (35c). "The Last Supper of Marianne, and Other Stories," (35c). "He Who Loved His Neighbors, and Other Stories," (35c). "The Story of a Simple Man," (35c). "Women Ain't No Fools," (35c). "Lovers' Gifts," (35c). "The Truth About Phyllis Warren." (35c).

Name.....

Address.....

City.....State.....

"Caesar and Cleopatra" was, I gather, generally panned in England. I can't see why. "Dead of Night," which was also made in England, got raves here. I think I do see why. The film is made up of three amusing, rather old-fashioned, cryptic little episodes which might be supernatural or might just be elaborately "psychological." If you wholly reject the non-rational, the picture is no fun. But if you are by habit over-rational, a film so persuasive as this, suavely presenting as accomplished fact so much that you have refused to regard as even faintly conceivable, can profoundly disturb and excite you. This is, of course, an important and serious event, but the disturbed person has chiefly himself to thank for that, not the picture. Two excited reviews of the film seemed to me as sympathetically, yet naïve, as the reactions of certain friends of mine who heard Willkie talk just after his world tour and who, because for once they were sure they had found a sincere man, were sure they had found a great one. For such reasons, among others, any further development of America's so-called religious so-called revival is deeply to be dreaded, though no more so than most of those who dread or scorn it. If anyone can be trusted to hold his liquor, it is the habitual drinker. All this aside, "Dead of Night" is in every way made with exceptional skill and wit; as intelligent light entertainment it could not be better; and its famous last shot, whether one has foreseen it or not, is one of the most successful blends of laughter, terror, and outrage that I can remember. Even so I think it would be

(Continued on page 195)

"The resolution of conflict in self is like the making use of opposites in art"

TWO AESTHETIC ANALYSIS PAMPHLETS

by Eli Siegel

Author of Hot Afternoons Have Been in Montana (Nation Prize Poem)

1. PSYCHIATRY, ECONOMICS, AESTHETICS Aesthetics, according to Aesthetic Analysis, is a way of organizing a disorderly economics and a divided self.

2. THE AESTHETIC METHOD IN SELF-CONFLICT. This work shows that the problem of "civil war in self" is not only philosophic and ethical, but is deeply akin to the artistic problem, and should be dealt with on a basis of exact aesthetics.

For copies, write to Martha Baird, 67 Jane Street, New York City. Phamphlets 50c each. Bookstores suplied.

Buy Bonds—for AMERICA Now for Your Future Later

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Germany's Future

Dear Sirs: The "Future of the Ruhr and Rhineland" by Fritz Sternberg in the July 6 issue is one of the most subtle arguments to revivify German industry. It puts all thoughts of punishment for German war-like activity completely aside.

According to Mr. Sternberg, "The danger of a third world war does not lie in any future aggressiveness on Germany's part but in a sharpening of the enmity between the United States, Britain, and the Soviet Union." Thus is future German aggressiveness lightly brushed aside. Where the peace-loving German socialists and democrats are to come from is completely unanswered. Past experience proves that any German is militantly Pan-Germanic.

All competent objective observers from Germany report no democratic activity there. Instead there is a bitterness at Hitler for not winning the War. Nazism is still the dominant feeling and pervades all thought. Rebuilding Nazi industry—all the rich industrialists were Nazis—will only show that we are soft and decadent to their thoughts.

When Germany shows her peaceful inclinations by actions and thoughts based on past actions, then is the time for the attitude suggested by Mr. Sternberg.

MICHAEL FRIEDMAN

Brooklyn, N. Y., July 22

Word From Finland

Dear Sirs: I herewith wish to express my sincere admiration for The Nation. It is really a very broadminded and human political magazine. I only complain that my acquaintance with it dates from last spring when I first had the opportunity to read it at the Information Library of the United States of America in Helsinki (Helsingfors), where I borrow American literature.

I am greatly surprised that our country's newspapers and political magazines don't make quotations from The Nation. There are no similar papers in this country who look at Franco Spain as do the editors of The Nation. Your struggle against fascism is in a class of its own. I admire your frankness and your articles, the way in which you defend the working class, and your logical and human viewpoint on the political and social situation today. It is really a very great loss to our politics and our people that our politicians don't follow such progressive and liberal magazines as The Nation.

Since last spring I have tried to introduce The Nation to my friends. I often make political speeches for groups of workers at Malm, a suburb to Helsingfors, and at each speech I make quotations from The Nation.

Because I was struggling against the Germans and the Finnish Fascists (not as a soldier, but in a political way) during the war I got imprisoned twice, but was let free October 1, 1944. I send my warmest greeting to all Americans who helped defeat the Germans and through this helped me to freedom. During the war I worked together with Socialists and Communists in the struggle against the fascism, but I have not joined the Communist Party, even though that party's program is moderate. The Finnish Communists seem to be logical and democratic in their claims.

ARVID E. CEDERBERG

Malm, Finland, July 30

Principles vs. "Realism"

Dear Sirs: I fully agree with Professor Grayson Kirk (The Nation, July 27) that our hope lies "in the development of general political understanding between the United States and the Soviet Union." But there can be no "general understanding" on the basis of secret diplomacy (Yalta-Potsdam) and power politics. These can only breed distrust, conflict and ultimately war; the experience of the last twelve months ought to be illuminating, even to the wilfully blind. Understanding comes only from a clear, honest, consistent statement of a permanent policy, i. e. of principles. We should make the United Nations Charter a reality, not a sham. If it were such a reality, if difficulties were settled on the basis of "understanding' and not of force, the United Nations Charter would automatically turn into the constitution of a world state. If we reject principles for "realism," i. e. deceit and violence, then we had better follow the advice of the late General Patton. Half-heartedness is neither peace nor straight "realism": it is "appeasement."

ALBERT GUERARD

Stanford University, Calif., August 1

(Continued from page 194)

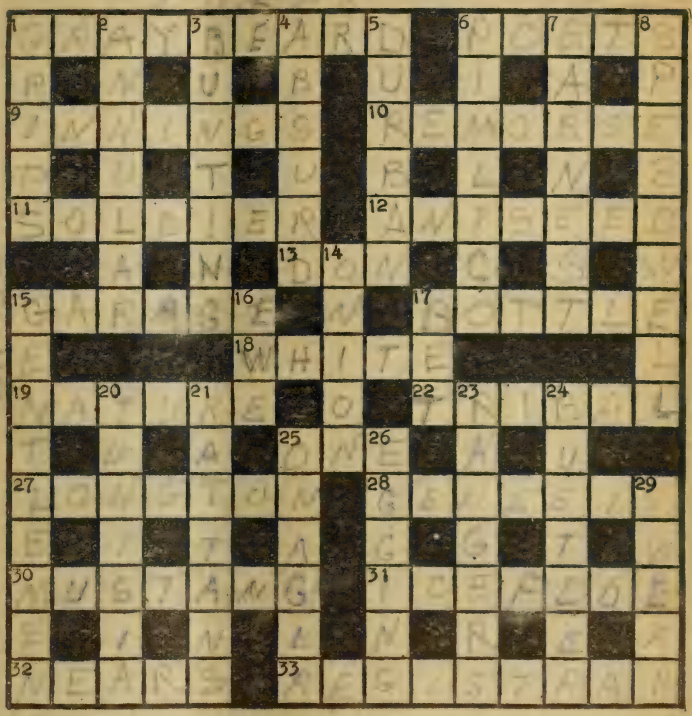
still better if "The End" were not superimposed on it, and if it ended with the first full closeup of its character.

"Notorious" lacks many of the qualities which made the best of Alfred Hitchcock's movies so good, but it has more than enough good qualities of its own. Hitchcock has always been as good at domestic psychology as at thrillers, and many times here he makes a moment in a party, or a lovers' quarrel, or a mere interior shrewdly exciting in ways that few people in films seem to know. His great skill in directing women, which boggled in "Spellbound," is functioning beautifully again: I think that Ingrid Bergman's performance here is the best of hers that I have seen. One would think that the use of the camera subjectively—that is, as one of the characters—would for many years have been as basic a movie device as the closeup, but few people try it and Hitchcock is nearly the only living man I can think of who knows just when and how to. He is equally resourceful, and exceptional, in his manufacture of expressive little air-pockets of dead silence. He has a strong sense of the importance of the real place and the real atmosphere; the shots of Rio de Janiero are excellent and one late-afternoon love scene is equally remarkable in its special emotion and the grandeur of excitement it gets away with, and in the amount these depend on communicating the exact place, weather, and time of day. Hitchcock also knows the movie value of the special tones and looks of people with special backgrounds, at special jobs. Cary Grant, as an American agent, has almost precisely the cultivated, clipped, puzzled-idealist brutality of a man whom I know in a roughly equivalent job; and Louis Calhern, as his boss, reminds me even more forcefully that, for what little good it gets us, there are considerable depths of specifically native sophistication at work, in and out of Washington. There is perhaps no telling how much of all this should be credited to Ben Hecht's screen play; but it seems safe to credit a good deal of the sharpest movie sense, and of a cool kind of insight and control which suggests a good French novelist, to Hitchock. The story by the way, shows Miss Bergman, a Nazi's daughter and a quondam tramp, doing State Department fingerwork among post-war German plotters in Brazil. Among her more painful duties is marrying Claude Rains, who is no less good as one of Hitler's unhappier orphans than as Bernard Shaw's coldly genial prototype of all dictators.

Crossword Puzzle No. 174

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Obviously he is not a young shaver any longer
6 The only truth tellers
9 Team's turn with the bat
10 The gnawing pain of guilt
11 Fighting man
12 Die sane (anag.)
13 Quixotic fellow
15 A necessity with most houses
17 Bundle of hay when it pours
18 The color you get by mixing all the others
19 Her Spring dress is much admired
22 Clannish
25 Singleton
27 2,240 pounds (4 and 3)
28 A first book
30 This wild horse needs to have his head
31 Polar bears like to be photographed on one
32 Approaches
33 A stranger who interests himself in your birthday

DOWN

1 Grasps
2 Ring-shaped
3 May be found among the reeds and flags
4 Ridiculous
5 Rub Dan down in a South African town
6 Buckingham Palace is in this London district
7 One who is in this is in no joking mood
8 Flowery adieu
14 Groucho Marx suggested using this vegetable to make your ice water
15 They take off their hats to women
16 This creature sounds like you, dear
17 Lay
20 Is a unit in North Africa
21 Walking-canes, maybe
23 These and the Home Guard would seem to have complementary roles
24 Butler's become active
25 Orange mixture
26 Urging on 29 Said the ghost in Hamlet

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 173

ACROSS:—1 HYPHEN; 4 WHEATEAR; 10 THOREAU; 11 SWAMPED; 12 AVERT; 13 EKE; 14 TYROL; 15 ENROL; 17 MARKSMAN; 21 RAPPINGS; 23 EDGAR; 26 ALTER; 28 MUM; 29 THEME; 30 DISTEND; 31 NANETTE; 32 EVERYMAN; 33 FERRIS DOWN:—1 HOT CAKES; 2 PIONEER; 3 EVERT; 5 HASTE; 6 AWAIT; 7 EMPORIA; 8 RIDDLE; 9 SUPERMAN; 16 LOP; 18 RESUMING; 19 SUE; 20 BREEDERS; 22 ARTISTE; 24 GREATER; 25 CAUDLE; 27 REEDY; 28 MEDIA; 29 TENSE.

SCHOOL

LAKEWOOD
MODERN SCHOOL
A residential school for boys and girls from 7 to 12 years of age. Small group. Personal supervision.
Write:
JAMES and NELLIE DICK
115 Carey Street • Lakewood, N. J.
Phone: Lakewood 6-1007

DENTAL ASSOCIATE WANTED

VETERAN, licensed to practice Dentistry in Connecticut, New York, desires associateship with older man. Write to Dr. Lester Sarkady, 20 Grove Street, New Haven, Conn.

LANGUAGES

ALL LANGUAGES. Phonograph Courses. Linguaphone, other makes. Sold, bought, rented. A. Alin, 475 5th Avenue, New York 17. MU 3-1093.

PUBLICATIONS

VARIOUS AND LOVE SONNETS by Richardson Savell. 64 tender lyrics. 3 years in preparation. $1.00. Grand Print Publishers, Box 542, Brookline Village, Mass.

REAL ESTATE FOR SALE

AN INVALUABLE HOME — Executive office site, No. 139 East 43rd Street. Immediate occupancy, 4-story Building, opposite Chrysler Building, Grand Central Depot, etc. $90,000—cash. Also, 55,000 square feet, immediate occupancy, $82,500. With about 16 acres land at Stuyvesant Falls, N. Y. Two 4-story brick and stone buildings. Formerly used as textile mills and battery manufacture. Elevators. With perpetual use of 400 h. p. to owner without cost. L. N. Rosenbaum & Son, 565 Fifth Avenue, New York 17.

FOR SALE nine-room house, garage, acre land, private lake, Westchester County. Write Box 88, Goldens Bridge, New York or call Katonah 570J, evenings.

RESORT

AUGUST 19 THROUGH LABOR DAY. $35 weekly. Homestead, Carmel, N. Y. Private lake, tennis, handball, volley ball. Good food. Modern conveniences. Phone GR 5-6582; Socialist Party. 303 4th Ave., N. Y. 10.

SITUATIONS WANTED

SOUTHERN COLORED DOMESTIC and hotel workers desire jobs. Write for list today (stamps). QUALITY EMPLOYMENT ASSN. 214 East Clay Street, Richmond 19, Va.

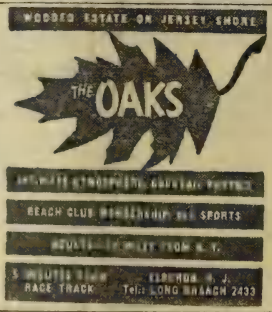
FARM HAND—N. Y. STATE. Recovered from nervous illness, been working on a farm for 6 years. Looking for a liberal and friendly atmosphere to work in permanently. With intelligent, patient, young or middle aged people, where speed is subordinate to loyalty and decency I could do fine for all concerned. Wages are very much secondary. Please write (describing mental environment) to Box 1637 c/o The Nation.

TOBACCO

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.40 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order. Ace Mail Order Co., East Orange 1, N. J.

RESORTS

50 MILES TO FOREST HOUSE
Vacationing is truly gay and unforgettable in this resort paradise—providing the ultimate in rest and relaxation. Superior accommodations, excellent food and congenial hospitality. Two grand lakes, all sports.
LAKE MAHOPAC, N. Y. TEL. MAHOPAC 688



Indian Lake Lodge
In the Heart of the Adirondacks
INDIAN LAKE, N. Y.
Ten Mile Long Lake, a backdrop of 3500 foot mountain ranges, a hundred acres of lawn and woodland. Scenic beauty plus all water sports, tennis, hiking, informal atmosphere, good food and comfortable quarters are yours to Sept. 15th. TELEPHONE: INDIAN LAKE 2412

BYRAM LODGE
ARMONK, N. Y. Tel. Armonk Vill. 906
Only 35 miles from N. Y. C. in Westchester. Completely remodeled, all conveniences, new furnishings. Beautyrest mattresses, all sports, bowling.
Rates $60 weekly; $10 daily. American Plan.
American-Jewish Cuisine
N. Y. Office 11 West 42nd Street PE. 6-2343

MAPLE GROVE MT. HOUSE
• Ideal Vacation Spot • Modern Accommodations
• All Adult Sports • Informal Atmosphere
• Excellent Cuisine • Dietary Laws
RATES: $37.50 • $40.00 • $42.50
Kerhonkson 8004M; 3641
Accord, New York

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.
ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR
MONROE, N. Y. Phone 7965

FARMS AND ACREAGE

10 ROOM COLONIAL; excellent condition; heat; electric; bath; barns; small river; view; 96 acres; beautiful location. $9,000. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

RESORTS

Gayly Informal
All Sports Facilities!
Comfortable Cabins and Lodges
Excellent American-Jewish Cuisine
WOPOWOG LODGE
on Lake Salmon, East Hampton, Conn.

Yours for Vacation Enjoyment
HILLTOP LODGE
On beautiful Sylvan Lake
HOPEWELL JUNCTION, N. Y.
65 mi. from N. Y. C. • B. R. Station, Pawling, N. Y.
Every conceivable Sport and Recreation
. . . with intimate, congenial people
Many Improved features for the new season!
Open from May thru October
Under direction of: PAUL WOLFSON & SOL ROTHAUSER
New York Office: 277 BROADWAY COrtlandt 7-3958

CASA MANOR
On Beautiful LAKE COSSAYUNA
COSSAYUNA, NEW YORK
Only 20 miles from famed Saratoga. 50-guest limit to preserve comfortable, restful, informal atmosphere. Excellent cuisine. Swimming, boating, fishing, table tennis, etc. Family accommodations available. Write or call.
JACOB M. OLSHANSKY
93 State Street, Albany, New York. Phone: 5-0363

HUNNS LAKE HOUSE
STANFORDVILLE NEW YORK
90 miles from New York via N. Y. Central. Charming lake and countryside, rustic, restful. Directly at lake, bathing, boating, fishing, other sports. Beautiful walks on own grounds. Excellent American cuisine. Ideal for week-ends and vacations. Adults only. Rate $45.00.
Management: GRETE POPPER
Telephone: Stanfordville 2931

MAMANASCO Lake Lodge
Ridgefield, Conn. • Phone 820
A resort of distinction fashioned from a country estate. Water sports, hiking trails, tennis. Library, open fireplaces. Congenial atmosphere. Famous cuisine

HATHAWAY LODGE
OPEN ALL YEAR
Formerly the palatial 592-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Winding Mountain Trails. Delicious food. Easy Transportation.
Attractive Rates • Make reservations now
For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 2110

SACKS FARM
Saugerties, N. Y. Tel. 590-J
Unusually beautiful countryside, pine woods, good, homey Jewish-American cooking. All conveniences. Intimate and restful. Swimming, horseback, tennis and other sports. Adults. Booklet.

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 24, 1946 NUMBER 8

The Shape of Things

HOPE FOR EFFECTIVE MEASURES TO CARRY on the work of UNRRA have improved somewhat as a result of the pressure that has been brought to bear on the State Department. William L. Clayton, Under Secretary of State, said on his return from the UNRRA council meeting in Geneva that provision would have to be made in some way for 800,000 refugees and displaced persons, not much below the present number being cared for by UNRRA. The representatives he left behind at Geneva—assuming they were not misquoted by the Associated Press, which carried a most unfortunate misquotation of Director General La Guardia's statement—even recommend that UNRRA's refugee activities be continued for six months after the funds run out on December 31, or until the International Refugee Organization can take over. One thing is certain; the I. R. O. will have neither the organization nor the money to begin operations anywhere near December 31. The most we can hope is that some sort of life can be instilled into it when the General Assembly meets in September, and that the money can then be found somewhere. Money will be necessary also to maintain the refugee personnel of UNRRA, and as far as the United States is concerned it will be very difficult to do anything about it in time. Congress has adjourned for the summer and for the elections, and it is at least even money that it will not come back to Washington until next January.

✶

MR. TRUMAN NO DOUBT WAS RELUCTANT to ask for additional funds for UNRRA's work from such a Congress, but he and his State Department will have much to answer for as the result of their lack of courage. It would appear that Mr. Clayton, who was principally responsible for the decision to cut off UNRRA with no additional funds, was primarily interested in stopping free food from countries under Soviet influence. Other countries, presumably Greece and Italy, will get American loans, although how that can be done without Congressional action is not easy to see; our Export-Import Bank is supposed to supply credits solely for actual projects, not national subsistence, and the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development still refuses to be involved in such utopian projects as feeding people and rebuilding devastated areas. Since we were contributing three-fourths of the cost of running UNRRA, and presumably will pay only our standard United Nations contribution of 24 per cent to whatever UNRRA activities it takes over, the new set-up will represent a saving to the American taxpayer. Let us hope that it will not cost the hungry people of Europe and the Far East more than it saves us. The only way we can avoid a real catastrophe next January is to continue the pressure on the Truman Administration. The United Nations still has not enough competent personnel, and the steps necessary to build up a satisfactory staff, to obtain the necessary money, and really to take over from UNRRA, will be long and difficult. But it is a task worth doing, and we should remember the warning by Herbert H. Lehman, LaGuardia's predecessor as director general of UNRRA, of the consequences "which must inevitably arise if the ground which has been so laboriously gained by UNRRA over the past years is lost."

✶

THE DEPORTATION OF SOME 1,300 JEWS WHO had made their way into Palestine in defiance of the British blockade and quotas can only make an ugly situation worse and a solution more difficult to find. Of what use is it for Mr. Bevin to discuss possible compromise plans with members of the Jewish Agency or his own Cabinet members while Moslem troops from Britain's Indian army herd Jewish refugees into barbed-wire concentration camps in Cyprus, and British courts hand out death sentences to Jewish rebels? The deportations and repressions are certain to cancel out any attempt to find a peaceful solution; cancel it out by inflaming the emotions and hardening the will of both sides in the struggle; by discrediting every Jewish leader who agrees to negotiate with the British and glorifying the young fanatics who use hand grenades and guns. If Mr. Bevin really wants peace in Palestine he will have to call off his side of the civil war first. He will have to release imprisoned Jewish officials and all the others who have been jailed for their opinions. He will have to halt the deportations, allowing the refugees to remain in Palestine until an immigration policy is finally agreed upon. Then perhaps he can talk with the Agency officials to some purpose, for it looks as though an improved partition plan, providing full autonomy, with control over

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things 197
Battle of the Blocs 199
La Follette's Folly 200
The Worlds of H. G. Wells 201

ARTICLES

What Price Groceries? by Tris Coffin 202
Will Russia Break With the West? by J. Alvarez del Vayo 204
Prairie Socialism by J. King Gordon 207
Cowboy on Our Side by Richard L. Neuberger 209
Hungarian Holocaust by Hilde Spiel 211
India: Unity or Civil War? by Shiva Rao 213
Everybody's Business by Keith Hutchison 215

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

New Year's Day A Poem by Robert Lowell 216
The Poetry and Wisdom of Paterson by Isaac Rosenfeld 216
Life and Politics by Robert Bendiner 217
Fiction in Review by Diana Trilling 220
Music by B. H. Haggin 222

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 222

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 175 by Jack Barrett 223

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon — Washington Editor I. F. Stone — Literary Editor Randall Jarrell•

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors
Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch — Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors
Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editor: Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx
Advertising Manager: William B. Brown
Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

• Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

immigration, in a larger Jewish zone, might be acceptable to the more moderate Zionist leaders. But such a scheme cannot even be discussed while war rages in the Holy Land.

*

THE SOVIET NOTE TO TURKEY PROPOSING revision of the Montreux Convention which governs navigation rights between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean, has placed another indigestible dish on the overloaded diplomatic table. The note made five suggestions: (1) that the straits should always be open for the passage of merchant vessels of all nations; (2) that they should be always open to the warships of Black Sea powers; (3) that warships of others powers should be barred except in cases specially provided for; (4) that "the establishment of the regime of the straits . . . must constitute the competence of Turkey and the other Black Sea powers"; (5) that the defense of the straits should be jointly organized by Turkey and the Soviet Union. The first three of these proposals conform closely to ones made by Mr. Byrnes last November and, if the Russian plan had stopped there, it would have been acceptable to Turkey and the other signatories of Montreux as a basis for negotiation. But the fourth point appears to exclude all but the Black Sea powers from the picture, leaving Turkey to deal in isolation with mighty Russia and two of its satellites. And the fifth is interpreted as a demand for Russian bases on Turkish soil.

*

NOT SURPRISINGLY ANKARA HAS INDICATED that it regards these proposals as incompatible with Turkish sovereignty and "categorically unacceptable." Unfortunately, the U. S. S. R. can appeal to several historical precedents in support of its claims: for instance, the demands made by President Theodore Roosevelt on Colombia which preceded the acquisition by the United States of the Panama Canal Zone, and British insistence on special rights in Egypt in connection with the Suez Canal. The fact is that, before the Dardenelles problem can be finally settled, we shall need an international conference to decide on principles governing the navigation of all international waterways. As The Nation has often pointed out, the Western powers cannot oppose Russia's designs with moral or political precepts which they neglect themselves.

*

WITH THE EMBARGO ON OVERSEAS PRESS dispatches lifted and arbitration under way the Press Wireless dispute, which for a week has disrupted all major services between the United States and most foreign countries, seems sure to be settled. But the strike develops certain issues which went far beyond the merits of the case. The grievances of the strikers were clear and impressive. Members of the American Communications Association (C. I. O.) walked out to protest the firing of forty-six of their men and the reclassification of many others, with accompanying reductions in pay. Whether they violated their contract by striking will be determined by the arbitration proceedings, but their tactics during the strike raise a grave question of union policy. It was entirely reasonable for the A. C. A. to order its members everywhere to refuse to handle Press Wireless copy during the strike, with consequent financial loss to that agency. But the union went beyond reasonable limits, it seems to us, when it ordered its members to embargo copy from all other cable companies on the ground that is was the only way to get at the papers owning Press Wireless, which were avoiding the consequences of the strike by getting their news through other channels. In other words, Press Wireless and its owners were to be penalized even if the process involved penalizing innocent cable companies and innocent newspapers, not to mention millions of readers who were to be denied full access to the news at a crucial moment in world affairs. The Newspaper Guild of New York is to be commended for having asked its members not to handle Press Wireless copy, while refusing to extend the ban to other channels covered by the A. C. A. embargo.

*

SINCE THE VIOLENT END OF BOLIVIA'S President Villaroel, other South American despots have been having nightmares in which lamp-posts are a prominent feature. The President of Paraguay two weeks ago went to the length of clearing the plaza before his palace of these dangerous weapons, and now the Argentine dictator appears to be similarly affected. When police tore down a placard with the legend "This post is waiting for President Perón," that idol of the people began to show signs of hysteria. "If anyone is thinking of a revolt," Perón announced to a group of his own officials, he himself would "act the week before." And growing still more graphic: "It is all a matter of giving a few feet of rope to the Descamisadas [his shirtless supporters], and then we will see who hangs." These and other such remarks confirm rumors in Buenos Aires that Perón's mixed following is already seriously disaffected, with certain labor and army groups getting set for a showdown. Inflated prices, wholesale thievery in high places, and factional ambitions appear to be mixing a bitter brew for Perón, whose regime meanwhile steadily takes on a deeper fascist coloration. It is characteristic that he talks of suppressing revolt not with the legitimate forces of government, but with his private following of 500,000 Descamisadas, which "with me at the head amounts to a million." He demands immediate formation of a "single party." And his Minister of Migration, inviting a thousand Norwegian quislings "of the best racial types" to settle in his country, bars the gate to refugees from Central Europe ("Argentina cannot put up with that useless human wreckage"). Perón discovers now, too late, that "to govern is not my profession." He is a soldier, he says, and he "will die fighting." So did Villaroel.

*

WHILE THE CASUALTY LIST IN CALCUTTA rises to monstrous proportions—more than 3,000 killed and injured as we go to press—Congress Party leaders proceed grimly with the job of setting up India's new Provisional Government. The background of the last few days' events is carefully drawn by Shiva Rao in a dispatch from New Delhi on a later page; even when he wrote, the prospect of a peaceful transition was clouded by the Moslem threat of direct action to block British proposals and Congress attempts to act upon them. The communal fighting which followed inexorably upon Mr. Jinnah's declaration of "Direct Action Day" undoubtedly threatens the whole plan for a representative interim government. Jinnah has pointed up the violence of his followers by attacking the Congress leaders as "caste Hindu fascists" who want the rule over the Moslems with the backing of British bayonets and by flatly refusing to cooperate with the Provisional Government. In such a setting the possibility of compromise seems negligible. That India's hope of independence should be drowned in Indian blood is intolerable, but unless Mr. Jinnah changes his mind very suddenly or Viscount Wavell and Pandit Nehru make unexpected concessions, the new government would appear to be doomed at birth.

Battle of the Blocs

THE Paris Peace Conference spent its third week listening to and discussing statements made by the five defeated countries. Nothing in the debate, however, suggested any closer approach to a common purpose, or even an increased disposition to compromise opposing views. On the contrary, many of the speeches were couched in bitter terms and new controversies arose.

Mr. del Vayo, in the review of Russian foreign policy which appears on another page, deplores the fission of the late allies into competing blocs and describes the growing fear and suspicion of the western powers which he found in Moscow. The question of who began the game of bloc-building is an arguable one, but certainly there is nothing to be gained any longer by denying that such blocs exist. The nature of the divisions at the Paris conference offers too much evidence on that score.

The course of the voting on procedural questions indicated that the western group is considerably larger than the eastern. But what the Soviet bloc lacks in numbers it makes up in organization, and its discipline is much tighter. At no time has the care with which its strategy is planned been better demonstrated than during the past week when the reception given to the spokesmen of Hitler's satellites was clearly designed to emphasize that ex-enemies who followed the Moscow line would be given much greater consideration than ex-enemies who didn't, or even ex-allies. Thus de Gasperi's plea for a softening of the harsh Italian treaty terms was castigated by Molotov and still more severely by the Yugoslav Foreign Minister, Edward Kartelj. But when Romania and Bulgaria made similar pleas, and asked to be given the status of co-belligerents, they found sponsors in the Soviet camp. Bulgaria, indeed, received the backing of the Ukraine and Poland for its demand that Greece cede to it part of Thrace so as to provide it with an outlet on the Aegean. Greece, on the other hand, a country which suffered enormously as a result of invasion by the Nazis and their allies, including Bulgaria, was treated with cold hostility by Soviet spokesmen and its claims for territorial compensation, which would give it better strategic frontiers, were derided.

The lesson conveyed by such differentiations was rubbed in by Molotov in a speech warning Italy and France against aligning themselves with America and Britain. "Certain great powers," he said, "are now trying to assure themselves of a position in the Mediterranean by attempting to relegate to the background not only Italy but also France." The Russian Foreign Minister went on to allege that Italy was in danger of "enslavement through foreign trusts and cartels" if it yielded to demands for special privileges by "foreign powers, disposing of great capital and vast means of pressure." This passage appears to have been an attack on the economic clauses which the United States wishes to insert in the Italian and other treaties with a view to insuring most-favored-nation treatment to all members of the United Nations and the exclusion of discriminatory trade agreements.

There have been many hints in the past few months that Russia was opposed to the whole American program for the freeing of international trade but none offered so direct a challenge as this speech of Molotov's. It provoked Byrnes to a heated reply, in the course of which he pointed out that the principle of equality of economic opportunity was embodied in the Atlantic Charter, reaffirmed in the United Nations Declaration, and restated in the joint declaration of the Potsdam Conference. "Would anyone seriously propose," he asked, "that an opposite intent be written into these treaties—that Italy or the Balkan countries should be free to discriminate in favor of some and against others of the Allied countries? . . . Would anyone suggest that those countries which were the principal objects of German economic penetration . . . should merely substitute for Germany some other country on which they would be almost entirely dependent for supplies and for markets? It is out of such arrangements, and not out of non-discriminatory trade, that enslavement and exploitation arise?"

These two speeches by the heads of the Soviet and American delegations glaringly reveal the almost insuperable difficulties of reconciling two totally opposite points of view. To the Russians the principles outlined by Byrnes appear simply as a device to further capitalist imperialism; to Americans, the bilateral agreements which the Soviets are concluding with the states within their sphere, often in conjunction with reparation agreements, look very much as if they were designed to insure economic subservience and to secure for Russian workers the benefits of "surplus value" created by the workers of other lands. Perhaps both are wrong but we have a ghastly feeling that probably both are right and that the battle of the blocs is, in part at least, a struggle, not between light and darkness, but between two varieties of big-power domination.

La Follette's Folly

ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE'S defeat in the Republican primary is a doubly painful occurrence: first, because it removes from the Senate an extremely able and progressive legislator, and second, because La Follette needlessly brought about his own downfall. The simple political truth is that he had no business running in a Republican primary at all. When the Progressive Party appeared to be played out, La Follette was invited, urged, and begged to bring his following into the Democratic Party, which, though numerically weak, had a monopoly of the state's liberals who were not still clinging to the foundering ship of the Progressives. But, guided by his mercurial brother Phil, he chose to force himself and his followers on a stodgy Republican machine, which he fantastically expected to control through the adulterated magic of the La Follette name. Had the Republicans nominated him, he would, if elected, have taken back to Washington with him a delegation of reactionary party hacks, in contrast to the slate of liberal nominees put up by the Democrats. For the sake of his own election he would have paralyzed Wisconsin's liberal forces, already reeling from the blow of the Progressive Party's dissolution.

The result of this major political blunder was that thousands of former Progressives abandoned La Follette and went into the Democratic primary to roll up a vote for Howard McMurray, a confirmed New Dealer. The defection was enough to eliminate La Follette and give the Republican nomination to youthful Circuit Court Judge Joseph R. McCarthy, whose strategy was the simple one of taking any position that La Follette opposed. This ill-starred expediency was not the only burden that La Follette carried into the campaign. Both McMurray and McCarthy hammered away at La Follette's isolationist record, encouraged by the defeat of such other senatorial isolationists as Nye, Wheeler, Shipstead, and Gossett. Nor was La Follette helped in industrial areas by McMurray's reminders that in 1944 he had soured enough on the Roosevelt Administration to speak of the New Deal's "tarnished record" both at home and abroad. And then came the kiss of death—a letter from Senator Taft, widely circulated by McMurray, in which the man with the Senate's most brilliant nineteenth-century mind affirmed that he was ideologically closer to La Follette than to the liberal Republican Senator Wayne Morse of Oregon.

Having elected to cast his fortunes with the Republican Party, it would admittedly be difficult for La Follette to switch over to the Democrats on the strength of one intra-party setback. But the other courses open to him are even less attractive. He has too much integrity, we believe, to back McCarthy for the sake of a party regularity that he never proclaimed, and, with his own machine destroyed, he can hardly run much of a race as an independent. He will therefore either recognize his serious mistake, support McMurray in November, and join forces with the Democrats, who would welcome him with enthusiasm; or he will pitch a tent durable enough for one of the longest sulks on record.

The last of these possibilities would be a serious loss to the country. Even at the peak of his isolationism, La Follette scorned the unsavory associations that ruined the careers of lesser men like Nye and Wheeler. And on the positive side, his zealous protection of civil liberties, his contributions to the growth of labor's influence, and his recent—and partially successful—efforts to reorganize Congress along more orderly lines leave the nation very much in his debt. After twenty years of service in the Senate, Bob La Follette is only fifty now—far too young to bury his talents and experience either in private enterprise or in the Republican Party.

The Worlds of H. G. Wells

IT IS foolish to be solemn about the death of H. G. Wells; otherwise one could say, with perfect truth, that our century has lost its Diderot. But this was the man who snorted: "Don't interrupt me. Can't you see I'm busy dying?" It is more as if the last bluejay had died: we shall never again hear that bright, brash, busy, scolding voice, so opinionated and confident and alive, so sure that everything will come right in the end, if we can only somewhere find the sense to behave as the voice keeps telling and telling and telling us to behave.

In the end he outlived himself, as men do; and his last fretful attacks upon mankind—which he called obsolete—and the English royal family—which he called corrupt—had kept only the testiness and impatient violence of the real Wells. But he had left a little of himself in eighty books, and had left more of himself in a time and in the people of that time. For a decade he was the most influential writer in the world: readers went into his books as children go into a forest, and every one of them could come back with something different. For there were all the fantastic stories, full of a grotesque and plausible imagination that it would be libelous to pigeonhole as "scientific"; all the humorous genre pictures of that nation of shopkeepers, England; all those hortatory, didactic, journalistic "novels" of Mr. Britling or William Clissold or whatever megaphone Wells was using; speeches and interviews and articles about everything in the world; and, last and longest, all the volumes of that private, patiently elaborated encyclopedia which he might well have called "The Outline of the History, Evolution, Work, Wealth, and Happiness of Mankind." He was a great journalist and propagandist and teacher; was even, sometimes, a good writer; but first of all he was a great work of nature, one of the wonders of the Western world. It is odd to think that, just as Diderot survives mostly in "Rameau's Nephew," Wells will survive mostly in a few stories.

Few people did more to destroy Victorianism; yet he was in a queer sense the last of the great Victorians, since he took one part of Victorianism—the vigorous and absolute trust in science and progress that he got from Huxley, his first teacher—and made from that a club with which he could beat everything else into pieces. How many times he told us that Science is the Means and the End and the Way; that it alone can sweep away all the outmoded rubbish of the past in which we miserable squatters are worrying out our petty existences; that sooner or later we must relinquish our destiny to those disinterested, impatiently efficient boards of scientific engineers that will build around us the future's barer and better world. Certainly he was not exaggerating the physical powers of science: today most of us can understand that, used as it seems it will be used, Science can sweep out of this world, along with the rest of the rubbish, most of that poor rubbish Humanity. But it has become harder and harder to believe in the existence of the boards; easier and easier to understand that Wells attacked confusion so violently because he himself was so confused, and admired nothing but clarity and reasonableness and efficiency because they were exactly what he himself never had. His conquests of the world had a curiously factitious quality, since they were accomplished not by overcoming obstacles one by one but by sweeping them all aside in a simple, magnificent, oblivious gesture. Between the Defoesque particulars and the cloud-like abstractions of his work there was a tactical vacuum that his moral enthusiasm and moral indignation could never hide.

And yet what a prophet he was, at his best. He was a man whose lifelong vocation was understanding what the next war—the First World War, the Second World War, the Third World War—was going to be like. It was not just that he predicted the atomic explosions, the disease-ridden and decimated populations, the radioactive areas bare of any life: he understood the confident generals, the petty and harried politicians, the worried and helpless scientists, the young fliers thoughtless as puppies—all the people who drop the bombs because they can think of no alternative. How unfortunate that this wasn't just one more mistake of that fertile, vigorous, and so often mistaken mind! But he was right; and all of us have been flung willy-nilly out of the world that created Wells into the most menacing of the worlds that Wells created.

What Price Groceries?

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, August 19

THE large and impressive Senate caucus room is the stage for some of the most exciting theatricals in Washington. There, under the blinding glare of the newsreel floodlights, Cordell Hull told the story of pre-war American foreign policy to the Pearl Harbor investigating committee. There husky Ed Pauley squirmed and perspired under the savage questioning of Senator Tobey of the Naval Affairs Committee. There the sordid story of war profits, of the slick Garsson boys and blustering Andrew Jackson May, was unfolded.

But for four days last week a deadly-serious social drama replaced this run of melodrama and tragedy. Instead of the usual array of Senators behind the long table, there were three men, members of the Price Decontrol Board. The big, friendly, white-haired man in the middle was Roy Thompson of New Orleans, chairman. To his left was Daniel Bell, a small, neat man with skeptical eyebrows and a cold, persistent curiosity. The man to the right, with a wrinkled forehead and tired eyes, was George Mead. Bell is a banker now, but for thirty-five years he was a model professional public servant. Mead is a Republican manufacturer who has served on a number of federal boards since 1933.

This board was a product of indecision, political fears, and deadlock. In the dying days of Congress, the House-Senate conference committee on price-control legislation was meeting morning, afternoon, and night. The big issue was food prices. The food lobby was piling on pressure to keep controls off; labor and the Administration were insisting that they be held on. Both sides threatened political revenge. The Senators and Congressmen were unhappy.

Finally, Senator Radcliffe of Maryland had an idea. Why not let someone else make this decision, say a board? The conferees brightened up—why sure, why should we take the heat? That was the genesis of the Decontrol Board.

For four days all the old arguments were repeated. There were the same statistics and charts and threats. The caucus room was taken over by the lobbyists.

But there was a different quality to these hearings. There was none of the anxious humility of Congressmen in the presence of bigtime lobbyists. The three board members were polite but neither enthusiastic nor cool when the big names of the farming and food industries sat before them.

Throughout the long hours of testimony and questioning, the basic issues and the opposing sides in this great economic battle gradually cleared. The most powerful segments of the food industry—the big farmers, the larger packing houses, the grocery chains, the larger distributors—were against price controls and subsidies. Their reasons were hinted at by two witnesses. One, representing small packers, said that under price control the small independents had been able to compete with the big boys. In an uncontrolled market, they would be squeezed out. Another witness, testifying for small milk farmers in the New York area, said that under subsidies the farmer made his reasonable profit. But now, he testified, with high prices the dealer is collecting the increase and the farmer is getting only a fraction.

There was a somewhat unreal quality to the testimony of the large farm organizations, the Farm Bureau and the Grange, which are tied to the anti-control group. Less than fifteen years ago the farmers were the radicals. They came to Washington demanding controls. Henry Wallace was their idol. The farmers had lost their big mass markets because city workers were without jobs. The farmers demanded action without precedent.

The first witness on Monday morning was Ed O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation and a political powerhouse. He is a suave old man with an amused twinkle in his blue eyes. For a longer time than he would care to admit, Ed O'Neal has been dictating farm policy in Washington, and electing and defeating candidates for offices from county commissioner to United States Senator.

O'Neal pooh-poohed all the talk about prices being too high. Of course some prices had risen above what most thinking farmers would like them to be, but, he said with a wag of his head, "Many of these price increases are not as great as they appear. Through much of the twenties and thirties, the consumer received his food at unreasonably low prices."

TRIS COFFIN is a Columbia Broadcasting System commentator. He writes a weekly Washington report for The Nation.

The Farm Bureau head forcefully, and with mountains of statistics, denied that the three conditions existed under which the board could decide to recontrol prices and authorize subsidies. These three conditions—written into the bill—are: food prices must have risen unreasonably since June 30, the products in question must be in short supply, and price controls must be practical.

All through the morning and into the afternoon, the grain farmers, dealers, and distributors hammered at their themes: a return to price control would mean black markets and less grain; there is plenty of grain for everyone; prices, really, are not too bad.

The first consumer witness was no match for the polished, confident, and well-armed professional lobbyists. She was nervous and easily flustered by the questions of the board. Her argument was simple and sincere: "Price rises threaten the basic cost of living. One-eighth of the food budget goes for grain products. Any rise in cereal prices would be a hardship for low-income groups."

A serious young man representing combined labor groups gave statistics destroying the myth that incomes are flushed and bank deposits stuffed. He testified that since the end of the war, the average weekly wage has dropped from $47 to $43. Savings are rapidly draining off. Half of American families have less than $500 left in savings.

Tuesday was meat day. Judge Montague herded his collection of husky, tanned men from the Western livestock farms into the chamber. The spokesman for the meat raisers was good-looking, self-assured Col. Jay L. Taylor. Mead chided him once, saying, "Don't you think you exaggerated the Congressional situation when you said Congress was unanimously opposed to controls?"

Taylor's voice grew hard, "If you want production, you might as well face the facts. You won't get production if you recontrol meat. Do you want production?"

It was a plain threat. Play our game or we strike. Mead asked him several other questions, but each time Taylor came back with the same answer: "Give us high prices and we'll produce."

Other witnesses were a little less blunt. A representative of the meat packers who looked like a well-dressed pig said, "Prices have not risen unreasonably. Prices are declining steadily. The supply picture is very favorable. Give us a little more time to prove we can provide meat at a reasonable cost."

The bald heads in lobbyists's row were startled by a defiant representative of the National Meat Industry Council, an organization of small packers. "The lapse of price controls," he said, "has been followed by price rises to record high levels. Meat prices have gone up from 20 to 50 per cent. These increases are in spite of large supplies. An uncontrolled market will force prices much above OPA plus subsidy."

The meat lobby was struck from another side by Herman Greenberg, formerly of OPA but now representing the New Council of American Business, who said sarcastically: "One of the gentlemen here this morning who cried the loudest about the black market was indicted and pleaded guilty to violation of price controls."

Greenberg said livestock prices have gone up 34 per cent in a month's time and that this is only a beginning; that retail meat prices in Washington shot up 73 per cent over June 30 ceilings.

Boris Shishkin, the lanky economist for the A. F. of L., dropped a gentle warning in the laps of the board. "The A. F. of L.," he said, "has strongly urged its affiliated unions to follow a policy of restraint in collective bargaining on wages. We have a specific program to help achieve greater production. We have taken these steps because of labor's hope that stable transition to full production is still possible with the aid of effective price control." Shishkin paused just a moment. "However, the patience of American wage earners is running out. The American worker will not sit idly by watching his weekly wage dwindle before his eyes."

The most dramatic witness of the whole hearing was Mrs. Frances Silverman, a young, very pretty, and indignant Brooklyn housewife, representing the Buyers' Strike Committee. Her angry dark eyes flashed as she charged: "Congress was derelict. If necessary, we'll organize buyers' strikes across the country so meat will rot in the slaughterhouses. Then maybe we can all eat, and not just the rich."

The next morning, Wednesday, Tom Linder, Commissioner of Agriculture from Georgia and venomous foe of the New Deal, made an attack on the integrity of the board. He slyly quoted a Washington news letter and Fulton Lewis to the effect that the board was "fixed" and its employees were all OPAers. This brought the first anger from the board members. By turn, they told Linder that they resented his statements. But the groundwork was laid. If the board decides for decontrols, the opponents have their alibi.

The final witness Thursday night was Phil Murray, fresh from a meeting downtown of C. I. O. leaders. His was a broadside attack on Congress for letting inflation get started, upon OPA for not fighting harder against it, and on the enemies of control. He spoke gloomily in his soft Scotch burr of "inflation and depression" and told the board: "It is your solemn duty and responsibility to put a stop to rising prices."

The big caucus room quickly cleared. The lights were turned off. And the three men went home to mull over the problem of the nation's grocery bill.

Will Russia Break With the West?

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Paris, August 12

THE recurring crises in the inter-Allied negotiations give rise at regular intervals to predictions that a final break is imminent. This has happened at some point in the course of every international meeting since the war ended but I have always felt sure, and have expressed my certainty in The Nation, that a break would not take place—not on the initiative of the Russians, in any case. Today, returning to Paris from Moscow in the midst of a new crisis, I still refuse to accept current rumors of an inevitable, disastrous break. No matter how tense the situation may become during the week ahead, I am confident that even at the last moment a way out will be discovered. For Russia, from which the difficulties are generally expected, will never of its own accord take the responsibility of bringing about the collapse of the frail structure of international cooperation that emerged from the war.

Russia's foreign policy, whether one approves of it or not, has, in this period of weakness and confusion, one distinguishing characteristic: it knows exactly where it is going. Besides this, it knows how far to go, where to stop, when to reduce its speed or even to retreat. And the limit Moscow sets is the line beyond which lies the imminent threat of war. This is why in my first article I emphasized the Russians' will to peace; in spite of the apparent rigidity and intransigence displayed by Molotov and his colleagues, that will still dominates Moscow's foreign policy.

The Soviet Union not only knows its own course; it knows as much as can be known about the purposes and plans of the Western powers, so often contradictory or even hard to discover. People talk about the growing isolation of the Kremlin; but if by this they mean that the government is not fully aware of the growth of anti-Russian feeling in the West during the last six months, they are greatly mistaken. Talking to many Russians who had never left Moscow, I might easily have believed that they had just stepped out of a plane from Washington. American opinion is followed with extreme care.

This is natural, and not only because of the weight and importance of the United States—today the only other really great power. Soviet concern derives also from the hope that was formerly placed in America; for it was to the United States that Russia looked to maintain in the first years of peace the collaboration which made possible Allied military victory. In that short-lived hope a personal factor played a decisive part and might have exercised a tremendous influence on early post-war developments, if death had not intervened. The loss of Franklin D. Roosevelt was a disaster that today seems to loom larger in the minds of Soviet citizens than of Americans. Russians are acutely aware of the service he rendered when, against the advice of his doctors, he traveled to Yalta to establish a basis of mutual understanding for the difficult period that was just opening. There in the Crimea, as at no previous meeting, Roosevelt won the confidence of Stalin and with it the confidence of the Russian people. General Catroux, the able French Ambassador to Moscow, told me how ordinary Russians had reacted to the news of Roosevelt's death; there was, said the Ambassador, "general consternation."

Had Roosevelt lived, American-Soviet relations, in the opinion of most informed Russians, would have followed a different course. Old reciprocal suspicions, which for more than two decades had hampered normal dealings between Russia and the Western Powers, had already been reduced to relatively harmless proportions; but even confidence and understanding, however important, needed to be buttressed by the broad, statesmanlike attitude of the late President. The most striking thing about Roosevelt's handling of the Russian issue was his capacity to relegate to second place aspects of Soviet policy with which he disagreed and to stake everything on Russia's undoubted desire to maintain the coalition among the Allies and extend it to the problems of the peace. At Yalta, in particular, he held to that major purpose and subordinated his disagreement on less crucial matters. The essential role of mediator, so clearly reserved for the United States, has found no successor to Roosevelt. Only an amateur of diplomacy like Mr. Bullitt—a man can hold the highest diplomatic post and remain an amateur—could have wanted the President to burn all his bridges on, let us say, the issue of Poland; the same sort of people here in Paris—one meets them every day—are again eagerly waiting for the moment when a sonorous Anglo-Saxon fist descends upon the conference table and ends the show, throwing Russia forever out of the community of nations.

To remain faithful to the idea of cooperation with the Soviet Union does not mean accepting every move Moscow makes. I believe the situation in most of the Eastern European countries after the war was naturally so favorable to the Russians that even in their own interest they could have used tactics which would have provoked less opposition inside and less excitement abroad. It is not that I take much stock in the pre-war democracy of the Balkan and Danubian states where, with the exception of Poland and Rumania during a short period, no honest free election had ever been held, but I am sure that genuinely anti-fascist, capable people, now excluded, could have been drawn into the revolutionary effort to break the feudal basis of those once-Nazi puppet states.

THIS IS THE SECOND article in a series by The Nation's European editor, reporting on his recently completed trip to the Soviet Union. Mr. Del Vayo's third article will deal with the new Five Year Plan.

When the Soviet Government established relations with Argentina a few months ago, I found the arguments made in support of that decision wholly unconvincing; and today, when Perón boasts of being the first Argentine president in twenty-eight years who has received a Russian Ambassador, I am still skeptical, knowing very well that he is ready—as one of his latest speeches revealed—to take the leadership in any anti-Russian movement that may develop in South America.

I have always disapproved of those too-clever decisions in foreign policy that confuse the people regarding the main issue. But specific points of difference do not incline me to join those who maintain that Russian policy is directed only toward territorial expansion, new markets, and mastery of the world. I still believe that one of Moscow's chief objects is the destruction of fascism—not only in words but through acts, as in the Russian zone of Germany. While no one can deny that very real conflicts of interest would have challenged even the best efforts of post-war diplomacy, it is equally true that four or five years of honest effort to work together in the spirit Roosevelt established at Yalta might have done much to overcome difficulties and stitch together the fabric of international relations. Once a common progressive policy had been established, differences in economic structure and method would not have presented an insuperable obstacle. Soviet policy has allowed for such differences ever since the economic conference of 1927 when Russia announced that the peaceful coexistence of capitalist and communist states was possible "during the transition period in which we are now living." If there were ever a "transition period" justifying such collaboration, it was the reconstruction period which followed the victory.

It is difficult to fix the precise moment when things started to deteriorate, but I believe the U. N. meeting in London last January marked the point at which mutual distrust and ill-feeling began clearly to dominate the relations between Russia and the Western powers. It was there that the talk of blocs and the organization of blocs emerged as a major disturbing factor.

Since then, the evil effect of this division among the nations has spread fast, building up suspicion on both sides. From Moscow the Western bloc, anchored securely in the New World and constructed with American and British material, is seen as much more than a loose association of Western European nations. Russians watch with distrust every combination, whether it takes the form of an attempt to revive the Balkan Entente or to carry out the Vatican plan of uniting France, Italy, Belgium, Spain, and Portugal—with an eye to wider connections in Latin America. The ingrained suspicion which led Chicherin in the twenties to regard the League of Nations as an instrument directed by the Western bourgeois world against the new revolutionary state, is coming to life again in relation to the U. N. I met this feeling on all sides. Russians are beginning to say that nothing has changed since 1917 in the attitude of the big capitalist nations; that the same old story is starting again, though with one great difference—the immense strength of present-day Russia. They even suggest that if Russia were not so strong, the peace would be made without it and against it.

Russian suspicions are increased by the fact that the people who are talking most about a new war are also those who openly advocate a Western bloc. In this context, British-American collaboration looks less like a natural coincidence of similar views on democracy and peace than a joint effort to insure Anglo-Saxon hegemony. Events since San Francisco have fortified these suspicions. Russians feel that not only have attempts to expand the Soviet area of influence been met by the combined opposition of Britain and the United States, but that the U. S. S. R. has even had to fight hard to maintain the positions granted it in the various conferences from Teheran to Potsdam. But more than any specific dispute or friction, the thing that gives Soviet distrust a serious aspect is the widespread belief in Russia that the concept of an anti-fascist war has ceased to exist among the other Allied powers.

One hears in Moscow much speculation about the reasons for America's changed attitude toward Russia and for the expanding partnership in foreign policy between the Anglo-Saxon powers. Russians see the United States supporting Britain's attempt to prevent the Soviet Union and other Eastern European states from gaining full access to the Mediterranean. In the long run even partisans of a "strong policy" toward Russia admit that this drive cannot be stopped; but it can perhaps be delayed until the "equilibrium of forces," to use a classic diplomatic cliché, has somehow been restored, or until the British feel stronger, or until the proposed American Mediterranean fleet bcomes a reality. In this unquestioning support of Britain by the United States, Russians see the total collapse of the anti-fascist idea. They see American policy adding its strength to that of Britain in Spain and Greece and everywhere else in the Mediterranean. They see Anglo-Saxon collaboration rising above obviously opposed interests in the Middle East in order to safeguard weakened British positions. They see American policy in Palestine hesitating and insist that were it not for the Jewish vote, the United States would undoubtedly support Britain's effort to maintain there a last stronghold along the Middle-Eastern communications line. In China they see conflict of interest between the United States and Britain again subordinated (this time Britain making the chief concessions) to the need of maintaining a common front against all other powers; they see the Kuomintang right-wing supported to a point which threatens new difficulties with Russia. And they watch attentively the gradual shift in American policy in Japan towards a more conciliatory treatment of those elements responsible for the war.

Seeing all this, Russians question more and more whether it is only "common loyalty to the ideals of Western democracy" which brings the Anglo-Saxon powers together as the nucleus of a Western bloc. The fear of an opposing coalition inspires every move made by the Russians in the U. N. It is this which explains their persistent opposition to any weakening of the Security Council in favor of the Assembly, where "combinations" are easier to arrange; their attitude on the veto issue; and even their objection to the Baruch plan and the later American memorandum on atomic energy, which would create a system of control that might, they fear, be used to undermine the Security Council.

From the moment the division of the world into two blocs came to be accepted as a fact, the Russians have automatically rejected solutions of problems which might have been relatively simple to deal with had the Roosevelt policy remained in force. We have seen this, above all, in matters touching Russian security. We have seen the conflicts of interest between Russians and Anglo-Americans transplanted to the soil of Germany where explosive material is still heaped high and the chances of a revival of Nazism are rapidly increasing. One may blame the Russians as much as one likes for the present deadlock in Germany, or argue that the Eastern bloc preceded the Western bloc. But what one must realize is that the Russians, watching the anti-Soviet wave mount in the chancelleries and the international conferences, will hardly refrain from carrying out a policy in their zone which they believe offers them a measure of security both against external attack and the rise of internal reaction. Mr. Sumner Welles was right when he wrote on July 25 in the Paris Herald Tribune: "The Soviet government has been eminently successful in achieving its objective within the Russian zone of Germany," while "the British and American governments have failed to carry out any integrated or democratic program within their zone. Political confusion and economic prostration are intrinsically as great as when the occupation began."

Together with the attitudes of the Great Powers, certain obvious tendencies in the internal political life of many Continental countries contribute to the mistrust in Russia. I dealt abundantly with these tendencies in my article on "The Western Catholic Bloc" in The Nation of June 29, and I need not discuss them here. But in Moscow, the theory that the Vatican has become the rallying point of all reactionary, anti-Soviet policies is widely endorsed. People say: The Vatican is no longer "above the battle"; it is "in the battle." Besides, Russians are wary of certain Socialist leaders who have become energetic promoters of the idea of a Western bloc.

I have always believed that even its own security would have been better guarded if Russia had followed a consistently democratic policy everywhere, attracting through such a policy the active support of the progressive forces in every country. I have believed that if in 1945, just as the war ended, Russia had spoken out clearly, not only on the colonial issue, where its stand has from the beginning been firm, but on the general issue of the fight against fascism; if it had made a series of concrete proposals for bringing that fight to a successful finish and had put the adversaries of a people's peace on the defensive, the present state of things could never have developed. But whether or not such a policy would have succeeded, today we must acknowledge that the revival of reaction has moved faster than anyone expected; rival blocs are coalescing, and if the left is still strong in Europe, as compared with the United States, and still has a chance of winning the battle, the attitude of certain elements among the Socialists and the rivalry between Socialists and Communists have for the moment greatly reduced the possibility of creating any kind of popular front capable of neutralizing reactionary intrigues. In this situation Russia is likely to rely less on such hopes than on consolidating its own strength. Nor are its intentions modified by the general run of persons who represent Western diplomacy in Moscow and elsewhere in Europe. Able, serious persons are to be found among the gossips and snobs in every foreign service; but it must be said that all over Europe, in diplomatic posts and in conferences like the present one at Paris, one sees an army of survivors of all the Munichs carrying on as before the war, spreading poison and doing all they can to dramatize and make impassable the differences between Russia and the West. The activity of these men not only partly accounts for the rising wind of suspicion that propels Russia's foreign policy, it also helps to discredit and often to distort the policy of the West, dissipating recklessly the good will created with such patient effort by President Roosevelt.

Neither they nor any other influences, however, will succeed in bringing about a break. The Russians will ride out any storm that rises in the Conference of Paris, whether they are blamed for it or whether they blame the West. They may not be confident of the future, but they are determined not to give up the United Nations.

Prairie Socialism

BY J. KING GORDON

II. The CCF Moves Ahead

Regina, August 10

DURING the last few days in this city on the flat wheat plains of western Canada, I have been doing some thinking about the future of the Canadian progressive movement in politics in comparison with the outlook for American progressives. I have come to the conclusion that Canadians are much more advantageously situated. Whereas in the United States the progressive forces appear to be hopelessly split into competing factions, uncertain as to political program and utterly lacking in an over-all national organization, the Canadian movement expressing itself in the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has reached a strength and maturity that equips it to challenge the wave of political and economic reaction that is plainly visible.

The CCF national convention which has just concluded brought together an impressive group of political leaders from every one of Canada's nine provinces. The mining regions of the maritime provinces were represented, as were the rich farm lands of Prince Edward Island and the Annapolis Valley. French Canada had an impressive group of young men who contributed an élan frequently absent from the serious-minded deliberations of their English-speaking comrades. Metropolitan Ontario had its spokesmen, too, but the most impressive of its industrial representatives, Charlie Millard, of the United Steelworkers, was occupied in Ottawa with the deadlocked negotiations on Canada's great steel strike. The prairie provinces, where the CCF was born fourteen years ago, had representation from every federal constituency—progressive farmers, trade unionists, teachers, and preachers. Canada's new north, rich in mines and forest industries, and where the CCF shows greatest political strength next to the prairies, sent its delegates from Sudbury, Cochrane, Cobalt, The Pas, and Flin Flon. The west coast, old in its socialist and trade-union tradition, sent men and women who might have come out of the left-wing of the British Labor Party.

It is, chiefly, this national character of the CCF which distinguishes it from the scattered movements in the United States and gives the greatest promise for the future. While it is true that the great majority of the twenty-eight CCF members in the Canadian parliament come from the province of Saskatchewan, with its firmly installed CCF government, the 800,000 votes the movement polled in the federal election of 1944—twice the 1940 total—are widely distributed across Canada. For example, in the last provincial elections in Ontario, Manitoba, Nova Scotia, and British Columbia, the CCF vote totaled more than 650,000, and in two of the provinces, British Columbia and Manitoba, the CCF is the official opposition, in each case having forced its chief opponents to form a coalition government.

J. KING GORDON, The Nation's managing editor, here concludes his two-part report on Canada's Cooperative Commonwealth Federation Party.

The national strength and unity of the CCF, its success in eliminating sectionalism and factionalism, derives from a well-worked-out socialist program specifically designed to meet Canadian political and economic problems. I was at the last CCF convention held in Regina in 1933. The movement was just one year old and the main job was to work out a statement of principles and a program which would bind into a working unity widely separated farmer and labor groups from half a dozen provinces and a score of cities. That first Regina convention is still looked upon as the most fascinating in the movement's history. For the differences were real and openly expressed. The eastern farmer from the long-settled regions of Ontario spoke a different language from his farm cousin on the western plains. The urban trade unionists had not yet got into harness with the rural progressives. The doctrinaire Marxists looked with suspicion on the Fabian socialists from the eastern universities. But out of the strenuous debate and the common necessity of saving the Canadian people from capitalist waste and exploitation, came a basic agreement; and the Regina Manifesto became the credo of the CCF. When Walter Nash, Foreign Minister of New Zealand's Labor Government, read the text he remarked to the CCF parliamentary leader, M. J. Coldwell, that it was "the finest statement of socialist principles and program in the English language." In the subsequent years of the movement the Regina Manifesto has saved it from political compromise, and unwise coalitions and affiliations, and has provided a basis for political education, the influence of which has extended far beyond CCF ranks. Some day soon, American liberals and progressives are going to have to abandon the course of expediency that seems to be dictated by political "realism" and hammer out a similar national program.

The convention that ended last night divided its time between problems of organization and problems of national and international concern to a socialist movement. The CCF in its early days reflected the provincial self-consciousness which has characterized Canada as a whole, and which today blocks the Dominion government's scheme to recast federal-provincial relationships. In the case of the CCF there has been some gain from the original emphasis on the provincial organization: witness the conquest of political power in Saskatchewan. On the other hand the priority of the provincial organizations has weakened the national office by starving it of needed financial support. Only the outstanding ability of the national officers—Coldwell, David Lewis, the national secretary, Professor F. R. Scott, the national chairman, and other parliamentary leaders and research assistants—has compensated for an inadequate budget. This convention deliberately moved away from the provincial base by establishing a national membership with fees paid in directly to the national office. Next year will see a greatly expanded staff in Ottawa, increased research and publication, and stepped-up organizational activity in sections where the movement is still weak. In the organization of local units—and a vast amount of work in this field needs doing in the eastern provinces—the provincial organizations will, of course, have to bear the major share of responsibility.

In its discussion of national affairs the convention in effect endorsed the day-by-day efforts of the CCF members of parliament. Whether a resolution condemned the Liberal government for its cold-blooded policy toward Japanese Canadians or its suspension of civil liberties in the recent spy case or its labor policy exemplified in the present steel strike, it was simply restating the case that the CCF had urged repeatedly on the floor of the House. The resolutions on social security, price contral, a housing program, a health program, all urged nationally the implementation of policies already being carried out within the limits of provincial jurisdiction by the Saskatchewan CCF government.

In international affairs the CCF viewpoint has broadened greatly. In the years before the war, disillusionment with the appeasement policy of the great powers, a basic preoccupation with domestic economic matters, and a socialist suspicion of the joint aims of capitalist nations had forced the CCF into a position not far removed from that held by the pre-war American socialist party. During the war this view of international affairs changed drastically. The CCF was thoroughly behind the Canadian war effort, and its members have played a leading part in Canada's participation in the various agencies of the United Nations. The convention expressed deep regret over the failure of the British Labor government to accept the report of the Anglo-American Commission on Palestine. It urged that Canadian delegates to the United Nations Assembly be instructed to press for the severance of diplomatic relations with Franco and for recognition of the Spanish government-in-exile, and demanded that "economic and other measures as provided in Article 41 of the United Nations charter be applied as far as is necessary to assist the people of Spain to rid themselves of Franco and his fascist government and regain political democracy." It called for the adoption of a scheme of atomic energy control—nationally through an Atomic Control Board which would undertake research and develop atomic power for peaceful ends through publicly owned enterprise, and internationally through such an agency as is described in the Baruch plan. The sympathetic relationship between the CCF and other democratic socialist and labor parties throughout the world was frequently stressed: Sam Watson, M.P., made a special trip from London to Regina to carry the fraternal greetings of the British Labor Party.

The Cooperative Commonwealth Federation appraises its strength and weakness realistically. It has on the credit side an impressive record of fourteen years growth, a national unity transcending sectional and provincial difference, and a program that has forced rival old-time parties to set more advanced social goals. Its national leadership is distinguished. A youth movement is recruiting new members and accepting a corporate responsibility in the affairs of the national movement. On the debit side is a numerical and organizational weakness, particularly in the eastern provinces where it must rally much greater strength than in the past if it is to make a serious bid for power. The trade unions, whose battle for recognition the CCF has fought vigorously since its inception, are generally sympathetic but have so far failed to enter wholeheartedly into the movement; the non-political-action tradition of the international unions still unfortunately persists.

To some extent these are the weaknesses of a young movement that will be automatically conquered if the CCF continues the aggressive campaign of political action it has prosecuted in its first fourteen years. Meanwhile, its adversaries are not sleeping. We have already noted the coalitions formed in certain provinces to keep the CCF from office. During the last federal campaign, a nation-wide campaign of scare-mongering and defamation was carried on by so-called public-relations counsels in Toronto. Hundreds of thousands of dollars were poured into slanderous propaganda to discredit the CCF. Today the attack on price controls, on trade-union security, on social legislation is being pressed by big business in the same concerted fashion as in the United States. The recent Dominion-provincial conference, aimed at assisting the provinces in their social-security program and bringing necessary taxing power back to the federal government, was jettisoned by the combined efforts of the Conservative premiers of Ontario and Quebec, representing the wealthiest interests in eastern Canada. The immediate focus of attack is Saskatchewan. The mortgage companies, the insurance companies, the Canadian Pacific Railway, are aiming their blasts at those measures the CCF government has passed to provide security for the people and curtail the exploiting power of the large corporations. The next years will see a more intensive attack from manufacturing and financial interests and the old-time parties who fear above all else the rising strength of a people's movement pledged to eliminate monopoly and inaugurate a planned economy. The CCF leaders and membership are quite aware of this imminent showdown. It is a challenge they are prepared to meet.

Cowboy on Our Side

BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Potlatch, Idaho

PAPPY O'DANIEL has prejudiced decent people against cowboy singers in politics, but forty-two-year-old Glen H. Taylor is doing his level best to dissipate that prejudice. Less than twenty months ago Glen Taylor was a young fellow who wheeled into Idaho towns in a sound truck, yodeled Oh, Susanna! and talked international cooperation and a Columbia Valley Authority. Today he is senior Senator from Idaho, occupying the seat which William E. Borah held for more than three decades.

Perhaps because he worked in a sheet-metal plant during the war and eats in the employees' cafeteria instead of the Senators' dining room, Glen dares to rush up legislative gorges where even the most doughty liberals fear an ambush. He alone among the members of the Senate is instituting ouster proceedings against Mississippi's Bilbo, recently renominated after urging intimidation and violence against Negro citizens.

The customary senatorial amenities have no place in Glen's book. Colleague or no colleague, Bilbo has encouraged violation of the Constitution of the United States, so Glen contends he should not be allowed to sit in the Senate. He sees scant value in the deference which Senators pay to each other; to him, senatorial courtesy is another way of winking at skullduggery.

A group of Senators recently told Pageant Magazine that Glen was the least effective member of the Senate. The wish may be father to the thought, for right now Glen is challenging another cherished senatorial prerogative—the privilege of so distorting and diffusing one's voting record on vital issues that a Philadelphia lawyer could not figure it out. Glen has introduced a resolution calling on Congress to publish at the end of each session a "tabulation of the voting records of all members on all roll-calls, together with a brief description of the issues voted upon." This proposal has, understandably, deeply offended many of Glen's colleagues.

RICHARD L. NEUBERGER, magazine writer and journalist, once served in the Oregon State Assembly. He is the author of several books on political and social problems of the Northwest.

This cowboy crooner recently took time out to drive home to Idaho. His mission was to bring about the defeat of the state's reactionary junior Senator, Charles Gossett. In the primaries Glen backed a Snake River Valley lawyer named George Donart. Most of the press and practically all Democratic Party officials supported Gossett, whom Taylor accused of being "a Republican in disguise." He said Gossett had voted for Hoover in '28.

The boys around the cigar stores in Boise and Coeur d'Alene were wagering 3 to 1 on Gossett nine days before the election. Then the "least effective" member of the Senate hit the state with his sound truck. He stopped the truck on street corners, at village squares, and along backwoods roads. He said George Donart was a Roosevelt liberal, but that Gossett was "just a stooge for the corporation crowd and there's too many of that kind of men in Washington, D. C., already." The result of the primaries was Senator Gosset, 14,460 votes, George Donart, 16,308. In addition, Idaho's Democratic vote exceeded the Republican total.

Taylor admits to being "an uneducated fellow," but the reactionary clique on Capitol Hill is wary of his sharp tongue. Ira Mosher, of the National Association of Manufacturers, testifying against the Full Employment bill, warned that the President could forecast a boom which would upset the business economy. Glen Taylor replied from the Banking Committee table, "President Hoover proclaimed a boom almost every day, as I recall, and none developed."

Pappy O'Daniel and Glen Taylor both can croon Clementine, but there the resemblance ceases. They vote opposite ways on practically every bill. Pappy is a flour salesman who was brought up in Ohio and later moved to Texas and emphasized the "Lee" in his name. Nothing synthetic tinges Glen Taylor's association with the region he represents in the United States Senate. He was born in Oregon and reared in Kooskia, Idaho (pop. 411). Glen could look out the attic window of his father's house and see the trail which Lewis and Clark had blazed along the Clearwater River.

Glen was number twelve among thirteen Taylor offspring. This ample family proved useful to Glen's father, Pleasant John Taylor, a traveling minister who preached in mining camps and sawmills. Pleasant John staged heart-rending melodramas to finance his preaching. His family provided the cast.

Glen herded sheep in the Bitterroots for a while, then married a girl named Dora Pike who could sing and dance. They formed their own vaudeville troupe—the Glendora Players. When the depression hit in 1929, farmers brought fryers and sacks of potatoes and traded them for tickets. Glen played the guitar and Dora sang. Many times their pockets were empty, and they were only a few steps ahead of a real-life sheriff.

Glen Taylor Seligson

In 1932, practically broke, Glen read a book that was a milestone in his career. It was "A New Deal," by Stuart Chase. That started him thinking. Why were people hungry in a land of plenty. A tract by King C. Gillette, the safety-razor king, made him think still more along this line—Gillette wanted every citizen to be a stockholder in the United States of America. Glen became interested in politics. In between performances with ukelele, banjo, and guitar he tried without success to form a Farmer-Labor Party. His failure convinced him that the Democratic Party under Franklin D. Roosevelt was the only practical vehicle for the common people to ride.

In 1940 Glen won the Democratic nomination for Senator to finish William Borah's unexpired term. He lost in the finals, but found that folks would listen to a man who interspersed Stuart Chase-Franklin Roosevelt economics with cowboy ballads. Two years later Taylor campaigned the state on a white saddle horse and again was Democratic senatorial nominee. Once more he lost in the general election, but this time it was only by 3,700 votes.

Glen joined the A. F. of L. sheet-metal workers and got a job in a San Francisco war plant, the management of which was astonished to find a two-time nominee for the United States Senate toiling at a shop machine. In 1944 he tried for the third time. "You make it in war plants," Glen told Idaho's ranchers, "and the grocer takes it away from you. Don't let anybody ever tell you there's a fortune in that work. You only see the money as it goes past your nose."

In the primaries Glen edged out Senator D. Worth Clark, and in the general election he defeated C. A. Bottolfson, the state's Republican governor. A year later Senator John Thomas died, and the singing cowboy became senior Senator from Idaho.

Senatorial offices are associated in the public mind with marble archways, overstuffed leather chairs, and a heavy Olympian atmosphere. Glen and Dora run their office in Room 244, Senate Office Building, without the usual senatorial solemnity. Their two sons, P. J. and Glen Arod (Dora spelled backwards), run through the rooms and leap into the Senator's lap, shouting, "I love you, Daddy." The secretary is a gray-haired Rhodes Scholar named George Curtis who hates Washington's pavements and phoney atmosphere and wants to go back to Idaho and teach literature in a country school.

Some staid liberals have been a little shocked by this ally of theirs from the Bitterroots. They like Glen's advocacy of a Columbia Valley Authority, and they admire his courage in assailing Bilbo and senatorial vote-dodging. But they gulp a little when they turn a radio dial and hear Idaho's senior Senator, under the coaching of Fred Allen's Senator Claghorn, chanting It Ain't Gonna Rain No More, No More. Glen's friends insist you don't have to be stuffy in order to be liberal. They also claim there is no reason why a technique for getting voters to listen to political speeches should be surrendered completely to the reactionaries.

A Senator without inhibitions is unusual in Washington. Even some fighting liberals take themselves pretty seriously. A widely-read document in Idaho is Glen Taylor's story of how he and his family finally found a place to live. They visited all of Washington's neighborhoods but refused to pay merely to be "elite." They balked at $250 a month rent, and at length bought a place in the Southeast section for $15,000. "That's a fearful lot of money," he explained, "but not as much as $250 a month for six years."

As for nepotism, Glen met the issue head-on: "Mrs. Taylor works in my office. She always has worked with me, as everybody in Idaho knows. In fact, if she weren't working too, I would despair of making ends meet."

When Glen first got to Washington, several reporters asked him to pose on the Capitol steps with his guitar. He said he would rather not but agreed to do so if the boys would give him a break when he had something to say in favor of Henry Wallace or against big business. The reporters promised full reciprocity, so Glen cocked his Stetson back on his head and sang a cowboy refrain with the majestic dome of the Capitol towering overhead. Dora, P. J., and Glen Arod surrounded him affectionately as he yodeled.

"I expected a lot of criticism about my lack of dignity," says Idaho's senior Senator, "but you know, it didn't turn out half bad. I got a whole batch of friendly letters from all over the United States saying that folks were glad a human being had been elected to the Senate instead of a stuffed shirt."

Hungarian Holocaust

BY HILDE SPIEL

Budapest, July 30

THE wildest inflation in history has ravaged Hungary during these last weeks. Life was insane, a sad joke drawn out almost beyond the endurance of the ordinary man or woman. From one hour to the next prices doubled and trebled. In May, when the pengoe stood at six million billion to the dollar, a monetary index figure called a "tax pengoe" was introduced to make the collection of taxes possible. By its merely fictitious and nominal existence, it killed the existing currency and then whirled off to dizzy heights of its own. At this writing the smallest note in circulation is one million tax pengoes—roughly a day's salary for an average employee and barely enough to cover his streetcar fare. Nobody pays rent in Budapest. The shops are filled with foodstuffs and all kinds of luxury goods, but no one on a salary, from Prime Minister to chambermaid, can hope to buy them.

Until a week ago a Hungarian wanting more than twenty-four hours' security tried to obtain black-market dollars. If he was lucky enough to get his hands on one, he would hold it until as late in the day as possible so as to secure the best possible price, yet still allow time for his wife to take the several hundred million tax pengoes to the market ten minutes before closing time—and with them buy a few green paprikas, a head of cabbage, a pound of tomatoes, and a kilo of apricots.

But when the death penalty was introduced for illegal dollar traffic, there were only two ways left for the average family to survive. One was through the calory-wage paid by business firms and factories to their employees. These men have become literally the breadwinners of the family: they bring home, every few days, a supply of white flour, cooking oil, fats, eggs, potatoes, or onions "paid" to them by the factory. The other way is by barter. Budapest, at all times a picturesque city, is today noisy with the clucking of hens that are carried about in shopping baskets. Its boulevards are soiled with rotting cabbage leaves dropped from the rucksacks of city workers. All over town barefooted peasant women trade farm produce, not only against clothes, shoes, porcelain, and silverware, but also against small but no less precious things like matches, saccharine, and sewing cotton. One is reminded of René Clair's old movie about moneyless Ruritania, in one scene of which a farmer hands over a spring chicken in payment for his aperitif, receives three eggs in lieu of change, and tips the waiter one.

All this would seem grotesque in a country which used to be the richest granary and fruit-producer in the Danubian basin. But there are a number of very real reasons, both economic and political, for the present situation. It is impossible to understand them, however, without remembering what happened here last year. When the first coalition government was formed by General Miklos in the provincial town of Debreczen during December, 1944, some of Hungary's gold reserve lay frozen in the United States and Switzerland. It remained frozen throughout the first year the government was in office, and only very recently were promises made to return it to the Hungarian National Bank. All the remaining gold reserve had been removed by the retreating German army to what is now the U. S. zone of Germany. Meanwhile, the government had to pay its own excessively large, and as yet unreduced, staff of civil servants, as well as issue liberal credits in order to get the country's industry in motion. Then the Red Army began to print notes to pay its soldiers, and soon the tremendous burden of occupation and reparation costs made itself felt.

The situation was further complicated by the political anomaly of a government composed of four parties with conflicting aims. The Smallholders' Party, led by Tildy, represented the conservative democratic interests in the country. In their desire to purge Hungary of fascist ideology, they found a common platform with Socialists and Communists, as well as with the National Peasant Party of non-Marxist, agrarian revolutionaries. They could even agree on a three-point program, of which the foremost point was land reform. This agrarian revolution, one must remember, was long overdue in feudal Hungary; yet even after the war the political demand for partition of the big estates did not come from the peasants themselves, much as they desired it. It was initiated by the intellectuals of all parties who first assembled in Debreczen. When land reform was subsequently introduced, it was done on orders from the capital, with no angry farmers evicting landlords from their estates. Most landlords had fled from the advancing Red Army, and the farmer looted house, larder, granary, storeroom, and stables, removing foodstuffs and seeds; but he was afraid to touch the land. Officials sent down from Budapest to divide up property among the peasants naturally encountered determined resistance from the bailiffs left in charge. These men used every kind of ruse and rumor to prevent the farmers' accepting the land offered them for cultivation: the British Army was just across the border, ready to march in and hang every peasant found in possession of his master's land; or the new Hungarian regime would fall as speedily as did the 1919 Commune. Also, no title deeds had yet been forthcoming from Budapest. How could a farmer call land his own that he could not prove was his by deed and letter?

HILDE SPIEL, a native of Austria, is special correspondent in Southern Europe and the Balkans for the London New Statesman and Nation.

For these reasons the land was left unsown, and the harvest was meager, with disastrous results to the economy of the country. But there were other difficulties weakening the government's grip on the country and thereby contributing to inflation. Enemies to the reconstruction campaign were to be found not only among the feudal landlords; there were also a number of large financiers left in Hungary, besides a large and bloated bureaucracy—staffed mainly from the ranks of second sons and poor relations of estate owners and industrialists. And though in 1944 the Smallholders' Party had fully agreed to land reform, and was still committed to carrying it through with the help of the other parties, it became less and less inclined to fulfil further obligations. For meanwhile the party's ranks had been swelled with a number of ante-bellum elements who saw the danger to themselves in the nationalization of industry and the drastic reduction of the civil service. They also sharply protested against the composition of Hungary's new police, which is, indeed, disproportionately staffed with Communists.

So an incessant tug of war is going on between the coalition parties, with damaging results to the government itself. At the same time, the big financiers of Budapest are still undaunted and do their best to disrupt the finances of the country still further by illegal transactions of all kinds.

Political leaders cannot helping seeing in the presence of the Red Army the most decisive factor in Hungarian politics. They are aware that this army, content for the moment to allow Hungarian statesmen a measure of self-determination, would not hesitate to back the more revolutionary movements if it seemed expedient. They also see their country's economic future inescapably linked up with the East, however much some of them would prefer closer bonds with the West. The Communist Deputy Premier, Rakosi, a dynamic and experienced politician, is believed to dominate his less astute colleagues in the government by sheer strength of personality. Tildy and Nagy of the Smallholders, and Szakasits of the Socialists may, indeed, be swayed by his powers of persuasion. But his arguments would be far less convincing without the continued Soviet occupation. Nor can the Smallholders find consolation in the fact that at present they represent 56 per cent of the electorate. As long as the coalition is maintained, they may be reasonably sure of holding their position; should it fail, a new election would certainly bring a swing to the left.

It is against this background that financial stabilization is now being attempted. On the first of August a new currency unit, the florin, goes into circulation, to be balanced against the old pengoe at one to four hundred billion. Simultaneously, economic life will be entirely reorganized. A series of new measures are being introduced to strangle speculation. The possession of foreign exchange is already punishable by death. Another law is proposed by which all gold in excess of a hundred grams will have to be given up—and while this will not force private hoards into the open, it will prevent the use of gold in barter and trade. Only a limited number of florins—eighty million during the first six weeks—will be put in circulation. Salaries and wages will be fixed in accordance with the average citizen's needs. Food rationing, moreover, will now be introduced in earnest. During these last months, government agents have been buying up food at all available sources, often outbidding the racketeers, and a three months' reserve is said to have been accumulated. The calory issue will certainly be small, probably not exceeding a thousand calories. But if fruit and vegetables are on sale at stabilized prices, and the free market is allowed to continue on a more reasonable basis than before, Hungarian housewives may breathe a little freely for the first time since the war.

But how can the government expect to carry this program through? Has it a real basis for its confidence?

The main ground for hope lies in the fact that land reform has at last been carried through with a good measure of success. The peasants discovered that, after all, nobody was hanged for acquiring land, and, in time, the title deeds were forthcoming from the capital. The coalition government, after a certain amount of reshuffling, seemed to stand firm. Last spring the farmers showed their confidence by sowing their land. In the face of incredible odds no less than 93 per cent of all arable land has been cultivated, despite huge losses of cattle, horses, pigs, sheep, poultry, and agricultural machinery. Similarly industrial production rose through the spring and early summer and, as a whole, is said to be 70 per cent of former capacity. This, moreover, was achieved in spite of the requisitioning of rolling stock and machinery by the occupation forces, and the almost complete demolition of bridges and railroads by the Germans during their retreat.

Hungary's national income during the next year may reach 75 per cent of its pre-war standard, while the state revenue is estimated at about 650 million gold pengoes (130 million dollars). Against this must be balanced reparation costs, of which 37 million gold pengoes will go to Czechoslovakia and Yugoslavia, and 200 million gold pengoes to the Soviet Union over a period of eight years. It is hoped that other expenditures, after further cuts in the civil service, will not exceed 540 million gold pengoes. The new budget was to be balanced at a deficit of no more than 20 per cent, or 130 million gold pengoes a year—a sum which gave no particular cause for anxiety. And today Prime Minister Nagy was able to reveal that the Soviet demands for reparations have been cut by a third and their payment extended over a greater period of years. This measure of relief, together with the return of Hungary's gold from American custody, will appreciably help the financial recovery of the new Hungarian state.

The only danger to the country seems to lie with those citizens who are determined at all costs to prevent economic stabilization. They are to be found among the few remaining big financiers and industrialists, the disgruntled state officials, and the landed gentry deprived of their property. Aided by their social standing and undeniable charm, they try to influence members of the Western Allied missions against the government, hoping to obstruct the financial reconstruction and thus unseat the present regime. This policy would seem short-sighted; for however much one may oppose power politics, and however much one may desire a country governed according to Western ideals of democratic self-determination, the geographical necessity for an Eastern orientation of Hungary cannot be argued away. In the light of this necessity, the interests of the country would seem better served by the existing government coalition—in which there is still room for a conflict of ideas and for free discussion—than by its demise; for the fall of the present government would certainly bring greater pressure from the East.

(Since this article was written the florin has replaced the pengoe and Hungary has exchanged a superabundance of money for a severe shortage. Reports from Budapest indicate that deflation is proving almost as painful as inflation. Wages, prices, and rents have been fixed at levels which make the real incomes of workers no more, at best, than half pre-war. So while goods appear plentiful in the stores there are no customers for any but the barest necessities. Meanwhile success of this drastic economic reform remains in doubt. It depends on the government's ability (1) to limit expenditures and avoid further recourse to the printing press; (2) to induce farmers to bring their produce to market in spite of the fact that wheat prices have been set at 2.2 times the pre-war level while those of industrial goods are five times higher.—EDITORS THE NATION.)

India: Unity or Civil War?

BY SHIVA RAO

New Delhi, August 12

POLITICAL developments have taken place at an almost bewildering pace since the Labor Ministers returned from New Delhi at the end of June. In summing up the results of their mission during the course of debates in both houses of the British Parliament in London, Lord Pethwick-Lawrence and Sir Stafford Cripps claimed a certain measure of success for their efforts. They asserted that both major Indian parties, the Congress Party and the Moslem League, had accepted the British long-term proposals and agreed to work out a Constituent Assembly on the lines laid down by the Cabinet Mission. Plans for a provisional government might have gone through had not Jinnah deliberately published his correspondence with Lord Wavell in which he challenged the right of the Congress Party to include within its quota Moslems from outside the ranks of the Moslem League. The ministers decided, upon their return to London, on the establishment of a purely official "caretaker government" at the center. They gave assurances that the Viceroy would resume negotiations immediately after election of the Constituent Assembly, and that the caretaker government would not remain in office beyond a few weeks.

SHIVA RAO is an editorial writer for the Hindu of Madras and correspondent in India for the Manchester Guardian. His dispatches from India appear regularly in The Nation.

Elections for the Constituent Assembly have now been completed. The Congress Party and the Moslem League between them have secured an overwhelming majority of seats. The former captured 203, losing only seven, while the latter obtained seventy-three seats out of a total of seventy-eight assigned to the Moslems. The Congress, however, made a significant and generous gesture. It elected nearly thirty outstanding men and women not belonging to the Party, chosen either because of their special qualifications or because they represented groups or interests which could not hope to succeed without Congress support. The result is that there are representatives of industrial labor, peasants, education, judges, doctors, and women, besides the smaller minorities such as Christians and Anglo-Indians, in the Constituent Assembly.

Had nothing else happened during July, the Viceroy could simply have gone ahead with the formation of the provisional government, resuming negotiations at the point where they were abandoned at the end of June.

The Congress leaders have always attached the greatest importance to this provisional government. They are anxious that India should take her proper place among the nations of the world at the earliest possible moment especially when far-reaching decisions are being taken. At the Paris Peace Conference a handful of officials form the Indian delegation—not men like Nehru. India intends to raise the issue of South Africa's discriminatory treatment of Indian settlers at the next session of the General Assembly of the United Nations in September. It is vitally interested in the future of Eritria and Somaliland. It considers membership in the Trusteeship Council essential to insure a liberal interpretation of the provisions of the Charter. None of these things can India be sure of achieving without a provisional government made up of leaders who enjoy the confidence of the masses of the people.

Internally, too, the situation demands prompt and energetic decisions on a number of social problems. Strikes and labor unrest call for an imaginative sympathy on the part of the government—not bureaucratic rigidity. The country suffered great hardships as the result of a three-weeks' postal strike for whose satisfactory termination credit should go more to the front-rank Congress leaders than to the officials who form the caretaker government. The food situation continues to cause anxiety since imports from abroad have proved extremely inadequate, and the central government is incapable of producing the necessary coordination.

Inside the Congress Party itself pressure upon the leaders is becoming increasing apparent from Socialists who captured an appreciable number of places on the party's central executive committee. They do not conceal their anxiety about the present leaders' "drift towards compromise and constitutionalism," as they derisively describe it from hundreds of platforms. They want to renew the struggle with British imperialism on an even more impressive scale than during the war. Gandhi they admire; for Nehru they have a certain amount of affection, even respect; their politics, however, they sharply criticize. They chafe at Gandhi's uncompromising adherence to non-violence. General strikes to achieve political ends they regard as a perfectly legitimate weapon, disregarding Gandhi's advice. The Congress leaders are aware that unless they can evolve a satisfactory working agreement soon, these left-wing elements will make a formidable bid for control.

Men like Nehru, seeing their influence challenged by younger men and women, genuinely want a settlement with the British and with Jinnah. For a solution of the "vast and intricate political and economic problems," observes the latest resolution of the Congress leaders, "the largest measure of cooperation among the people of India is called for so that the 'change-over would be smooth and advantageous towards all concerned." They visualize the present task facing the country as a "rapid transition from dependence on a foreign power to full independence."

In addition Nehru wants to see India assume the leadership of Asia at this juncture. As for Gandhi, it is more than the mere leadership of the continent, more than a mere political settlement of Indo-British differences; Gandhi, brooding on the atomic bomb, thinks non-violence is the real answer. The solution of India's problem by non-violence will prove the efficacy of such a policy, he thinks, in meeting all world problems.

The Moslem League's present attitude renders the problem, which is difficult enough at all times, considerably more complicated. There was hope of a spirit of compromise prevailing inside the Constituent Assembly so long as Jinnah seemed willing to accept the British long-term plan, notwithstanding its clear repudiation of Pakistan. Subsequent publication of certain documents and letters proves that this acceptance was induced by a number of assurances which the Viceroy privately gave to Jinnah in regard to the formation of a provisional government without full realization of their implications. Jinnah and the Moslem League have withdrawn their support of the British long-term plan, although their representatives in the Constituent Assembly have retained their seats. The Cabinet Ministers and the Viceroy have been charged with a breach of their pledged word and phrases like "dishonorable betrayal of Moslem interests" and "the unholy alliance between the British and the Congress" have been freely used in recent weeks. Released from its embarrassing commitment to the British long-term plan, the Moslem League has reverted to its original demand for the immediate realization of Pakistan, but with a dangerous addition—a threat of direct action.

No one likes the present situation, neither the British nor the Congress Party, nor the Moslem League. Under these circumstances the Viceroy has asked Nehru to make proposals for an interim government—a course which should have been taken at the beginning of the negotiations. It was highly improper of the Viceroy to attempt a task which falls within the sphere of the duties of a Prime Minister. Nehru has accepted the responsibility and will see the Viceroy later this week with proposals. It is significant that the resolution of the Congress leaders, adopted last week-end before the Viceroy's invitation was issued, makes an earnest appeal to Jinnah and the Moslem League to participate in the solution of their common problems in a spirit of cooperation. It is certain that Nehru will offer Jinnah a share of the power within the provisional government. If he spurns the offer, Nehru must go ahead with such elements as are willing to support the new government. It is a critical moment in India's history—implying either a united endeavor to establish democratic freedom or grave civil strife.

EVERYBODY'S BUSINESS

Production and Profits

ASSIDUOUS efforts have been made by the N. A. M. and other mouthpieces of business to spread the impression that the profits of industry have been subjected to an intolerable squeeze between the millstones of rising costs and fixed price ceilings. As a result, it is claimed, the business man has been left with little incentive to produce and the one sure cure for inflation, a massive output of goods, has been delayed.

It is now possible to state positively, on the basis of production and profit statistics for the first six months of 1946, that this propaganda theme is not supported by the facts. Only a few industries, faced with special reconversion problems or involved in prolonged labor troubles, are now operating on an unprofitable basis. For the majority, business is good and profits are mounting to heights never touched in the most prosperous years of the past. The upward trend of earnings is brought out very clearly by figures for 120 companies noted in Barron's of July 29. In the first quarter of the year their aggregate profits showed a decrease of 1.5 per cent compared with the corresponding quarter of 1945; in the three months to June 30, they registered an increase of 36.7 per cent. These figures would have been still more favorable but for the fact that among the corporations included are some that have yet to recover ground lost during prolonged strikes in the early months of the year. General Motors, for instance, has reported a net loss for the half-year of $19.8 million after tax credits estimated at $79.5 million and a transfer from reserves set up to cover reconversion costs of $21 million. The obstinate refusal of the G. M. management to negotiate a settlement with the United Automobile Workers have proved very expensive for the company's stockholders.

Labor troubles in the automobile, steel, and coal industries have also been an important factor in holding down production. However, since the coal strike—the last major dispute—was settled, output has been gaining rapidly. The Federal Reserve Board index of industrial production (average of 1935/39 equals 100), which fell to 152 during the steel strike and again relapsed when the mines were shut down, rose 11 points between May and June to reach 170. And, according to the latest report of the Civilian Production Administration, additional gains were made in July. Coal output, for instance, is now averaging in excess of 2,000,000 tons a day compared with 1,400,000 in 1941, a boom year. Electric power output is also far ahead of the 1941 level, while in June petroleum production rose to the wartime peak of 5,000,000 barrels a day.

Many of the consumer goods industries are by now turning out goods at a greater rate than before the war. The following table shows recent shipments of certain household appliances in comparison with the monthly average in 1940/41.

	1946	1940/41 average
Washing machines	193,000 (June)	158,000
Vacuum cleaners	177,000 (June)	156,000
Gas ranges	141,000 (June)	125,000
Water heaters	225,000 (May)	175,000
Electric irons	430,000 (May)	380,000
Refrigerators	210,000 (June)	309,000
Electric ranges	46,000 (June)	47,000

Mid-year reports show plainly that, in most lines of business, the level of operations is sufficiently high to provide bonanza earnings for stockholders. A table published in the August Bulletin of the National City Bank shows, it is true, that the aggregate net income of 345 leading corporations for the first half of this year was 7.8 per cent below 1945 causing the annual rate of return on net worth to fall from 10.2 per cent to 9.1 per cent. However, this setback was wholly accounted for by the adverse results of the steel, automobile, and electrical equipment industries. By contrast other business groups showed the following striking percentage increases in net income for the first half of 1946 compared with the first half of 1945:

25 Food products	51.6 per cent
18 Paper and pulp	212.0 per cent
29 Chemicals, drugs	52.8 per cent
15 Cement, stone, and glass	25.4 per cent
52 Miscellaneous manufacturing	78.8 per cent
23 Trade (wholesale and retail)	247.0 per cent
13 Service	37.2 per cent

The tremendous increase in trade profits is especially noticeable, particularly as this branch of business, taken as a whole, has made very substantial profits all through the war. Retailers and wholesalers have been in the fortunate position of being able to expand sales vastly without a commensurate expansion in costs. They have, of course, had to pay rather higher wages, but wage costs per unit of sales have dropped sharply, as have overhead charges. Consequently profit-margins have risen to levels hitherto unknown in a highly competitive business. For the year ending January 31,1940, Gimbels's profit margin was 2.9 per cent; for that ending January 31, 1946, it was 10.4 per cent. Corresponding figures for the May, Allied, and Associated department store chains were: 5.1 and 13.8 per cent, 4.3 and 9.8 per cent, 4.7 and 12.2 per cent. It would seem that there is a very good case for absorption of some part of higher manufacturing prices by retailers.

Another business group which has enjoyed exceptionally large increases in profits this year is textiles, although nowhere are there more constant complaints about the ruinous ceilings set by the OPA than in the pages of the textile trade press. The National City Bank tables do not provide separate figures for this industry but the half-yearly reports of eight companies which I have received show aggregate net earnings of $27,251,000 this year compared to $10,775,000 in 1945—a rise of 252 per cent. It would certainly be hard to account for the shortage of shirts and suits on the ground that profit-incentives were absent. KEITH HUTCHISON

(Everybody's Business will not appear in the next four issues of The Nation as Keith Hutchison is on vacation.)

BOOKS and the ARTS

New Year's Day

Again and then again . . . the year is born
To ice and death, and it will never do
To skulk behind stormwindows by the stove
To hear the postgirl sounding her French horn
When the thin tidal ice is wearing through.
Here is the understanding not to love
Our neighbor or tomorrow that will sieve
Our resolutions. While we live, we live

To snuff the smoke of victims. In the snow
The kitten heaved its hindlegs, as if fouled,
And died. We bent it in a Christmas box
And scattered blazing weeds to scare the crow
Until the snake-tailed sea-winds coughed and howled
For alms outside the church whose double locks
Wait for St. Peter, the distorted key.
Under St. Peter's bell the parish sea

Swells with its smelt into the burlap shack
Where Joseph plucks his hand-lines like a harp,
And hears the fearful Puer natus est
Of Circumcision, and relives the wrack
And howls of Jesus whom he holds. How sharp
The burden of the Law before the beast:
Time and the grindstone and the knife of God.
The child is born in blood, O child of blood.

ROBERT LOWELL

The Poetry and Wisdom of Paterson

PATERSON (BOOK I). By William Carlos Williams. New Directions. $2.50.

THERE are many distinct levels in William Carlos Williams's new poem. Three are object levels, what the poem is about: Paterson, the city; the city as man; language as bridge between the two, joining their identity. The second of these levels can be further divided into city-as-man-in-general, as this-or-that man, and as the self, the largest abstract autobiographical image of the poet. Then there are the levels of language-in-use: first prose, in the form of passages from a local history, newspaper clippings, expense accounts, letters and reminiscences; and finally the surface itself, which is Williams's familiar, and at the same time deceptively, but authentically, simple poetry. The completed poem of four parts will elaborate the image, "a man in himself is a city, beginning, seeking, achieving and concluding his life in ways which the various aspects of a city may embody. . . ." The present installment "introduces the elemental character of the place." Thus far, the curious thing about this poem, with its divisions and subdivisions, is that its lines are a true green, though they grow not as meadow but real estate.

The simplicity of Williams's lines is not strained by the need to bind so much disparate symbolic material. The pace accommodates itself to things seen, tactile qualities, an uncrowded catalogue:

. . The sun
winding the yellow bindweed about a bush; worms and gnats, life under a stone.

The pitiful snake with its mosaic skin and frantic tongue. . . .
The absurd dignity of a locomotive hauling freight—

or rolled his thumb

about the tip of his left index finger and watched it dip each time, like the head of a cat licking its paws, heard the faint filing sound it made. . . .

The ease with which Williams hauls his symbolic freight is to the credit of his prose. It is in his clean idiomatic manner (I assume he has written most of it himself, instead of actually taking it from local sources), and it fixes beforehand the objects, events, and meanings that the lines of poetry draw upon. (It is rather as if the notes of "The Waste Land" had been moved into the poetic foreground, with the poem serving as commentary—or need one say as if?) Thus the image of Mrs. Sarah Cumming and Sam Patch, who met their deaths, respectively, by an accidental fall and a stunt leap into water, is well prepared in the prose excerpts to serve the later purpose—death by drowning as the typical metaphor of ineffable poetic language. The lines in the following passage that Williams puts in quotes illustrate the value of such a cut-back in making concrete a generalization about poetry.

Moveless
he envies the men that ran and could run off toward the peripheries—
to other centers, direct—for clarity (if they found it) loveliness and authority in the world—

a sort of springtime toward which their minds aspired
but which he saw,
within himself—ice bound and leaped, "the body, not until the following spring, frozen in an ice cake"

There is an obvious scrap-book advantage in this method; it permits running back and forth in time, leaps from man to this-man to the self, and provides a sociological or historical distillate of the city which the poetry, essentially lyrical, could never undertake to do. But the success of this attempt, a generalizing lyricism with an ars poetica as its motive, cannot as yet be determined. It will depend on how freely the poetry detaches itself, in the subsequent parts, from the prose conveyor belt and works out its own designs. There is already some spontaneous generation of material in the lyrical sections; thus, a reconstruction of a National Geographic snapshot of native women, which develops into a delicate passage on marriage and the communication between lovers.

Of course, devices are essential, for the lyric has short wings. But more important than the sustaining of the lines is the sustaining of the mood, which is here one of summary and wisdom: whether it can grow, circle out, and return on itself with real gain. In recent years the poet's only wisdom has been poetry; he knows all about knowing about poetry, and the earth, which Williams in his concluding lines calls "the chatterer, father of all speech," is a borax heap on which only words grow. But Dr. Williams knows many other things: child-birth, women, life along the Passaic. One can expect him to bring this knowledge to his wisdom in the forthcoming parts of "Paterson."

ISAAC ROSENFELD

Life and Politics

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE. The Macmillan Company. $3.75.

WILLIAM ALLEN WHITE found so much good in the worst of his fellows that all his life he foreswore harsh judgments and loved men whose views and acts he couldn't abide. At the same time he saw so much bad in the best of them that his autobiography, for all its mellowness, color, and high spirits, exposes with surgical deftness the shams of a generation. Unlike Steffens and the other great muckrakers who were his contemporaries and good friends, White was never the outsider doing a cold job on malefactors whom he abhorred; on the contrary, he was for half a century an insider of the Republican machine that he so frequently and enthusiastically damned, and a warm personal admirer of innumerable G. O. P. luminaries from Hanna to Hoover.

The exception to White's rule of indulgent tolerance is William Allen White. To hear him tell it, he was first "a young fool . . . writing reactionary editorials about Sound Economics"; then he was "fair, fat, and twenty-four, a supercilious young Pharisee, blinder than a bat," who lied about the Populists out of the depths of his ignorance. As a journalist, he "reported the superficialities . . . without real knowledge of what was going on," and even at thirty-seven, already publisher of the Emporia Gazette, he was still no more than "a little oleaginous molecule with a red, round face, waddling in a dog-trot from God-knows-whence to God-knows-where." Nor, in his own harsh view, did he ever improve appreciably. Covering the peace conference at fifty, he was "abysmally ignorant," without the "sense

HAVE YOU BEEN LOOKING FOR AN Understandable BOOK ON ATOMIC ENERGY?

George Gamow has worked with Lord Rutherford and Niels Bohr on atomic problems. He was an official observer at the recent Bikini atom bomb tests. In two previous books, Mr. Gamow has proved his genius for explaining the difficult concepts of modern science in language a layman can understand. In this book, which is illustrated with 46 of his own pen-and-ink sketches, he gives a complete picture of atomic energy, extending in time back to the discovery of radioactivity fifty years ago, and in space to the sun and stars.

CONTENTS

I. MODERN ALCHEMY: A review of the general theory of nuclear physics from 1896 to the beginning of World War II.

II. HOW THE STARS USE ATOMIC ENERGY: A picture of the evolution of the universe in terms of atomic transformations, containing new ideas which stir the imagination.

III. HOW CAN MAN USE ATOMIC ENERGY? An account of the methods used to release nuclear energy, and the facts of the atomic bomb; and a survey of possible peacetime uses of atomic energy.

"Here is a book in the best tradition of popular writing on science."—LOUIS N. RIDENOUR Saturday Review of Literature

ATOMIC ENERGY
in Cosmic and Human Life
by GEORGE GAMOW author of Mr Tompkins in Wonderland
Mr Tompkins Explores the Atom

$3.00 at your bookstore MACMILLAN

that Frank Simond had, or that Oswald Garrison Villard had." He was "just Republican precinct committeeman in the Fourth Ward of Emporia, Kansas, who had been on the state commitee and had been on the national committee, and so walked with what I thought was a heroic tread."

This self-castigation should not be taken at face value, and will not by anyone who ever knew William Allen White, and I suspect that future generations of readers will be too absorbed in the narrative, the color, and the warmth of his book to pay much attention to it. I suspect further that White did not mean these passages to be taken literally. But they are there for a reason, and I cannot believe that reason to be unconnected with the curious political double life that marked White's career from the time a minor episode "soured [him] on wealth" and made him "a champion of the new rebellion."

Here was a man who threw himself with characteristically boyish abandon into the Great Reformation led by Theodore Roosevelt, his idol. And here was the man who, among Roosevelt's closest advisers, held out longest against the bolt from the G. O. P. He was, as he says, > a rebel against the rebellion, suspicious even in my enthusiasm, but abating no ounce of energy even though I was standing beside myself . . . I have always done that. Something in moments of tension has always split my personality. Maybe it was in inheritance, blood, or paternal environment—the calculating Yankee watching the wild Irishman, not without amusement and sometimes with qualms.

PALESTINE IN CRISIS

By Freda Kirchwey

A 24-page booklet containing four first hand reports reprinted from recent issues of The Nation.

Prices:

Single Copy Price 10 Cents

Prices for bulk orders: 100 copies $9—500 copies $36—1,000 copies $54. Additional thousand $44.

Send your Orders to

THE Nation

TWENTY VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

This was the same split personality that warned White's Kansas delegation in 1920 not to "disgrace the Republican Party" by nominating Harding and then "toddled along, followed the Kansas banner in the parade, ashamed, dishevveled in body and spirit, making a sad, fat figure while the bands played, the trumpets brayed, and the crowd howled for Harding." The "wild Irishman" supported Franklin D. Roosevelt in public and in private for three-and-a-half years of his first term only to allow the "calculating Yankee" to spend the last six months in promoting the election of Alfred M. Landon, even though he was doubtful enough of his fellow-Kansan to write of him in the Gazette:

> Political geography has taken him where he is. . . . But political geography does not make a man President. He must measure up to certain spiritual requirements. . . . But if he does not have these extraordinary qualities—if some hell-born breed of events thrusts him luckily into power without the strength to do the job—God help his country in a time like this.

The truth is that William Allen White, materially successful all his life, endowed with excellent health, and supremely happy in his family life, knew none of the miseries which he realized were "crystallizing the struggle of the people of the world into one pattern of revolt"—a revolt that was mirrored only tangentially and with distortions in the middle-class insurgency of the Bull Moose. Vaguely and inactively, William Allen White was for that deeper revolt, but he was not of it. He became conscious enough of the shallowness of the Roosevelt reform to write in his autobiography that "we were intent upon making wholesome dog biscuits for the underdog." But apparently this awareness seemed in no way inconsistent with an almost embarrasingly lavish devotion to revolutionists of the caliber of Herbert Hoover. ("We set up a little altar to Herbert Hoover in our hearts—and after thirty years the candle before it is still burning.")

The White "Autobiography," foreshortened by the author's death in 1945, is a great book on several levels. As a personal narrative it is a joy to read—especially the opening chapters on the respectfully dispassionate courtship of White's parents, an episode of Dickensian flavor, and on his idyllic boyhood in a post-bellum Kansas that still feared Indian raids, though the Red Men that little Will White knew were hardly more than wandering bands of amiable gypsies.

As a detailed and animated study in the workings of American political machinery—local, state, and national—the book is superb. White loved Kansas and the America of his youth, but no Marxist has ever dissected the railroad plutocracy so unmercifully, or so unsentimentally laid bare what White called "the vast swindle that was the Middle West of the eighties." And, in passing, the world's most noted country editor wasted no rose-tinted nostalgia on small-town papers as an institution; most of them, he showed, were as mendacious as the small scale of their operations required.

No journalism of our day can touch the "Autobiography" for sheer reportorial brilliance. As correspondent for the George Matthew Adams Newspaper Service and the top-notch magazines of the period, White covered every major political story—and many an unscheduled one—of the first two decades of the century. And they come alive in his book with startling vividness, particularly the Republican convention of 1912, at which Elihu Root, the intellectual aristocrat of the party, facing down a crowd of delegates "which had been melted by rage into a rabble," put his faith in the barbed wire concealed beneath the bunting that wrapped the railed approach to the rostrum. Equally memorable was the scene at the Century Club, where White had been lunching with Thomas B. Reed on the day of McKinley's funeral. At the moment when the entire nation came to a standstill for the tribute of a silent prayer, Reed, who had been ousted as Speaker by the McKinley-Hanna cabal, rose and delivered himself of "the most exquisitely brutal, meticulously refined malediction" White had ever heard—all "poured out in a torrent of wrath, a cold, repressed New England cascade of icicles."

White's estimates of people are personal rather than political, and he has sketched a fascinating gallery. McKinley "was destined for a statue in a park, and was practicing the pose for it." Charles Curtis was a man "who after his one blast for free silver never let the expression of his convictions affect in any way his rise in prestige and power." Mark Hanna, whom White loved as a father, was "a tender-hearted brigand," who, had he lived, might perhaps "have seen how evil was his rollicking economic lechery." Bryan was "an innocent, intellectually and emotionally—a child in a garden who loved its beauty, enjoyed its perfume, and never crushed a bud," while Darrow "belonged to the great brotherhood of pilgrims who tread the primrose path not idly but with zeal and a deep conviction of their rectitude." Wilson, whom he admired and whose foreign policy he favored over that of his hero's, was "a spare, ascetic, repressed creature, a kind of frozen flame of righteous intelligence"; yet he treated T. R. with "a frigid malevolence" that White could never forgive.

The book is 649 pages long and so broad in scope that I have done no more than suggest its contents. It is an intimate political history of the United States from 1880 to 1923, informed by the genial spirit of a man who had experienced the best the country had to give in those years—an intelligent, talented, and successful American whose conscience preserved him from social arrogance and whose humor saved him from ever becoming smug.

ROBERT BENDINER

Coming

The Books and the Arts section of The Nation will feature during the next few weeks articles and reviews by Wolfgang Köhler, William Empson, Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., Hans Reichenbach, Stuart Chase, Albert Guerard, Franz Neumann, Paul Tillich, Isaac Rosenfeld, Ernest Nagel, Delmore Schwartz, Mary McCarthy, Wylie Sypher, Hannah Arendt, Robert Lowell, Arthur Mizener, and Paul Sweezey.

The new book by

CHARLES A. BEARD

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY in the MAKING 1932-1940

A Study In Responsibilities

A clear, documented statement by one of our greatest contemporary historians, showing precisely what Franklin D. Roosevelt and other political leaders represented as our foreign policy before we entered the war. Whatever the final judgment may be as to responsibilities in the making of American foreign policy from 1932 to 1940, here is a record that is inescapable for all who are interested in the truth of the case.

Second printing • $4.00 • At all bookstores

YALE UNIVERSITY PRESS
New Haven, Connecticut

FICTION IN REVIEW

ROBERT PENN WARREN'S "All the King's Men" (Harcourt, Brace, $3) is not the first novel to draw its inspiration from the career of Huey Long. Some years ago there was John Dos Passos's "Number One," which I have not read, and a few seasons ago there was Hamilton Basso's "Sun in Capricorn," which, as I remember it, dealt rather freely with the actual biography of the Louisiana Kingfish. Mr. Warren would seem to stay closer to his original: he gives us a complete life-story, from the days when his Willie Stark was just an earnest, urgent, back-country farm boy to his early years in law practice and his first venture into politics, through his flashing rise to political power and the governorship, to, finally, his assassination. I say "would seem" because, acquainted with only the broadest outlines of Long's life, I have no way of knowing how much of Mr. Warren's detail is a matter of record and how much supplied by the novelist's imagination. But since Mr. Warren offers his story wholly as fiction, the question of factual accuracy need not be raised.

And a very remarkable piece of novel-writing "All the King's Men" surely is. For sheer virtuosity, for the sustained drive of its prose, for the speed and evenness of its pacing, for its precision of language, its genius of colloquialism, I doubt indeed whether it can be matched in American fiction. Mr. Warren's method is the method of great photography, his poetry an overtone of photographic documentation. Perhaps one must imagine the camera of Walker Evans inching over mile after mile of the South, piling up its record of personal portraits and place portraits and portraits of things, catching fact after fact of the Southern heat and mystery, indolence and venality and despair, in order to begin to have a notion of what and how Mr. Warren sees.

Nor are its imposing gifts of composition the only recommendation of " All the King's Men." There is also its largeness of intention. Mr. Warren's study of a political leader is intended to investigate the moral relativism inherent in the historical process. One might describe it as a fictional demonstration of Hegel's philosophy of history. For what Mr. Warren seems to be saying, with Hegel, is that spirit or goodness arises only out of the ruck of living and the clash of self-seeking wills. He is questioning the absolutes of good and evil which are so much the assumption of a large part our present-day political morality.

But all relativistic positions are peculiarly liable to misinterpretation, and the Hegelian relativism especially must be read very purely not to be translatable into a justification of means by their end, or not to be understood as the belief that good always, even often, has its source in evil. Yet here precisely is the inadequacy of "All the King's Men," that it can give rise to just such misconceptions of what I am sure was its very much purer informing idea. It is in fact difficult not to infer from Mr. Warren's novel that a Willie Stark's absolute power is justified by such public benefactions as the fine hospital he builds, or that we are to welcome the Willie Stark type of political unpleasantness as a step in political progress.

In part, of course, this may be the inevitable result of translating the hero of history into a hero of fiction. For, concerned with the world historical figure, Hegel was concerned only with his historical or force aspect, not with his ethical aspect; but fiction always deals primarily with individual human beings, and only by suggestion with philosophical abstractions, and when Mr. Warren personifies his abstractions, as the novelist must, he in effect alters a way of viewing history into a system of personal morality from which, then, we evolve a system of political morality. Thus, Willie Stark is not an evolutionary force, but first a person on whom his author exercises an ethical judgment; and if only because he is the hero of the novel, we must assume that this judgment is largely admiring or approving. The result is that it is the demagogue's usual dull ambivalence—half the obsession with power and half a soft generosity and idealism—that is made to stand for the dialectical struggle of good and evil in both individuals and society.

But it is not merely because he is the hero of the novel that we assume that Stark is approved by his author. We also have the word for it of Mr. Warren's narrator. "All the King's Men" is told through the point of view of a young newspaperman-researcher attached to Stark—one of those prefabricated figures out of the city room whom Mr. Warren endows with a wonderful eye but with no equivalent gift of inward vision. "Wise," cynical, tough but touchable, Jack Burden is better educated than his usual counterparts in fiction and the movies, but his values are scarcely more fortifying. He is the kind of man, for instance, who, when he perceives that the only thing alive in the face of an Okie to whom he gives a lift on the road is the twitch near his eye, goes on to evolve from this observation an embarrassingly maudlin philosophy—a phantasy of the Great Twitch as a god of doom. Even more significant, he is the kind of man who feels virtually no emotion about his share in the blackmail of a friend, a blackmail that leads the friend to shoot himself, except the pleasure of recognition that a good—a truth—has come from it. But although Jack Burden is so essentially shabby a person that he vulgarizes any thought he entertains or acts out, it is to him that Mr. Warren entrusts an idea of history that requires the nicest discriminations. It is Burden's morally ambiguous evaluation of Stark that we are forced to accept as Mr. Warren's.

And if the low quality of Burden's moral awareness is responsible for most of the ethical and political confusion of "All the King's Men," so must it in some measure account, I think, for the failure of Mr. Warren's novel to achieve the artistic stature commensurate with the author's writing gifts. For one has the idea that were Mr. Warren's narrator to inhabit wider realms of thinking and feeling, he would not only alter our view of the book's central character but also give greater meaning to its subsidiary people, that he would raise all his associates out of the realm of the commonplace and raise their conflicts from melodrama to drama. Certainly the conception of almost all Mr. Warren's characters fails to match the energy of the prose in which they are delineated. While Mr. Warren's language draws upon every resource of actuality, his creation of people lacks all freshness of perception. It is the inner human mystery that Mr. Warren blinks as he pursues the mystery of the historical process.

DIANA TRILLING

STAGE PLAYS

THEATRE GUILD'S PRODUCTIONS
THE MUSICAL HIT

CAROUSEL

Music by Richard Rodgers ▪ Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d ▪ Directed by Rouben Mamoulian ▪ Dances by Agnes de Mille
with Harold Keel — Iva Withers
Jean Darling ▪ Eric Mattson ▪ Norma Howard ▪ Jean Casto
AIR-COND. MAJESTIC Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT

OKLAHOMA!

Based on Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs"
Music by Richard Rodgers ▪ Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d ▪ Directed by Rouben Mamoulian ▪ Dances by Agnes de Mille
Jack Kilty ▪ David Burns ▪ Betty Jane Watson ● Ruth Weston
AIR-COND. ST. JAMES Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." — Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40. AIR-COND.

"ALL TRIUMPHANT!"—Barnes, Herald Tribune
RICHARD RODGERS and OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd Present

ETHEL MERMAN in

"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"

Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN ▪ Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON
Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN
IMPERIAL THEA., 45th St. W. of Bway. Mats. Wed. & Sat. Air-Cond.

BUY YOUR BOOKS through

The NATION

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible.

•

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
The NATION
20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

The

New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review
may now be obtained through

THE Nation

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

•

Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage
SPECIMEN copy on request

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"AN EXCITING STORY!" New York Sun.

BETTE DAVIS

GLENN FORD ▪ DANE CLARK

'A STOLEN LIFE'

Adapted from Karel J. Bene's novel
— AND —
'SWING PARADE OF 1946'
GALE STORM ▪ PHIL REGAN

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL B'way & 62 St.

"Delightful Film Comedy"—N. Y. Times

JENNIFER JONES
CHARLES BOYER
in ERNST LUBITSCH'S
'CLUNY BROWN'

Based on MARGERY SHARP'S Novel
— AND —
"It's a Killer-Chiller"—PM
JOHN HODIAK ▪ RICHARD CONTE
LLOYD NOLAN ▪ NANCY GUILD
'SOMEWHERE IN THE NIGHT'

NOW! AIR CONDITIONED

The THEATRE GUILD presents

LAURENCE OLIVIER
in William Shakespeare's
"HENRY V"

IN TECHNICOLOR ▪ Released Thru United Artists
PRICES: Eves. (at 8:30) $2.40, $1.80 Mats. daily (at 2:30) $1.80, $1.20
ALL SEATS RESERVED
NOW! N. Y. CITY CENTER 131 West 55th St.

BARBARA STANWYCK ▪ VAN HEFLIN
LIZABETH SCOTT
— IN —
HAL WALLIS' Production
"THE STRANGE LOVE OF MARTHA IVERS"
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

— IN PERSON —
DINAH SHORE
— Plus —
GIL LAMB
— Plus —
The Acromaniac
EXTRA!
DICK STABILE
and his Orchestra

NOW PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

Music

B. H. HAGGIN

JAZZ is a new material not only for the musicological system-grinders but for the academic course-makers. The following questions were sent to a number of music critics by a member of a college teaching staff who wrote that the answers and comments would be part of the material he was assembling "in connection with the contemplated introduction of jazz into the music curriculum:"

1. What is the position of jazz in modern music?

2. Will jazz make any permanent contribution to music? If so, what?

3. Could jazz be taught in the music schools? Would such instruction be of value?

In reply I wrote: "A course in jazz could be given and would be valuable if it was devoted to letting the student hear jazz—this for two purposes: (1) by familiarizing him with it—and solely by that method—to develop his taste for it; (2) to make clear to him the difference between jazz and the forms of popular music that are not jazz, such as the show music of Gershwin and Berlin and the large-band performances of arrangements of this music."

In other words, "the course would not be concerned with the 'position of jazz in modern music' and its 'permanent contribution to music.' Your questions on these matters represent first of all the academic attitude in the teaching of music—which is to teach not the piece of music as a piece of music, a particular artistic communication, but the piece of music as a collection of stylistic manifestations related to other such collections in the development of music. And that is something I consider completely wrong. Your questions further represent the long current notions about the relation of jazz to American serious music, which are also wrong. In these ideas jazz has been taken incorrectly to mean the show music of Gershwin and Berlin; and even about this music the ideas have been wrong, and your questions are on the wrong track—as you may realize if I ask the analogous questions about the position and contribution of the Viennese waltz. But it is even worse when the ideas and questions are about jazz in the correct sense—the improvisation of small groups like those of Louis Arm-

(Continued on page 223)

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Voting at Eighteen

Dear Sirs: As a highly interested teenager, I have wondered why The Nation has not come out for the extension of the franchise to all citizens over eighteen years of age.

I, like most of my contemporaries, feel that now is the time to amend the Constitution extending the vote. When I graduated from high school two months ago, I generally was in sympathy with such an amendment. Since I have now entered industry, observing what the older as well as the younger generation is thinking, and observing how reaction is setting in as typified by Dwight Griswold's defeat in Nebraska and Charles La Follette's defeat in Indiana, I am particularly concerned about the need for this amendment. Young people are, as a rule, liberals, with highly imaginative concepts of things, yet are, contrary to opinion among the older folks, well informed on political and economic issues which are at present confronting the world. Their outlooks have not been blackened with delusion and fear and prejudice, and they are not burdened down with the modes of the past. Liberalism is greatly in need of these young people's votes. They are looking to the future.

During the war millions of young men not yet of voting age were drafted into the armed services and asked to accept the responsibilities of full-fledged adults. Recognized as quick thinkers and alert fighters, as a group they were excepted from no undertaking. Many returned veterans, hardened by the experiences of seeing the world, will this fall be ineligible to vote because "they ain't old enough."

I have heard many people refer to the younger element as too ignorant and inexperienced to vote. Most of these same people are not acquaintd with, or never attended the meetings of, the young people of the present generation. Mention youth, and most of these old fogies immediately think of a harum-scarum demon. There are many young people like this, but I rather think they are an exception. Most youth are serious. They want to contribute to society and take up the responsibilities of an adult. The number of people over twenty-one who are in ignorance of the problems of the present age is much higher than that of people between eighteen and twenty-one. After all, the older people have had time to lose faith in prevailing institutions, their minds have become closed and set. Not so the young folks. Their minds are clear, relatively unpolluted by the hates and resentments of yesteryear. The future is theirs and most of them will be wary in their handling of it.

Despite claims to the contrary, eighteen- and nineteen- and twenty-year-olds want the franchise. We see political opponents elected to office, we are made responsible adults before the courts, and Congress drafts us long before the ballot is even within reach. Most of us form personal political and economic opinions, quite distinct from those of our parents, before leaving school.

At present, only Georgia provides the franchise for citizens over eighteen. Under the auspices of liberal Governor Ellis Arnall, an amendment was passed to bring these young citizens into the electorate. The results have been satisfactory.

I suppose we could wait for individual states to take action; however, the delay and inadequacy of this procedure is too obvious. The time to act is now. Now is the time for all of us to work for a Constitutional Amendment to give all citizens over eighteen the franchise.

BEN BENEDICT

Sturgis, Mich., July 14

Hope for Georgia

Dear Sirs: I found "It's Growing Time in Georgia" by Lillian Smith (The Nation, July 13) a masterpiece of understanding and bravery. Reading it was difficult in the light of Talmadge's victory. I admire Governor Arnall's work and hope that he will have another growing time in Georgia.

JAMES R. DUFFIN

San Francisco, July 23

Stickney Memorabilia

Dear Sirs: I am gathering material for a life of the American poet, Trumbull Stickney (1874-1904). If any of your readers have letters or other material pertaining to him, I would appreciate hearing from them.

THOMAS RIGGS JR.

12 Gansevoort St.,
New York 14, July 6

(Continued from page 222)

strong; and again you may realize this if I ask the analogous questions about the position and contribution of Spanish cante flamenco."

And in conclusion, "the fundamental error is that of thinking that these forms of popular music acquire importance and value only from a relation with, an absorption into, serious music, instead of realizing their sufficiency and validity, their importance and value in and for themselves."

But if the course is given I am sure it will be devoted to the ideas about the position and permanent contribution of jazz in serious music that were supplied by the other critics whom my correspondent wrote to. It will be devoted, that is, to the ideas which provide the kind of material a college course can be made of—which lend themselves to classroom discussion, note-taking, memorizing, and questions and answers for academic bookeeping.

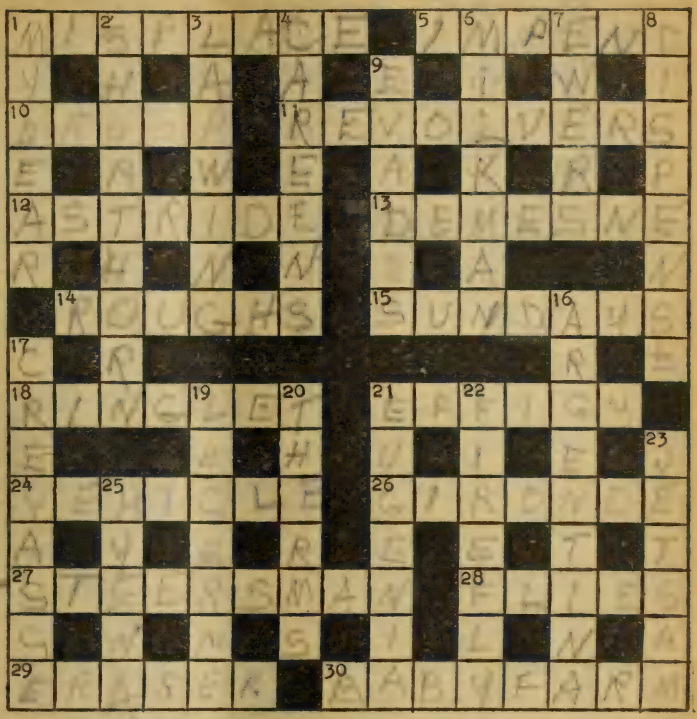
For August Victor offers a single record (11-9191; $1) with Mozart's Overture to "The Abduction From the Seraglio," beautifully performed by Beecham with the London Philharmonic (though with characteristic over-deliberateness in the minuet section), and beautifully reproduced (though with some weakness in treble, and with curiously fluctuating volume-level in the fortissimos on the second side.)

Apparently Victor considers this overture as great a burden as our minds can stand up under in August; for the rest of its list is very light, and only one of the items rates discussion: a volume (Set 1053; $3) of the favorite Brahms Hungarian Dances—Nos. 1, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 17—spiritedly performed by Erica Morini with Artur Balsam at the piano.

If Victor is so seasonal it might issue Beecham's recent recording of Royal Hunt and Storm from Berlioz's "Trojans," of which I have heard enthusiastic reports. The quiet conclusion of that piece is a succession of exquisitely wrought details of a startlingly intense loveliness that brings tears to my eyes in the same way as some of the things that happen in Mozart; and the entire piece documents a reader's observation, in a recent letter, that he saw in Berlioz's "very pure and fire-like and passionate music . . . a mind operating in the romantic idiom in the same extraordinary way as Mozart's operates in the idiom he grew up with."

Crossword Puzzle No. 175

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Put a square peg in a round hole, for example
5 Finish with a mischief-maker
10 Hang down
11 Weapons with which people might defend themselves when encircled?
12 Mounted like a man
13 Manor house
14 Hooligans
15 We are best suited on these days
18 Token of marriage on hire?
21 It doesn't hurt anyone to be burnt in this
24 Any conveyance
26 No dirge comes from this part of France
27 Pleasure was, in Gray's famous lines
28 Buzzybodies
29 The man who never made a mistake would have no use for one
30 Where infants are taken in and done for (4 and 4)

DOWN

1 Dreamy way to begin a letter (2 and 4)
2 If we're going to be chased by a bull, we hope it will be this kind!
3 Is this bird a sitter, or a flyer, or both?
4 Moves with an inclination to port, or starboard
6 We open the door to find that he has left
7 Running water wash-basins have largely superseded them
8 Do away with — in the prescription department!
9 Dodges
16 A great inn (anag.), and it's in South America
17 Cress, Eva? (anag.)
19 Town and lake in Switzerland
20 Heat units
21 She's probably "Genie" to her friends
22 Seems as though it might be a dangerous insect during a drought
23 Washed up while the jam set
25 Is this animal laughing at us?

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 174

ACROSS:—1 GRAYBEARD; 6 POETS; 9 INNINGS; 10 REMORSE; 11 SOLDIER; 12 ANISEED; 13 DON; 15 GARAGE; 17 BOTTLE; 18 WHITE; 19 NATURE; 22 TRIBAL; 25 ONE; 27 LONG TON; 28 GENESIS; 30 MUSTANG; 31 ICEFLOE; 32 NEARS; 33 REGISTRAR.

DOWN:—1 GRIPS; 2 ANNULAR; 3 BUNTING; 4 ABSURD; 5 DURBAN; 6 PIMLICO; 7 EARNEST; 8 SPEEDWELL; 14 ONION; 15 GENTLEMEN; 16 EWE; 17 BET; 20 TUNISIA; 21 RATTANS; 23 RANGERS; 24 BUSTLER; 25 ONAGER; 26 EGGING; 29 SWEAR.

SCHOOL

LAKEWOOD
MODERN SCHOOL
A residential school for boys and girls from 7 to 12 years of age. Small group. Personal supervision.
Write:
JAMES and NELLIE DICK
115 Carey Street • Lakewood, N. J.
Phone: Lakewood 6-1007

APARTMENT WANTED

Washington, D. C. newspaperman, single, 30, wants to share apartment close to downdown after Sept. 15. Alternatively, he wouldn't mind such quarters alone. Box 1638, c/o The Nation.

DENTAL ASSOCIATE WANTED

VETERAN, licensed to practice Dentistry in Connecticut, New York, desires associateship with older man. Write to Dr. Lester Sarkady, 20 Grove Street, New Haven, Conn.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

10 ROOM COLONIAL; excellent condition; heat; electric; bath; barns; small river; view; 96 acres; beautiful location. $9,000. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, phychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocational psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

LANGUAGES

ALL LANGUAGES. Phonograph Courses. Linguaphone, other makes. Sold, bought, rented. A. Alin, 475 5th Avenue, New York 17. MU 3-1093.

MAGAZINE SUBSCRIPTIONS

SUBSCRIBE FOR PERIODICALS simply by asking me for them; any number in one order. Pay after I bill you at publishers' lowest prices. Catalog NA, Free. John Crehore, Walpole, N. H.

PUBLICATIONS

ENJOY POETRY TO ENJOY LIFE! Richardson Savell's LOVE SONNETS, 896 lines—64 confessions. Handsomely imprinted. $1.00. Grand Print Publishers, Box 542, Brookline Village, Mass.

REAL ESTATE FOR SALE

OPPOSITE Chrysler Building at Grand Central Terminal, 139 East 43rd St. 4-story building. Lot 20 x 100. $90,000 cash. Also, 55,000 square feet. Immediate occupancy. $82,500. Two 4-story and basement buildings. Elevators. About 16 acres land. At Stuyvesant Falls, N. Y. (near Hudson). May sell one building only. With perpetual use of N. Y. Power & Light 400 h. p. without cost as part of ownership. Formerly used as textile mill and as battery plant. Owner, Room 820, No. 565 Fifth Avenue, New York 17.

RESORT

AUGUST 19 THROUGH LABOR DAY. $35 weekly. Homestead, Carmel, N. Y. Private lake, tennis, handball, volley ball. Good food. Modern conveniences. Phone GR 5-6582; Socialist Party. 303 4th Ave., N. Y. 10.

SITUATIONS WANTED

SOUTHERN COLORED DOMESTIC and hotel workers desire jobs. Write for list today (stamps). QUALITY EMPLOYMENT ASSN. 214 East Clay Street, Richmond 19, Va.

YOUNG WOMAN, recent college graduate M.S. in Social Work desires position with opportunity for interesting travelling. E. Berk, 515 E. 35 St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

EX-SPY TO HIRE: Veteran experienced investigating creative artists, businesses, political movements in Germany seeks career position. Used to making decisions, handling subordinates. Married, A.B. degree, fluent German, French. Box 1639, c/o The Nation.

TOBACCO

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.40 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order. Ace Mail Order Co., East Orange 1, N. J.

CLASSIFIED
ADVERTISING RATES:
62c a line (six words)
Minimum 3 lines
$6.16 an inch

DISPLAY ADVERTISING:
Base rate, $250 per page.
Rates by classification, on request.

THE NATION
20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.
BA 7-1066

RESORTS

The Glenmere
Your private country estate while you are our guest.
In the Ramapos
CHESTER, N. Y.
51 Miles from New York City
Your private lake with beautiful white sand beach. Your private golf course. We offer you excellent accommodations, superb cuisine and every facility for your entertainment. Glenmere is a glorious place for your vacation.
N. Y. Office: RE. 2-5047

HATHAWAY LODGE
OPEN ALL YEAR
Formerly the palatial 592-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Winding Mountain Trails. Delicious food. Easy Transportation.
Attractive Rates • Make reservations now
For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 299

HUNNS LAKE HOUSE
STANFORDVILLE NEW YORK
90 miles from New York via N. Y. Central. Charming lake and countryside, rustic, restful. Directly at lake, bathing, boating, fishing, other sports. Beautiful walks on own grounds. Excellent American cuisine. Ideal for week-ends and vacations. Adults only. Rate $45.00.
Management — Telephone
GRETE POPPER — Stanfordville 2931

OAKWOOD
NEW WINDSOR, N. Y. Newburgh 4477
Delightful...Boating and swimming in our private lake.
Different...The colonial atmosphere.
Delicious...Our unexcelled cuisine.
Diverting...Recordings for listening & dancing.
All this only 53 miles from New York City
A Resort for Adults Only

DEUEL HOLLOW HOUSE
In Berkshire foothills, 70 miles from N. Y. City. Delicious food served on terrace overlooking our private lake. Free swimming instructions, rowing, fishing and other sports. A completely informal atmosphere.
SOME AUGUST RESERVATIONS AVAILABLE
Raisel Cohen — David Sacks
Wingdale, N. Y. — Phone 3691

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • AUGUST 31, 1946 NUMBER 9

The Shape of Things

TRIESTE REMAINS THE TOUGHEST NUT FOR the Peace Conference to crack; its shell was scarcely dented at the Foreign Ministers' meetings. But the difficulties of the problem are by no means insoluble. Now that the conferees have accepted internationalization of the disputed seaport as the only sensible course, the next step is to find an international machinery acceptable to the two blocs into which the Peace Conference has unfortunately divided. For the past few days there has been a good deal of quiet discussion in the corridors of the Luxembourg Palace of a formula which would place Trieste under the control of an international board headed by a representative of a country other than the Big Three and the nations directly concerned. There are not many people on the international scene today whose anti-fascist record and international outlook would meet with general approval, but there are a few. It is impossible to overestimate the tremendous service that would be rendered to the cause of peace by a rapid solution along these lines; in the midst of the present discouraging exhibition of mutual distrust and misunderstanding between the nations which won the war, this would be a first example of working internationalism. But the only chance of success for this Trieste plan lies in the creation of an anti-fascist administrative system with a clear-cut progressive program. Perhaps the solution is not so much the "internationalization" of Trieste but, as Pietro Nenni suggested the other day, its "inter-socialization," with the left forces in Italy and Yugoslavia giving the world a lesson in peaceful cooperation.

*

BARTLEY C. CRUM BELIEVES HE HAS HIT ON the answer to a major political mystery: the paradox of America's official failure to further a Jewish homeland in Palestine even though every President since Wilson has proclaimed the principle, both major parties regularly include it in their platforms, and numerous resolutions in its support have been adopted in Congress without opposition. Mr. Crum, who was a member of the Anglo-American Committee on Palestine, blames the State Department and particularly its "gentlemen of the middle level," who have long been "captives of the British social lobby" in Washington. The solution may be over-simplified; we suspect that our oil concessions, dependent on the cooperation of shady feudal chiefs, are one important factor among others. But the indictment leveled by Crum is convincing and concrete enough to call for drastic investigation. Given access to the department's secret files in connection with his mission, Crum found that for every Presidential promise made on Palestine and for every Congressional resolution, the State Department, in confidential cables to Arab leaders, advised that "nothing would be done." He cites "secret communications between Ibn Saud, Farouk of Egypt, and the Husseinis of Jerusalem, and the Middle East desk of the State Department," headed by Loy Henderson, whose removal, he suggests, would be "salutary." Confidential cables from the White House to American members of the Palestine committee, he says, were delivered first to British Foreign Office officials, who opened them as a matter of course and undermined the committee's work at every turn. Evidence has been piling up for years showing the extent to which policy is influenced by these middle-level officials, in the Foreign Service and in the department itself. The country should welcome Senator Guffey's proposal for a full-dress investigation of this secret government-within-the-government.

*

NINE NEGROES HAVE BEEN LYNCHED IN the last two months, in outbreaks of that inter-racial violence that is the most barbarous and shameful feature of American life. No one has been punished for these lynchings; it is not likely that anyone ever will be, if local authorities and local sentiment have their way. If local authorities won't act, the federal government must; but the improved civil-liberties laws that would enable it to act with real effectiveness have little chance to get through Congress, owing to the antiquated and unfortunate system that has put Southern reactionaries in control of most committees, and that gives a minority of Senators the power to block any legislation by filibustering. Senator Johnson has just resigned, in disgust at its inaction, from the special committee investigating campaign expenditures; two of its remaining members have been goaded into stating that they consider charges against Senator Bilbo extremely serious. It will be educational to see what they do about the charges. Men like Bilbo and Talmadge have done everything in their power

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS
The Shape of Things 225
The Price Compromise 227
Roots of Suspicion by Freda Kirchwey 228

ARTICLES
The Work of the Decontrol Board by Tris Coffin 229
How to Elect a Progressive Congress by Henry A. Wallace 231
Intermezzo in Berlin by J. Alvarez del Vayo 232
Four-Part Dissonance in Paris by Aylmer Vallance 235
We're Building a Fascist China by Agnes Smedley 236
Palestine: British-American Dilemma by Reinhold Niebuhr 238
The Mystery of Big Jim by Neil O. Davis 240
Small-Town America VI. Wharton, Texas by Alden Stevens 242

BOOKS AND THE ARTS
A Historian's Politics by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr. 244
An Academic Bohemia by Weldon Kees 245
The Medea of the Rocks by Arthur Mizener 246
The Impressionists and Proust by Clement Greenberg 246
The Limits of Refinement by Dudley Fitts 247
Records by B. H. Haggin 249
Films by James Agee 249

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 250

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 176 by Jack Barrett 251

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon — Washington Editor I. F. Stone — Literary Editor Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors
Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch — Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors
Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editor: Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx
Advertising Manager: William B. Brown
Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

to make Southerners feel that race violence is not only right but expedient; Bilbo has openly and repeatedly advocated that Negroes be kept from the polls by force or intimidation, and has just crowned his long, deplorable, incredible career by a spirited and heartfelt defense of the Ku Klux Klan: "The Klan has always stood for the American flag, constitutional government, and the American way of life." Senator Bilbo, at home, is a shrewd politician; his evident belief that his constituents will agree with his statement is more disquieting than the statement. But the most disquieting thing of all is the probability that this man will continue to represent—or should one say disgrace?—the American flag, constitutional government, and the American way of life.

*

NEWS FROM CHINA IS NOW BEING CONVEYED by military communiques, and hope of peace has virtually come to an end. Unfortunately, the communiques are fully as partisan and misleading as the political dispatches which preceded the breakdown; Americans who want to know how the fighting is going will have to wait until the true picture seeps out through the iron-clad censorship. The censorship has also made it almost impossible to gain a clear understanding of the events which led to the collapse of negotiations and the outbreak of full-fledged civil war. On another page in this issue Agnes Smedley assigns chief responsibility for the breakdown to Chiang Kai-shek and his reactionary associates, but suggests that blame also rests on the American government and those financial interests which have backed Chiang against the genuinely democratic elements in China. Her general indictment of American policy is unquestionably justified, but it is important in the interests of clarity to distinguish between the sound democratic policies outlined in President Truman's directive to General Marshall and the less advertised but obviously more potent measures adopted by our military officials to prop up the Kuomintang armies in their struggle against the Communist forces. For the American army in China has obviously subverted the purposes announced by the President. It is probably too late to avert the tragic consequences of our conflicting policies, but it is not too late to pull American troops and marines out before they find themselves fighting in China's civil war—on the wrong side.

*

PRIMARY DAY IN NEW YORK ADMITTEDLY brought no cheer to the left, but the ecstasy of the conservative press is pathetically out of proportion. Joseph Clark Baldwin and Augustus Bennet, two reasonably liberal Republicans—both repudiated by their party and running without campaign funds, organizational backing, or any kind of mass support—were defeated for renomination to Congress. That is the extent of the victory. From the editorial pages of the Scripps-Howard, Hearst, and other metropolitan papers the casual reader might conclude that the G. O. P. had gone much further and retired from public life such leftist luminaries as Vito Marcantonio and Adam Clayton Powell. Actually, all that happened was that those two gentlemen, deprived of a Republican nomination, will run in November on two tickets instead of three. As Democrats and American Labor Party nominees, both are almost certain to return to Congress. Their failure to go back as Republicans, far from depressing us, seems like a healthy, if unsought, release from a none too savory connection. The appallingly low vote in the New York primary is regarded by experienced observers as a failure of the machines: not enough canvassers rang enough doorbells. This failure, particularly marked on the left, was largely responsible for the Republican defeat of Marcantonio and Powell. Communists and their fellow-travellers, who can normally be counted on to perform this basic chore, are reliably said to have fallen down on the job this year—a sign of the weakness that has beset the party since the purging of Earl Browder. Here again the effect can be salutary if it induces labor candidates to organize such support in the trade unions instead of buying it, politically, from a party which, like the Republicans and Democrats, has its own fish to fry.

*

IN THE DEATH OF DOROTHY J. BELLANCA, the Amalgamated Clothing Workers' Union has lost a unique leader and the nation a devoted citizen. Mrs. Bellanca was only fifty-two years old. Yet her service as a union member, organizer, and vice-president had stretched over more than thirty years—all of them in the men's clothing trade, from which the Amalgamated grew. Under Sidney Hillman's remarkable leadership, she was one of that ardent and able band who started the union, extended it to encompass the entire industry, and won for it the respect of workers and management alike. A person of rare loveliness and fine mind, she was possessed by an unflagging and passionate concern for the sufferings of others. Without question she was the ablest woman organizer in the American labor movement. For many years Mrs. Bellanca had responded to those wider claims so often made on union leaders. She was an outstanding member of the Committee on Welfare of Women and Children of the Department of Labor, established when the New Deal was young. She was a White House appointee to the National Health Conference in 1938, which did so much to inspire subsequent work in this field. She was a member of the Mayor's Committee on Unemployment during the depths of the depression. She was a leader of the Governor's committee against employment discrimination in New York State. Her life was shorter than it should have been, but it was filled with distinguished work and was rich in compensations. One recalls the words of Heine: "Place on my grave a wreath and in my hands a sword. For I have been a soldier in the great Liberation War of Humanity." Mrs. Bellanca was such a soldier.

The Price Compromise

IF ANYONE is fully pleased by the curious compromise agreed upon by the Price Decontrol Board, the press has neglected to report its existence. Compromise is inevitable in politics, and it is often possible to reach a middle-ground decision reasonably satisfactory to all parties in a controversy. But the Decontrol Board's efforts represent a straddle that is rightly condemned by both friends and foes of price control.

Restoration of price limits on meat had been anticipated, despite the protests of the packing interests, because of the runaway prices on most meat products in recent weeks. If there was to be any stabilization at all, it was obvious that meat, which accounts for a large proportion of the average family's food budget, had to be brought under control. But dairy products—milk, butter, and cheese—also constitute a big part of the average family's food; and, despite the official reasoning cited in Tris Coffin's article on page 229, it is difficult to understand the board's decision to exempt these items from control. In many areas the increase in milk prices had exceeded the June 30 ceiling plus the subsidy and in some instances has reached unreasonable levels.

Even if the increase were no greater than the two-to-three-cents-a-quart rise made necessary by the suspension of the subsidy, it would seem imperative to restore that subsidy. Otherwise, millions of children in low-income families face curtailed consumption of this irreplacable food. The only plausible explanation of the board's action is political rather than economic. It apparently decided to throw some sop to the opponents of price stabilization, and the lifting of controls on milk and grains seemed less dangerous than similar action would have been with meat.

Whether or not the compromise can be made to work is another matter. Explosive inflationary pressures have been generated by recent price and wage increases. These will naturally be exerted most strongly on the uncontrolled sectors of the national economy. Milk and grain prices may be forced far beyond their present levels. Confronted by a big increase in the cost of these necessities, together with the never-ending price increases authorized by the OPA, organized labor would have no choice but to demand wage rises beyond the 18½-cent advance incorporated in the national stabilization program. As President Roosevelt pointed out during the war, the only way to stop the insidious advance of prices is to stop it simultaneously everywhere. The decision of the Price Decontrol Board has left a vital sector of the price front undefended. The gap can still be closed if the board carries out its promise to watch prices closely and restore controls as soon as further increases occur; but its behavior so far is not such as to make us expect great energy or courage in the future.

Roots of Suspicion

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE Yugoslav-American crisis subsided when the State Department announced that its demands had been met with the release of the nine men held after the shooting down of the army transport plane on August 9. But the issues involved in the incident have not been resolved. The attacks by Yugoslav flyers on unarmed planes will hardly be repeated; Marshal Tito has in fact ordered that they be stopped. They were not, however, isolated outrages designed to test out the limits of American forebearance, although this is the interpretation offered by most of the editorial writers. The whole context of events suggests that they reflected a more serious and complicated situation.

From the moment the victorious Yugoslav forces were induced to abandon Trieste and the western littoral of Istria, and the area was put under Allied—meaning Anglo-American—control, a state of semi-war has been in effect. For the Yugoslavs look upon the Morgan Line as a British invention which infringes upon their inalienable rights, and regard the crack British-American troops guarding the line not as liberators, still less as allies, but as an occupying army. Border incidents, ambushings, free-for-all fights have become the common expression of this hardening enmity.

Tito says that American army planes have been making frequent reconnaissance flights over Yugoslav territory. The State Department denies it. Probably an impartial inquiry would be required to get at the facts, and this is not likely unless the United States government lays the dispute before the Security Council. But it would be wise, in the absence of such an inquiry, to withhold judgment on this particular point. Even if Tito is telling the truth, the behavior he complains of would explain rather than excuse an attack on a plane obviously unarmed and carrying passengers. What his explanation does is to highlight a background of tension and hostility far more serious in the long run than any single act of violence, however unjustified.

It is this background which explains the dismal stalemate at Paris, and the mood of despair and even of hysteria which has swept the Western world in the past few weeks. If war were made by headlines, by prophecies, by a fierce concentration on the probability of war, the bombs would begin to drop before dawn tomorrow. Fortunately the men who must make the fatal decisions do not want war—not now at any rate. Or, more accurately, they do not want another military war if they can establish their ends by political pressures and maneuvers.

In three articles Mr. Del Vayo has provided a clear description of the suspicions that dominate Russian strategy in this continuing political struggle. Most Americans will sharply challenge Soviet assumptions about the intentions of the West. As a nation we consider ourselves innocent of any aims that could interfere with the legitimate interests of other nations. And it is a fact, I believe, that neither our government nor the people as a whole want war or harbor any direct aggressive designs. But in this world of revolutionary conflict, innocence is not a defense. It may, in fact, prove a rather menacing trait. It enables us to do, or connive in the doing of, an astonishing variety of provocative acts with an air of total complacency. It enables us to be shocked by the conduct of our opponents without ever imagining that we may be arousing similar emotions in them.

Just as an obvious and even pressing example, let us take our policy on the atomic bomb. Having perfected, manufactured, and used this instrument of extermination, we proceeded, after an interval of many months, to develop a plan for the international control of atomic power. The preparation of the plan was the work of a group of honest, disinterested experts. The plan itself, although open to serious criticism at several points, does in fact offer the organized world a chance to control a power this country now wields alone without challenge. Nothing has more startled American opinion than Russia's bland dismissal of our proposal. How can it be explained even in Russia's own interests? Naturally, the easy explanation, in the present temper of the country, is that the Soviet Union opposes any system of control because it expects to develop atomic weapons soon itself and wants no inspectors snooping about its plants and laboratories.

I suspect this is a superficial analysis of the Russian attitude; it ignores, because we cannot really believe in, Russian suspicions. For a year after the United States dropped two A-bombs on Japanese cities, our army and navy went on improving and manufacturing these weapons. For a year they went on experimenting with new methods of atomic attack, new forms of propulsion. They conducted two noisily-exploited trial bombings over Bikini. They did their best to keep the domestic control of atomic development in military hands. And, meanwhile, a number of high military men openly advocated that the bomb be used on our Soviet ally, before our Soviet ally should get to the point where it could use it on us. This was not, certainly, the view of the government, but it seemed to gain ground, especially in the jingo press.

Then came the plan, and the plan provided that all the fissionable material in the world be put under the control of a new international atomic-energy board which was to be created, and that when all the chips were in, and all the machinery assembled, and all the rules made, the United States would decide whether the set-up was satisfactory to it. If so, it would surrender the knowledge and the bombs. If not—that question wasn't answered. But the Soviet Union, if I gauge its suspicions correctly, was not prepared to accept a plan which depended ultimately on the simple yes or no of a power which had not acted in a way calculated to allay those suspicions.

One can argue, as I would argue, that the sensible procedure for Mr. Gromyko would have been to call for amendments of the American plan rather than propose as a substitute one which makes no sense at all in a world of mutual insecurity. It is likely that his demand for the immediate destruction and outlawing of the bomb was not in fact a serious proposal, but was intended to dramatize the existing international situation—like Litvinov's famous proposal, at the Disarmament Conference in Geneva, of total, universal, and immediate disarmament.

This is just an example, but an important one, of the gulf of misunderstanding that opens when American innocence collides with Soviet suspicion. Perhaps the best course Americans can pursue in this period of political struggle is to examine dispassionately—instead of rejecting indignantly—the reasons the Russians give for doubting our good intentions.

Mr. Del Vayo's article on Germany provides much specific material for such an examination. So does Mr. Vallance's letter on the Paris conference. But the most substantial food for self-analysis I have come across in recent weeks was the official report of General McNarney on Russia's policy in Germany, published on October 16 in Berlin. The whole report was an expansion of a single charge: that the Soviet Union was deliberately attacking private enterprise and moving toward socialism in its zone. In the General's own words, this implied "establishment of a Socialist state with a classless society following the destruction of the capitalist system." One can understand how painful such discoveries must be to a General brought up in the dominant American faith. But I would like to suggest that a report like his is enough to prove the incapacity of the American army to carry on any political or economic functions in any European country. It is not only evident that the attitude he reveals is bound to produce antagonism among the Russians, justifying in their eyes every fanciful charge against the American government; it is also clear that McNarneyism, like the policy of the Colonel Blimps referred to by Mr. Del Vayo, will drive into Russia's arms the only elements in post-Hitler Germany we can safely do business with, and will open the way for a recrudescence of Nazi hopes and activities. What this means in terms of the prospect of peace hardly needs to be emphasized.

The Work of the Decontrol Board

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, August 24

FROM quiet first-floor offices in the Federal Reserve Building, the members of the Price Decontrol Board are anxiously watching the reaction to a decision they made after exhausting days of hearings and study.

These three men—Roy Thompson, the big, friendly chairman; Daniel W. Bell, whose punctilious, exact mind searched out the answers in the four days of hearings; and George Mead, the midwestern manufacturer—staked their reputation on this decision. They ruled that price ceilings and subsidies should be restored to meat; that flax, cottonseed oil, and soybeans should go back under controls; and that most grains and dairy products should not be placed under price ceilings.

The mail is beginning to pour into their offices—cheers and angry criticism from consumers and producers alike, with the cheers holding a slim majority. The most cheering letter was one which reads: "Your board will receive brickbats and bouquets. This note is from an American family which feels your board tackled an onerous task with forthright courage and made its decision with clear conscience."

The ruling came as a surprise to Washington, for it disregarded the heaviest pressures. The meat and cottonseed oil interests have potent political backing from Southern and Western Congressmen, and in the hearings the livestock men bluntly threatened to withhold meat if controls were restored.

In failing to put price ceilings on dairy products, the board went against the recommendations of both the OPA and the Department of Agriculture in one of the few cases where these two agencies have agreed on anything. An easier finding was that on grain; all the figures the board could collect showed that supplies will be sufficient when the crops are harvested and that prices are tending to level off toward the old ceilings.

In his radio talk Thompson explained the action on fats and oils. "Nearly everyone agreed that was what needed to be done—industry, consumers, and government. Price rises since June 30 were outrageous in many cases. An adequate supply of fats and oils is nowhere in sight. This country is unfortunately having to halt all exports of fats and oils after the end of the year."

TRIS COFFIN is a Columbia Broadcasting System commentator. He writes a weekly Washington report for The Nation.

The toughest and most perplexing problem was dairy products. Consumer groups made their strongest pleas to put price ceilings on milk. The arguments were both statistical and emotional.

The board was limited by Congress: before it could restore controls, it had to find that prices have risen unreasonably, that supplies are short, and that controls would be workable. The three men could not satisfy themselves that prices had shot up unreasonably. The final decision was motivated by two factors—first, that for the country as a whole milk had risen one cent a quart, plus the two-cent subsidy which was withdrawn; and second, that the dairy industry had made an effort to hold prices and was considered deserving of an opportunity to discipline itself. Economists in both the OPA and Department of Agriculture, however, are frankly pessimistic. They believe that milk will become short in the winter months and that prices will go up further. Moreover, Thompson in his radio talk did not close the case of dairy products. He said, and I am told the board means it: "If dairy products move upward from here on out, this board can and will put the industry back under control." The work of the board is not finished. It will be watching supply and demand of farm products continually until the price control act expires.

At the other end of Washington, in an old barn-like building down by the railroad tracks, the OPA is organizing for its greatest test—the success or failure of meat ceilings will determine the future of price control. The opposition has moved fast. The American Meat Institute is screaming "black market" at the top of its lungs. The Wall Street Journal reflected the sullen mood of the industry in a page-one story on August 22, a roundup of opinion from livestock men, packers, and butchers. The article wound up with a nasty crack: "Former black-market operators didn't say anything yesterday. They just grinned."

When Paul Porter, the tall, good-natured OPA administrator, held his press conference this week, he was frankly cautious. A reporter asked him, "What can you say about rolling meat prices back to the June 30 levels?"

"I think we ought to be pretty realistic about it," Porter replied. "We are going to have a pretty bad September. I have always tried to stay at or near June 30 levels. We will do the best we can—subject, of course, to the concurrence of the Department of Agriculture." He promised to "throw the book at the black marketeers," and added: "I think probably for the first time we have some basis for confidence. We have enough manpower to make a full-scale attack on the black market. [Note: The enforcement staff has been doubled.] Obviously, we are not going to succeed one hundred per cent, but I don't think there is any reason to believe we will see large-scale black-market operations."

A correspondent asked, "How seriously do you take the packers' warnings that farmers will stop producing and hold back livestock?"

He replied thoughtfully, "I think we have heard those threats many times before. I am hoping that the packing industry will devote as much energy to making controls work as they did in trying to get rid of them."

Porter realizes that the OPA is going to be blamed for an inevitable meat shortage in September, and he is not happy about it. Every forecast indicates the livestock growers will keep their cattle on the range during September and not sell them. The grass is good during September and the cattlemen can fatten their products and watch with satisfaction the howls from a meatless public. The American Meat Institute can say, "We told you so," and haul up the old bugaboo of the black market. Cattle are expected to come into the packing houses at a rapid rate in October, and then slow down during the first quarter in 1947, leading to a meat famine in the second quarter. During the war the lowest level of supply was 115 pounds of meat per capita per year, which meant 65 pounds dressed in the stores. The current figure is 135 pounds.

The board's decision on meat has been followed by a confusion that tends on the surface to support the industry's propaganda line. Wholesalers have stopped buying meat from the packers at uncontrolled high prices, but their ice boxes are still loaded with high-priced meat they can't unload; the retailers don't want to be stuck with high-priced meat either. So the counters have pretty slim pickings at present. The wholesalers are crying bloody murder and demanding that OPA give them more time to unload. They claim that they need thirty days to get rid of their high-priced meat before controls are put back on.

The OPA has a double-barrelled job on meat—it must keep a close watch all along the line to see that meat is not diverted to the black market, and it must educate consumers not to buy above ceilings. The OPA people profoundly hope that the consumer groups, which did such a good job of lobbying and testifying, will work with equal vigor in organizing housewife support for the meat program.

Paul Porter has another worry in the back of his mind: he is afraid that milk prices will go up, and that he will be faced with the almost impossible job of dragging them back down again. He told his press conference: "I would be less than candid if I did not say I was disappointed that the board did not recontrol fluid milk and dairy products. I expect we will be in trouble in dairy products, certainly, this fall. It's a lot more difficult to catch the horse after he has gotten out of the barn, particularly when he is allowed to run a month or two. But we'll probably have to try and lasso him and bring him back."

The battle of prices is not over. It is just moving into a new and perhaps more complicated stage.

How to Elect a Progressive Congress

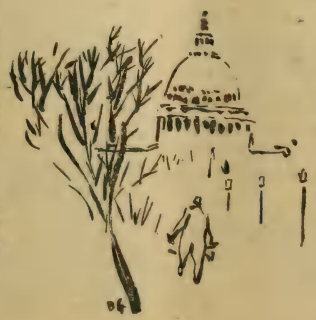
BY HENRY A. WALLACE

IT IS an appalling historical fact that the votes of a few Representatives and Senators meant the difference between adequate and inadequate preparation for the war against Germany and Japan—between victory and defeat. The draft law, for instance, was extended shortly before Pearl Harbor by only one vote in the United States House of Representatives. It is also true that the kind of Senators and Congressmen we elect this November will largely determine whether we meet the challenge of the peace at home and abroad.

Too many people, I have found, seem to believe that too many other people become weary of well-doing. They point to the fact that Woodrow Wilson found it impossible to awaken the people of this country to the necessity for a League of Nations after World War I. They remind us that President Wilson, who gave his life to winning the peace after he had worn himself out in leading us through a successful war, was succeeded by President Harding, who beguiled the people with the sop of "normalcy." But I am convinced that the people of the United States are not asleep in 1946. The lesson of 1920 taught us that we cannot afford to lose interest even for a moment in political action—and from personal association with numbers of veterans, I firmly believe that the eleven million young men and women who served in the armed forces are exceedingly aware of both the dangers and opportunities before us as a nation and as a people.

I have more than faith to back up my belief that we can elect a progressive Congress in November of 1946. In California, for example, such progressive Democratic Congressmen as George Outland, Chet Holifield, Jerry Voorhis, and Helen Douglas ran better in the primaries this year than they did two years ago. In the Democratic Senatorial primaries, George Donart of Idaho, Lief Erickson of Montana, and John Sparkman of Alabama —all progressive—were victorious and will be elected to the United States Senate.

Then let us see how progressive Republican Senators and Congressmen fared in the primaries. Bob LaFollette in Wisconsin, Charles LaFollette in Indiana, and Joseph Clark Baldwin and Augustus Bennet in New York—all good progressive public servants—were defeated by the forces of Republican reaction. The warning is unmistakeable: if we are to have a progressive Congress this fall, it can not be a Republican Congress.



The rejuvenated Democrats in Wisconsin would have welcomed "Young Bob" after he had liquidated the Progressive Party—but he chose instead to return to the Republican Party, which stood for everything against which the LaFollettes had always fought. But the Republicans of Wisconsin spurned this able public servant whose sin, to them, was that he treated laboring men like other human beings. On the same day that the Republicans turned thumbs down on LaFollette, the Democrats of Wisconsin nominated Howard McMurray for the United States Senate. An able progressive, McMurray was one of Franklin Roosevelt's staunchest supporters while he was in Congress, and I am certain that, if elected, he will be an outstanding Senator.

Men of the type of Charles LaFollette are badly needed in Congress—but the Republicans of Indiana sternly rebuked him when he challenged the conservative leadership of his party and sought the senatorial nomination in the party convention. The trend of reaction in Republican primaries was especially emphasized in New York City by the defeat of Joe Baldwin, who time and again deserted the retrogressive Republican leadership to vote for administration-sponsored progressive legislation.

The issues, therefore, between Republican and Democratic candidates are now much clearer—because most Republican nominees are all out against the people's progress, while the great majority of the Democrats who were nominated in contested primary elections continue to stand by the Roosevelt New Deal. Both parties, as a result, have tightened their lines; and we are nearing the happy time when we can have some assurance that if we elect a candidate of one party we will have a vote in Congress for conservatism, and if we elect a candidate of the other we will just as surely have a vote in Congress for progressivism. There is still much work to be done in the South, as elsewhere—but we are well on our way.

I have always contended, and the votes in Congress prove, that on most issues involving the general welfare the majority of Democrats vote right and the majority of Republicans vote wrong. It is equally true that in most primary elections progressive Democrats win and progressive Republicans lose. It is my sincere belief that there is no place in the Republican Party organization nationally for a progressive Republican. Senator Wayne Morse, of Oregon, will learn the hard way—as did George Norris, Wendell Willkie, Bob LaFollette, and I and my father before me—that the Republican Party will only break the hearts of those who conscientiously seek to use it as a medium of progress.

The Congress which will be elected this November will have the task of making the Employment Act of 1946 mean something in terms of continued jobs and economic stability. Therefore, it is highly important to elect Congressmen and Senators who sincerely believe that continuous full employment and full production should be our national objective.

We cannot have continuous full employment—even with a full employment act—if a majority of our representatives in Congress are committed to the reactionary doctrine that a soft labor market is desirable. In housing, health, education, and social security for all, just as in protecting the gains of labor, we need Representatives and Senators who think in terms of the national interest and not in the interest of selfish groups. In the shaping of our foreign policy, we must have Representatives and Senators who will recognize and avoid every step which leads to the much-mongered World War III. We must make "On the Alert" a watchword for peace as well as war.

Our most immediate danger is a light vote in November. But if the voters of the United States will go to the polls forty-five million strong on Election Day, I feel certain that we shall have a progressive Congress prepared and able to win the peace.

Intermezzo in Berlin

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

Paris, August 20

TO HOP from Moscow to the Hotel Savoy in Berlin is to live in two different ages within the space of six hours; that is how long the regular daily flight takes, in comfortable American-type planes built by the Russians.

Flying low, with a single stop at Kaliningrad (the pre-war Koenigsberg), I looked out on the rich farmlands of once-great junker estates that had formed the underpinning of Prussian hegemony over Germany, now split up by a very rapid and radical agrarian reform. Here, as everywhere in the Russian zone, the Germans are working hard both in the fields and the factories; they have little free time or energy left to play at werewolf or to plot the coming of the Fourth Reich.

Pausing only long enough to leave my luggage at the hotel, I hurried out into the ruins of Berlin, a city where I once lived for seven years, in search of familiar landmarks: the house on Kleiststrasse where my elder son was born; the house on Nettelbeckstrasse where one of my best friends had lived—the painter Herstein, whose whole family was wiped out in the war; the building on Potsdammerbrücke where I had my office when I was the Berlin correspondent for La Nacion of Buenos Aires and where, even in 1924, I had a rough-and-tumble visit from a gang of young hoodlums because of some articles I had written on the growing Hitler movement.

THIS ACCOUNT of life in occupied Berlin by The Nation's European Editor replaces his report on Russia's new Five Year Plan, originally announced for this week, which will appear in an early issue.

The street signs were still there, but of the houses only a wall or two stood, and their facades were smashed beyond recognition. Rubble is still piled high everywhere: I could not help thinking that there must be hundreds of cadavers buried in the ruins; it is amazing that no serious epidemic has broken out to aggravate the city's physical problems. No photographs or newsreels can give a convincing idea of the extent of destruction. The city was smashed not so much by American and British air raids as by Russian heavy guns; the battle for Berlin was undoubtedly the greatest artillery battle of any war.

After wandering about the city on foot for several hours, I returned to the hotel completely exhausted. The sight of the dining room quickly revived me. One of the most illuminating stories of the post-war is to be found in this hotel which flaunts its impressive comforts before a fallen city. The Savoy is certainly the best of the hotels requisitioned by the Allied missions in Berlin; the English know how to install themselves—hot running water at all hours, a plain but well-cooked mess, and a wine cellar that proved a constant temptation to one who is a teetotaler only on doctor's orders. There you can drink French wines, confiscated by the Nazis, that are hard to find today in Paris. A few civilians are received as transients, and glancing back a few days on the register I recognized the beautiful diminutive handwriting of Harold Laski. But the hotel is mainly for the use of officers of the British occupation army. I watched them pass in their impeccable uniforms, red braid, and decorations bright against the khaki, looking as if they had stepped out of some old print of Cecil Rhodes's England, with the self-assured air of men convinced that their Empire is indestructible. Their every gesture revealed ties, hereditary or imagined, with England's ruling class.

In Berlin the British are favorites among the "better" Germans. Despite the ruins there is a distinctive note of elegance throughout their zone. The people wear better shoes than in the other zones; the store windows have little to show, but the quality of the merchandise is far superior to that seen elsewhere in the city. This was always true of the Kurfürstendamm, but the streets in the Russian zone in the neighborhood around the Unter den Linden, formerly the center for luxury shops, now house German workers as do all the old fashionable districts under Russian control. The American zone along the Grünewald is another matter. Here a striking note is provided by dozens of American girls in uniform or civilian clothes who completely overshadow the Germans and their wives. Grünewald spells laughter and jokes and stunning feminine figures such as one sees nowhere else in Central Europe today.

In the British sector the Germans feel more secure and happy—at least that class of Germans among whom Hitler found his greatest support. Of course the English officers, in the Hotel Savoy and outside it, are as distant and unapproachable as they are in their own country, but the Germans get a sense of protection from their correctness and perhaps even more from the anti-Russian attitude they attribute to the British. Germans respond to this gentlemanly behavior with unpleasant servility. In the other zones business is transacted curtly in German. When I went into a bookstore in the British zone, however, the proprietor greeted me most obsequiously in English; I answered him in German. And I paid for my purchase with marks instead of cigarettes which are the preferred medium of exchange. According to my calculations, with five cartons of cigarettes one can live for a month at the Hotel Savoy, drink the best Rhine and imported French wines, go to the theater and night clubs every evening with one of the hundreds of girls who can be seen strolling before the mutilated walls of what used to be the Gedächtniskirche—the church of rich marriages—as far as Fassanenstrasse. The temptation to soldiers of the occupation armies to save their pay and live on sales of cigarettes and chocolates is a story that has been told many times. Just a month ago a journalist and former British officer named Blore wrote a sensational report for the London Daily Mirror exposing the high living and consequent demoralization in the British zone.

Naturally I was much more interested in the political story and was fortunate enough to meet three men, two of them Germans, the other a foreign official, who were able to give me detailed information, not only about the capital, but about the four occupational sectors. None of them could be classified as pro-Russian or anti-American or anti-British. They confirmed my own impression that lack of agreement among the occupying powers has made Germany the most critical and complicated problem of all Europe. Whether on the agenda or not, it casts its shadow over every international meeting. There is now a strong move on foot here in Paris, backed not only by the French, to have the Big Four discuss the German issue simultaneously with the peace treaties.

Except in the Russian zone, the German people are obsessed by a single idea—"to wait for the break." They work only the necessary minimum to deceive the occupation officials or get their daily rations. The one topic of political discussion among the population of the American and British zones is when the break between the Russians and the Anglo-Saxons will occur. Phrases like "They [the Anglo-Saxons, of course] will surely ask us to join them" or "We shall have planes again" are heard in all their conversations. And this grim hope is shared by fanatic nationalists and "reasonable" people alike. Some believe that the break may come before the end of this year; others think that it will not happen for another year or two. But all are hoping. An old German acquaintance of mine, who is reorganizing the Socialist Party in the British sector, happened to be in Berlin when I arrived; he said to me, "Mein lieber Vayo, erinneren Sie sich das Kapp Putsch? Es ist daselbe jetzt; wir sind wie am Vorabend des Kapp Putsches." ("My dear Vayo, do you remember the Kapp Putsch? Well, it's just like that now; it's as if we were on the eve of another Kapp Putsch.")

The split in the victorious coalition just a year after the end of the war is especially regrettable in so far as Germany is concerned. For a hundred reasons it should never have been allowed to develop in this country where still-powerful Nazi forces have only one chance for revival: the absence of a coordinated occupation program. But even the policy of checking Russia in Germany is filled with contradictions, and its promoters can expect no success if they continue along the path they have followed until now. In order to stop the Russians, the Americans and British must, first of all, strengthen democracy in their respective zones. And for that they would have to support the Socialists and help them get organized.

The Western occupation authorities have done just the opposite. Schumacher, the Socialist leader who six months ago seemed to be in high favor with the Anglo-American officials, has now been practically dropped and is in despair. The few Labor army officers sent in by the Attlee government have little or nothing to say about administration. Colonel Blimp commands here—I saw dozens of him in the Hotel Savoy. And to a Colonel Blimp the Schumachers are not "good Germans." Recently anti-fascist circles in Berlin were stunned by news that the British had authorized a new party, the "Conservative Movement," in their zone. The names of its leaders are enough to raise the hair of anyone who knows Germany: Hugenberg, Wulle, and Count Westarp. Hugenberg, president of the Krupp cartel until 1918, was the real force behind the notorious "Stalhelm," the paramilitary anti-labor organization which was incorporated into the S. S. in 1934. It would be unfair and false to pretend that what is happening in the British zone pleases the Labor Government. I have seen confidential notes from London asking the occupation authorities to act in a different way toward the Socialists and other democratic forces there. But Colonel Blimp, while giving lip service to democracy, allies himself with Hugenber, demonstrating again the error in allowing the army to control occupation policy.

It is all very well—indeed, an easy trick—to impress world democratic opinion with figures on denazification. Taken as a whole, by people who know very little about Nazi methods of organization, they sound terribly convincing. "Denazification by hundreds of thousands"—what an encouraging headline! But the purge has affected only the small fry and a few top Nazi officials without touching most of the important and potentially dangerous leaders. A typical example of this is to be found in the city of K. Its administrative apparatus consisted of some 200 functionaries; 150 of them have been fired. What more could one ask? But among the 50 who remain are the city's 20 ranking Nazis. As a result, there has been no real change in the administration. The English authorities have forbidden the functionaries, among whom are many Socialists, to organize a union there. An anti-labor law which the Conservatives adopted in Britain after the general strike of 1927 was invoked by the local Colonel Blimp to prevent the reconstitution of a union that might have exercised effective control over Nazis still holding government posts.

In the Russian zone denazification proceeds quite differently. Taking a similar group of 200 Nazis, the Soviet authorities will spare the 150 small fry and root out the leaders. Indeed, the Russians have begun to "rehabilitate" some of the small fry. In the Sachsischen Zeitung, published in their zone, I saw a picture of a former Nazi who had "rehabilitated" himself by putting in twenty Sundays of overtime on the reconstruction of a bridge.

Generally speaking, in order to win the favor of the American and British authorities, a German must be in good standing with the church. Politically, the party in ascendancy today is the C. D. U. (Christliche Demokratische Union), the counterpart of the French M. R. P. German anti-fascists have humorously dubbed it the "Club der Untergeschlupften"—the club of chicks nestling under the wing of the mother church. The Germans must support this party if they want to eat, for the hierachy controls in large measure the distribution of food packages from abroad. During the months of May and June, Socialists living in areas where they comprise 80 per cent of the population received only 20 percent of the food packages; the remainder were distributed among the 20 per cent who belong to the Catholic party. That is why German anti-fascists have a saying to the effect that "Catholic food packages from the U. S. A. and Protestant herring from Sweden determine German politics." It is easy to imagine the political effect on the workers and still easier to understand why the Catholic party is growing rapidly.

I am not suggesting that everything is perfect in the Russian zone. Certainly there are many things that can be criticized. For instance, army excesses in the first days of the occupation started a wholesale exodus of Germans into the other sectors; I am told, however, that the soldiers have been ruthlessly disciplined and the situation has improved considerably since the first of the year. What can be said without hesitation is that in the Russion zone one does not find the constant contradictions between theory and practice, between what was promised and what is being accomplished, that characterize the American and British administrations. The foreign expert with whom I talked described the contrast in these words: "In the Russian sector, the Germans say, 'The Russians are not as bad as we thought they would be'; in the Western sectors, they say 'The English and Americans are worse than we expected.' " Recently the Western occupation authorities have begun to complain that large quantities of propaganda literature and newsprint for papers are being smuggled into the other zones by the Russians. They would not need to fear this propaganda if the situation in their zones did not create an audience ready to absorb it. If the big powers fail to achieve a coordinated policy in Germany within the next year or two, nothing can prevent the Russian zone, planned along socialist lines, with its German population working hard yet feeling compensated politically and socially, from extending its attraction and influence to zones dominated by cartels and reaction.

But there is a broader danger that threatens the entire world—that out of this disunity and continuing inter-allied war on German soil, a new, aggressive Germany may emerge. The mistake so frequently made in discussions of a possible Nazi revival is the notion that this depends upon the complete revival of Germany as a nation. The foreigner who sees Berlin in ruins and the rest of the country devastated and largely idle is apt to say, "All this talk of a German come-back is poppycock. Why, it would take twenty years to rebuild Berlin alone." But a Nazi revival does not call for Reichskanzlei and a headquarters in Nürnberg restored to the splendor of Hitler's time. It requires only that the Nazi part of Germany become the potential ally of a Western bloc in a general drive to stop the Russians; at that moment the fascist movement will rise again with renewed force, just as Hitler predicted in intimate farewell talks with close followers during the last days of the Battle of Berlin.

I am convinced that agreement on German policy between Russia, Great Britain, the United States, and France is still possible within the framework of a broad agreement on foreign policy. But such an accord depends not only on the Russians; the Anglo-Saxons will have to make a greater effort than their Eastern ally. I cannot imagine the Russians accepting for all Germany the policy now prevailing in the American and British zones, a policy which is moving not in a socialist direction but toward the reestablishment of the cartels, the power of the Catholic church, and Nazi-reactionary control of industry and government. Under such conditions, no agreement can be expected.

Four-Part Dissonance in Paris

BY AYLMER VALLANCE

London, August 23

THE Paris Congress doesn't dance. It listens—an uneasily-seated audience—to inharmonious symphonic variations on a single theme: big-power mutual apprehensions. Impregnating the whole protracted procedural debate, wherein the Russians, rightly or wrongly, sensed an Anglo-American plot to utilize the simple majority recommendations as an excuse for repudiating all the points favorable to the Soviet Union agreed on by the four Foreign Ministers, this atmosphere is now poisoning the initial discussions on questions of substance. Observers seriously question the probability of success for the conference whose work (supposedly peace-making) is distorted by considerations relevant only to a third world war.

The conference's psychological divorce from principles of political justice, economic common sense, and human welfare, is strikingly illustrated in the Italy and Trieste issues. Irrespective of the debatable merits of the case eloquently argued by de Gasperi, that treaty imposes harsh burdens on the Italian people. Notwithstanding the worthwhile contribution to the victory of the anti-fascist partisans, Kardelj and Molotov replied antagonistically because it is no secret that Byrnes, who warmly shook hands with de Gasperi when he resumed his seat, is working jointly with Bevin to create an anti-Slav Catholic bloc embracing Italy, West Austria, and Bavaria. In this connection, the arrival in Paris last week of Myron Taylor is regarded as a significant move directed toward securing French Catholic support for this long-planned Foreign Office scheme. Molotov's denunciation of "the economic enslavement of Italy by the Western powers who claim a Mediterranean monopoly" was a logical counter-move aimed at rallying the opposition of working-class anti-clerical Italians against an Anglo-American cordon sanitaire blessed by the Vatican and based on a satellite Rome-Vienna-Munich axis. The effect on the common people of Italy and Austria and Germany was totally overlooked in this maneuvering.

Similarly, the deep disagreements in the Trieste commission reflect no genuine Anglo-American concern for the ethnic rights of Istria or the welfare of Trieste workers but simply fear that the Slav bloc intends to absorb Trieste and dominate the Adriatic by circumventing the Foreign Ministers' decision that the free territory of Trieste should have a democratic constitution under a governor answerable to the Security Council. The Russian draft of the Trieste statute proposes a legislative assembly elected by universal suffrage of all present and future citizens, including Yugoslav immigrants whose entry would be unrestricted. The governor would have limited powers enabling him to delay and, in the last resort, refer to the Security Council legislation of which he disapproved; but he could only veto absolutely acts of the assembly "in violation of the statute." A customs union with Yugoslavia is also proposed.

This interpretation of the principles of a democratic constitution is highly distasteful to the British, who foresee a governor impotent to overrule a Trieste legislature swamped by a Yugoslav majority. Hence the British draft gives the governor the absolute right to veto all legislation and invests him with overriding "emergency reserve powers." In the British view a customs union is also inadvisable, and only citizens now residents of Trieste should be eligible to vote. The American standpoint is similar to the British, the chief modification being that the American draft empowers the governor to overrule all laws involving the risk of a breach of good order, which in effect means a blanket veto.

It is difficult to see how the conference, in its present ganging-up mood, will bridge these differences. Molotov will criticize the Anglo-American conception of Trieste's independence as an attempt to establish an undemocratic dictatorship denying the Triestines even access to free trade with the neighboring hinterland. This will doubtless be the prelude to an acrimonious debate over what constitutes democracy. The real merits of the issue are likely to be wholly obscured.

AYLMER VALLANCE is a staff contributor and regular London correspondent for The Nation.

Ernest Bevin's arrival in Paris has not improved matters. The harshly worded British reply to Yugoslav complaints about the treatment of Slovene nationals, followed by the American "ultimatum" on the subject of the forced-down airplanes, has created an atmosphere of heightened tension in Paris. The crisis is not regarded in London with exaggerated alarm. It is believed here that the Yugoslavs will release the airmen with assurances that there will be no repetition of these high-handed tactics of the Yugoslav airforce. It is not believed that the American chiefs of staff would select the European theater for a military clash ultimately involving Russia. Paris opinion, however, which is endorsed here, assumes that the latest exchanges of diplomatic incivilities have rendered the chances for a settlement of the Trieste question increasingly remote. Slav suspicion of Anglo-American intentions are bound to be increased by Evatt's proposal that the free territory be subordinate not to the Security Council (on which the Russian veto could operate) but to a committee which a simple majority, obtainable by the Anglo-American bloc, would control.

Altogether, the conference, as seen from here, is deadlocked before the practical discussions of issues of substance have even begun.

We're Building a Fascist China

BY AGNES SMEDLEY

SHORTLY after General George Marshall left for China last year, an American army officer of long experience in that country, said to me: "Marshall can do nothing so long as Chiang Kai-shek is in power. Chiang is the fountain-head of all reaction in China, and so long as he remains in power there will be no peace and no democracy." Again after January 10, when different Chinese political parties signed their agreement to establish a coalition democratic government under which both Kuomintang and Communist Party armies were to be amalgamated into a Chinese National Army, that same army officer remarked: "Now look out for skulduggery!"

The skulduggery began before the ink on the January agreement, which was anathema to the Kuomintang right-wing, was dry. Headed by the Generalissimo, Kuomintang reactionaries set in motion a long chain of events which wrecked it by March. According to American authorities returned from China, these reactionaries operated according to a strategic plan in three stages. In the first, or preparatory stage, the democratic movement was to be wiped out—bribed into betrayal, terrorized into silence, or branded as "Communist"—so that the China problem might be sold to America as an outright Kuomintang-Communist conflict for power.

During stage two, Kuomintang armies—by then equipped with American lend-lease and financed by American loans—were to launch a war of extermination against the Communist armies. America was to be drawn into this war in support of the Kuomintang, while Soviet Russia was expected to intervene in support of the Communists. This situation was expected to lead into stage three—war between Russia and the United States, with all China as a battlefield.

During the May conference of the Kuomintang in Nanking, reliable reports quoted Chiang Kai-shek as stating that "we have three more months to prepare, and three months thereafter to finish the Communists."

This strategic plan was first whispered about, then dinned into the all too willing ears of high American officers and American monopolists, until today reactionaries of America and China speak of the "inevitability" of a Russian-American war. Neither Fate nor God is responsible for this plot. It is man-made.

In late July, at the end of his three "preparatory months," the Generalissimo issued final orders for civil war. A copy fell into Communist hands and was delivered to General Marshall who, with our new Ambassador, flew with it to Kuling, to which mountain resort Chiang had gone to give the impression that his subordinates, not he himself, were responsible for what was to come. But civil war began as scheduled.

On August 14, Chiang issued his VJ-Day declaration from Kuling in which he tried to absolve himself and his party from all responsibility for civil war, placing the blame on the Communists. Formally addressed to the Chinese people, that declaration was in reality propaganda directed at America whose guns, money, and recognition are the sole support of his regime.

Consider the following lines in that declaration:

> "War-time legislation restricting civil liberties has been removed and amended. . . . Relief is being given to the famine area. . . . The taxation system has been improved."

On August 13, one day before Chiang's declaration, Mr. Chu Hsueh-fan, one-time ardent Kuomintang member, now president of the Chinese Association of Labor

AGNES SMEDLEY was active in Chinese politics for ten years and was co-founder with Mme Sun Yat-sen of the Chinese League for Civil Rights. She has written several books on China.

(C. A. L.), appealed to world labor for help against government attacks on the labor and democratic movements. Government officials and police, he wired, had just seized C. A. L. offices in many provinces, arrested twenty members, and seized the Workers' Hospital and two welfare centers established in Chungking with A. F. of L. and C. I. O. contributions.

In May the Chinese secret police demolished the newspaper plant of the Chinfeng Jih Pao, organ of the Democratic League in Sian, beat up its staff, and shot and left its editor for dead. Mr. Wang Jen, a lawyer who dared take the case to court, was arrested and executed, and a cynical notice published that he had been executed as an opium addict!

What happens to the many democrats who have been kidnaped or who have "disappeared" in the past year?

In May twenty-six professional men in Nantung, a city north of Shanghai, disappeared after disobeying police orders not to testify before the visiting American-Chinese Truce Team. A few days later the corpses of four of the men were dragged from the nearby river. They were trussed up with wire, their eyes had been gouged out, and their bodies had been mutilated. Their names: Sun Tien-ping, editor of the local Kuomintang daily; Ku Hsin-yi, member of the local art academy; Li Tien-tse, of the Chinese Writers Association; and Chien Su-fan, teacher in the Nantung Middle School.

Also in May the police closed down all bookstores and cultural organizations in Canton, while an organized mob demolished two liberal dailies which were branded as "Communist." The two papers had exposed government corruption in UNRRA supplies, tracing one big shipment of relief rice to the Fifty-fourth Kuomintang Army. Another shipment of relief flour arrived in Canton with three hundred bags missing and, when asked to explain, the relief official in charge replied: "A strong wind came up and blew them off the boat into the sea."

After the March plenary session of the Kuomintang had unilaterally altered the January agreement so that neither the Democratic League nor the Communists could accept its decisions, the Kuomintang tried to split the Democratic League by bribing its leaders. As the planned date for civil war drew near and these democrats still refused all bribes, the secret police in Kunming on July 11 assassinated Mr. Lee Kung-po (graduate of Reed College, Portland, Oregon), one of the League's chief leaders and editor of its weekly organ in Kunming. At Mr. Lee's funeral ceremony four days later, Professor Wen I-to, graduate of the University of Chicago and for ten years professor of literature in the American-supported Tsinghwa College, delivered a caustic and heroic speech against the secret police. A few hours later Professor Wen and his elder son were also assassinated. Eleven other Kunming professors, also marked for death, and their families then took refuge in the American Consulate in Kunming.

Following these outrages, thirteen outstanding Chinese professional leaders risked death by cabling the Human Rights Committee of the U. N. in New York, reminding it that the assassins had used American pistols with silencers and that only government secret police were armed with such weapons, given them by the United States Office of Strategic Services.

Generalissimo Chiang's remarks on "taxation improvement" must also be considered against a factual background. In May thousands of peasants in Chiang's home province of Chekiang marched to Hangchow and petitioned the government against three new rice taxes, one of them the government "Food Loan" by which peasants are stripped of grain to feed Kuomintang armies and finance local administrative bureaus.

When the Chekiang peasants, having received no relief, rioted, government troops suppressed the uprising, burned down homes, and executed 150 peasant leaders.

Americans blame such conditions on the Chinese government, but the Chinese people cannot forget that when the Japanese surrendered last year the Kuomintang dictatorship was so weak and so universally hated that it could have been replaced by a democratic government had not America propped it up with guns and money. During the war we armed twenty Kuomintang divisions and thousands of Chinese secret police. Within the past year, however, forty Kuomintang divisions have been equipped with our lend-lease. In addition hundreds of bombers and fighters, 231 warships, and open and secret loans said to total some four billion dollars, have been given Chiang's dictatorship. Our planes and ships transported Kuomintang armies to battle stations in the heart of Communist-held territory on the pretext of disarming Japanese. At the present moment six thousand Japanese troops in Shansi Province and thousands of Japanese espionage agents, some of them in Peking, still operate under the command of the Chinese government. On the pretext of keeping the railways open, American marines still occupy Chinese territory.

Reading reports of government gangsterism, assassinations, and corruption, Americans say our government has "blundered," or that General Marshall has been "outwitted." Better-informed people insist that in late 1944, when General Joseph Stilwell was recalled, certain elements in our government and certain financial interests decided to turn China into another Spain, and that General Hurley's resignation did not alter their plans.

We may think that our government has "blundered," but the Chinese people know to their cost that our "blundering" has all been in the direction of reaction. For months now a flood of protests and appeals from Chinese from every strata of society has been pouring into this country, demanding the withdrawal of American troops and military supplies from China and asking that no more aid be given until there is a coalition democratic government. The Chinese press in China did not dare publish even Madame Sun Yat-sen's statement.

The State Department has now announced that, despite all such appeals, American troops will not be withdrawn from China—a statement which will merely fan the flames of rising anti-American feeling in China. We Americans will be dangerously wrong if we believe Kuomintang propaganda that this rising anti-American feeling is "Communist-inspired." It is universal—and American actions, not Chinese Communists, are responsible for it. On June 26, John Roderick, A. P. correspondent, wrote from Peiping that "American prestige is careening downhill at a rate so precipitous that it will take most drastic action in Washington to curb it." Not only Communists and liberals, he wired, are anti-American, but "bankers and business men generally."

Late in June the noted Chinese military strategist and educator, General Yang Chieh, told a large audience of students and teachers in Kunming that "the new American imperialism" is "trying to put China in its pocket." The Chinese government, he warned, "is not an independent government," but "everything it does is under orders from America." Listing many events to prove his point, the General stated that the Chinese delegates to the U. N. in New York supported American policy toward Spain, though Franco's regime had been the first to recognize Japan's puppets in Manchuria and Nanking.

With our government sitting tight in its support of the most rotten and corrupt of Chinese elements, it is up to the American people to force action. We can put ourselves in the position of the Chinese people by imagining what we would do if foreign troops occupied American soil, and a foreign power, pretending friendship for us, armed and financed an American government of Rankins, Bilbos, Al Capones, and Ku Klux Klansmen. Our own fate is being fought out in China by the Chinese people. Every Chinese patriot, every Chinese democrat, who falls fighting Chinese fascism, weakens our own democratic forces here at home. If we want a reactionary Chinese quisling government, we can continue as we are today. If we want a peaceful and democratic China bound to us by ties of brotherhood and friendship, we can have it by forcing our own government to reverse its China policy, withdraw all its support for the present Kuomintang regime, and allow the Chinese people to deal with it in the same manner as we would deal with a similar outfit in the United States. For us to permit our government to continue its present policy is an infamous betrayal of the Chinese nation and people, and of the American nation and people.

Palestine: British-American Dilemma

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

London, August 19

A FEW weeks in Britain, involving endless discussions with British friends on the Palestine issue, make one despair of the possibility of finding adequate solutions for our world problems? One is bound to ask how we shall ever get along with Russia if two nations having as much in common as Britain and America can understand each other so little as they do on this issue.

The primary reaction of Britain to America's attitude on Palestine is one of impatience with what is regarded as our irresponsibility. It is felt that we are quick to give advice but slow to share responsibility. Thus when President Truman did not reject the recent partition scheme out of hand but made counter-proposals, one official said: "It is a relief to have any concrete proposal from America." One is reminded by British friends that the Palestine mandate was originally meant to be jointly held with us and that it was not Britain's fault that we refused. One is told that no American seems willing to consider the embarrassments which British policy faces in the Middle East, though the British are quite willing to admit that some of these embarrassments are caused by contradictory promises to Jews and Arabs. Everyone seems to take it for granted that the offer of joint responsibility has been periodically renewed and rejected. This can only be true if it was secretly done, as it well may have been. My suggestion that Britain was really of two minds on this subject and that in one of its minds it did not really desire joint responsibility was greatly resented, and on one occasion almost broke up a dinner party.

It is of course true that we have never made a public offer of joint responsibility. I have always thought, though my convictions are broadly Zionist, that both Jews and others in America have been mistaken in not insisting that the Palestinian issue be dealt with in terms of a very wide Mediterranean policy, involving economic aid to the Arab world and joint responsibility with Britain for both the economic and political implications of such a policy. We were now finally presented with the suggestion of such a policy, but it was associated with an adequate partition scheme. Counter-proposals may improve the scheme, but one has the uneasy feeling that neither this country nor Britain is ready for the kind of joint action which alone would provide both a solution of the Mediterranean problem and a healing of the breach between us.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, a staff contributor of The Nation, was a delegate to the Cambridge conference of the World Council of Churches.

The uncomfortable juxtaposition of the British loan and the Palestine issue in Congress some weeks ago was, incidentally, a perfect symbol of the real root of the difficulties between ourselves and Britain. For here one nation was asking economic help of the other, while the other was making political demands upon the first. The economically powerful nation feels politically frustrated, and the nation with world-wide political sovereignties which she is no longer able to sustain economically suffers from the frustration of economic weakness; and each is inclined to hold the other responsible for its ills and to resent the ungenerous character of the aid which each offers in answer to the other's demands.

Undoubtedly both nations share blame for not dealing with these issues, and other similar ones, more imaginatively; but on the whole our blame is certainly greater.

Whatever our sins of omission and commission, they cannot dissuade even a sympathetic observer of British political thought from the most critical reaction to the temper of Britain on Palestine. What I found chiefly offensive in that temper was its high moral tone which, it need hardly be added, is almost always a note of self-righteousness. Thus the King David Hotel bombing, terrible as it was, might well have been considered against the background of the tragic history of recent years with its millions of slaughtered Jews. Instead the only note was one of horror at the outrage. Ever increasing severity in the measures of suppression in Palestine are accompanied by pious lectures on the necessity of maintaining law and order. They reminded me of similar lectures by President Hoover, when he trained machine guns on demonstrating ex-servicemen whom the depression brought to penury. It is all very well to affirm that it is the business of a government to govern. But a democratic government might remember that widespread disaffection is not cured by the increase of force; and that the use of such a prescription leads down a very slippery slope.

I have found it equally disquieting that the strategic considerations involved in the Palestine issue are never mentioned, or hardly ever. Winston Churchill blurted them out in the House, when he declared that the government would not be so embarrassed about Palestine if it had not given up its bases in Egypt. R. H. S. Crossman dealt with these issues more responsibly from the Labor side. But the public discussion seldom takes them into account. Crossman, incidentally, a member of the Joint Commission on Palestine, has illumined the issues with great sincerity and wisdom. One is bound to report, however, that his was a very lone voice in the Parliamentary debates. While his position is supported in some Labor circles, it had the feeling that the support was not much larger in the nation than in Parliament.

It is of course no peculiarly British vice to cover political strategy with moral pretension. In so far as it is distinctive, the English-speaking peoples share it. The British left is, for instance, properly critical of the fact that progressive opinion in America does not challenge our moral pretensions in China more vigorously. There is full appreciation of the sincerity and the ability of General Marshall's policy. But the policy has failed and we seem embarked upon a course of giving increasingly dubious backing to an increasingly reactionary Chinese government—all in the name of saving China from civil war. If, say our British friends, the reactionary forces behind Chiang Kai-shek were not so sure of our support, would they dare to be so stubborn?

But we are, for the moment, dealing with Palestine and not China; and one further charge must be brought against British policy. The Labor government has recalled scarcely a single colonial official from the Middle East, and the alliance between British officialdom and Arab feudalism remains unbroken. There is little suggestion in public discussion of the rather sorry realities of the Arab world: the monopoly of "opinion" which is held in it by the overlords, the virtual absence of a middle class, and the miserable and abject poverty of the masses. It is not suggested that a Labor government could quickly change these realities; but it might at least have considered what kind of contribution a dynamic, technical, and democratic Jewish civilization, with solid ground to stand on, could make to the economic life of the Middle East. It might also have refrained from overrating the military potential of the Arab states, more particularly since British officers are in fairly intimate contact with the military strength of this world.

These lines are written before the character of President Truman's counter-proposals are known. There is, I think, a fairly general disposition to go pretty far in making American proposals; and the situation may not appear as hopeless a few weeks hence as it does at the present moment. But the chasm between ourselves and the British on this issue is positively frightening. It forces one to wonder how we can ever establish such organs of intercommunication between nations as would be commensurate with the organs of power which they wield and which make their relations to each other ever more intricate, and the consequent frictions ever more intolerable.

The Mystery of Big Jim

BY NEIL O. DAVIS

IN ONE sense, at least, Alabama next January will have the "biggest" governor in the union—oversized James E. "Big Jim" Folsom, six feet, eight inches of vote-getting young politician. But whether Folsom will be a big man in other respects remains to be seen.

One thing is certain: Big Jim believes he is just what the doctor ordered for Alabama. Without any show of conceit, he is quick to tell you that it will take him only the first year or two of his four-year administration to bring "peace, happiness, and prosperity" to every man, woman, and child in Alabama. This thirty-seven-year-old, Cullman insurance salesman is the most confident governor-elect modern Alabama has ever known. His friends tell him he will be called upon to grapple with mountain-size problems once he takes office, but their forebodings have not yet changed his infectious smile to a frown, nor stemmed that stream of small talk which so endeared him to Alabama's voters that they swept him into office with a whopping 60,000 majority.

Big Jim is a plugger. He is not easily discouraged.

He made his first bid for major political office in 1936 when, without success, he opposed the late Representative Henry B. Steagall for the Third Alabama District seat in Congress. He conducted a rather mild, back-slapping campaign. He made no claim to be the liberal candidate, and was soundly defeated. He tried again for Congress in 1938 and ran a poor third. Undaunted, he next sought the governorship and this time surprised everyone by coming in second in the race which saw the nomination of Governor Chauncey Sparks.

Shortly after that campaign he entered the army under the Volunteer Officer Candidate training program but was discharged in 1944 when his wife died following the birth of their second daughter. He made one Atlantic crossing as a member of the Merchant Marine and then came home to run for delegate-at-large to the 1944 Democratic National Convention. He captured one of the four places with ease on the promise that he would work for a fourth-term nomination for President Roosevelt. What he did not tell the voters was that he would also work for the renomination of Vice President Henry A. Wallace. Folsom was one of only two members of the twenty-two man Alabama delegation who voted for Wallace. The rest sought the nomination of the late Senator John H. Bankhead. During the recent gubernatorial campaign his opponents charged that this was a first bid for the C. I. O.-P. A. C. support which he received in the 1946 campaign.

This past spring and summer when Big Jim told his campaign audiences about the old fashioned way of cooking turnip greens and pot liquor, he knew what he was talking about. He was born on a small farm in South Alabama and spent much of his boyhood chopping cotton and shaking peanuts. He had an early introduction to politics, for his father served Coffee County, Alabama, as both tax collector and sheriff.

Jim finished high school and entered the State University in Tuscaloosa, but before his freshman year was over, his funds were gone and he had to drop out. A year later he spent two years at Howard College, a small Baptist school in Birmingham, but again his money ran out and again he was forced to quit school, this time for good. That was in 1931; for the next two years he went to sea as a merchant seaman.

In 1933 Big Jim returned to Alabama and found a county job with the Alabama Relief Administration. His supporters say it was in this work that he developed real traits of human sympathy and a social consciousness. He went to Washington in early 1936 and worked several months for WPA, but he resigned to come home and marry his childhood sweetheart and make his first unsuccessful race against Representative Steagall.

Following his two unsuccessful tries for Congress, Folsom moved to Cullman, in the northern part of the state, and began selling insurance for a small company that had been founded in his home county. He still operates an insurance agency in Cullman.

Folsom offered an entirely new campaign appeal when he took the stump early in the past spring. With the assistance of the "Strawberry Pickers"—a string band playing catchy hillbilly tunes, a sound truck, and a new line of homespun philosophy, Big Jim took to nearly every crossroads and hamlet in Alabama his promise of "a new day for the common man." In his 350 campaign speeches he promised to run the politicians out of the state capitol and turn the government back to the people. He promised $50-a-month old age pensions before 1951, the paving of every farm-to-market road in Alabama, an $1800 minimum salary for public school teachers, a new constitution to replace the state's present outworn one, poll tax repeal, reapportionment of representation in the legislature, and aid to farmers and small businessmen.

However, Jim Folsom never talked very much about his platform. As a matter of fact, he often said, "We really have no platform only a program for the people." Sometimes he seemed to say anything that popped into his mind, such as "We ought to get rid of this excess-profits tax." He generalized about the things he proposed to do, never said how he would do them. His pension plan alone, if Alabama had to bear the whole cost, would require three-fourths of the state's annual income. His farm-to-market road-paving program would require more than a billion dollars. He did not say where the money will come from to finance any of his proposals. On several occasions, though, he did suggest that if the British loan could be defeated, there would be enough money saved to pay the pensions and pave the roads. He never said which constitutional provisions he would throw into the discard, which he would rewrite, or whether there would be any specific new provisions.

NEIL O. DAVIS, a former Nieman fellow, is editor of the Lee County Bulletin, Auburn, Alabama.

Folsom did say he would ask for repeal of the poll tax. He did not, however, emphasize that point. In fact, many people who voted for him do not even now realize that he opposes the poll tax.

Meanwhile, Lieutenant Governor Handy Ellis, Folsom's run-off opponent, painstakingly outlined his platform from one end of the state to the other, and told how he planned to accomplish his program for "a greater Alabama."

How did Big Jim beat him? Everything about Folsom's campaign captured the fancy and the imagination of the people. He had no county campaign committees or county chairmen; as he told his audiences, his was a "people's campaign." Only once during the race did he have a local bigwig introduce him from the platform. He appeared to be lone-wolfing it. But as a result his four opponents paid him little attention in the first primary, while they slugged it out with each other for a second try in the run-off. The politicians had the race doped out to see Handy Ellis and State Agriculture Commissioner Joe Poole in the run-off. These two called one another every name in the book; they reserved none of the epithets for Folsom. The result was that they knocked each other out, and Big Jim coasted into first place by a neat plurality.

By this time the snowball was rolling. People sensed victory for the young man with the big feet, hearty laugh, and homey manner, and they began to climb on the bandwagon. The only question in the run-off was the size of the Folsom margin. It was more than 60,000 votes, the largest ever given a candidate in Alabama.

Jim is a fine-looking, black-thatched man who can talk two hours without once making the mistake of telling people what they don't want to hear. The voters were tired of war and post-war problems—so Jim told them about how he was their only friend in the race, and how he was going to fashion an era of real peace, happiness, and plenty for all. He said it was simple. All you had to do was clean out the old-line politicians and run the state government as a servant of the people. Then he would tell them, with demonstrations, how his poor old mother washed turnip greens. Next he would call on the "Strawberry Pickers" for a catchy tune. There would be some more talk about his desire to serve the common man. Then Jim would hold high his corn-shuck mop, which he promised to use in cleaning out the capitol, while the "suds bucket" was passed around for campaign funds to make this cleanup possible. Then the show was over except for a round of kissing all the girls in the audience amid laughing and thigh-slapping by the male members of the throngs which gathered wherever he spoke.

Big Jim Folsom

It is a mistake to say that the C. I. O.-P. A. C. put him over; P. A. C. had very little to do with it. The masses of Alabama voters are still anti-labor. Folsom ran strongest in the backwoods, rural, non-union counties where there has been no political education. In the first primary he failed to carry the big cities—Birmingham, Mobile, and Montgomery. Representative Luther Patrick, C. I. O.-P. A. C. endorsed, lost in Jefferson County, while Folsom won there in the second primary.

The liberal-progressives in Alabama did not nominate Folsom. They were split. A number of enlightened progressives supported Ellis because of the doubts and fears raised by the Folsom candidacy and because of Ellis's strong record in support of public education.

Included in the small circle which tried to help Folsom map campaign strategy (he master-minded his own campaign, in the main) were men of varying shades of political opinion and interests. At one extreme was Horace Wilkinson, race baiter, corporation lawyer, and brilliant political strategist of Birmingham, whose enemies claim that he is an old-time Ku Kluxer (though they have never proved the charge). Undoubtedly, he taught Big Jim plenty about the business of conducting a successful state-wide campaign. He is an old hand at gathering votes. At the other end were such intelligent, capable, earnest liberals as Gould Beech, young editor of The Southern Farmer. Beech traveled with Folsom during the run-off and wrote many of his speeches and statements to the press. But such supporters as Beech say: "Jim made his own decisions and ran his own campaign."

The big guy ran first because he is a genius at knowing the mind of the people, and because he diagnosed as none of the other candidates did the hopes and aspirations of the small farmer, the country storekeepers, the rural school teachers, the thousands of workers. He knew the people were tired, restive, and wanted a change. He knew that the people were sick and tired of domination by the old-line politicians. Folsom realized that plain homey talk about government "by all the people" instead of by a few political hacksters would ring the bell. His promise of a "break for the common man" had much the same tremendous pulling power as did Huey Long's "Every Man a King" slogan.

The liberals who supported Folsom believe he feels genuine concern for the little man. They think he believes he can make good on the majority of his ambitious promises and is, therefore, honest. Supporters like Wilkinson, on the other hand, evidently believe that Folsom made the promises he did and talked so much about the common man simply to get votes, and that he will be amenable to their suggestions once he sits in the governor's chair. There can be no doubt but that there will be a gigantic behind-the-scenes tug of war between these two sets of backers once he is in office.

Folsom is lacking in experience which would equip him to deal with the affairs of state government. He has a good heart, but his chances are questionable of succeeding in measuring up to the hopes and expectations of the people who drove out the old gang and turned to a man in whom they believe.

Folsom will need all the help he can get. Practically all the enlightened newspapers (as well as the unenlightened) supported Handy Ellis in the run-off. Whether Big Jim will seek their support and that of other right-minded groups who opposed him in trying to carry through a people's program remains to be seen. The legislature is already nominated and it is an Ellis legislature; there are signs that a "Stop Folsom" movement is already underway in its ranks. The vested political interests are already seeking a way to the governor, and if, when the legislature meets and the going gets rough, Big Jim turns to Horace Wilkinson and his cohorts, who admittedly are masters at dealing with legislators, everything that has been gained by the people's victory at the polls will be lost.

Much, practically everything, will depend upon who has Folsom's ear.

Thoughtful, progressive Alabamans are worried but hopeful. One factor in which they find considerable encouragement is the congenial working relationship Folsom will have with Senator Lister Hill and Senator-Designate John Sparkman. Forward-looking people will give Folsom all the effective support they can, and that will help. "He will have to proceed to be governor intuitively, by ear," they say. "That means he must have men about him who can tell him the best thing to do. No one knows who these men will be." They are not ready to make any forecast on what is in store with Jim in the driver's seat.

Small-Town America

BY ALDEN STEVENS

VI. Wharton, Texas

THE last hanging in the town square at Wharton, home of the White Man's Union, took place in 1904. The finest monument now in the square is a white limestone cenotaph honoring Sheriff Hamilton Dickson, shot by a cornered outlaw in 1894. Following the "zoot suit" riots in Los Angeles and elsewhere, men said to be deputies of Sheriff "Buckshot" Lane stood on Wharton street corners armed with knives and slashed yellow checks and green stripes from young Negroes as they passed. When, many years ago, a group of men opposed to the construction of a new courthouse rode off to get a federal injunction against it, a Whartonian politico who controlled a large group of Negroes blew his shrill, distinctive horn to assemble his gang and ordered them to move the county records and files into his back shed. Then, also under orders, they swarmed like locusts over the old courthouse and in one day left the town square level and neat as a pin. "They did everything but plant grass," says one who watched. When the opposition got back there was no doubt about it—Wharton needed a new courthouse.

These events are among the more interesting in Wharton's history. Immortalized by native son Horton Foote in a Broadway play that drew critical acclaim, it is exactly what Foote called his play—a "Texas Town." But it is an east Texas town, and that is very different from the cattle communities of west Texas populated with ten gallon hats and galloping cow ponies. East Texas has been touched by the roughness and decisiveness of the old west, but culturally it is an extension of the old South. The town's leading citizens live in white houses, drink mint juleps, play bridge, and support the White Man's Union. The Negroes live on the other side of the Texas and New Orleans tracks and are not part of Wharton.

The White Man's Union is generally regarded as Wharton County's greatest contribution to political science. Mr. J. C. Armstrong, a great, white-haired man who came to Wharton in 1882 told me about its formation.

"When I came here there were still Nigras in office from the Reconstruction period," he said. "One of 'em was county treasurer, and three out of four county commissioners were Nigras. Lots of 'em were justices of the peace. They had the same situation up in Big Bend County north of here. I forget if it was 1892 or 1894 when a bunch of men got together up in Richmond, Texas, and organized the White Man's Union Association.

"Only white residents of the county can belong. By gentleman's agreement, association candidates will not be opposed in the election. The White Man's Union votes downstairs in the courthouse and the regular state primary goes on upstairs."

In practice, only the White Man's Union primary is considered important, the other being pretty much a formality. The Negro office holders were ousted in the first election and have never come back. The union carries on, undaunted by the Supreme Court except that its activities have recently been restricted to county offices.

Mr. Armstrong says the White Man's Union is just as it was when it was organized, except that a few years ago a large sulphur company tried to win an election by running their large numbers of easily-intimidated Mexican workers through the voting chute. The union, a flexible organization designed to meet any emergency, was unruffled. It calmly changed its rules. Mexicans, starting forthwith, could not be members. Naturally, the sulphur company lost.

Wharton is a hot, flat town on the banks of Texas's Colorado River. It has a prosperous appearance except for the Mexican quarter and the Negro quarter across the tracks. It is square and neat and paved and has many churches. In Rugley's drug store well-dressed men and women sip cokes and make small talk. Into Al Foote's haberdashery come both whites and Negroes for a joke and a pair of socks or a hat. Al, keen and good-natured, always a leading citizen, won great favor with the town's Negroes when he cancelled unpaid bills for zoot suits destroyed by knives in the town square.

On hot Saturday nights the main business street leading into the town square is jammed with a mixed crowd. The Bohemian farmers, blond, industrious, and cheery, who are working themselves from tenancy to land ownership by main force, mix with Mexicans who work in sulphur or follow the crops, and with the town's many Negroes. Some think the town's record of good race relations (that is, no riots and few lynchings) can't last forever. The caste system here is too involved. Many whites consider Mexicans lower than Negroes. And some of the older Southern white families, whose men have never really worked and whose women have never lifted a hand to do anything more strenuous than eat, are aghast at the Bohemian women, who work long and hard beside their men in the fields without even the careful distinction between male and female duties which is adhered to by the Negroes. Bohemians, they say, are really the lowest of all.

It is a very Southern town. It is the sort of community where a large plantation owner cannot understand his eighteen-year-old son's desire to get married when "he can have any nigger on the place for two bits!" It's in a county where a grand old lady who has spent much time abroad avoids a nearby Negro settlement because so many of the children have features amazingly like her husband's. When war jobs and army allotments dried up the traditionally plentiful supply of household labor, and some Negro women took it easy at home and saw more of their children for the first time in their lives, it was suggested by some of Wharton's outraged and abandoned white ladies that Buckshot Lane ought to go out and bring them in to work. If they refused to come, it was agreed, then Buckshot ought to take and horsewhip them.

Whites say they accept full responsibility for Negroes who work for them. By this they mean that so long as their workers do as they're told and make no trouble, they can count on a bare living, a roof (it may leak), a minimum of medical care, and a small supply of old clothing. When, after the Beaumont race riots early in the war, Negroes in Wharton were dubious about going on with a planned celebration of Emancipation Day, Sheriff Lane adhered to this tradition of responsibility by telling them to go ahead with it, saying he would guarantee protection in case of trouble. They went ahead, and there was no trouble.

The Wharton Spectator carried not a single foreign item on the front page while we were there, and the Wharton Journal can't brag of its overseas coverage either. Most people in Wharton think little about what goes on abroad, are uninterested in the U. N., and don't believe in labor unions. Yet before the death of OPA many of the town's merchants telegraphed petitions signed by themselves and their customers, pleading for the preservation of OPA without change.

Wharton, generally speaking, is pleased with itself, with its clean, prosperous air and its white courthouse surrounded by green grass and shrubs. It is pleased with the sleek surrounding farmland and with the enormous stockpile of sulphur pumped from under the earth and standing there to be shown proudly to visitors. And, of course, there is always the White Man's Union.

BOOKS and the ARTS

A Historian's Politics

AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY IN THE MAKING, 1932-1940: A STUDY IN RESPONSIBILITIES. By Charles A. Beard. Yale University Press. $4.

THE title of Dr. Beard's new book is misleading if it makes anyone expect an account of the forces shaping United States foreign policy between 1932 and 1940. The preface tries to put it more precisely: "This volume deals with public statements of foreign policy (1932-1940), not with pronouncements on international morality, or with secret negotiations, offers, and promises in foreign affairs." But this is misleading, too. Broad sections of United States foreign policy, such as the Good Neighbor policy, are hardly mentioned.

The book really is an examination of "the thesis that locates in the United States the responsibility for the policy that eventuated in World War II"—a thesis whose sources are never very systematically investigated but which, Beard implies, was invented and disseminated by persons favoring an internationalist policy. The first two chapters, appraising this hypothesis with respect to the League of Nations, question whether either a small bloc of Senators or the American people as a whole brought about a second world war by refusing to follow through on Wilson's plan for world peace. Beard then sets out to "test the validity of the thesis of popular responsibility" as it has been applied to the period from 1933 to 1940.

The internationalist thesis, he writes, has created the picture of public opinion during the Roosevelt administration insisting on a policy of isolationism, of Roosevelt and Hull endeavoring to put over an internationalist policy, and of public opinion, misled by the isolationists, sabotaging that effort. The isolationists, according to the thesis, lulled the country into a false sense of security and so "must bear the responsibility for the progress of aggressors in Europe and Asia which finally and inevitably 'drew' the United States into the war in spite of President Roosevelt's warnings and his efforts to maintain peace."

This general problem is set forth in the third chapter, "Problems Posed by Charges of War Guilt," which is billed in the preface as describing the "nature and limitations of this work." The remaining seven chapters consist of a straightforward compilation of public statements by Roosevelt bearing upon the large general issues of internationalism and isolationism. The last chapter recites the peace promises made by Roosevelt and Willkie in the 1940 campaign and, without further philosophy or morals, the book comes to an abrupt end.

In terms of its ostensible historical purpose, the book is surely weak. What does Beard mean by foreign policy? He says in his most explicit statement, "Policy is a definite design which has meaning in the concrete terms of the actions necessarily signified and conveys to common understanding the practical purport of the language used in expressing it." If this means what, after due meditation, I think it means, Beard tends to regard foreign policy as essentially a matter of words and not of operations. Now any serious historian, or experienced politician, knows that public statements bear the same relation to foreign policy that the visible part of an iceberg bears to its concealed bulk. This is not the result of the special iniquity of the Roosevelt administration; it is true of all governments anywhere. The thing that matters in foreign relations is what governments do, not what they say. An examination of "foreign policy in the making" which confines itself to citations of public record is drastically inadequate. The thesis Beard sets up for attack simply cannot be tested by such a limited range of materials.

A second point—equally familiar to the serious historian and the experienced politician—is that foreign policy is not made in a vacuum, and that the policy maker in his public pronouncements does not have quite the same freedom as the scholar in the library. This condition also existed before Roosevelt became president or Willkie became candidate and, though disappointing to idealists, it can hardly be ascribed to any specific internationalist depravity.

These defects in method impair the value of Dr. Beard's book as historical inquiry. They are points, moreover, on which no one can presume the need of instructing Dr. Beard; and the question inevitably arises whether the book should be considered as historical inquiry. What, after all, is Beard arguing? That Roosevelt's foreign policy was often confused, impulsive, disingenuous? That official rhetoric in a democracy often turns out to be "campaign oratory"? What serious student would dispute these things?

Indeed, Beard is hardly arguing against serious students. Professor Bailey comes in for a few raps in the discussion of Versailles; but the main foes thereafter turn out to be Senator Pepper and the State Department. It would be naive to regard Pepper's speeches or the State Department's thoroughly tendentious "Peace and War" as serious historical accounts, and Beard is not that naive. They are political documents. After noting Beard's somewhat cavalier attitude toward historical method, one must conclude that for all its scholarly wrappings "American Foreign Policy in the Making" is a political document too.

Since no one in the trade has argued more eloquently than Dr. Beard that objective history is impossible, we may assume that the factual manner of this work is not to be taken too seriously. Indeed, Beard, the philosopher of history, would require us to search skeptically for the premises and conclusions of Beard, the historian. Occasionally in this book the deadpan slips, and we catch a glimpse of the author's own convictions, as when he points out that in 1934 "I came to the conclusion that the Roosevelt administration would eventually involve the United States in a war with Japan" (which is, I suppose, one way of describing Pearl Harbor). But throughout most of the book the air of objectivity is bravely sustained.

Fortunately it is not necessary to read between the lines, since Beard's position on these matters, like Roosevelt's, is largely a matter of record. "American Foreign Policy in the Making" points out that Roosevelt was inconsistent; it never says explicitly that he was mistaken. But is not error, rather than inconsistency, Beard's suppressed major premise? For Beard certainly thought Roosevelt was mistaken in 1939 when he wrote "Giddy Minds and Foreign Quarrels." He thought so in 1940 when he wrote "A Foreign Policy for America" in support of the policy of "continentalism" (which he now, more frankly, calls isolationism). He thought so when he assailed "Wilson's scheme for permanent and open participation in European and Asiatic affairs in the alleged interest of universal peace and general welfare," and called on Roosevelt "to abstain from denouncing and abusing foreign States." He thought so in 1941 when he went down to Washington to testify against the lend-lease bill.

Beard's subtitle for his new book is "A Study in Responsibilities." Among other responsibilities he might have considered are those about which he has written powerfully elsewhere—the responsibilities of the historian to acknowledge his basic presuppositions. (This is not to speak of the responsibility of a great and deservedly influential scholar to the many persons, particularly college students, who were affected by his pre-war isolationism.) Are we to infer from "American Foreign Policy in the Making" that Beard sticks by his isolationism? That he seriously believes in 1946 that the maintenance of strict neutrality in 1940 "would favor, not hinder, the coming of peace"? That he still regrets the passage of the lend-lease bill? On this type of question, which Beard has elsewhere taught us is the fundamental type of question to ask when reading historians, his new book is silent and evasive. An obligation attached to his isolationist activity in 1941, one would think, would be to cast the balance of the competing policies today, instead of writing a book which hides Beard the publicist's own beliefs and seeks instead to discredit his opponent by convicting him of sins which Beard the historian knows to be largely irrelevant. This is work for Flynn, O'Donnell, Chamberlain, not for Charles A. Beard. You can prove that any democratic leader was opportunistic. The significant thing is to prove that he was wrong.

Another responsibility which the Yale University Press might have spent five minutes considering is the problem of the title and the jacket. The title is manifestly deceptive. As for the jacket, it raises a number of fundamental questions about the bearing of official pronouncements on the actual conduct of foreign affairs and the feasibility of popular control over foreign policy. It even says, "Does membership in the United Nations Organization itself determine American foreign policy and render obsolete the historic relations of the United States to the other powers of the world?" These are doubtless fascinating questions, but the book does not happen to discuss them. The Yale Press's exercise in promotional sleight-of-hand is really more blatant than anything Beard can pin on Roosevelt or Willkie.

ARTHUR M. SCHLESINGER, JR.

An Academic Bohemia

THE LITTLE MAGAZINE: A HISTORY AND A BIBLIOGRAPHY. By Frederick J. Hoffman, Charles Allen, and Carolyn F. Ulrich. Princeton University Press. $3.75.

MR. HOFFMAN and Mr. Allen have taken a first-class subject and produced a result that may compassionately be termed third-rate. This study of the "little" magazines, the first full-length account to appear, should offer illumination of a sort to those who have never looked at, subscribed to, read, or written for them. Probably the chief distinction of the book, concerned as it is with the magazines that first expounded every advanced idea and technical innovation of the last thirty years, is that its authors should sound as though they had just returned, rather limply, from red-pencilling a C plus on a theme about freshman hazing. When they rally from this state, they approach their subject with all the undiscriminating enthusiasm of a phrenologist for cranial irregularities.

To put one's finger on the places Mr. Hoffman and Mr. Allen go wrong would entail a wearisome pointing at page after page. Without any general theories of culture, fresh or borrowed, to give meaning to their sequence of events, the careers of the magazines they chronicle with varying degrees of thoroughness but with a steady naiveté—Poetry, Blast, The Little Review, The Criterion, This Quarter, The Dial, Hound and Horn, Partisan Review, and all the others—are only interesting phenomena. A good many muffin-headed notions about avant-garde publications are weighed here and found decidedly worth keeping. The impulse behind the origins of the little magazine in English (the authors have patriotically restricted themselves to periodicals in this tongue) was one symptom of the cultural lag that slowed down the importation of "modern" nineteenth century attitudes, of which the most heroic exponents were Flaubert, Rimbaud, and Baudelaire. (Hoffman and Allen have a reference to Rimbaud—as a contributor to Mr. Laughlin's Poet of the Month series.) Other predecessors, here at home, were Henry James and Henry Adams, with their lips curled at the mention of local editorial opinion. But Hoffman and Allen give us, instead of roots and continuity, the familiar introductory story of Harriet Monroe, in 1912, brooding about Poetry in Chicago, an intent modernist Adam. They can later enlist their gifts as goggled tourists to string together the following set of words: "[Poetry] carries on today with the same high spirit and intelligence that has made its past record so brilliant."

The authors have gifts for relieving a reader's irritation with even finer comic touches. I would not willingly keep back these few examples, among their best:

> The poet's trumpeting for a political and military cause may very well improve the quality of radio and cinema fare.

> Indeed, there is much truth in Pearl Buck's observation that our literature has always been regional . . .

> The poetry of Herbert Read has always been a credit to left-wing literature.

If "The Little Magazine" were merely a foolish or accurately academic affair, it would be easy to be merely unkind. But Hoffman and Allen have not even exploited the meagre source material available. They have remained undefiled by the spirit of such lively personal accounts as those of Pound, Wyndham Lewis, McAlmon, Cowley, Margaret Anderson, and Ford Madox Ford. Some of these, along with pieces that are first-rate contributions, by Ford, Clement Greenberg, and Parker Tyler, are not even included in their list of sources. (Pound's article on the little magazine, in The English Journal, tells more in six pages than our present historians do in 230.) Their vigorously affirmative attitude toward errors has made possible, on page 208, the compilation of a charming little treasury. They deftly manage to misspell the name of Lincoln Kirstein's novel, remark that "The Hound and Horn did not discover any noteworthy writers," thus confidently settling the hash of James Agee, and refer to a mysterious Hound and Horn contributor named "Ellery Larsson." Going on the reasonably safe assumption that this is not Ellery Queen, I take it to be Raymond E. F. Larsson in one of his frequent appellative rearrangements; but with Hoffman and Allen one is never sure.

Their method of historical sequence, combined with a tasteless eclecticism—the editor of The Midland, John T. Frederick, gets more searching attention than T. S. Eliot, Wyndham Lewis, and F. M. Ford as editors, combined—can only result in disconnected accounts of "tendencies" and the destinies of individual magazines. The "changes" thus revealed are mere links in the "progress" of literature. This may enchant progress-enthusiasts, who are welcome to their enchantment. Unmentioned, and perhaps unmentionable, is the key issue of bohemianism, which provided the main scaffolding for the little magazine, and bohemianism's bizarre convolutions from a serious origin to its dead end today in professional bohemianism and the warmed-over "avant-garde" productions of—dare one invite the anger of PM?—Mr. Patchen. In the same way that a little magazine becomes dull without a program as well as taste and brains—most of those published today serve goulashes of "modernism" and the academic—so does a history of them.

Miss Ulrich is a reliable bibliographer and her section is valuable, reasonably complete, and mainly accurate; its usefulness would have been enhanced by a listing of the number of issues brought out by each magazine. The index, in keeping with the text, is poor. WELDON KEES

The Medea of the Rocks

MEDEA, FREELY ADAPTED FROM THE MEDEA OF EURIPIDES. By Robinson Jeffers. Random House. $2.50.

THIS is an interesting experiment with the "Medea" and a far more successful piece of drama than most versions of Greek plays. As its subtitle suggests, it makes little effort to retain either the dramatic technique, the background, or the tone of Euripides' play when there is any danger of confusing a modern audience or interfering with Jeffers' reading of Medea's situation.

The magnificent choruses of the original play are, for the most part, cut, as are the long, beautifully organized, and, in their own way, highly dramatic narrative speeches. Medea's dragon-drawn chariot is eliminated, and Jeffers' Medea does not, as does Euripides', reveal to the audience beforehand her plan for the murder of Kreon and his daughter. All these changes make the action more "realistic" and, certainly in the introduction of suspense, and perhaps in other respects, make it a cruder play. For the same practical reasons Jeffers has either cut, simplified, or explained the allusions of the play.

He has also made the language extremely colloquial. Some of this is quite successful in its naturalistic way. For instance, the opening lines of the play, in the Loeb Classics translation, read: "Would God that Argo's hull had never flown through those blue clashing rocks to Colchis-land." This is pretty bad, with its poetical "Would God" and "flown," its fumbling, with "Argo's hull," for an idiom which does not exist in English, its pedantic literal translation of "Symplegades," its musical-comedy "Colchis-land." In Warner's fine transliteration these lines read:

> How I wish the Argo never had reached the land
> Of Colchis, skimming through the blue Symplegades . . .

In Jeffers they come out:

> I wish the long ship Argo had never passed that perilous channel between the Symplegades . . .

Poetical effects are almost always added out of Jeffers' own romantic supply:

> I wish the pines that made her mast and her oars still waved in the wind on Mount Pelion, and the great fishhawk
> Still nested in them . . .

The pines and the oars are Euripides' but the waving in the wind and, of course, the fishhawk are Jeffers'.

Just as he has imported the fishhawk, and later on a mare which attacks a stallion, so Jeffers has invented a new meaning for the play. Jason is made into a sort of Rotarian, intent on being practical and crudely successful, and Medea—"She is Asiatic and laments loudly," as a stage direction says—into an exclusively passionate and proudly revengeful woman. Jeffers stresses the purely physical horror of her act, in a way Euripides never does, and stresses his sympathy with it. The result is to destroy what I suppose is the conflict of the play, the clash between the profound Greek respect for normality and Euripides' acute sense of the reality of deep, disturbing passion ("When love is in excess," as the chorus says, "It brings a man no honor"). Jeffers' play has no conflict; it is an exhibition in which Miss Judith Anderson may make the most of Jeffers' romantic nihilism. ARTHUR MIZENER

The Impressionists and Proust

PROUST AND PAINTING. By Maurice Chernowitz. International University Press. $3.75.

THE intimacy with which the arts in France intruded upon and cross-fertilized each other between 1848 and 1914 still appears remarkable. The confusion of the arts against which Lessing warned was here realized on a basis and with results that he could not, of course, have foreseen. For how could he have possibly anticipated that the arts, in their isolation from bourgeois public life, would be, "legitimately," driven in upon each other for sustenance?

The basis of this confusion, or fusion, was a community of production and consumption nowhere better exemplified than in the person and work of Marcel Proust. It was the obligation of the French artist of his period to be at home, at least as a consumer, in arts other than the one he himself practiced. Witness therefore, before him, Delacroix's sensitivity to music and literature, Gautier's and Baudelaire's to music and, particularly, to painting.

Proust's familiarity with music and the influence of Wagnerian form upon his great novel have already been dealt with in many an article. But now for what is, as far as I know, the first time, his relations with painting are examined in some detail by Maurice Chernowitz in "Proust and Painting," a conscientious and inevitably provocative, yet pedestrian and over-literal book that, while presenting the essential elements of the question, fails to sift and manipulate these with any real intellectual vigor.

On Mr. Chernowitz's deposition, painting, and especially Impressionism, played an even greater role than music in forming Proust's sensibility and style. If music governed the larger formal aspects of his work, painting seems to have controlled him even more pervasively in the smaller aspects. Proust took in more of the world through his eyes than through his nose, ears, or epidermis. (Compare him in this respect with Joyce, for instance, who seems to have been all ear.) And, as Mr. Chernowitz and others show, the Impressionist pictorial aesthetic influenced his content and such elements of his style as diction and syntax.

The question of syntax is particularly important, for it raises deeper issues. As much as he was influenced by Bergson's ideas, Proust appears to have found the diametrically opposed "metaphysic" of the Impressionist painters equally attractive. (And in so far as it is one of the functions of art to keep contradictions in suspension, unresolved, he was entitled to the inconsistency.) Bergson's "duration" may have justified Proust's notion of "permanent memory" and hence the way in which he fictionally organized the passage of time; yet the attempt, expressed in the delaying syntax of his long sentences, to immobilize and protract the instant by subdividing it infinitely, by spreading and, so to speak, spatializing it, bespeaks the mathematical, atomic, Eleatic materialism of the Impressionists, precisely that "mechanical" materialism against which Bergson argued.

It is in its attitude toward time that the Symbolist and Impressionist aesthetic of the nineteenth century differentiates itself most vividly from that of the Renaissance, Baroque, and Romantic past. Instead of shaping, organizing or elegiacally celebrating the flow of time, as previous art has done, it halts and fixes discrete moments; without faith in the future, without faith in the external reality of the past, it seeks to grasp the instant as if it were all—"Verweile doch, du bist so schön"—and treats the past as if it were a bundle of so many underived moments unified only by the identity of the subject who experienced them. In this desire to arrest time and movement in their flight, in his aversion to or incapacity for the dramatic, Proust, it seems to me, was most profoundly of all an Impressionist.

CLEMENT GREENBERG

The Limits of Refinement

LOCAL MEASURES. By Josephine Miles. Reynal and Hitchcock. $2.

MISS MILES'S talent is that of the virtuoso. Her way with words is brilliant: the control of rhythm, the arrangement of rime and assonance, the answering of stanza to stanza—everything is elaborately and even intensely worked out. And there are unquestionable triumphs: "Flag Level," "Funeral," perhaps "All Hallow," certainly "Denial," strike against the mind with the vigor of true poetry. Yet something is clearly wrong, for these successes are all too infrequent; and it is my impression that the fault lies mainly in the poet's extraordinary preoccupation with technic.

Miss Miles's themes are commonplace enough, but they are developed at a height so rarified that the reader—this reader, at any rate—is left fighting for breath. Nothing is more forbidding than the Perpetual Epigram, the wit that never relaxes. I am not concerned here with obscurity: no one could complain with worse grace that a lyric does not speak with the confiding flatness of Wordsworth's "We Are Seven." A poet has every right to be as enigmatic as he pleases; but his enigmas should attract, like Yeats's in his old age; they should be dynamized somehow—a life, a passion, a compassion—and so tease the reader into speculation and ultimately, one hopes, solution. But Miss Miles's too often repel investigation. We must not be ordinary, her verses seem to say, we must coruscate—even, perversely, where (as in "Loser," a particularly Eleusinian utterance) coruscation deliberately assumes the guise of Hodge-like awkwardness. It is as though she were perpetually on guard against being found out enjoying something as ignoble as a firmly shaped conviction. And it is, unhappily, possible to refine a poem to death: that is to say, beyond the point of credibility; and when this happens the audience, dazzled by the Czernyan arpeggii and the octave trills, but bored and baffled for all of that, is likely to fold its tents like the Arabs.

DUDLEY FITTS

Palestine in Crisis

By Freda Kirchwey

A 24-page booklet containing four first hand reports reprinted from recent issues of The Nation.

Prices:

Single Copy Price 10 Cents

Prices for bulk orders: 100 copies $9—500 copies $36—1,000 copies $54. Additional thousand $44.

Send your Orders to

THE Nation

TWENTY VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. at Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

CLAUDETTE COLBERT : JOHN WAYNE

In MERVYN LEROY'S Production of

'WITHOUT RESERVATIONS'

WITH DON DE FORE

From the Novel, "Thanks, God; I'll Take It From Here" By JANE ALLEN and MAE LIVINGSTON

—AND—

'THE SPIDER' Richard CONTE ■ Faye MARLOWE

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL B'way & 62 St.

"AN EXCITING STORY!" New York Sun.

BETTE DAVIS

GLENN FORD • DANE CLARK

'A STOLEN LIFE'

Adapted from Karel J. BENES Novel

—AND—

'SWING PARADE OF 1946'

GALE STORM • PHIL REGAN

BARBARA STANWYCK • VAN HEFLIN

LIZABETH SCOTT

—IN—

HAL WALLIS' Production

"THE STRANGE LOVE OF MARTHA IVERS"

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

—IN PERSON—

DICK STABILE AND HIS BAND

—Plus—

The Modernaires with PAULA KELLY

—Plus—

The Acromaniacs and as an extra added attraction

BUDDY LESTER

NOW PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

STAGE PLAYS

THEATRE GUILD'S PRODUCTIONS

THE MUSICAL HIT

CAROUSEL

Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille

with Harold Keel — Iva Withers

Jean Darling ■ Eric Mattison ■ Norma Howard ■ Jean Casto

AIR-COND. MAJESTIC Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway, Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT

OKLAHOMA!

Based on Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs"

Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille

Jack Kilty ■ David Burns ■ Betty Jane Watson ■ Ruth Weston

AIR-COND. ST. JAMES Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway, Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." — Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN

LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH. 4-4256

Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40. AIR-COND.

"A SURE-FIRE HIT."—Coleman, Mirror

RICHARD RODGERS and OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd Present

ETHEL MERMAN in

"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"

Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS

with RAY MIDDLETON

Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

IMPERIAL THEA., 45th St. W. of Bway. Mats. Wed. & Sat. Air-Cond.

The THEATRE GUILD presents

LAURENCE OLIVIER

in William Shakespeare's

"HENRY V"

IN TECHNICOLOR • Released Thru United Artists

PRICES: Evgs. (at 8:30) $2.40, $1.80 Mats. daily (at 2:30) $1.80, $1.20

ALL SEATS RESERVED

NOW! N. Y. CITY CENTER 131 West 55th St.

Moving to the GOLDEN THEATER September 3rd.

4 performances beginning September 3rd.

Checks should be made payable and sent to the GOLDEN THEATER, 252 West 45th Street

BUY YOUR BOOKS through

The NATION

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible.

Please address your orders to

THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION

The NATION

20 VESEY STREET NEW YORK 7, N. Y.

The

New Statesman and Nation

England's Leading Weekly Review

may now be obtained through

THE Nation

20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.

•

Yearly subscription $6.50 including postage

SPECIMEN copy on request

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

FOUR songs from Mahler's cycle "Lieder eines fahrenden Gesellen" are on Columbia's August list, sung by Carol Brice, contralto, with the Pittsburgh Symphony under Reiner (Set X-267; $2.85). They are early works, in which one hears the feeling and idiom that are developed and richly elaborated in the later ones; and those who have the taste for Mahler's music will find them lovely and moving. Miss Brice, when I first heard her at the Museum of Modern Art a few years ago, produced tones of incredible opulence throughout her range with complete ease; now the ease is gone, and with it much of the opulence. The low tones are still voluminous; the high ones are thin and shrill most of the time in the first three of the songs. But in the fourth, where she sings with more freedom and assurance, the low tones are richer, the high ones lovely; and they form phrases that carry more musical and emotional impact. Reiner's excellent orchestral contexts have a stylistic authority that is an additional pleasure in and for itself. The performances are well-reproduced; and both German texts and English translations are provided.

Prokofiev's Sonata Opus 94 for violin and piano, which Szigeti introduced to us a year or two ago, is still another of the works that sound to me as though Prokofiev had set his technical apparatus in motion while he read his mail, dictated to his secretary, took his dog for a run, read the newspapers, and at the end of a morning had a sonata movement to try on the piano. Szigeti has recorded his performance with Leonid Hambro (Set 620; $3.85); and the contrast between the vitality of his playing and the quiet smoothness of Hambro's is exaggerated by recording which makes his playing much louder than Hambro's, and which also makes the sound of his violin a little brash.

Stravinsky's Four Norwegian Moods are sour-sounding and rhythmically involved and pointless Stravinskyan manipulations of simple materials. They are well-performed by the New York Philharmonic under his direction, and the performances are well-reproduced (123-71-D; $1).

A number of opera arias are sung by Bidú Sayao, soprano, with the Metropolitan Opera Orchestra under Fausto Cleva (Set 612; $4.85). They comprise Non so piu cosa son and Voi che sapete from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro"; Ah! non credea mirarti from Bellini's "Sonnambula"; the Roi de Thule and Jewel Song from "Faust"; Manon's entrance aria and Adieu, notre petite table from Massenet's "Manon"; and Mimi's Farewell from Puccini's "La Bohême." Sayao's voice is lovely, and she sings most of the pieces very beautifully; but I find her delivery of the sustained phrases of the Bellini aria excessively mannered, and Cherubino's Non so piu is sung with the exaggerated pertness and coyness of Sayao's Susanna. Only brief English summaries are given instead of the texts.

Act I Scene 3 of Wagner's "Walküre" is sung by Helen Traubel and Emery Darcy with the New York Philharmonic under Rodzinski (Set 618; $3.85). Taubel's voice is thin, cold, and tremolo-ridden; and Darcy's is constricted; but the orchestral part is well-performed; and the sound of the orchestra on the records is not only good but properly balanced with the voices. Both German text and English translation are provided; and one can roll on one's tongue such delectable items of Wagnerian dramatic poetry as "Winterstürme wichen dem Wonnemond, in mildem Lichte leuchtet der Lenz; auf linden Lüften, leicht and lieblich, Wunder webend er sich wiegt"—almost, but not quite as good as "Schweigt eures Jammers jauchzendes Schwall" in "Die Götterdämmerung."

Now it is Columbia that issues still another recording of Brahms's First Symphony—this one made by Rodzinski with the New York Philharmonic (Set 621; $5.85). It is a fairly straightforward performance, which is well reproduced—though without what would make the tremolos of muted violins under the horn solo in the introduction of the fourth movement distinct.

The tricks that the Don Cossacks do under the direction of Serge Jaroff in the volume "Russian Fair" (Set 619; $4.85) I find it impossible to listen to.

Films

JAMES AGEE

"BRIEF ENCOUNTER," an expansion of a one-act play by Noel Coward, is a story about two decent middle-class people who fall in love outside their marriages and, beset by guilt and unable to stomach the enforced deceit and humiliation, give each other up. It is my impression that the same story, with fancy variations, is told once or twice in every issue of every magazine for housewives—often with a certain amount of sincerity, almost never with enough insight, detachment, style, or moral courage to make it better than wretched. Here, I must grant, there are several tricks of over-artifice and some of ham. But because in this case the story is written, filmed, and acted with a good deal of the positive qualities I mentioned, the picture is both a pleasure to watch as a well controlled piece of work, and deeply touching. Even an unforgivable formula such as the lover's Looking Like A Little Boy when the woman's attentiveness reawakens his idealism, becomes remarkably real when

THE MEANING OF EXISTENTIALISM

INTELLIGENT READERS everywhere are talking about Existentialism, the newest philosophy of life. In this 15,000-word book, Joseph McCabe explains what the philosophy means in terms that are clear to the Man in the Street. This new philosophy—Existentialism—was born in the most frivolous part of gay Paris, the Latin quarter, and the most enthusiastic devotees of it are the volatile young men of the district.

Existentialism is not expounded and discussed in musty class-rooms of gloomy universities but mostly in cafes and restaurants that resound with chatter and laughter and are black with the smoke of millions of cigarettes or blue with the echoes of naughty jokes and stories. But here our author, Joseph McCabe, warns us that the founder of Existentialism is a professor of philosophy who maintains that he offers the world at least the crown of 2,000 years of philosophical speculation, a creed of life that will supersede all other creeds and all religions. The founder of Existentialism is an Atheist and emphatically denies that there is any mysticism in his ideas. Existentialism is an Epicurean creed. Existentialism beats Hegel in the intricacy, if not nebulosity, of its patterns of words, and yet it fires the enthusiasm of the gayest crowd that ever followed a philosopher. This certainly adds to its piquancy.

McCabe's THE MEANING OF EXISTENTIALISM contains four chapters, as follows: 1. WHY PARIS BEGOT A NEW PHILOSOPHY. 2. THE ANCESTRY OF THE CREED OF EXISTENTIALISM. 3. THE THEORY OF PROFESSOR SARTRE, FOUNDER OF EXISTENTIALISM. 4. IS ANY PHILOSOPHY NECESSARY?

THE MEANING OF EXISTENTIALISM is 25¢ per copy, prepaid.

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS Box 2350 GIRARD, KANSAS

it is handled tenderly and cleanly. I particularly like the performances of Celia Johnson and Trevor Howard as the lovers, and the things that are done with their faces and with the various ways they walk, at various stages of the affair. If, in my opinion, the movie at its best suggests merely all that woman's-magazine fiction might be at its own best, that it is not intended as a back-handed compliment. For it seems to me that few writers of supposedly more serious talent even undertake themes as simple and important any more: so that, relatively dinky and sentimental as it is —a sort of vanity-sized "Anna Karenina"—"Brief Encounter" is to be thoroughly respected.

"The Big Sleep" is a violent, smoky cocktail shaken together from most of the printable misdemeanors and some that aren't—one of those Raymond Chandler Specials which puts you, along with the cast, into a state of semi-amnesia through which tough action and reaction drum with something of the nonsensical solace of hard rain on a tin roof. Humphrey Bogart and several proficient minor players keep anchoring it to some sufficient kind of reality. The picture is often brutal and sometimes sinister, and PM is probably correct in rating it as a new high in viciousness; but I can't bring myself to mind this sort of viciousness, far less to feel that it shouldn't be shown. I know it's a dream world, and doubtless it stimulates socially undesirable appetites in me and in others, but beside the really bottomless vileness of films like, for instance, "To Each His Own," which walk the streets unchallenged and never even pass a serious medical inspection, it seems to me about as toxic as a package of Tums.

"Two Years Before The Mast" would be fair enough as a piece of straight sea-melodrama. The performance of Howard da Silva as the Captain and the presentation of the claustrophobia that is developed aboard ship—made in wartime, entirely ashore, the film grants few relieving views even of a process wave—are better than fair. What I object to is Paramount's presenting this heavily hopped-up picture of what a merchant seaman was up against, a century ago, as if it were historical fact, vouched for in Richard Henry Dana's book. Dana, if they'd care to tell the truth about it, said that he would have hated to command a crew of that sort unless the law gave him flogging-rights.

"Monsieur Beaucaire" turns Booth Tarkington's story inside-out and dresses Bob Hope in it. Some of it seems to me such rock-bottom Hope formula that whether you yawn or rather wearily laugh depends chiefly on your chance state of mind. Bits of it, however—Hope's reception in the Spanish court, his minuet, and his duel with Joseph Schildkraut—seem funny enough to take anyone, regardless of state of mind. And for what the minor role is worth, Schildkraut understands how to make and control his points, in this sort of

(Continued on page 251)

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS

Hillman Memorial

Dear Sirs: The Pioneer Youth Campus again stepped into the forefront through the spontaneous efforts of its alert civic-minded campers who were quick to recognize the meaning of the loss of Sidney Hillman who died July 10. At a camp memorial meeting the next day the campers voted to put a memorial plaque on our bell tower. The dedication will be held August 28, to which Mrs. Eleanor Roosevelt, Dr. William Killpatrick, Dr. E. C. Lindeman, and Dr. John Dewey have been invited. While Mrs. Hillman is unable to attend, she has arranged for a representative to be present. This will be an occasion to re-emphasize the trade union background and philosophy of Pioneer Youth Camp.

AGNES MORGENTHAU NEWBORG

New York City, August 21

True Representation

Dear Sirs: On matters of racial prejudice the difference between a Southern congressman and a Northern one is that the former's wrong ideas on the Negro are so firm and deep that he cannot act against them, even though he nearly recognizes their absurdity, while the latter, though perhaps holding the wrong ideas almost against his reason, can act for the removal of intolerance through law. Thus, gradually, the evil is controverted and successive generations are corrected in their thinking and behavior. Bilbo is wrong when he obstructs this movement, but so are almost all Southern and many Northern legislators whether they speak their people's minds or not.

It is time to stop execrating Senator Bilbo and to get to work on the American people. Bilbo is probably a more faithful representative of the people than any other man in the Senate; he is a valid part of the conscience, not only of Mississippi, but the United States; he is the spokesman for the evil in us, and we would have a false and misleading legislature if one like him were not in it. How many in the North are without stain of racial prejudice? How many persons reading Bilbo's public addresses must admit that their views are almost identical? Perhaps Bilbo does good in expressing the bad thoughts that are entertained secretly by so many, for under reasonable examination they must disappear.

JOHN ILLO

Atlantic Highlands, N. J., August 7

Found: A Leader

Dear Sirs: I have just read David Lilienthal's profound and amazing Science and Man's Fate in the July 13 issue of The Nation. I have also read Samuel Grafton's syndicated column for July 16 in which the current "dark moment," when the "passion of the American people is dormant, waiting for the touch that will arouse it," is cited.

May I nominate Lilienthal as the man who is capable of giving to the now inert mass of liberal and independent voters of our country that "reaffirmation of world accord" of which Grafton speaks, and who is capable of eliciting the "similar reaffirmation" from the Russian people? Lilienthal is the man Grafton is looking for who could "blow the lid off the next elections," assuming that he could have an adequate vehicle of public relations and organization—the man who could express "the silent, aching hope for a future of more peace and dignity, at home and abroad, than now seems to lie ahead of us."

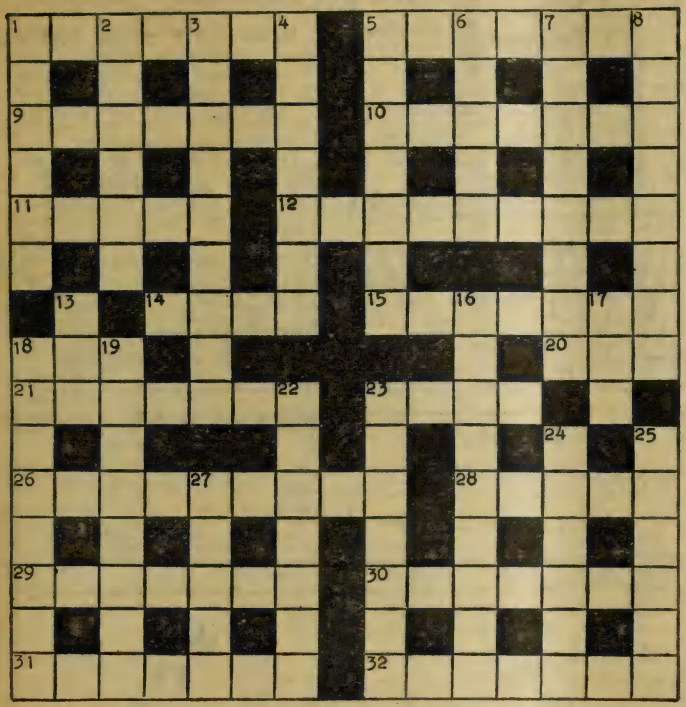
What is needed to set up such a tremendous chain-reaction in the world community at this juncture is for some liberal leader to pass the word quietly from one to another among the various liberal organizations, starting with The Nation Associates. The message of Lilienthal as printed in the current Nation, so arranged as to play up the high points of it, would be the truly effective document for the purpose. If a specific national policy is needed, I suggest the economic program presented by Irving Flamm, president of the Lawyers' Guild.

EDWIN S. POTTER

Arden, Del., July 16

Crossword Puzzle No. 176

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 What the Rising Sun may now be regarded as doing
5 Piece of furniture that is not what you'd think it was 9 We read of him in Genesis XVI, 12
10 Less plentiful
11 A pipe, not a knife
12 To hit back on a horse is of first importance
14 Go on a hunger strike
15 Mullion (anag.)
18 Diogenes went abroad in one
20 She has a sheepish look
21 Red ears gives you a clue to them
23 One Dumas
26 The scrubwoman has a front seat in this motor coach
28 There is a number here
29 Waiting for the word to sail (5 and 2)
30 Something to be imitated — or avoided
31 Ken's rat is strongest smelling
32 Rates on in the Upper House

DOWN

1 Pain that goes through you like a needle
2 Chief of Pacific Society group
3 No special container required (2, 3 and 4)
4 Got a lip (anag.)
5 Walter's a profligate
6 Not necessary perhaps on Wake Island
7 A musical evening should include this
8 Choke
13 Hugh sounds colorful
16 American author who might have signed his name: X X (4 and 5)
17 Possess, or confess
18 Flies for Free France
19 A vain Arab becomes a German national 22 Rio de Janeiro is the one with the finest harbor
23 Ship-shape parcels
24 A munition dump?
25 Superficial charm
27 Corner fish

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 175

ACROSS:—1 MISPLACE; 5 IMPEND; 10 DROOP; 11 REVOLVERS; 12 ASTRIDE; 13 DEMESNE; 14 ROUGHS; 15 SUNDAYS; 18 RINGLET; 21 EFFIGY; 24 VEHICLE; 26 GIRONDE; 27 STEERSMAN; 28 FLIES; 29 ERASER; 30 BABY FARM.

DOWN:—1 MY DEAR; 2 SHORTHORN; 3 LAPWING; 4 CAREENS; 6 MILKMAN; 7 EWERS; 8 DISPENSE; 9 EVADES; 16 ARGENTINA; 17 CREVASSE; 19 LUCERNE; 20 THERMS; 21 EUGENIA; 22 FIREFLY; 23 JETSAM; 25 HYENA.

(Continued from page 250)

show, much better than the star does.

In an elevator the other day—a hell of a place to bring such a thing up—an acquaintance rebuked me for liking "Caesar and Cleopatra." As it turned out, he simply doesn't like the play much, whereas I simply do; and he minded the gaudiness, whereas I still don't; but I found I was close to agreeing with him about Claude Rains. He flatly thought Rains was a ham. I think he is, but has a saving ironic understanding of his hamminess; I also think Shaw's Caesar is, among other things, a conscious ham. Watching Rains again as Caesar, I realize that he plays nearly everything much too broad, to be as right for the role as I had thought. I now think he was adequate, and skillful, and amusing, but in second gear.

I speak of this now partly out of my duty towards myself, my God, and my neighbor, chiefly because I was unable to do anything but mumble about it in the elevator. Ground floor.

THE AMERICAN FREEMAN

Monthly Magazine, edited by E. Haldeman-Julius. Each issue contains about 50,000 words. Contributors: Bertrand Russell, Joseph McCabe, Paul Eldridge, E. Haldeman-Julius, and others. Always on the side of libertarianism and freethought. $1 per year (Canada and other Foreign, $1.25). Sample copy 10c. The most outspoken publication in the U. S. It is a fearless and uncompromising truth-seeker. It pulls no punches. It hits hard. It is well-written and appeals to intelligent readers who aren't afraid of candor. Mail subscription to: The American Freeman, Box 4013, Girard, Kansas.

RAYMOND SWING, news analyst: "outstanding periodical which any citizen will find valuable."

Introductory Offer

SURVEY GRAPHIC, 112 E. 19 St., N. Y. 3, N. Y.
Send me 5 months of Survey Graphic for the dollar enclosed. (Regularly $3 a year)
Name_____
Address_____
NA

SCHOOLS

LAKEWOOD
MODERN SCHOOL
A residential school for boys and girls from 7 to 12 years of age. Small group. Personal supervision.
Write:
JAMES and NELLIE DICK
115 Carey Street • Lakewood, N. J.
Phone: Lakewood 6-1007

APARTMENT WANTED

CHARACTERS: 3 Antioch College women students, references. PLACE: 1, 2, 3 rooms, kitchen facilities. TIME: Immediate thru October. SETTING: Rent, share or sublet. Inquire Sacramento 2-8686 after 6:30 P. M.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

10 ROOM COLONIAL; excellent condition; heat; electric; bath; barns; small river; view; 96 acres; beautiful location. $9,000. Berkshire Farm Agency, Chatham, N. Y.

HELP WANTED

HOUSEKEEPER wanted by publisher, Bachelor, take full charge studio duplex apartment N. Y. C., antique furniture. Well trained dog. Sleep out, good wages. No cooking. Write Box 1640 c/o The Nation.

Yale professor and wife, country-dwellers, offer living to young artist or scholar who would help outdoors. Write Box 1641 c/o The Nation.

LANGUAGES

ALL LANGUAGES. Phonograph Courses. Linguaphone, other makes. Sold, bought, rented. A. Alin, 475 5th Avenue, New York 17. MU 3-1093.

PUBLICATIONS

Read Longinus on style but Savell's LOVE SONNETS for sensitiveness. Evocative of five beautiful women. Only $1.00. Grand Print Publishers, Box 543, Brookline Village, Mass.

CONTROVERSY Magazine publishes ALL articles and letters submitted. Write CONTROVERSY Magazine, 516 N. St. Clair St., Pittsburgh, Pa.

SITUATIONS WANTED

PH.D. Candidate
Columbia, Vet. seeks part-time position—editorial, research, etc. 3 years experience public relations, editing top social and commercial organizations, young, progressive.
Box 1643, The Nation

SOUTHERN COLORED DOMESTIC and hotel workers desire jobs. Write for list today (stamps). QUALITY EMPLOYMENT ASSN., 214 East Clay Street, Richmond 19, Va.

YOUNG WOMAN DESIRES POSITION TRAVELING as private secretary. College graduate specializing in commercial teaching and business administration with varied experience in social work, industrial and economic research. Box 1642, c/o The Nation.

TOBACCO

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.40 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order. Ace Mail Order Co., East Orange 1, N. J.

RESORTS

45 Miles from New York City
Zindorest Park
Monroe N. Y.
Telephone 4421
A Resort for Adults Only
Exclusive location, 150 acres of unusual beauty. All sports. Lake and Pool on premises. Delicious food, relaxing atmosphere, dancing, horseback riding on premises, modern accommodations.
Greyhound, Adirondack Trailway and Short Line Buses stop at our Entrance.

BREEZEMONT PARK
ARMONK N.Y.
35 MILES FROM NEW YORK CITY
"A Country Estate in the Scenic Hills of Westchester County"
The nearest of all nearby resorts. Exclusive location. Luxuriously furnished. Dignified. All sport activities. Excellent cuisine.
OPEN ALL YEAR — Phone Armonk Village

The Fieldstone
On Round Island Lake
A place of unexcelled beauty for rest and relaxation. One hour from New York.
ALL SPORTS — OPEN ALL YEAR
MONROE, N. Y. — Phone 7965

RESORTS

Return from a Vacation
Looking Fine — Feeling Fine
From
WESTERN VIEW FARM.
high in the Connecticut Hills, you can return tanned, glowing and invigorated, and with happy memories of the warm hospitality of an Inn which is in its Twenty-seventh season under the same ownership and management.
Rates per person, $12.00 a day, $70.00 a week
Week-ends, Friday evening to Sunday evening, $24.
TED OHMER
New Milford, Connecticut Tel.: New Milford 440

MAMANASCO Lake Lodge
Ridgefield, Conn. • Phone 820
A resort of distinction fashioned from a country estate. Water sports, hiking trails, tennis. Library, open fireplaces. Congenial atmosphere. Famous cuisine.

HATHAWAY LODGE
OPEN ALL YEAR
Formerly the palatial 592-acre Macy estate in the beautiful "Hills of the Sky." Large, luxurious rooms, many with open fireplaces and private porches. Winding Mountain Trails. Delicious food. Easy Transportation.
Attractive Rates • Make reservations now
For reservations or further information write or call
HATHAWAY LODGE, Haines Falls, N. Y.
Telephone: Tannersville 299

RESORTS SCHOOLS
HELP WANTED
SITUATION WANTED
MERCHANDISE FOR SALE
PUBLICATIONS

The Nation offers attractive rates for your classified advertising:

$6.16 per inch (display) (min. 1 inch)

.62 per line (6 words to the line) (min. 3 lines)

Discounts for multiple insertions

Write for our rate card and deadlines

Advertising Department

THE Nation

20 Vesey Street
New York City 7

Phone
BArclay 7-1066

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • SEPTEMBER 7, 1946 NUMBER 10

Atomic Alternatives

WITH every insult flung across the Paris peace-table, with every needless veto in the Security Council, every international "incident" and every diplomatic impasse, the unthinkable draws closer to the inevitable.

A year ago, with the world still awed by the vast horror that had fallen on Hiroshima, millions consoled themselves with the thought that the atomic bomb might mean the end of war—that naked fear would at last bring peace where individual intelligence, organized religion, and ages of bitter experience had failed. It is clear now that peace-by-fear is the least hopeful, the least tolerable, of any of those interludes by which men mark off their wars.

We know of no better gauge for measuring the distance we have slid down the slope to catastrophe since Hiroshima than the recent remarks of Dr. Harold C. Urey, a leading member of the Manhattan Project. Pleading for an effective international control of atomic energy, Dr. Urey does not confine himself to the usual warning that failure will inevitably lead to a "civilization-destroying war." He goes on, in the grimly practical fashion of scientists, to state the logical corollary: to head off such a war the United States might have to declare war itself, while the atomic bomb is exclusively ours, "with the frank purpose of conquering the world and ruling it as we desire, and preventing any other sovereign nation from developing mass weapons of war."

Dr. Urey is not a Russophobe, or a xenophobe; he is a man of peace and a democrat. The appalling alternative to international control which he suggests is one that he "cannot contemplate with any pleasure, but one which may be a strict necessity." The reasoning is clear: either international control or certain war; if war, then it is better, not merely for the United States but for the world, that the war be one-sided and short rather than evenly-matched, protracted, and resulting in mutual extermination.

Taken aback by the reaction to his views, Dr. Urey made it plain that his words were not intended as a threat, but rather as a warning. They are a warning to us as much as to the Soviet Union. For a preventive war would have devastating consequences to the United States. Morally it would lay upon the conscience of the country a strain that might well be insupportable. Politically it would change us overnight into a military dictatorship, permanently constituted to impose on a rebellious world a Pax Americana through force of arms.

No American—probably not even Colonel McCormick—can tolerate the thought of such a "solution." Yet the alternative, in the absence of international control, is still less tolerable. It has become so commonplace to speak of the "destruction of civilization" that the words already have a hollow sound. In a single year men have grown to live with the thought of doom, not by facing it but by letting words take the place of imagination. We speak of the atomic bomb now almost as we once spoke of poison gas or bombardment from the air—as horrors to be borne in wartime rather than the possible end of the human race. To freshen the perspective, to replace the dried-up phrases of the cliché-mongers with the searing picture of atomic war as it really is, we recommend to our readers the current issue of the New Yorker. The issue contains no cartoons, no stories, no bright and brittle comment on the minor foibles of men; its entire content is devoted to John Hersey's simple and magnificently detailed account of what happened to six citizens of Hiroshima who were lucky enough—if that is the word for it—to survive the tiny bomb that fell on their city on August 6, 1945.

We do not believe that the time has come to choose between Dr. Urey's preventive war and an ultimate clash of atom-armed powers, in which the Hiroshima bomb will have swelled to twenty times its potency and been duplicated by the thousand. The time for that decision may never come, but it is the blindest sentimentality to assume so. The Atomic Energy Committee of the United Nations, so far as the public knows, is still far from reconciling the differences between the American and Soviet approaches. The American representatives, in our opinion, have traveled much farther along the road to a sane solution than the Russians. Technically, the Baruch plan, as we have pointed out before, is vulnerable; but the Gromyko plan is impossible. In spirit both the Lilienthal and the Baruch reports are hopeful and intelligently resigned to an ultimate surrender of American

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

Atomic Alternatives 253
The Shape of Things 254
Pacific Coast Conference 256
Anderson Must Go 256
Week-End Notes by Freda Kirchwey 257

ARTICLES

So You Want a New Car by Tris Coffin 258
Can France's Empire Survive? by Andrew Roth 260
Russia's Next Five Years by J. Alvarez del Vayo 263
Paris Profiles by Oscar Berger 266
Democracy in Manhattan by Paul Klein 268
A Crisis at Fisk by W. E. Burghardt Du Bois 269
California's Central Valley Project by Carey McWilliams 270

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Barnyard History by Isaac Rosenfeld 273
The Play That Thought by Alan Downer 274
Nationalism by Rustem Vambery 275

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 278

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No 177 by Jack Barrett 279

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon — Washington Editor I. F. Stone — Literary Editor Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors
Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors
Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editor: Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx
Advertising Manager: William B. Brown
Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

sovereignty in the field of atomic controls. Gromyko, on the other hand, insists that "sovereignty is one of the cornerstones on which the United Nations structure is built" and objects to the American view that the whole question of atomic energy is of "international and not of national importance."

We understand that behind Gromyko's extreme remarks is the fear of a control body in which the Soviets might be outvoted. Similarly, behind Baruch's refusal to surrender the "know-how" and the stockpile until a control system is set up and in working order lie suspicion of the Soviets and the fear of political consequences at home. But in the light of the hideous alternatives, these considerations are not enough to justify the prolonged deadlock. The bargaining must go on.

Much as we have already yielded, we can and should make at least one more concession. We should stop making atomic bombs while the negotiations are in progress. Whatever our intentions might be, the continued manufacture of bombs can only look to the rest of the world like coercion, blatant enough to sow indignation and too ineffective to prevent even little Yugoslavia from shooting down our planes. As for the Russians, they have a wide gap to span between the archaic nationalism of Mr. Gromyko and an effective system of international control. It is inconceivable that they will make no effort to bridge that gap, but the choice is theirs—and they know by now what that choice really is. The time is running short, and as Mr. Baruch bluntly puts it, "The bomb does not wait upon debate. To delay may be to die."

The Shape of Things

A MORE SENSITIVE MONARCH THAN KING George II of Greece would long ago have concluded that he was unwanted by a people that had twice shed blood to get rid of him. He would also have had qualms about returning to a country on which he had saddled a dictatorship as brutal as any in pre-war Europe. But he is going back to Athens now, the beneficiary of a plebiscite dominated by terror from the right and fear of the left. Notwithstanding the two-to-one vote, nobody imagines that this mean and colorless failure, lacking even the traditional symbolism of British royalty, is what the Greek people need and want in a desperate moment of their history. They are a proud and politically sophisticated nation, and probably not even the violence of government-protected Royalist bands, the presence of two British divisions, and the subtle pressure of a "courtesy call" by units of the American fleet would have persuaded them to vote for George's recall if they were not ridden by even stronger fears. Assigned to the British sphere in secret talks between Stalin and Churchill, Greece has nevertheless become a key to the satisfaction of Soviet ambitions in Eastern Europe. Through application of what has come to be known as the "Azerbaijan formula," northern and eastern Greece could be neatly sliced off: an "independent" Macedonia closely allied to Yugoslavia, Eastern Thrace to Bulgaria, and Epirus to Albania. Turkey then would be effectively cut off from the west and Greece isolated, a harmless isle in a Soviet sea. Given the prevailing power politics of "the peace," British anxiety over the Eastern Mediterranean sector of the imperial lifeline is not hard to understand. What is incredible is the persistent and dangerous fallacy of British governments that Russian encroachments can be headed off only by blowing a semblance of life into decaying feudal remnants. Greece deserves something better than a choice between commissars and royal riff-raff.

*

THE IMPORTANCE OF THE SOCIALIST PARTY congress that ended last Sunday in Paris reaches beyond the area of internal party disputes into the entire domain of French politics. To begin with, the congress will have an immediate effect on the new Constitution which in its present form depended upon the combined support of Socialists and Mouvement Republicain Populaire (M. R. P.) to counterbalance the more and more belligerent opposition of the Communists in the Assembly. It will also destroy some of the hopes entertained in moderate circles that the next elections might bring about a government of Socialists and M. R. P. representatives with some additions from the Radical-Socialists and other minor groups, but leaving the Communists outside. If one thing has clearly emerged from the congress, in the midst of all kinds of reciprocal concessions to avoid a split in the party, it has been the uncompromising will of the majority to rule out any flirtation with the party of M. Bidault. The M. R. P. was the main target of the delegates from the provinces where the traditional anti-clericalism of the French masses had been aroused by the creation of a Cabinet under Catholic leadership. With his experience of so many years in the labor movement, Léon Jouhaux had already warned the Socialist leaders not to allow themselves to appear as "the allies of the priests." Since the elections this feeling, strongly expressed at the Montrouge meeting in May, has swept every regional and local pre-congress gathering. It is not any personal objection to Bidault, whom everybody likes; it is fear of the Vatican smuggling itself, against all logic, into the France of the Liberation. From the point of view of personalities, there is not one among the new members of the National Executive Committee who can compare with the defeated leaders. Neither the young though successful Minister of Agriculture, Pierre Tanguy-Prigent, nor Guy Mollet, in spite of his excellent record in the Resistance, has the authority of a Léon Blum or a Vincent Auriol, but they have become the voice of the Socialist youth and the Socialist workers who, while favoring collaboration with the Communists for limited ends, demand party independence and leadership—leadership in directing France toward socialism and checking the increasing aggression of the reactionary forces.

*

NEHRU'S ALL-INDIAN INTERIM GOVERNMENT has taken office despite the continuing threat of a Moslem revolt. Two and a half centuries of uninterrupted British rule is at an end. The new government has been drawn from all sectors of the Indian community, includes some Moslem representation, and appears to be about as strong as it can be without Jinnah's cooperation. While some reports indicate that the Calcutta massacres had weakened Jinnah's influence with the Indian public—including many members of the Moslem League—his utterances remain as bellicose as ever. Few expect him to reverse his stand and accept Viscount Wavell's invitation to name five members of his group to the provisional government as replacements for the present Moslem members. Moreover, the new disorders in Bombay arising from the Moslem protest of the government's inauguration presage trouble ahead for Nehru. But the Attlee government has wisely and courageously decided not to let Moslem intransigence upset its timetable for Indian independence.

*

IF YOU WEREN'T IN THE ARMY YOU CAN learn a lot about the army from the Lichfield trials. Colonel Kilian and his subordinates were responsible for the extraordinary brutality and inhumanity of Lichfield, that concentration camp where "Work him over—just don't break too many bones" was a customary order, and where a guard was promoted for shooting at a prisoner who looked out of the window. It is a common belief in the army that Lichfield was no different, essentially, from other army prison camps in France and Italy; one of the defense attorneys made this clear when he asked for a directed verdict of acquittal, on the ground that the trials are "really a war on the army and its methods." This attorney did not understand or did not dare admit that these trials are really a part, a very disgraceful part, of the army and its methods: the defendants have been tried, convicted—they have not been punished. The jail sentences handed out to the first two defendants were promptly suspended; the other defendants have been punished by small fines or reprimands—a guard, for beating a prisoner with a club, was fined fifty dollars. Colonel Kilian was responsible for this beating and for many others—because of him Lichfield convinced most of its prisoners that they could expect neither justice nor mercy from the army they fought in and the country they fought for. For these offenses Colonel Kilian has received a $500 fine and a reprimand. Two privates, because they struck Colonel Kilian, are serving prison terms of six and seven years. This is army justice—the same justice that, time and time again during the war, sentenced enlisted men to life imprisonment, and dismissed officers from the service, for the same crime: rape.

*

THE TRIAL OF GENERAL GREGORI SEMENOV and seven other White Russian counter-revolutionaries on charges of treason and espionage carries us back to the all-but-forgotten days of the early 1920's when unofficial wars were under way at various places around the periphery of Red Russia. Although we have become accustomed to view with suspicion the confessions in Russian state trials, there can be no doubt of the authenticity of Semenov's admissions. His exploits as a leader of one of the most notorious of the White Guard bands were documented by American as well as Soviet observers. General Graves, head of the American expeditionary force in Siberia in 1918-20, declares that "there was only one worse criminal than Semenov, that was Kalmikov" (another notorious White Guard leader). The followers of both of these men, according to General Graves, "were roaming the country like wild animals, killing and robbing the people." In view of his known record, it is not difficult to believe his further admission that he had plotted to kill Lenin, and had accepted Japanese aid in setting up schools to train spies and terrorists for counter-revolutionary work in the Soviet Union. The only suspicious element in his testimony concerned his alleged change of heart after his capture by Soviet forces in Manchuria.

Pacific Coast Conference

THE annual fall conference of The Nation Associates will be held this year on September 21 and 22 in Los Angeles. Planned and organized by members on the Coast, the two-day meeting will take up a wide range of topics grouped under a compendious title—"The Challenge of the Post-War World to the Liberal Movement." One session will be devoted to the election campaign, with special attention to issues and men of particular interest to the West; another to United States foreign policy, keyed to the problems directly menacing peace (the first subject discussed will be the dangerous two-world approach to security—America and Britain on one side, the Soviet Union on the other); a third, to economic security as an essential factor in the maintenance of peace; and a final session on the question of chief importance to our time and nation: Is liberalism capable of providing the dynamics necessary for the defense of democracy?

As is usual at conferences of The Nation Associates, the sessions will end with a dinner forum to be addressed by persons whose names stand for national leadership in progressive thinking and acting. Among them will be Thurman W. Arnold, former associate justice of the United States Court of Appeals; Bartley C. Crum, president of the National Lawyers Guild and, recently, member of the Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry on Palestine; Senator Wayne L. Morse of Oregon; Dore Schary, leading Hollywood producer; and the editor of The Nation. A full announcement appears on page 276 of this issue.

One of the features of the occasion will be a special Pacific Coast supplement to The Nation. It will be edited by our staff contributor, Carey McWilliams, published in Los Angeles, and circulated among members of the conference. A distinguished group of Western writers will contribute articles relating to the region and to the subjects under discussion. A limited number of copies may be available for members of The Nation Associates and Western subscribers.

We consider this conference one of the most important The Nation Associates has held and we urge all members and readers on the Coast who can possibly do so to attend and take an active part. The value of such a discussion depends quite as much upon the participation of an intelligent audience as upon the topics and speakers appearing in the program.

Anderson Must Go

SECRETARY ANDERSON'S action in setting beef and pork ceilings far above the June 30 levels was unexpected and disturbing. Its economic and political implications are obvious. Combined with the order of the Price Decontrol Board lifting ceilings on grains and dairy products, it threatens to dynamite the Administration's stabilization efforts. For it should be evident even to the most rock-ribbed member of the N. A. M. or the farm bloc that we cannot have a further sharp increase in the price of such vital products as meat, cereals, and dairy products without immediate demands for higher wages on the part of labor. Already there are intimations of a new wave of strikes that may prove even more crippling than those we have lately experienced.

The extent of the rise in living costs since June 30 shows that inflation is here, and in an extreme form. During the long Chinese inflation, in which prices have risen to 4,000 times their pre-war level, the average rate of increase has been approximately 10 per cent a month. In the two months since expiration of the OPA, food prices in this country have risen more than 30 per cent. The new meat ceilings will raise beef prices by approximately 10 per cent and pork prices more than 5 per cent. Cost-of-living figures do not yet reflect the price rises granted by the OPA in recent weeks on a multitude of manufactured goods, but when the figures are available, the advance in the cost of living is bound to be close to the 10 per cent rate.

In justification of his action Secretary Anderson declares that a substantial boost in meat prices is essential in order to assure adequate production. Referring to the recent heavy marketing of livestock, he declared that an increase in price is essential to bring cattle and hogs into the feeding lots. Without doubt there is truth in his contention. But it is based on a type of reasoning that views a temporary shortage of meat as a greater evil than the wrecking of the American economy through inflation. This was virtually admitted by an official spokesman of the Department of Agriculture in a revealing statement to a Washington newspaperman the day after Secretary Anderson issued his order. "Our interest," the spokesman declared, "is primarily in the American producer . . . the interest of the Department of Agriculture in the consumer is only academic."

When the department's objectives are stated in these terms it is easy to understand why Paul Porter was unable to persuade Mr. Anderson to restore the June 30 ceilings. But there remains the question of how it is possible in a supposedly national Administration for the interests of the majority of the population to be thus rudely overridden by the representative of a single sector of the population. Admittedly, Congress gave the Secretary of Agriculture power to fix meat ceilings. Voters will do well to recall this fact at the November elections. Nevertheless, the Administration is supposed to be a team responsible to the President and through him to the people as a whole. If there is conflict within the team, the President should step in and make the final decision. The Secretary of Agriculture has clearly violated the basic principles of the stabilization program as established by President Roosevelt and reaffirmed by President Truman. He should be asked to resign and the President should appoint a successor who is willing to carry out the Administration's policy.

Week-End Notes

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

HAVING no vote in the Security Council, I delayed making up a rather disheveled mind about the merits of the candidates for admission to the U. N. I tried to remember what sorts of qualities we insisted upon in my high-school fraternity. Members had to be congenial and nicely dressed, as I recall, and not too serious-minded. Our motto was, "As one lamp lights another nor grows less, so nobleness enkindleth nobleness," but you weren't expected to live up to that until you got in. And afterward—well then it was too late to do much about it.

But today, somehow, these excellent requirements seem hardly sufficient. There may even be too many well-dressed, unserious members of the U. N. already. As I looked the candidates over, I kept remembering something Cordell Hull said toward the end of the war. (Anti-fascism was still in style then.) Mr. Hull said, "There can be no compromise with fascism and Nazism." He said the Allies were agreed that "even after the defeat of the enemy there will be no security unless and until our victory is used to destroy these systems to their very foundations." Those words, I thought, could be made into a pretty good test of eligibility. I decided, too, that members of the U. N. fraternity ought to be more or less independent—at least not cut out of whole cloth by some other nation. By applying these rather unofficial criteria and taking a quick look at the Charter, I tentatively marked a ballot: Transjordan, no; Outer Mongolia, no; Portugal, no; Albania, yes; Eire, grudgingly, yes; and yes for the others. But then, nobody asked me and it didn't come out at all like that. . . . Never mind, America welcomes its new fellow members—Iceland, Sweden, and Afghanistan—and offers them its brotherly devotion and possibly a loan. As for the fraternity secrets, I'm afraid we cannot share those for a while. Initiation must wait until the atom commission has finished its work.

The Mufti is as fine a scoundrel as the Middle East has ever produced. He is unscrupulous, cruel, treacherous, crafty, able, and attractive. He has the magic of leadership and so the capacity to do harm on a big scale. If the British had allowed him to come to London with the Arab delegation to the Palestine conference, they would have been forced, in honor and consistency, to ask for the acquittal of all the war criminals in the dock at Nürnberg. (Of course, if they and the French had done their duty he would be there, too.) For the Mufti is not only an old hand at the sport of political assassination and plotting on his own grounds, but during the war he carried his activities first to Iraq, where he organized a pro-Nazi coup whose failure was not his fault, and finally to Germany itself. There he established offices, with branches and correspondents in Rome and Tokyo, and spent his time organizing Arab support for the Axis and having his picture taken with top-rank Nazi chieftains —even with Hitler himself. History may give the Mufti credit for the highest service to his master's cause. Documents unearthed in Germany indicate that Haj-Amin el Husseini may have actually invented the idea of the mass extermination of Jews. At least we know he advocated it in his regular broadcasts from Berlin.

In any case, whether for his crimes against humanity or for his operations against the Allies, the Mufti has been ruled out and the Arabs of Palestine, who acknowledge him as their spiritual as well as their political leader, have decided to boycott the London conference. The Arab states, however, have so far stood by their decision to send delegates and this suggests that the Mufti is less potent in areas where he has been unable to eliminate political opponents as thoroughly as he has done in Palestine. The Jews, too, are reconsidering their decision to stay away from London; and for the first time since the Anglo-American Committee made its report we have some excuse for optimism. The barring of the Mufti, the commutation of the death sentences against eighteen young Jewish terrorists, and above all Britain's apparent willingness to accept the Jewish Agency's proposals as a basis for discussion indicate a slow conversion in London toward the ideas British Labor has always professed. If the Jewish leaders are wise and firm they will take full advantage of this shift without abandoning the precautions every subject people must observe in dealing with their rulers. This is a moment when decency has a small chance to succeed. It had better not be lost.

So You Want a New Car

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, August 29

IN these dull summer days there is always one place restless with problems and bulging with news. It is the big converted warehouse in the sagging slum district where the OPA lives.

Working there in their shirt sleeves in the August heat, a group of men are trying to break a billion-dollar black-market racket whose chief victims are veterans. It is the black market in automobiles. One-fourth, perhaps more, of the cars sold since the OPA went back into business were sold at above-ceiling prices.

The bonuses paid for cars are fantastic—$500, $1,000, $2,500, a diamond ring, a city lot. Prodded into action by the outraged squawks of the veterans, the OPA is just beginning to swing into a highly organized enforcement and educational campaign designed to crack this spreading racket.

A specialized group of enforcement agents—men who smashed the big-time operations in counterfeit ration coupons—have been augmented by new agents from other government agencies. OPA top officials have given the go-ahead signal for the agents to concentrate on the automobile black market.

Last Monday a number of special agents moved into the sleepy Southern town of Leesville, South Carolina, a community of two thousand persons. To a stranger there was something very curious about this town. The shady streets and vacant lots were jammed with cars, hundreds of them. Leesville was the hub of what the OPA claims was a one-hundred-million-dollar ring operating in black-market cars. Its fingers allegedly spread all over the Southwest and up into the North.

On this day the OPA agents walked casually among the salesmen in a huge open-air sales lot a short distance from the town. They stopped to look at cars and haggle over prices. They noticed that one-fourth of the autos were new models. Other agents roamed the streets jotting down the license numbers of visitors. They would follow these leads later to surprised dealers who patronized the sales every Monday.

With the evidence all gathered, the agents struck. They arrested six alleged salesmen. Using marked money the OPA officers had bought five cars at over-ceiling prices, according to the allegations. Two of the cars were new and three were used. They paid approximately twice the ceiling price, it is claimed. The OPA says the agents could have bought scores more if they had had more money.

This raid had been carefully planned for weeks. It was appropriately named "Operation Circus," because of the gala atmosphere of the open-air market. This, however, was just one of the many alleged organized black-market centers spotted all over the United States. Sales lots are ingeniously hidden away in small country towns.

Another alleged ring worked out of Murray, Kentucky, a small town near the Tennessee border, and, according to the OPA, included dealers in the South and Midwest. Its operation was well organized. Spotters were hired in large cities—busy legmen hanging around bars, movies, even churches looking for good buys, preferably new cars. These scouts would stop owners as they entered their cars; often they jumped on the running-board. The driver would be offered a fancy price for his car. The standard rate was $500 over the ceiling price for a new car. The spotters got $25 for each car they brought in.

The OPA says that the cars were then taken either to Murray or to Cairo, Illinois. The alleged ring advertised to dealers throughout the Southwest that cars would be offered for sale at auction. According to the OPA, these "auctions" were merely a blind, and the deals were consummated before the automobiles ever went on the block.

TRIS COFFIN is a Columbia Broadcasting System commentator. He writes a weekly Washington report for The Nation.

There is some evidence in the OPA Washington offices that the gangsters who always follow the easy-money rackets have moved into the car black market. One man picked up by the agents had a record of forty-one previous arrests. Robert Ehrlich, in charge of the OPA special agents, prefers to call many of the men linked up with the organized gangs "shadowy characters."

The strategy of the OPA is twofold. The most publicized campaign is against the organized black-market gangs, with a quick follow-up on the dealers who have been spotted at the sales. But a hard day-in-and-day-out job is being done by agents in every part of the country, picking up dealers who are cashing in on the easy money of the black market. These agents have been averaging arrests or suits against three violators every month. The practice of selling over ceilings is so widespread that the OPA doesn't have a chance to pick up all the violators. The technique is to spot the enforcement activities regularly over a wide area and hope that the publicity will scare other dealers into being good boys.

No dealer can be sure when he offers a car at an over-ceiling price that he is not talking to an OPA agent or a citizen who is cooperating in the campaign. The OPA has a fund to make buys. It is also enlisting the help of enraged consumers.

The rackets are many and ingenious. One is the trade-in deal. The prospective buyer with a car to trade in will be offered $600 less than it is worth. If he objects, he doesn't get the new car.

There is the overhaul racket. The consumer buys a used car at the ceiling price and then is charged $250 for an overhaul job he does not want or need.

There is the finance racket. The car is sold at the ceiling price, but the buyer is required to finance it through the dealer, who tacks on exorbitant extra charges. There is the gadget racket. The consumer is forced, if he wants a car, to pay for trinkets and extra equipment which he would ordinarily never put on the car.

Another racket is for a dealer to accept "gifts." As mentioned above, the OPA discovered dealers taking in diamond rings and even city lots.

A complicated procurement system was uncovered in an Eastern city. The racketeers had stooges put their names on dealers' lists; when the stooge got his car, it went to the ring for a $1,000 bonus. Another $600 was added to the cost to the ultimate consumer.

The most lucrative and most dangerous of all the car rackets is to smuggle automobiles across the border into Canada or Mexico and into the export market, where even more fabulous prices are offered for American-made automobiles. The OPA has the cooperation of other interested federal agencies in trying to stop this operation.

The enforcement campaign has been so widespread that little publicity has been given to it. Nineteen were indicted by a grand jury in Newark. An agent in New York bought a used station wagon allegedly at almost $1,200 over the ceiling. A Des Moines dealer was accused of gypping twenty-six customers by low trade-in allowances. A Springfield, Missouri, salesman was charged with asking $2,200 over the ceiling for a new Buick. In Evansville, Indiana, a veteran led agents to a dealer who, he claimed, had offered a car at above the ceiling. In Detroit, twenty-two pleaded guilty of running a $3,000,000 used-car racket.

The veterans have been the chief victims of the auto black market. Many veterans sold their cars for a nest egg for the wife and family when they were inducted; when they are discharged, they look around for a replacement. They put their names on the dealers' lists. But many veterans have complained to the OPA that they have seen "war profiteers" riding around in that shiny new car while their names have been passed over on the lists. The OPA has encouraged veterans to sue, and ask for an injunction against the offending dealers.

Other veterans, desperately in need of cars, have had to plunk down their savings and their terminal-leave pay to buy one. In at least one community, Houston, Texas, veterans have organized to help the OPA break the racket. In many other isolated cases, veterans have walked into the local OPA offices and led agents to the dealers.

The consumer, if he only knew it, has the law on his side and can trim the racketeer. The first step is to report to the local Price Control Board. The buyer who has been charged over the ceiling not only can collect the amount charged over the ceiling; he can also sue for treble damages and get three times the amount of the overcharge plus attorney fees and court costs. Scores of these suits, encouraged by the OPA, are being filed every week. A good many shamefaced dealers have settled on the spot rather than be dragged into court.

There is no danger of the buyer losing that precious new car. The OPA emphasizes that.

The OPA needs the help of the consumers to smash the racket. The automobile assembly lines which produced three million cars a year were shut down or converted to war for four years. The current rate of production is two million cars a year. It will be a year, maybe much longer, before supply meets the demand. Then will come that wonderful day of justice when the buyer can walk coldly by the dealer who was selling cars at double the price.

There are a few simple facts the prospective customer should know before he goes car shopping. All cars—both new and second-hand—have OPA price ceilings on them. The local Price Control Board has these figures, as well as legitimate costs for extra equipment. It is against the law for any dealer to sell above ceilings. It is illegal for a dealer to require any kind of "side payment." The buyer cannot be required to make extra cash payments that are not shown on the sales record. It is illegal for a dealer to require the buyer to purchase anything he doesn't want in order to get a car. No law requires him to trade in one car to get another. If you do trade in a car, you are entitled to a reasonable value. The OPA has ruled what a "reasonable value" is. The customer cannot be required to buy the car "on time." He can choose any finance company he wants. With the sale of every new car, the dealer must prepare and give the buyer a certificate of transfer showing all charges.

One weapon which would go a long way toward smashing the black market would be for the manufacturers to take away the franchise of any dealer convicted of over-ceiling sales. The franchises are worth thousands of dollars, and dealers would think twice about making an easy profit now if they knew they might lose their franchise.

Thus far, the OPA has heard only a grapevine rumor that one manufacturer, Ford, is considering using this weapon to clear an ugly stain from the reputation of the automobile industry.

Can France's Empire Survive?

BY ANDREW ROTH

Marseilles

UNDER the impact of insurgent colonial nationalism, France's own material weakness, and the jealous interest of rival powers, the French empire would seem to be in danger of dissolution. Actually, however, it is not; for France seems to have learned a timely lesson—that only a more liberal empire can survive.

None of the "Quiz Kids," or "Brain Trusters," of France can yet define the structure of the "French Union"—the phrase which has now replaced "French Empire" in describing both the forty million people of France proper and the seventy million in its overseas territories. Its precise structure is still being worked out. But it is already clear that the new structure will not be the highly centralized, assimilationist empire of the old-style French imperialists. In their scheme France held an industrial and economic monopoly, and its colonies were bound to it by a dependence on its manufactures, markets, and great monopolistic banks like the Bank of Indo-China. Each territory was prompted in its allegiance by the French army and police and a colonial élite which—whether of Arab, Negro, Indo-Chinese, or West Indian background—was educated in France and assimilated to French culture.

World War II soon spotlighted the fatuousness of this policy. Once France, the industrial center, was overrun in 1940, Indo-China fell like a ripe plum into Japanese hands, and the African territories were of little use by themselves as a base for anti-Nazi resistance.

The pre-war policy is even more ridiculous in the cold light of the post-war world. In most French territories the inhabitants are asserting a desire to develop their own national personality rather than become merely imitation Frenchmen. In the most recent elections in Algeria the Moslem electorate voted overwhelmingly for the Algerian Manifesto Party, whose program can be summed up in one of their slogans: "We do not want to be bastard sons of France!" The strength and popular support of the Indo-Chinese movement for independent nationhood has been enough to compel the French government to recognize the Viet Nam Republic as a free state within the French Union.

Even if it wanted to, liberated France does not have the economic and military strength to suppress all the nationalist stirrings in its territories. According to official estimates France emerged from the war a trillion francs (or eight billion dollars) poorer than in 1938. Factories which cannot provide reconstruction material for France itself cannot underwrite extensive colonial expeditions. It is estimated that Indo-Chinese military operations have already set the French treasury back some $200,000,000. Short of man-power, the French at one time recruited criminals, and later German P. O. W.'s, to strengthen the Indo-China garrison; and according to American military authorities, French troops which recently left Marseilles for Indo-China apparently felt themselves so underequipped that they stole more than thirty American jeeps and stripped them for spare parts.

The French are not only fully cognizant of their own material weaknesses but—particularly after being edged out in Syria and Lebanon by the British—are sensitive to the possibility that other powers may offer better terms to France's dissident territories. It is significant that last winter a Nation article of mine, somewhat sympathetic to the aspirations of the Indo-Chinese, which was reprinted in the Paris edition of the Herald Tribune, brought forth the accusation in the rightist press that I was "an advance agent for American capitalists." This sensitivity toward encroachment on French interests is also strong on the left: both Communists and Socialists emphasize the necessity for winning the loyalty of the Arabs in French North Africa to prevent them from gravitating toward the British-influenced Arab League.

ANDREW ROTH, a regular contributor to The Nation and author of "Dilemma in Japan," is en route to Asia via Europe and the Middle East. He has recently been broadcasting from Cairo for the Columbia Broadcasting System. This is his third report on the present condition and future prospects of the great pre-war colonial empires.

FRENCH SOLAR SYSTEM

Under the pressure of nationalistic demands, their own material weakness, the possibility of better terms being offered by other powers, and the heightened respect for freedom in a France that itself has been liberated, the French government has been moving toward better relations with its colonies with enough speed to provoke shrill screams of anguish from diehard imperialists in the colonial service and most colonial businessmen. In general the movement is toward decentralization: the new arrangement will resemble a solar system with France as the sun and the other members of the French Union revolving about it at various distances from the parent body. The orbit of the Viet Nam Republic—which is pushing toward full dominion status—will be on the outermost periphery. French Equatorial Africa—where national consciousness is at a minimum and the chief current goal is full French citizenship—will revolve close to the parent body. The orbits of the other territories will be found in between, varying according to the attraction of France, the repulsion of native nationalist forces, and the drawing power of other countries. No simple pattern is possible because the French Union embraces peoples in many stages of development and has the additional complication of over a million Europeans implanted in overwhelmingly Moslem-Arab North Africa.

The first timid step toward decentralization and greater local autonomy in the territories was taken at the famous Brazzaville Conference which was opened in January, 1944, by General De Gaulle and numbered among those present the heads of all the African colonies, as well as delegates from the Consultative Assembly which had just been established in Algiers. Brazzaville recommended considerable decentralization of political power—to be wielded by governors-general in consultation with local assemblies—and decentralized economic planning, including greater industrialization and improved agricultural techniques. Although Brazzaville marked an advance in colonial thinking, it was hardly an "anti-colonial revolution," as some describe it. It is not necessarily an improvement for the colonial peoples if their French governor-general has more power, particularly if the government at home is more liberal than the official in the field—as is frequently the case. Furthermore, while the conference advocated extended education, it specified the language used should be French and suggested a delay of five years before forced labor should be abolished. It was silent on the important questions of the economic domination of the colonies by the giant trusts and banks, and of whether the colonial peoples should have freedom of speech, movement, assembly, and organization.

The real improvement in French colonial policy began last winter when General de Gaulle was replaced by Socialist Félix Gouin as Premier and Socialist Marius Moutet assumed the portfolio of the Ministry of Overseas France—formerly the Ministry of Colonies—a post he held in Blum's Popular Front cabinet and which he holds today under Premier Bidault. Soon after Moutet took office he declared in a speech to the Constituent Assembly that the French government could no longer act as a lord or master, but only as a friend and partner. Actions proved that this was more than good French rhetoric. On March 2 a general amnesty in Algeria freed virtually all of the nationalist leaders who had been imprisoned in the wake of severe riots in May, 1945. Four days later the way was paved for peace in Indo-China by the recognition of the Viet Nam Republic as a free state within the French Union, entitled to its own parliament, army, and foreign representation. In April the French Constituent Assembly abolished forced labor in the colonies. In May a law was passed to make French citizens of all —rather than merely the elite—in overseas territories. Furthermore, a number of other measures, including the elimination of discrimination in justice and civil service appointments have been put through. And the successful application of these liberal measures is made more likely by the emergence of a number of very liberal career officials in the Ministry of Overseas France, headed by able, energetic Director of Political Affairs Laurentie, who made his reputation as a progressive governor of Madagascar.

MANY PROBLEMS REMAIN

However, many important problems still remain virtually untouched. In some of the meetings held in West Africa in July to celebrate the granting of French citizenship to all inhabitants of overseas territories, rope barriers still divided the audiences into Negro and white listeners. French social-security legislation and other social laws do not even apply to Algeria—which is technically part of France—much less the other territories. In North Africa the Arab language, although the mother tongue of the great majority, is not recognized. In Martinique, "Pearl of the Antilles," the economy is still monopolized by the "Ten Families" while the majority of the population earns about $75 a year cutting cane. Throughout the overseas territories the power of the giant banks and commercial companies still remains strong, while the voice of the impoverished landless cultivator can only be heard feebly.

Even worse than these unsolved problems are those cases where, having taken two steps forward, the French seem to be trying to take a step backward. The outstanding case is Indo-China where in March the French agreed that the boundaries of the Republic of Viet Nam should be determined by referendum. Yet, on the day after the Viet Nam delegation left for Paris to work out a detailed solution of their status, the local French authorities inspired and "recognized" an anti-Viet Nam Republic of Cochin-China, headed by wealthy collaborationists, and also hastened to sponsor secessionism in the rich mountain plateau of South Annam. In terms of traditional "divide-and-rule" colonial politics this may be a smart maneuver, for these southern areas are the granaries of Indo-China, and if the French hold them, they will be able to impose severe restraints on the development of the Viet Nam Republic. But it bears no resemblance to the brave spirit of the new French colonial policy.

It was a survival of the old, unilateral colonial spirit which moved the local authorities in Indo-China to call a conference of the "Indo-Chinese Federation" at Dalat on August 1 before the organization of this federation had been discussed in the French-Viet Nam negotiations at Fontainebleau. Quite naturally, the Viet Nam negotiators suspended their participation, while the French Socialist and Communist press attacked the Indo-Chinese authorities for their "two-faced game."

TWO SCHOOLS OF THOUGHT

Part of the reason for such contradictions between words and deeds lies in the existence within the present French government of very different strains of thought on colonial policy. The High Commissioner in Indo-China, Admiral Thierry d'Argenlieu, who doffed his vestments as head of the Carmelite monks to reenter the navy, is close to the M. R. P., the party of Premier Bidault. The M. R. P. is very conservative on colonial affairs, and contains in its leadership people with colonial interests such as Max André, former director of the Franco-Chinese Bank, the second biggest bank in Indo-China. It is noteworthy that when the Viet Nam delegation objected to Admiral d'Argenlieu as head of the French delegation negotiating with them at Fontainebleau, Premier Bidault replaced him with André.

In the current Constituent Assembly discussions on the French Union, the M. R. P.—with the support of many conservative colonial officials—has favored the immediate imposition of a constitutional structure which will, in effect, limit overseas representation before the tide of nationalism gets into full swing. It favors siphoning this representation off into a separate chamber (Assembly of the Union) and a separate cabinet (Council of State) both of them heavily loaded with French and representatives of French puppets such as the Bey of Tunis and the Sultan of Morocco. The M. R. P. favors action on these proposals by the present Constituent Assembly without further consultation with colonial peoples beyond the minority of representatives they have in the present Assembly.

Against these M. R. P. plans the Communists have put up a stiff, if somewhat opportunistic, opposition. They are pushing hard for the extension of political rights in the colonies, for almost everywhere that impoverished colonials have the opportunity to vote, they vote left. Both representatives of Catholic Martinique are Communists, and the delegation of the Algerian Manifesto Party, which swept the Moslem electorate, is seated in the Constituent Assembly between the Communists and Socialists. The President of the Viet Nam Republic, Ho Chi Minh, was a charter member of the French Communist Party. As a result of this strong leftward current in the colonies, the Communists favor the representation of overseas territories directly in the National Assembly, rather than in the separate, loaded chamber proposed by the M. R. P. They also advocate that statutes for the French Union be written by a separate Constituent Assembly with major participation by the overseas majority and that greatly expanded powers be granted to popularly elected overseas legislatures.

The Communists are curiously circumspect about their colonial position. I canvassed the main Communist bookshop twice and could not find a book or pamphlet on the subject, merely a very general article in a recent issue of their theoretical magazine Cahiers de Communisme. When I confronted stocky, confident Communist leader Jacques Duclos with this fact he grinned broadly and said that this was "a matter of tactics, not of principle;" the colonial question is "very delicate," and (shades of Earl Browder!) the French Communists have no intention of losing any votes in the coming election by telling Frenchmen they are imperialists.

As in most French political matters, the balance of power on colonial affairs is in the hands of the Socialists, and, although lately they have voted with the M. R. P. on a number of subjects, on colonial matters they have recently swung close to the Communists. After remaining somewhat aloof on Indo-Chinese questions for some time, on July 23 Le Populaire's editor, Oreste Rosenfeld, swung into a sharp attack on the "duplicity" of French activities in Cochin-China, "where the chief interests of colonial capitalism are concentrated," and strongly supported the position of the Viet Nam delegation, including their demand for representation in the United Nations.

In the same week veteran Socialist Charles Dumas, after attending the Congress of North African Socialists at Algiers, urged upon the French Socialist Party all possible haste in extending to Africa all French social laws, improved education, industrialization, and agrarian reforms. "France will only be able to maintain its position," he warned, "if it brings social justice as well as liberty."

Russia's Next Five Years

BY J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO

PERHAPS the best yardstick of Russia's strength today is the new Five Year Plan. The potentialities of the plan, its achievements to date, its shortcomings and proposals for correcting them occupy a prominent place in the Soviet press and, one suspects, in the reports of foreign ambassadors in Moscow to their governments. The Five Year Plan is being discussed by experts and laymen, by soldiers and sailors, in the factories and on the collective farms, at rest homes and sports clubs. Its promise and daring have roused the imagination of the young; for them it is a sequel to the exciting story of the war, and the names of Stalingrad and Magnitogorsk, city of steel and city of electricity, spell new adventures in a continuing chapter of Soviet history. Even foreign journalists from more or less hostile camps, remembering previous experiences, are wary in their predictions; rather than risk skeptical criticism, they accept at least the fact of Russia's determination to succeed. Thus, Emile Magnus, who recently returned from the Soviet Union, commented in the conservative Monde Illustré of August 10: "People talk of miracles. The miracle is the socialist state's capacity for work."

I have my doubts about supernatural explanations. The churches in Russia are open and well frequented these days, but the Soviet Union bases neither its politics nor its economics on miracles. What distinguishes the new Five Year Plan from similar projects being tested with limited success in other parts of Europe is its realistic approach: the essential trait of Soviet planning has always been a healthy empiricism. This time the starting point is a recognition of the limitations revealed by Russian industry during the war. Taken by itself, the record was impressive—factories had doubled, some had even tripled, the production quotas assigned to them. But the fact remains that, despite the spirit of sacrifice displayed by the workers on the home front, the Red Army received twice as much equipment from the Allies as it did from Russian war plants. Moreover, it was not only a question of amount; even before the war the Russians had the greatest respect for American industrial techniques, a respect that increased when American equipment first arrived on the Eastern front and when the magnificently armed American soldiers appeared on the battlefields of Europe. To my surprise, I heard little talk about the atomic bomb in Moscow, but the Russians are acutely aware of American leadership in technical accomplishment.

Stalin did not blink at the conclusions to be drawn from the lessons of the war: that the tempo and scope of Russian industrialization must be increased in order to insure the country's economic independence in a period of international crisis. According to the Premier's statement, the aim of preparing Russia for any emergency will be achieved only when production of iron, steel, and coal is four times greater than pre-war output and oil production has been doubled. That will take many years, perhaps two more five-year plans, but the present plan, even if it should not be fully achieved—though most serious observers are convinced that it will be—justifies the assertion I made in my first article that Russia is daily growing stronger.

The factor of security, of safeguarding the country against any future attack, is as evident in Russia's Five Year Plan as in its foreign policy. But it would be a mistake to interpret the plan exclusively in terms of military preparedness. Should genuine universal disarmament become a reality tomorrow, the U. S. S. R. would still have a Five Year Plan, equally ambitious in purpose though, of course, different in emphasis. The fierce will to repair the ravages of Nazi aggression, to resume the immense effort of socialist construction interrupted, after twelve years of progress, by the war, would produce the same tempo now being displayed.

If the present troubled situation of the world—which has ended the war but not yet found peace—forces the Russians to put production of iron, steel, and coal before that of consumers' goods, still a good part of those resources are being used to build a country in which life will be more enjoyable and exciting for the average man; side by side with the billions of rubles allocated to heavy industry are enormous appropriations for new cities, parks, workers' rest-homes, theaters, cinemas, libraries, and schools.

The five main headings of the report submitted by Mr. Voznesenski, chairman of the Gosplan, give a good idea of its multiple objectives:

1. Increase in industrial production of almost 50 per cent over pre-war levels.

2. Revival of agriculture and consumers'-goods industries in order to guarantee the material well-being of the Soviet peoples.

J. ALVAREZ DEL VAYO, European editor of The Nation, here describes Russia's new Five Year Plan in the last of four articles reporting his recent visit to the U. S. S. R. Other aspects of Soviet life will be dealt with from time to time in Mr. del Vayo's regular page, soon to be resumed.

3. Guaranties of new technical progress in all branches of the national economy, providing a strong impetus for increased production.

4. Guaranties of a rapid accumulation of socialist capital, with a total, centrally-administered investment of 250 billion rubles for the reestablishment and development of the national economy.

5. Further increase in the defense potential: the army to be equipped with the most modern material.

In the devastated regions the Five Year Plan has already begun to demonstrate its possibilities. When the Germans swept through White Russia, they destroyed practically every industrial plant and business house, leaving mountains of rubble as reminders that here had stood busy cities like Minsk, Gomel, Vitebsk, and Orsha. The number of farmhouses made uninhabitable exceeds 350,000. The entire area has been reduced to the level of 1913. German occupation authorities themselves estimated that it would take ten years, at the very minimum, to rebuild White Russia. Today it is certain that it will be accomplished within the life of the present Five Year Plan. Industrial production in the last quarter of 1945 had risen to twice that of the first quarter. But as in the rest of the country, the plan is not limited even in the devastated areas to reconstruction; it calls for new construction on a much larger scale than before the war. The achievements in the electrical industry since the start of the plan indicate that by 1950 White Russia will be producing twice as much power as in 1940.

The push given to already existing industries has meant the rapid expansion of new developments, particularly housing. A fever of building, which started in the devastated districts, has spread to all parts of the country. Local authorities in cities like Leningrad are swamped with requests for living quarters—a family of five will modestly ask for a single room. Moscow has been literally invaded by people from other regions left homeless by the war. The suffering inflicted by the scorched-earth policy of the Germans—which immunized me against any sentimental grief at the sight of shattered Berlin—together with the desire to compensate the people for the new, tremendous sacrifices demanded of them, has led the Soviet Union to set aside 42.3 billion rubles for housing.

In rebuilding White Russia, the planners intend to utilize the region's own raw materials in order to keep costs as low as possible and impose no extra strain on the transportation system. With much of the rolling stock destroyed in the war, the problem of providing Russia with an efficient system of communications—a problem that drove some of the best administrators of previous five-year plans half crazy—has again assumed critical importance. The present plan provides not merely for resumption of pre-war operations, but a big increase in the production of locomotives and railroad carriages: 7,585 locomotives as compared with 5,960 produced under the second Five Year Plan; 472,000 freight cars as against the former record of 255,000. In addition to repairing destroyed lines, the Soviet Union will build 7,880 additional kilometers of track; not only are major lines, like Donbas-Krivoi Rog, to be restored, but new railroads will link the powerful industrial centers of the Urals, Russia's great war arsenal, and push their way across Siberia. The plan has allocated 40.1 billion rubles to these projects.

Simultaneously with the development of railroads, provisions have been made for the expansion of the automobile industry; under the Five Year Plan 500,000 new cars (428,000 trucks, 65,000 passenger cars, 6,500 autobuses) will reach the market. The Russians are terribly proud of their latest passenger-car models, especially the streamlined ZIS-110 turned out by the Moscow Auto Plant, and the "Pobeda" (Victory) launched by the Gorky factory. Here again praise for American techniques is heard; an engineer points to a model and asks with a broad smile, "Quite American, isn't it?"

While in devastated regions like White Russia the Five Year Plan admirably combines reconstruction and construction, it is in the areas untouched by the war that the effort to build a strong, prosperous Russia is seen at its most impressive.

The Ural range is one of the world's richest mountain chains, and the variety of its mineral resources have made it possible for the Russians to perfect an extraordinarily hard steel. It was with special reference to this region that M. Quaroni, the Italian Ambassador to Moscow, told me that not even a tenth of Russia's industrial potential had yet been tapped. The Ambassador, who speaks Russian like a native, is a veteran diplomat, with an open mind to everything that is happening in the Eastern countries where he has spent most of his career. It was not until after the October revolution that the Russians began the systematic exploitation of this area whose fabulous riches had been described in Russian legend and poetry as far back as the fifteenth century. During the war the smelting furnaces of Magnitogorsk poured out a steady stream of steel for Russian guns; today they are producing it for reconstruction. By 1950 Magnitogorsk alone will be turning out 70 per cent more cast iron and 110 per cent more steel and subsidiary products than in 1940. The Ural region as a whole will be producing 2.5 times more cast iron than in 1940; coal and petroleum output will be respectively 2.7 and 3.2 times higher than pre-war levels. Under the Five Year Plan the Urals will become self-sufficient in electrical power through the construction of a new hydroelectric station on the Kama River near Molotov City and of eight other stations along the Ufa River. A new housing development for metal workers at Magnitogorsk is being built in record time; individual units erected last winter in 40 days, were put up in the spring in 27 days.

Apart from Magnitogorsk, new steel mills are going up in Nizhni-Tagil and Chelyabinsk, while the one at Orsk-Khalilov will soon begin to manufacture a new metal containing a high percentage of chrome and nickel. The Five Year Plan for the Urals also provides for the maximum utilization of the big aluminum factories in Uralo-Bachiro. To make all this possible, forty-nine new coal mines will be opened during the next five years.

While White Russia and the Urals illustrate the application of the Five Year Plan in typical devastated and undevastated areas, a survey of the immense Soviet territory tells the same story with minor variations. A single figure reveals the breadth of this industrial effort: the total volume of industrial production for the last year of the Five Year Plan is set at 205 billion rubles (based on 1926-27 prices), in other words a general increase of 48 per cent over pre-war figures.

Although the greatest concentration is on heavy industry, generous provision is made for the producers of consumers' goods. The textile industry is expected to turn out 4.5 million meters of cotton, 150 million meters of wool, 141 million meters of silk, 240 million pairs of shoes, and 580 million pairs of socks and stockings. And while agriculture has been pushed to the utmost limits, the Soviet administrators are none the less hoping to achieve an annual 17 per cent step-up in the food industry. At first it was thought that rationing could be lifted this year, but in the light of the 1946 harvest, the Council of Ministers decided to continue it into 1947.

Figures on its output of goods for consumers have little intrinsic meaning, however, because Russia plans to augment its own production by large purchases in neighboring countries as the result of bi-lateral trade pacts. While I was in Moscow a delegation from Prague headed by Gottwald and Masaryk was putting the final touches on an agreement which will secure to Russia much of Czechoslovakia's production in light industry. Nor are these arrangements limited to the Soviet Union's area of influence. In Stockholm I found the Swedish Socialist government, hardly to be accused of partiality for the Bolsheviks, much pleased with its new pact, which will enormously expand Swedish business in both machinery and consumers' goods. The same is true for Switzerland.

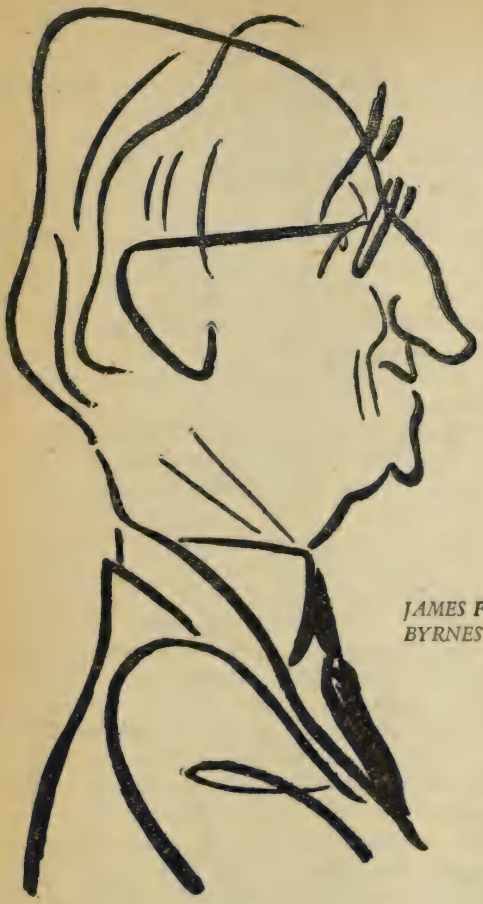
In the cultural field Soviet planning seems to recognize no boundaries. I heard leading officials say that when the mass-education program of the Five Year Plan is completed, the Russians will be the most literate people in the world. I arrived in Moscow just after the close of the school term; 555,000 students and 50,000 scientific workers had received degrees. By the time the Five Year Plan has reached the mid-way mark, between 120 and 130 thousand specialists will have graduated from universities and technical schools.

The Soviet Union has just emerged from a battle for survival that ended with the Red Army's victorious entry into Berlin. Now it faces as hard an ordeal—the battle of reconstruction. But the Russian people are tackling this fight with the same confidence in ultimate success. Many casualties will be registered in the course of the Five Year Plan; from time to time we shall read of replacements in the leadership, of shifts from one post to another, or of wholesale dismissals, as, recently, in the Ukraine, which may give the impression that Russia is on the edge of an internal crack-up. In many cases these reports will mean simply that the principle of "the right man for the job" is being ruthlessly applied, alike to the highest-ranking official and the unskilled worker in steel mill or factory. Given the nature of the human race, perhaps we must expect industrial fraud and corruption. But in Russia these are dangerous games, not only because the socialist state is rigid in such matters, but because in the popular conscience there is a latent revulsion against anyone who seeks personal benefit in a common endeavor. Riding in the Moscow subway one day, I sat beside a young Russian soldier. He glanced at the book I was reading, noticed that it was in Spanish, and told me proudly that he had learned that language by himself. We got to talking, and when he discovered that I came from the United States, one of his first questions was, "Is it true that war profits are allowed in America?" He could understand profits in peace time, but the idea of making fortunes from war contracts while soldiers were dying at the front seemed to him incredible.

One should not, however, lay disproportionate emphasis on the difficulties the Soviet Union is likely to encounter in carrying out the Five Year Plan; Hitler made that mistake in evaluating Russian internal developments from 1937 to 1941—and it cost him Germany. Selling the Five Year Plan to the Russians is not as difficult a job as people imagine in countries where the working class is not in power. It would be ridiculous to deny the element of compulsion that accompanies any attempt at a planned economy, especially when the demands on the people are of such extraordinary magnitude. But it would be equally foolish to ignore the difference in attitude between a worker in a socialist country and one in a country of free enterprise. As far back as 1918 Lenin predicted that socialist competition would play a decisive role in the transformation of society. "Capitalism," he said, "produced a working capacity entirely unknown in the era of serfdom. Capitalism can and will be ultimately overcome because socialism will produce an even greater working capacity."

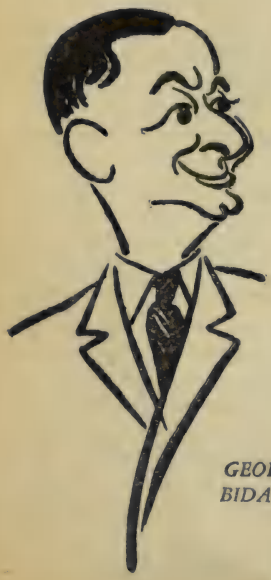
This is the attitude that inspires the Five Year Plan. And in this crucial period, when the most urgent task is to prevent the crystallization of two hostile continental blocs, those who forget the socialist factor will never understand the source of Russian strength.

Paris



JAMES F. BYRNES

MacKENZIE KING

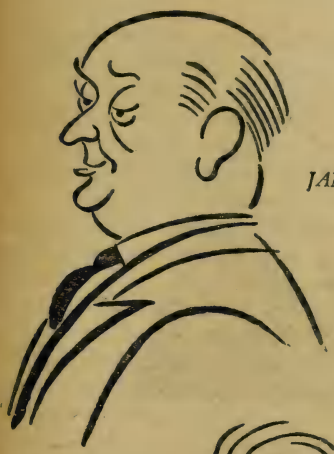


GEORGE BIDAULT

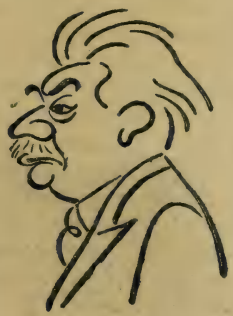
ERNEST BEVIN

Profiles

BY OSCAR BERGER



JAN MASARYK



DMITRI MANUILSKY

PAUL-HENRI SPAAK

VYACHESLAV MOLOTOV

Democracy in Manhattan

BY PAUL KLEIN

ON August 20 a primary election was held in Manhattan's Second Assembly District—held, that is, by the machines, and lost by the people. We have heard much in the past years about the disappearance of election frauds, the clean-up of city politics, the new, pure era in New York City voting; but Tuesday's exhibition is unrivalled in local political history.

John J. Lamula, father of New York State rent control and constant supporter of liberal measures both in private life and during his tenure as State Assemblyman in 1943-44, was entered in the primary races of all three parties. Denied backing by the regular Republican organization for his failure to follow reactionary party lines, he was indorsed by the Young Republican Club. (Lamula, by the way, was the only Republican ever to be elected from this traditional Tammany district, which brought up Al Smith.) In the American Labor Party and Democratic primaries Lamula faced Louis di Salvio, incumbent; in the Republican, Alfred D. Licato.

In the pre-primary electioneering, when Lamula was making street-corner speeches, malpractices began to appear. Thugs threatened storekeepers who let him use electricity for his loudspeakers; false issues were raised; local citizens were intimidated. Mayor O'Dwyer had to send extra police protection into the area. Two days before the election a brother of the local Republican leader was arrested for defacing posters.

It was on primary day, itself, however, that the democratic process was trussed-up and laid aside by the machine politicians. The story was unfolded in the Lamula headquarters that night as his official watchers despondently returned with their district tallies; it was a saga of every modern and old, sly and open, domineering and wheedling trick known to ward-heelers and their gutter familiars. Most of the Lamula watchers were well-meaning but inexperienced young people; they knew their rights generally, but were unprepared to cope with the connivance of officials appointed by the Board of Elections, and the apathy (in some cases this was a euphemism) of the police. Although a large portion of the crooked operations occurred during the counting, enough went on during the voting to shock the watchers. Several attempts were made to ring in "floaters" to vote for people who had died since the last election, or who were away for the summer. One gentleman who returned from the country just to exercise his franchise found that he had already voted!

THE AUTHOR of this article was an official watcher in the recent New York City primaries. "I emerged disgusted," he wrote, "and determined to help clean up local politics. Such a clean-up depends on an informed citizenry—and for that reason I have written this article."

Many boards did not have the required two Republican and two Democratic inspectors at each table; several complaints were made by watchers that only three inspectors attended. Two watchers were even impressed into inspection duty in the absence of regular officials. At one board a young man had his life threatened by a "lady" inspector who resented his insistence that he be allowed to carry out his official privilege of inspecting signatures. Another watcher asked that an arrest be made when an inspector offered a voter money for his carfare (plus a little extra for his trouble); however, because the voter didn't take the money (saying, "What? With a cop here? Later!"), the policeman on duty didn't think the incident warranted an arrest. It was at the same poll that an inspector "helped" aged voters who were having trouble with their ballots, by opening them up—outside, not in a booth with an inspector from the other party, as the law requires—and dismissed the watcher's complaint with "Well, see? We're so honest at this board that everything can be done out in the open!" Another watcher was kidded for taking his duties so seriously—kidded by a Tammany ward-heeler who remembered that "in the old days the boys used to crook elections, but no more. You might as well go home, get some rest. It don't pay to crook elections these days." This was the same inspector who was caught a few hours later, during the counting, marking up the ballots he was tabulating. When challenged, he drew the pencil quickly back towards himself, thus adding another illegal X to the ballot right in front of him, and said: "Naw, you got me wrong. See, I pulled the pencil away from the table like that just so you could see I wasn't marking up the ballots."

It was the same story in all thirty-eight election districts. At one, they counted half of Lamula's votes void—sometimes slyly adding some blotch to back up their story, and sometimes, in districts where the audience and/or cops were their own men, not even bothering to make it look good. At another, they counted blank votes for Licato or de Salvio. In another district, ten blank ballots were put aside to be handled separately; the watcher looked at something else for a moment, and when he turned back there were only eight blank ballots and the machine candidates had acquired two more votes. In all the districts the watchers were bullied and harangued for exercising their right to challenge or protest votes. In the districts with the most experienced inspectors (hence, with the greatest number of crooked votes)', the inspectors would hold a phony plebiscite and then "compromise" with the watcher—that is, allow him to officially register three or four out of twenty-four or twenty-five protests.

In one district that will long be remembered by Lamula supporters, dishonest counting was so rampant that the young lady watcher, unable to cope any longer with the threats of the hostile inspectors, called headquarters for aid. Lamula, himself, went straight to the poll in question, where he was informed that his watcher was merely having hysterics, and that he had been given a most careful and fair count, especially evidenced by the fact that in the disputed count—the Republican—he had won, twenty to sixteen. After a few words with the far-from-hysterical, but very angry, watcher, Lamula demanded and got an immediate recount: somehow the vote changed from the previous twenty-sixteen to twenty-three-eight in favor of Lamula!

Consider the financial outlay necessary to the campaign of a non-machine candidate and you will see why the thousand-dollar cost of a recount is prohibitive. Consider one more thing: the temper of citizens, although slow to kindle, is a difficult thing to control when once aroused. We need only look at the recent events in Tennessee to see what may happen in other sections if the officials themselves do not change local political practices. Our citizens, many of them young and returned from the war, want and demand fair and peaceful elections, but if these are not forthcoming they will demand and seize merely fair elections. Let us not force violence. Let us make these allegedly outdated practices be, in fact, outdated; let us have the voice of the people a true voice, not a reproduction through a mouthpiece.

A Crisis at Fisk

BY W. E. BURGHARDT DU BOIS

THERE is a crisis developing at Fisk University which is of more than local or even just racial significance. Fisk is at Nashville, Tennessee, and is one of the oldest institutions for the higher education of Negroes. Its body of alumni form a distinguished group, numbering today perhaps 3,500 living graduates.

As long as segregated colleges are necessary, a colored man, if properly trained, should head a school for colored students for obvious social and psychological reasons. But presidential timber among Negroes is rare because of limited education of opportunities, lack of cultural contacts, and, especially, lack of business and administrative experience. Gradually, however, Negro presidents are being selected, as witness John Hope at Atlanta, Mordecai Johnson at Howard, and Horace Mann Bond at Lincoln, Pennsylvania. In other words, while it is difficult to find the right colored man for the presidency of a Negro college, it is no longer impossible.

When a vacancy in the presidency was imminent at Fisk, an ideal Negro candidate for the position was presented, who had the practically unanimous backing of the alumni. Charles Harris Wesley was born in Kentucky in 1891. He is a graduate and trustee of Fisk; a doctor of philosophy from Harvard in history (1925); teacher and professor of history at Howard, 1913-1938; and dean of the Howard graduate school, 1938-1942. He has been a Guggenheim Fellow and has received an award from the Social Science Research Council; he has written books and articles, among them an outstanding history of Negro labor in the United States. For the past four years he has been president of Wilberforce University, in Ohio, and has conducted its affairs with marked success, reducing its debt, increasing its enrollment, and raising its scholastic standards.

W. E. B. DU BOIS is director of special research for the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

But the Board of Trustees of Fisk University at its June meeting postponed the election of a new president, although no other candidacies had been seriously advanced. The alumni charge that there were two reasons for the delay: first, an objection to giving a Negro a voice in the financial affairs of the university; and second, the white South's fear of encouraging intelligent and liberal leadership of Negroes by men of their own race.

Fisk has an endowment of about three million dollars. No Negro trustee is on the finance committee, and the financial affairs of the university are known in detail to only a few trustees. It has been charged that university funds are wastefully administered. One trustee is said to receive some $22,000 annually for handling the portfolio of investments, and it is alleged that the office of the vice-chairman of the board receives $12,000 annually for "promotion and publicity." The auditors in their last report declared that they had not examined the portfolio of investments.

But an even more serious matter is now at hand. In May the campaign of the United Negro College Fund was launched in Nashville by the retiring white president of Fisk University. At this luncheon, of course, no Negro could appear. There were present, according to the Nashville Banner (May 2, 1946), Nathan Adams, of the First National Bank of Dallas, Texas, "who is a leader in the fund campaign"; Edward Potter, Jr., Southerner and vice-president of the Fisk trustees; and several other whites, Northern and Southern.

Potter explained that the white Nashville members of the Fisk Board "have not approved of some things" at Fisk but thought it was better "to try to improve situations drifting into bad directions" than to desert and let the school "go to rout—to the left wing." President Jones complained that the attempt to name Wesley was precipitate. And then, according to the Banner, Adams, the Texas banker, > strongly denounced the present federal administration, communism, and Eastern meddling as confusing the racial problems of the South. "The Negro won't work as long as Mr. Truman gives us Santa Claus in every community," Adams charged. He said he wondered "how many of us know how far to the left we have already gone" and predicted that solution of present-day problems is impossible "as long as we remain blind to the left wing." Pointing out that adoption of FEPC philosophies would mean we have come a long way from freedom, Adams warned, "Don't let them take the Democratic Party completely away from us. What are we, a bunch of morons?"

Obviously, it would be impossible today to find in the United States many educated Negroes who did not believe in the FEPC, and very few who were not eternally grateful for the forward-looking social work of Franklin Delano Roosevelt. If it is the policy of the United Negro College Fund to deprive such men of leadership among their own group, it is time that this was clearly stated.

There can be no doubt as to the present situation: the Northern white trustees hesitate to put a Negro into the presidency; they would prefer a complacent, even if second-class, white man. The white Southern trustees would consent to a Negro president provided he was a Negro amenable to their guidance and not "radical"—that is, not an advocate of the FEPC, the abolition of the poll tax, or any New Deal policies. It is rumored that they are in partial agreement on a man of this sort.

Perhaps the time has come when Negro higher education can no longer depend upon gifts from the North or cooperation with the white South but must be supported by the students and alumni themselves. It would be a hard task, for education today is costly, and the alumni and students of Negro colleges are almost entirely in the lower-income brackets. But whatever the cost, Negro education cannot be dictated to by uncandid financiers in the North, and by so-called "liberal" Southerners who are trying to stop the Negro from thinking.

California's Central Valley Project

BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

FIVE hundred miles long and a hundred miles wide, California's great Central Valley Basin is about half as large as England. Containing over 6,000,000 acres of irrigable land (twice the amount actually under irrigation, the valley has about 50 per cent of the state's cash farm income. Although many streams flow through the valley, it remained a semi-arid area until comparatively recent times. The northern part of the valley has about one-third of the land and two-thirds of the water. Floods in the north, drought in the south. Most farmers in the southern end of the valley pump irrigation water from wells which tap underground seepage from local streams. Over a period of years the underground water level has fallen at an alarming rate.

Since 1874 the people of the valley have been looking for a development plan that would harness the energies and integrate the resources of the basin. Central Valley Project is, finally, that scheme. It consists of a complex system of water works and power facilities designed to furnish irrigation water to areas now having none or not enough; to develop hydroelectric power; to prevent floods; to improve navigation on the Sacramento River; to repulse saline waters now intruding on some 400,000 acres of rich land in the delta of the Sacramento and San Joaquin Rivers; and to furnish water to local industrial plants and municipalities. A multiple-purpose project, Central Valley demands a delicate and complex articulation of all phases of the development, since all are part of a basic plan. No single phase of the project, whether it be a dam, a canal, a recreation site, or a scheme to replenish the supply of salmon in the Sacramento River, can possibly be thought of except in relation to every other phase of the project.

The Bureau of Reclamation has recently completed its master plan for the development of Central Valley. If the plan is carried into effect, the Central Valley project would provide jobs for 18,000 for the next fifteen years; save existing acreage vitally dependent upon irrigation; provide water for 2,000,000 acres now irrigated from inadequate underground water sources; save 360,000 acres in the delta from saline intrusion; provide irrigation for 3,040,000 acres not now irrigated; and generate a total of 8.1 million kilowatt-hours of power annually.

CAREY McWILLIAMS, a contributing editor of The Nation, is the author of "Southern California Country" and has written extensively on inter-racial and farm-labor problems.

Despite the fact that the people of California have repeatedly demonstrated overwhelming support for the Central Valley Project, a real danger exists today that it may be sabotaged. The opposition stems from two sources, or more precisely from two corporations: the Pacific Gas and Electric Company and the Kern County Land Company. While the two corporations have different reasons for opposing the project—the one to protect its present monopoly on the distribution of power in northern California, the other to protect its vast land holdings in the southern part of the valley—they have joined forces in a vicious campaign to obscure issues, hamstring the Bureau of Reclamation, and retard (if possible prevent) completion of the project.

Electric power generated by Central Valley dams must serve a twofold purpose: it must be used to operate the pumping plants, which are a vital phase of the project, and it must be sold to consumers at the lowest possible rates—not merely to pass on the maximum benefits to the largest number of people, but also to attract new markets for the power itself. If a large demand for power is developed, and if the power is properly disposed of, revenue from the sale of power will not only repay the cost of the power facilities but will service at least half the cost of the entire project.

In hoping to sabotage the cheap power potential of the Central Valley Project, Pacific Gas and Electric has two major objectives: first, to prevent the Bureau of Reclamation from securing appropriations for the construction of transmission lines, stand-by plants, and distribution facilities; and second, to prevent the organization of public districts for the distribution of Central Valley power. Without the transmission lines and other essentials the Bureau will be compelled to sell Central Valley power to the only purchaser possessing these facilities, namely, P. G. and E. Thus today the Company is purchasing the power generated at Shasta Dam, since the Bureau's transmission lines extend only as far as Oroville. Continuance of this arrangement will mean, once the project is completed, that the government will be compelled to sell vast amounts of power generated at the dams to a private monopoly, only to turn around and buy a large amount of this same power in order to operate other phases of the project. To date forty-four public agencies have made application for Central Valley power, but the Bureau cannot service them because of this lack of distribution facilities.

In trying to prevent the formation of new public districts, and, at the same time, to force the existing public districts to enter into long-term contracts with it for power, P. G. and E.'s objective is to sew up the market so that even if Congress should eventually give the Bureau sorely-needed appropriations for transmission lines, the valuable markets will already have passed into the P. G. and E. orbit. The price at which municipalities and other public districts could purchase power from the Bureau would be about 40 per cent less than current rates paid to P. G. and E. If the State of Washington's average rates for power in 1944 were applied to the electricity sold by P. G. and E., it would represent an annual saving of $58,569,000 to California consumers!

Granted equal efficiency in operation, P. G. and E. can never pass on to consumers the ultimate maximum of benefits of Central Valley power. In 1943, under regulations of the State Railroad Commission, the corporation was allowed a return of 6.7 per cent of the fair value of all used and useful properties of the company, over and above all operating expenses and fixed charges. The Central Valley Project is being built under laws which require payment to the government of the power features of the project in 50 years at 3 per cent interest. (Irrigation features are to be repaid without interest.) The difference between 3 per cent, the cost of money to public agencies, and the 6-7 per cent allowed P. G. and E. represents the added burden carried by the people of northern California today. With government distribution of power, the initial costs of the power features would be eventually repaid out of earnings, and the rates for power could then be progressively reduced. But the stockholders of a private utility have a perpetual claim against its earnings. To range the irrigators on its side of the contest, P. G. and E. has made what, on the face of it, appears to be a fair offer to purchase Central Valley power. Pointing to this offer, the company says to the irrigators: if our bid, which represents a higher price for power than is required by the Reclamation Act, were to be accepted, the proceeds could be used to reduce charges for water. Of course the catch in this proposition is that the cost of power to P. G. and E. is an operating expense which would ultimately be paid by all consumers of power, including the irrigators.

The opposition of the Kern County Land Company (which owns over a million acres of land, 400,000 of them in California) is ostensibly based on the "excess lands" provision of the Reclamation Act. This section provides that landowners who use water from Bureau of Reclamation projects must agree to sell their "excess lands" at a price which does not reflect the increased value due to the construction of the project. In the case of Central Valley this increased value would amount to more than $100 an acre. Retention of the excess lands provision would work no hardships on the large landowners in the valley. They could receive project water for even their excess lands for a period of ten years before being compelled to sell these lands. In fact, they are under no compulsion to accept project water. But if they do, they must agree to sell all holdings in excess of 160 acres in single ownership, or 320 acres in community property ownership. Eighty-seven per cent of the farms in the Central Valley are less than 160 acres.

From the inception of the Central Valley Project, the large landowning interests fought to have the project exempted from the excess lands provision. Defeated in this move, they are now seeking to have the Army Engineers given the appropriations needed to complete the project. The purpose here is threefold: first, projects built by the Engineers are not subject to the Reclamation Act and therefore the excess lands provision would not apply; second, projects built by the Engineers generally do not require repayment of construction costs; and third, they are interested in flood control and navigation and have never shown any particular enthusiasm for multiple-purpose projects, of which Central Valley is the classic example. If constructed by the Army Engineers the dams yet to be built would unquestionably minimize the hydro-electric power aspects, and would be built, not as units in a larger scheme, but as separate, unrelated, and uncoordinated projects. I regret to report that the Army Engineers are working in intimate collaboration with the Kern County Land Company and the Pacific Gas and Electric Company in an effort to secure control of the project.

The land question, as it relates to Central Valley, poses two additional questions.

For years a debate has raged in California over the relative efficiency of large-scale versus small-scale farming. The issue largely turns on the question of what is meant by "efficiency." Should it be narrowly construed to mean only a dollars-and-cents efficiency as reflected in the profit and loss statement of a particular farm operator? Or should it be broadly construed in terms of social efficiency? Studies made in Central Valley by the Department of Agriculture clearly demonstrate that a small-farming community has certain definite social advantages over a large-farming area. The small-farming community has more stability; it creates a more widely shared prosperity; it minimizes farm labor disputes; it has more stores and filling stations, better schools and roads; and it supports more people in independence. The San Joaquin Valley is the "Grapes of Wrath" country: a region plagued for years by intense, bitter, and often bloody conflicts between migratory farm workers and large landowning interests. In view of this record, the argument for the alleged efficiency of the large-scale farm might be more compelling if farm labor were protected by a comprehensive system of social legislation. Since no such protection exists today, the "if" is a very large "if" indeed. As a region, the Central Valley would profit by a breaking-up of these large holdings—more particularly by a diffusion of the great social, economic, and political power which their owners have exercised for so many years.

The second question has to do with underground waters. Even if the project is completed by the Bureau of Reclamation as planned, the following situation is likely to result: the small farmers will promptly sign up with the Bureau for water, but the large operators may elect not to use project water. Some of these large companies possess valuable water rights of their own, and, with scarcely a single exception, they all pump underground water. As the small owners receive more and more water from the project, and as the Bureau, as part of its plan, systematically diverts flood waters to fill underground reservoirs, the underground water level will gradually rise. This will then enable the large landowners to pump more water, and to pump it cheaper than they can do at present. Yet left with their large holdings intact, they will not be contributing a dime toward repayment of the costs of the development.

To save the Central Valley Project, the Bureau of Reclamation—not the Army Engineers—must be designated as the agency to complete the work in accordance with the plan which the Bureau has prepared and which has been submitted to the President and to Congress. Participation of the Army Engineers should be restricted solely to the flood-control and navigation features of the plan. Eventually it would be desirable to create a Central Valley Authority and to buy out the P. G. and E. holdings; but, with the lines of battle drawn as they are today, the immediate choice is between the Bureau of Reclamation and the Army Engineers. In addition the Bureau must be given adequate appropriations to enable it to build the transmission lines, stand-by plants, and distribution facilities called for under the plan. Not only should the excess lands provision of the Reclamation Act be retained, and applied to this project, but the State of California should declare all underground water supplies to be a public resource and should then proceed to regulate the right to pump these waters. At the same time, the California delegation in Congress should dust off Senator LaFollette's farm-labor legislative program, submitted to Congress in 1942, and press for its immediate enactment. This will divert some of the excess lobbying enthusiasm of the Kern County Land Company from the Central Valley Project. Finally, Congress should conduct a thorough-going investigation of the private power lobby, now in more brazen operation than at any time since 1933.

BOOKS and the ARTS

A Barnyard History

ANIMAL FARM. By George Orwell. Harcourt, Brace and Company. $1.75.

GEORGE ORWELL, to judge by his writing, is a man, not without imagination, who is never swept away by his imagination. His work as a literary critic and analyst of politics and popular culture runs along a well laid out middle course, kept true to it by an even keel; it is always very satisfying, except when he ventures out into certain waters, as in his reflections on art and poetry in his "Dickens, Dali, and Others," where a deep keel has the advantage over an even one. Even when he is wrong, as he was many times during the war in his political comments and predictions, he is wrong in a sensible way. He stands for a common sense and a reasonableness which are rare today, especially when these virtues are removed from the commonplace, as they are in Orwell's case, though not absolutely.

"Animal Farm," a brief barnyard history of the Russian Revolution from October to just beyond the Stalin-Hitler pact, is the characteristic product of such a mind, both with credit and discredit to its qualities. It puts an imaginative surface on the facts, but does not go far beneath the surface and shows little in excess of the minimum of invention necessary to make the transposition into an animal perspective. The facts are straight, and all the wieldy ones are there; the interpretation, within these limits, is plain and true. The implicit moral attitude toward the real historical events is one of an indignation that goes-without-saying, opposed to the nonsense and chicanery of Party dialectics, and to what has come to be recognized, to a large extent through Orwell's writing, as the well-intentioned, peculiarly liberal act of submission to the tyrant's myth. At least by implication, Orwell again makes clear in this book his allegiance to an older and more honorable liberalism that still holds as its dearest thing the right to liberty of judgment. Nevertheless, this is a disappointing piece of work; its best effort is exerted somewhere on middle ground, between the chuckle-headed monstrosity of orthodox Stalinism and the sated anti-Stalinist intelligence of long standing which already knows all this and a good deal more besides.

In brief, old Major, the pig, shortly before his death, delivers himself of the lessons of his life for the benefit of the animals of Mr. Jones's Manor Farm, pointing out to them how they have been exploited by Man (capitalism) and urging the revolutionary establishment of a better society (The Communist Manifesto). The animals drive Mr. Jones off the farm and hold it against his attempts to regain possession (Revolution and defeat of the Counter-revolution). Led by two pigs, Napoleon (Stalin), more or less in the background, and Snowball (Trotsky, with a soupçon of Lenin—for simplicity's sake, Vladimir Ilyitch is left out of the picture, entering it only as a deus ex machina who shares with Marx old Major's identity, and with Trotsky, Snowball's) the animals institute a regime free of Man, based on collective ownership, socialized production, equality, etc. The pigs, who are the most intelligent animals, form a bureaucracy which does not at first enjoy many privileges, this development being held over until the factional dispute over the rate of industrialization and the strategy of World Revolution begins, Snowball-Trotsky is exiled, and Napoleon-Stalin comes to power. Then we have, in their animal equivalent, the important episodes of hardship and famine, growth of nationalism, suspension of workers' rights and privileges, frame-ups, Moscow Trials, fake confessions, purges, philosophical revisions—"All animals are equal" becoming, "All animals are equal, but some animals are more equal than others"—the Stalin-Hitler pact, etc.—all of which is more interesting as an exercise in identification than as a story in its own right.

What I found most troublesome was the question that attended my reading—what is the point of "Animal Farm"? Is it that the pigs, with the most piggish pig supreme, will always disinherit the sheep and the horses? If so, why bother with a debunking fable; why not, à la James Burnham, give assent to the alleged historical necessity? But it is not so—for which we have Orwell's own word in a recent article in Polemic attacking Burnham. And if we are not to draw the moldy moral of the pig, what then?

Though Orwell, I am sure, would not seriously advance the bad-man theory of history, it appears that he has, nevertheless, drawn on it for the purpose of writing "Animal Farm." There are only two motives operating in the parable (which is already an oversimplification to the point of falsity, if we take the parable as intended); one of them, a good one, Snowball's, is defeated, and the only other, the bad one, Napoleon's, succeeds, presumably because history belongs to the most unscrupulous. I do not take this to be Orwell's own position, for his work has shown that he knows it to be false and a waste of time in historical analysis; it is, however, the position of his imagination, as divorced from what he knows—a convenient ground, itself a fable, to set his fable on. (If Marxism has really failed, the most ironic thing about its failure is that it should be attributed to the piggishness of human nature.) It is at this point that a failure of imagination—failure to expand the parable, to incorporate into it something of the complexity of the real event—becomes identical with a failure in politics. The story, which is inadequate as a way into the reality, also falls short as a way out; and while no one has a right to demand of "Animal Farm" that it provide a solution to the Russian problem—something it never set out to do—it is nevertheless true that its political relevance is more apparent than real. It will offer a kind of enlightment to those who still need it, say, the members of the Book of the Month Club, but beyond this it has no politics at all.

Another way of making this point is to compare "Animal Farm" with Koestler's "Darkness at Noon." Rubashov, also faced with the triumph of the pig, at least asks why the pig is so attractive, why he wins out over the good. This is a question that can no longer be answered by stating that the pig wins out. It is a more sophisticated question, for it realizes that the fact of the triumph is already known, and a more important one, for it leads to an examination of the pig's supremacy along two divergent lines, by way of a specific Marxist analysis of history, or a criticism of Marxism in general, both engaging the imagination at a crucial point. But Orwell's method, of taking a well worn fact that we know and converting it, for lack of better inspiration, into an imaginative symbol, actually falsifies the fact; thus over-extended, the fact of Stalinist "human nature," the power-drive of the bureaucracy, ceases to explain anything, and even makes one forget what it is to which it does apply. An indication that a middle of the way imagination, working with ideas that have only a half-way scope, cannot seriously deal with events that are themselves extreme. There is, however, some value in the method of "Animal Farm," provided it is timely, in the sense, not of newspapers, but of history, in advance of the news. But this is to say that "Animal Farm" should have been written years ago; coming as it does, in the wake of the event, it can only be called a backward work.

ISAAC ROSENFELD

The Play That Thought

THE PLAYWRIGHT AS THINKER. By Eric Bentley. Reynal and Hitchcock. $3.

A FEW years ago a weird little satire (at one time called "Foolscap," but it had as many titles almost as performances) appeared briefly on Broadway. The principal characters were George Bernard Shaw and Luigi Pirandello—who, injured in an automobile accident, were taken to the nearest hospital, which happened to be an insane asylum. Recovering, they resolved to write a play employing as characters the inmates and their dream selves. The result was sheer tomfoolery involving God and Cleopatra and a preface by Shaw which was longer than the play, of course, and some hocus-pocus by Pirandello about who was really who. It was an unimportant, rather vulgar play, but it demonstrated clearly the bewilderment of the modern theater and the modern audience at what two of its most important contributors were trying to do and say.

There have been a good many books of criticism which have attempted to remove this bewilderment. Mr. Bentley's is the latest and, in many ways, the most successful. It is clear, straight-forward, and written with enthusiasm. More important, it is not doctrinaire, save in its willingness to consider seriously any genuinely modern development in dramatic art. Mr. Bentley does not resist attempts to break with the well-made play, nor does he believe that any form which makes such an attempt is necessarily an improvement. But "The Playwright as Thinker" is not as dispassionate as its title and its willingness to see both the good and bad in every playwright, might lead you to expect. For Mr. Bentley is following the quest of the modern writer to express in dramatic terms the attitude of his time. It has been a quest as full of blood, sweat, and tears, as ever the life of a tragic hero could be, and that it is not yet ended Mr. Bentley indicates by enclosing his study in the ironical parenthesis of a consideration of the recent offerings of Broadway and the deficiencies of the college and little theaters.

The modern drama begins with the introduction of naturalism into the theater, with such plays as Hebbel's "Maria Magdalena," and with the concomitant discovery that the basic conflict might be a conflict of ideas as well as a conflict between a black villain and a white hero. To be sure in the older drama, in Shakespeare, the conflict between medieval and Renaissance ideas was reflected, but Shakespeare did not feel the necessity of choosing sides. The winds of doctrine began to blow more sharply in the nineteenth century, however, and the modern playwright, like the modern artist generally, felt called upon to choose sides and to fight. The modern dramatist no longer writes a prologue to put his audience in a receptive frame of mind. Instead he writes a preface, after the fact, to defend his world-view or his aesthetic theory which, in some instances, only further emphasizes the gulf between the artist and his intended audience.

With all the good-will in the world, it must be recognized that the playwright as thinker has not been able to put himself en rapport with his audience. It is not enough to say that modern culture—industrialism, capitalism, and the democratic movement—has created a demand that the drama should be obvious if not crude. The older dramatists were able to appeal on several levels when they were willing to subject themselves to the discipline required. After all, Mr. Evan's recent "Ur-Hamlet" was no more popular or successful than his former "uncut" version. And the great popular success of Shaw's "Candida" (which Mr. Bentley's shrewd analysis proves to be a very "unpleasant play" indeed) demonstrates how the toughest dialectical struggle may be dramatized in human terms.

The greatest of the early dramatic thinkers, Ibsen, has been classified as a writer of sociological treatises. But the sociological treatises of a past generation commonly are consigned to the job of collecting dust in libraries. The occasional revival of "Ghosts" or "A Doll's House" shows few signs of dust. Perhaps the problems are antiquated, as immediate problems are apt to become, but the problems of Mrs. Alving or Nora, like the inciting incident in Lear, are, to quote Mr. Bayes, "but to bring in fine things." The terrible story of Mrs. Alving is as universal in its implications as the terrible story of Othello, and therein lies the power and permanence of Ibsen. Mr. Bentley concludes from the practice of our more advanced dramatists that there is something old-fashioned in the "peep-show theater of illusion, suspense, individual psychology, and domestic tragedy." But it is hard to see what the drama is to be if it is not to be the mirror of nature, of human nature.

The unique tool of the dramatist, after all, is the actor, and his chief problem may well be what to do with him. There are plenty of evidences before us today of the unscrupulous use of the living actor to give a sense of life to the one-dimensional shadows of what Mr. Bentley calls commodity drama. There is likewise evidence, though seldom on the stage, of an uninformed use of actors as ideological puppets. This is not progress in art, or modernism, but atavism, a return to the medieval. It is not myth-making, but allegory-making. It took the English drama many generations to shake off the bonds of the dramatized sermon, for lively Vice to crowd deadly Prudentia into the wings. But the Epic Theater—of which the Living Newspaper and the radio documentary are developments—is perilously close to "The Castle of Perseverance."

Every reader must concur with Mr. Bentley as he finds the commercial theater shallow and uninspired. Yet of the major playwrights he selects for discussion and analysis, Hebbel, Ibsen, Wagner, Shaw (the chapters on Shaw are outstanding, in striking contrast with the windy nonsense which the recent birthday celebration evoked), Pirandello, and even the somewhat tricksy Strindberg, each shows inescapably that individual and human forces are at work: representationalism is something which the drama cannot wholly discard without turning to marionettes. The dramatist need not be excluded by his form from the "more philosophical and partisan reasoning of modern art," but neither should he neglect the power of identification which is implicit in the form. One conclusion to be drawn from this study of the modern drama is that the Ibsen of our day, if we are to have one, must surely speak in terms of recognizable men and women, whatever he may be hopefully doing at bottom.

ALAN DOWNER

Nationalism

THE NATIONALITIES OF EUROPE AND THE GROWTH OF NATIONAL IDEOLOGIES. By H. Munro Chadwick. The Macmillan Company. $4.

NATIONALITIES AND NATIONAL MINORITIES. By Oscar I. Janowsky. The Macmillan Company. $2.75.

EASTERN EUROPE BETWEEN THE WARS 1918-1941. By Hugh Seton-Watson. The Macmillan Company. $6.50.

NATIONALISM AND AFTER. By Edward Hallett Carr. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

IT is not by mere chance that within the last six months four books have appeared which deal with more or less the same problem. Nationalism, this problem child of our age, the foundation of sovereignty and the stumbling block of international relations, has—strangely enough—never cropped up in the discussions of the United Nations; no one wanted to complicate his power politics by conjuring up this specter haunting international peace.

Professor Chadwick calls nationalism a "vivifying and inspiring force" which has an ugly side only when it is associated with aggression. His book is devoted to the history of languages and the formation of the linguistic map of Europe. It was upon historical grounds, we are told, that the Germans based their claim to domination. Yet before the Emperor Joseph II, the Holy Roman Empire, in spite of its adjective "deutscher Nation," was devoid of German nationalism; it took Bismarck to make the Germans nationally conscious. In spite of a one-sided approach and of some errors, the author has made a valuable contribution to the better understanding of a troublesome question.

Less historical is Professor Janowsky's aspect of nationalism, which may be tolerant as in America and England or intolerant as in the "war-breeding zone of East-Central Europe." There is a flaw in his argument that "Americanization is positive, requiring all to learn the English language and to become associated with all embracing American culture." What else did Prussianization or Magyarization require? And it was hardly a comfort to the Irish that the efforts to obliterate their native culture were used "but as a means of countering disloyalty." By praising nationalism in some countries, but censuring it in the "war-breeding zone," the author seems to overlook the fact that nationalism is twofold and aggressive only in its political manifestation. France and Germany fought many wars, but none over the superiority of Voltaire or Goethe. The greater aggressiveness of nationalism in East-Central Europe was partly due to Ottoman and Habsburg imperialism, which retarded its development. It was the overbearing Drang nach Osten and the German-British rivalry for world markets that was the real cause of the two wars, not the Sarajevo murder or even "the depravity deeply imbedded in the teachings of respectable Junkers." The most valuable contributions of the book are Professor Janowsky's analysis of the multi-national states, and his suggestion that national federalism be combined with economic unity in the reorganization of this region.

Hugh Seton-Watson arrives at a similar conclusion; but he realizes that any federation in Eastern Europe depends primarily on social changes and relations with the Great Powers. The authority of his thinking is the result of thorough study, of an exhaustive knowledge of the languages and countries of Eastern Europe. His work deals with the struggle of minorities, but within the frame of political history between the two wars. This is, before everything, the history of the peasantry; in discussing the agrarian problem he makes a praiseworthy attempt to escape misleading propaganda, but occasionally without success. It was certainly not the sudden death of Count Bethlen's Minister of "Completely fascinating"

—SATURDAY REVIEW OF LITERATURE

The Little Magazine

By FREDERICK J. HOFFMAN, CHARLES ALLEN, and CAROLYN F. ULRICH. The bizarre history of the rebels of contemporary literature . . . the brilliant, esoteric "little magazines", among them The Little Review, Broom, transition, which have introduced many of the century's outstanding writers. "Indispensable for the young writer marooned on our cultural desert island."—Chicago Sun. "An illuminating volume . . . a considerable service to American letters."—New York Times.

With a 165-page Bibliography of over 500 little magazines published in English in the 20th century. 464 pages, illustrated, $3.75

At your bookstore
PRINCETON UNIVERSITY PRESS

The Nation Associates

Announces

A Pacific Coast Conference and Dinner on the Challenge of the Post-War World to the Liberal Movement

September 21-22, 1946

AMBASSADOR HOTEL LOS ANGELES

★

Dinner Speakers

Hon. THURMAN W. ARNOLD
FREDA KIRCHWEY
Editor, The Nation
Senator WAYNE L. MORSE of Oregon
DORE SCHARY
BARTLEY C. CRUM Presiding

•

Dinner Committee

Honorary Chairman
THOMAS MANN

Co-Chairmen
BARTLEY C. CRUM
BETTE DAVIS

Associate Chairmen
EDDIE CANTOR
Hon. HELEN GAHAGAN DOUGLAS
Hon. ROBERT W. KENNY
DUDLEY NICHOLS
ALLEN RIVKIN

•

Reservations for the dinner at $7.50 per person and information about the conference may be obtained at the offices:

THE NATION ASSOCIATES
Room 1114 Taft Building
Hollywood, California
GLadstone 6121

Agriculture that caused "a fairly generous land reform" to be abandoned (p. 77); the various governments of the counter-revolution had consistently worked against it, as the author himself admits. Slight errors like this one do not mar the detailed and valuable picture of these national and international struggles. Nationalism was the foundation of what Seton-Watson calls "small power imperialism," but nationalism has been the villain in the play which big power imperialism has staged in Eastern Europe. Seton-Watson candidly admits that "Munich was the greatest defeat . . . suffered by Britain since the loss of the American colonies," but forgets to mention that the French system of alliances was wrecked less by Italian policy than by the policy which encouraged the rearmament of Germany and her satellites.

Whether Professor Becker is justified in believing that nationalism cannot be abated or sovereignty curbed remains open to discussion. It has to be admitted that Dante and Goethe have preceded Mussolini and Hitler, and will survive their memory. There is no reason to assume that creative nationalism cannot continue unless one nation exterminates or enslaves others. Consequently the optimistic outlook offered by Professor Carr is most gratifying. His little book once more substantiates T. H. Huxley's dictum: "Size is not grandeur." Professor Carr points to the absence of any trace of national exaltation on the outbreak of the last war, in contrast to the patriotic fervour of 1914. "National hatreds have lost their old spontaneous frankness and mask themselves in ideological trappings." After examining the periods of its development Professor Carr concludes that World War II "may well turn out to have been the last triumph of the old fissiparous nationalism," just as toleration followed the religious wars of the seventeenth century. But stability and security of an international order can be achieved, Professor Carr believes, only by "a balanced structure . . . for the planned development of the economies of geographical areas and groups of nations."

This opinion may be optimistic, but it is certain that war cannot be banned by juggling the traditional idols of national sovereignty, as the League did and as the United Nations still do. Whoever will become the first hero of peace—by explaining to the Security Council that Dante, Cervantes, and Goethe are not the necessary precursors of Mussolini, Franco, and Hitler—will do a greater service to mankind than all the pygmy statesmen and diplomats who protect their sovereignties by hurling innuendos and invectives at each other.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

MOTION PICTURE

FRANK BORZAGE'S

"I'VE ALWAYS LOVED YOU"

in TECHNICOLOR

LOEW'S Cool CRITERION BROADWAY & FORTY-FIFTH STREET

MOTION PICTURES

NEVER BEFORE SUCH LUXURIOUS... RIOTOUS... LOVING AND LIVING!

G. C. F. presents

VIVIEN LEIGH • CLAUDE RAINS

in Bernard Shaw's

"CAESAR AND CLEOPATRA"

PRODUCED AND DIRECTED BY Gabriel Pascal

*By Arrangement with DAVID O. SELZNICK

NOW ASTOR B'WAY & 45th ST.

POPULAR PRICES

PARAMOUNT Presents

BOB HOPE

JOAN CAULFIELD

in

MONSIEUR BEAUCAIRE

Produced by Paul Jones • Directed by George Marshall

IN PERSON

CHARLIE SPIVAK AND ORCHESTRA

Bob Evans The Arnaut Brothers

EXTRA ADDED ATTRACTION

PEGGY LEE

TIMES Square PARAMOUNT Midnight Feature Nightly

NOW! AIR-CONDITIONED

The THEATRE GUILD presents

LAURENCE OLIVIER

in William Shakespeare's

"HENRY V"

IN TECHNICOLOR • Released Thru United Artists

PRICES: Evgs. (at 8:30) $2.40, $1.80 Mats. daily (at 2:30) $1.80, $1.20

ALL SEATS RESERVED

NOW! GOLDEN THEATRE 252 West 45th St.

Buy All the Bonds You Can...

Keep All the Bonds You Buy

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST.
near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM'S

'OF HUMAN BONDAGE'

STARRING

Eleanor PARKER • Paul HENREID • Alexis SMITH

-AND-

'JANIE GETS MARRIED' Joan LESLIE Robert HUTTON

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL B'way & 62 St.

CLAUDETTE COLBERT : JOHN WAYNE

In MERVYN LEROY'S Production of

'WITHOUT RESERVATIONS'

WITH DON DEFORE

From the Novel, "Thanks, God; I'll Take It From Here" By JANE ALLEN and MAE LIVINGSTON

—AND—

'THE SPIDER' Richard CONTE • Faye MARLOWE

STAGE PLAYS

THEATRE GUILD'S PRODUCTIONS

THE MUSICAL HIT

CAROUSEL

Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille

with John Raitt — Iva Withers

Jean Darling • Eric Mattson • Norma Howard • Jean Casto

AIR-COND. MAJESTIC Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway, Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT

OKLAHOMA!

Based on Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs"

Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille

Jack Kilty • David Burns • Betty Jane Watson • Ruth Weston

AIR-COND. ST. JAMES Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway, Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." — Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN

LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH. 4-4258

Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40. AIR-COND.

"MERMAN'S A WOW!"—Chapman, News

RICHARD RODGERS and OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd Present

ETHEL MERMAN in

"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"

Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS

with RAY MIDDLETON

Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

IMPERIAL THEA., 45th St. W. of Bway. Mats. Wed. & Sat. Air-Cond.

Letters to the Editors

Jewish Immigration

Dear Sirs: The Byrnes proposal of unification of the four occupation zones of Germany leads to the question why in other administrative matters the British and the United States zones should not be considered as a unit. With the unpardonable delay in executing the recommendations of the Anglo-American Palestine Commission, steps should be taken not only to distribute the displaced persons over a larger area, but also to take out those who are able to leave.

Under President Truman's directive of December 22, 1945, displaced persons under corporate affidavits and relatives of United States citizens with individual affidavits can emigrate to the United States if their residence is in the American zone. Many Jews in Berlin, as well as in Vienna, who have satisfactory affidavits from relatives, are unable to come to the United States because they live in the British sector of the city. It is reported from Berlin and Vienna that it is impossible to find enough Jewish and non-Jewish refugees whose status complies with the Truman directive.

On one hand we are trying to approach the unification of the various zones of Germany, and on the other we do not allow people living in the British section of a partitioned city to emigrate to the United States. Since the British zone can supply immigrants, it is wise to take this advantage.

I believe that we are obligated to encourage these people, who have sacrificed so much during the last five years. We have to open new avenues for them on which to rebuild their lives. If we fail them, we destroy the very foundation upon which democracy is built. Their enforced stay in Berlin, Vienna, and other parts of the British zone, for technical reasons only, must be considered as an unjust punishment.

KURT R. GROSSMAN

Kew Gardens, N. Y., August 5

Los Alamos Approved

Dear Sirs: After reading "Los Alamos, New Mexico" by Alden Stevens (The Nation, August 3), I feel like sending you this letter of appreciation.

I lived in Los Alamos for over a year as one of the "tough" machinists mentioned in the article. Thus I am fully qualified to say Mr. Stevens has done a one hundred per cent fair and accurate job of reporting.

It is extremely difficult for any writer to characterize and to generalize without being trite and flat. Mr. Stevens has managed to catch the general mood encountered in Los Alamos, which is hard to describe and which is distinctively different from any other place in the United States.

WALTER GERSTEL

Berkeley, Calif., August 15

Los Alamos Regretted

Dear Sirs: Having just seen motion pictures of the last Bikini explosion, I have still greater regret that Alden Stevens expressed approval of the work done at Los Alamos. The intelligent, cooperative people there, he says, "can take satisfaction in the fact that their work together

JUST OFF THE PRESS

Two Booklets by Bertrand Russell

1. IDEAS THAT HAVE HARMED MANKIND. Man's Unfortunate Experiences with His Self-Made Enemies, Including Sadistic Impulses, Religions, Superstition, Envy, Economic Nationalism, Pride, Racism, Sex Superiority, Creeds, and Other Evil Things. 25c.

This new booklet (5½x8½ inches in size), by Bertrand Russell, contains the following sub-heads: 1. Principal Causes Are Human. 2. Man's Worst Enemy—Man. 3. Our Sadistic Impulses. 4. The Place of Religion in Man's Cruel Record. 5. The Psycho-Analysts Take a Look. 6. Emotions and Superstition. 7. Envy as a Source of False Beliefs. 8. The False Philosophy of Economic Nationalism. 9. False Beliefs Bred by Pride. 10. Pride of Race. 11. The Superstition of Male Superiority. 12. Some Bad Effects of Male Domination. 13. Class Distinctions. 14. The Delusion of Divine Favor. 15. The Chances Are That Our Ideas Are Wrong. 16. What Social Science Can Do. 17. What the World Needs.

2. IDEAS THAT HAVE HELPED MANKIND. A Philosopher Looks at Man's Long History, Points to the Things That Moved Him Forward, and Shows What We Must Do in the Near Future if Civilization Is to Continue to Grow. 25c.

This second booklet (also 5½x8½ inches in size), by Bertrand Russell, contains the following sub-heads: 1. How is Mankind Helped? 2. What Civilization Has Taught Us. 3. Man's Great Steps. 4. The Art of Writing. 5. What the Greeks Did. 6. Aristotle's Four Kinds of Cause. 7. The Contributions of Galileo, Descartes, Newton, and Leibniz. 8. The Law of Inertia. 9. Knowledge of Natural Laws. 10. Geology and Darwinism Undermine Faith. 11. Our Stock of Moral Ideas. 12. The Brotherhood of Man. 13. Liberty, Equality, and Fraternity. 14. Religious Toleration. 15. Free Press and Speech. 16. Democracy. 17. Wanted—An International Government. 18. The New Freedom.

The above booklets were written especially for Haldeman-Julius Publications by Bertrand Russell, the distinguished philosopher, logician, mathematician, and Freethinker. These freshly written essays are now published for the first time.

If you want both booklets, remit 50c and they will be sent prepaid. Be sure to quote the titles you want—1. IDEAS THAT HAVE HARMED MANKIND. 2. IDEAS THAT HAVE HELPED MANKIND.

Bertrand Russell recently said that he enjoyed writing booklets for E. Haldeman-Julius because he is given the fullest freedom of expression. In fact, it is only in essays written for Haldeman-Julius that Dr. Russell can give circulation to the mind-liberating thoughts he feels should be made known to the average person. Most standard publishers are afraid to issue works that are frowned on by the orthodox and conventional. Such a restriction is never encountered in the editorial department of the H-J. Publications. In the booklets listed in this announcement Dr. Russell offers the literate a feast of reason, information, logic, wit and rollicking humor.

In addition to the titles listed above, we have eight Bertrand Russell booklets, as follows:

THE VALUE OF FREE THOUGHT. How to Become a Truth-Seeker and Break the Chains of Mental Slavery. 25c.

AN OUTLINE OF INTELLECTUAL RUBBISH. A Hilarious Catalog of Organized and Individual Stupidity. 25c.

HOW TO READ AND UNDERSTAND HISTORY. The Past as the Key to the Future. 25c.

HOW TO BECOME A PHILOSOPHER, A LOGICIAN, AND A MATHEMATICIAN. 30c.

WHAT CAN A FREE MAN WORSHIP? 6c.

WHY I AM NOT A CHRISTIAN. 6c

HAS RELIGION MADE USEFUL CONTRIBUTIONS TO CIVILIZATION? 6c.

A LIBERAL VIEW OF DIVORCE. 6c.

Take your pick. If you want all 10 booklets by Bertrand Russell send $1.75 and they will be shipped prepaid. Ask for BERTRAND RUSSELL'S 10 BOOKLETS. Mail orders to:

E. HALDEMAN-JULIUS, BOX R-1942, GIRARD, KANSAS

. . . helped to bring a swifter end to the war and saved many American lives." The implication is that the far greater number of Japanese lives lost, the great cities destroyed, are not even worth a thought. Gandhi is quoted as saying the atomic bomb had destroyed America's soul. In the end, may not millions of lives—yes, American lives, too—be sacrificed to the fear aroused by our invention and by the memory of its needless use against civilians?

EDWARD S. ALLEN

Ames, Ia., August 21

Opposition to Chisholm

Dear Sirs: Please accept a mild protest against the cosmology and ethics of G. Brock Chisholm which are obviously unworthy of The Nation's pages. As an idle mid-summer pastime, this sort of speculation may have its interest, but it offers us cold comfort indeed. If you read his articles carefully (The Nation, July 20-27, 1946) you will see that they undermine most of the assumptions on which a liberal journal should operate: namely, that since man has survived so far and is still surviving, what he does, how he lives, and what he believes are of infinite importance to him, and that conscience is not simply a childhood hangover. Life is tough, but don't let The Nation lose its nerve too.

R. W. FLINT

Dennis, Mass., August 2

Research on Gissing

Dear Sirs: I am engaged in research on George Gissing and would like to appeal to your readers for permission to see any letters of Gissing's. He spent some time in America, and letters from him may still be in existence. If any reader has such letters, I would appreciate it if he would write to me as soon as possible, my address is c/o Miss Clayson, 60 New Oxford St., London, W. C. 1, England. JAMES PATERSON

London, July 16

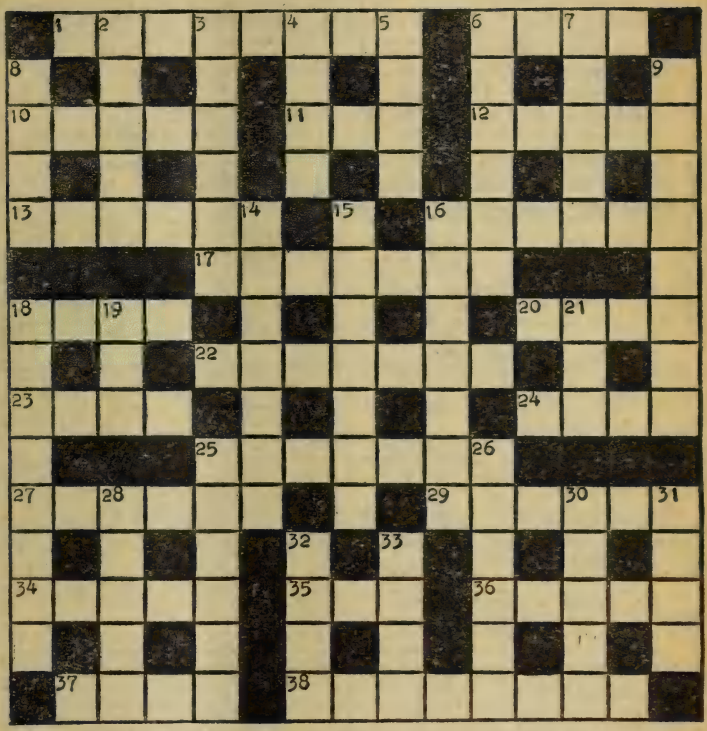
Loan for Palestine

Dear Sirs: Regarding the Palestine partition proposal, if the United States is supposed to put up $300,000,000 for Arab welfare, why not use the money to buy all of Palestine and consider that money as a long-term loan to a new Jewish state? Certainly world Jewry would underwrite such a solution to a thorny problem. LEONARD GORDON

Los Angeles, August 14

Crossword Puzzle No. 177

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 The 119th Psalm is in the form of one
6 Wine for a cast iron inside
10 In Capri lovely, and in England
11 Mightier than the sword — you can sign checks with it!
12 It's not done
13 Pass between India and Afghanistan
16 Roman for "bloke"?
17 France's Cote d'Azur
18 Carries the horn in the hunt
20 This vehicle needs a "shuvver"
22 Not a rickshaw coolie
23 To come home thus is surely to enjoy more than a walk-over?
24 Very little is needed to make a happy one, said the old Roman
25 Appointed as ruler over (3 and 4)
27 A maker of wheels, ships or plays
29 What 13 is
34 Of birds
35 Pretty cool
36 One who glides over the snows to heaven?
37 Move round and 'round
38 External

DOWN

2 A tasty dish
3 Comparatively greasy
4 Sound sleepers
5 Sealskin? No, rabbit
6 Hun king
7 French tobacco
8 It is the dog-watch on board, no doubt
9 Study a French river: you take it in its course
14 Vile rut with water in it
15 His is the grimmest of crimes
16 Is this one of the reasons why China is not a sea power?
18 Panama (5 and 3)
19 Object
21 French king
25 Kicked up more with leg than foot, apparently 26 A cattleman or poker player, perhaps
28 This sort of building requires no camouflage
30 Ignatius' diminutive offspring
31 Pound of poetry
32 Comb factory
33 A Tory in disguise

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 176

ACROSS:—1 SETTING; 5 WHATNOT; 9 ISHMAEL; 10 SCARCER; 11 CUTTY; 12 PARAMOUNT; 14 FAST; 15 LUMINOL; 18 TUB; 20 EWE; 21 READERS; 23 PERE; 26 CHARABANC; 28 THREE; 29 LYING TO; 30 EXAMPLE; 31 RANKEST; 32 SENATOR.

DOWN:—1 STITCH; 2 TAHITI; 3 IN ANY CASE; 4 GALIPOT; 5 WASTREL; 6 ALARM; 7 NOCTURNE; 8 THROTTLE; 13 HUE; 16 MARK TWAIN; 17 OWN; 18 TRICOLOR; 19 BAVARIAN; 22 SEAPORT; 24 PACKETS; 24 ARMPIT; 25 VENEER; 27 ANGLE.

SCHOOLS

LAKEWOOD
MODERN SCHOOL
A residential school for boys and girls from 7 to 12 years of age. Small group. Personal supervision.
Write:
JAMES and NELLIE DICK
115 Carey Street • Lakewood, N. J.
Phone: Lakewood 6-1007

Metropolitan Music School, Inc.
111 West 88th St. N.Y.C. 24 TR 4-4733
Children and Adults. All instruments, voice and theoretical subjects. Pre-school classes. Guitar as applied to Folk Music, Jazz Master Class in improvisation. Instructor: Teddy Wilson
REGISTER NOW • BULLETIN AVAILABLE

DRAMA INSTRUCTION

ACTING—STAGE and RADIO taught by professional Actor-Director. Veteran, over 12 years experience. D. BERGER, 305 Haven Avenue, N. Y. 33.

LANGUAGES

LINGUAPHONE MAKES LANGUAGES EASY. At home learn to speak Spanish, French, German, Russian or any of 29 languages by quick, easy Linguaphone Conversational Method. You learn by listening. Save time, work, money. Send for FREE book. Linguaphone Institute, 81 RCA Bldg., New York 20, N. Y.

ALL LANGUAGES. Phonograph Courses. Linguaphone, other makes. Sold, bought, rented. A. Alin, 475 5th Avenue, New York 17. MU 3-1093.

MAGAZINE SUBSCRIPTIONS

SUBSCRIBE FOR PERIODICALS simply by asking me for them; any number in one order. Pay after I bill you at publishers' lowest prices. Catalog NA, Free. John Crehore, Walpole, N. H.

PUBLICATIONS

CONTROVERSY Magazine publishes ALL articles and letters submitted. Write CONTROVERSY Magazine, 516 N. St. Clair St., Pittsburgh, Pa.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis. Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocational psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

Buy Your Books Through
THE Nation

• Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price, post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible.

Please address your orders to
THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
THE NATION
20 VESEY STREET
New York 7, N. Y

RESORTS

Return from a Vacation
Looking Fine — Feeling Fine
From
WESTERN VIEW FARM.
high in the Connecticut Hills, you can return tanned, glowing and invigorated, and with happy memories of the warm hospitality of an Inn which is in its Twenty-seventh season under the same ownership and management.
Rates per person, $12.00 a day, $70.00 a week
Week-ends, Friday evening to Sunday evening, $24.
TED OHMER
New Milford, Connecticut Tel.: New Milford 440

KINAPIC LODGE
LOVELL VILLAGE MAINE
On LAKE KEZAR, one of America's most beautiful lakes
Cabins on the lake, American plan, informal, for adults and family groups. Water sports, good golf, fine lake and stream fishing. Excellent Hungarian cuisine.
Open June 1 to Oct 15. Reserve now.
Booklet by Mail, or Phone Lovell: Ring 12 A

REAL ESTATE FOR SALE

$2.25 per square foot for 55,000 square feet, with perpetual use without cost of 400 h.p. (New York Power & Light Corporation). Two brick and stone, sprinklered buildings, 4 stories and basement, elevators, about 16 acres land; at Stuyvesant Falls, 9 miles from Hudson, N. Y. Immediate occupancy. An offering of inestimable value to a concern using power. Formerly textile mill and battery plant. Price $123,750. Owner, Room 820 No. 9 East 46th Street. Plaza 3-7510.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

CENTRAL hallway colonial; 8 rooms; electric and running water; view; ski run; small creek; orchard; asphalt road; privacy; 16 miles from Tanglewood Festival; splendid barn with 30 stanchions and drinking cups. 100 acres. $7,000. Berkshire Farm Agency, East Chatham, N. Y.

HELP WANTED

UNIQUE SCHOLASTIC OPPORTUNITY
PROMINENT educational project affiliated with major university offers minimum of 14 months full-time work in Chicago at excellent salary on stimulating, broadening research job under direct supervision of well-known scholar, to several qualified persons. Must be alert, analytical, well-read, have some graduate background, willing to work intensively. Write for interview giving full particulars.
Box 1646, c/o The Nation.

SITUATIONS WANTED

YOUNG WOMAN DESIRES POSITION TRAVELING as private secretary. College graduate specializing in commercial teaching and business administration with varied experience in social work, industrial and economic research. Box 1642, c/o The Nation.

SOUTHERN COLORED DOMESTIC and hotel workers desire jobs. Write for list today (stamps). QUALITY EMPLOYMENT ASSN., 214 East Clay Street, Richmond 19, Va.

TOBACCO

CIGARETTES—Popular brands; minimum 3 cartons. Price $1.40 per carton; postpaid. Send check or money order. Ace Mail Order Co., East Orange 1, N. J.

RESORTS

The Glenmere
Your private country estate while you are our guest.
In the Ramapos
CHESTER, N. Y.
21 Miles from New York City
Your private lake with beautiful white sand beach. Your private golf course. We offer you excellent accommodations, superb cuisine and every facility for your entertainment. Glenmere is a glorious place for your vacation.
N. Y. Office: RE. 2-5047

ROOMS WANTED

TEXAS ART STUDENT, male, unobtrusive, needs quiet room for living and painting in Central Manhattan. Box 1644 c/o The Nation.

EXECUTIVE wants room with bath three nights weekly. Mon., Wed., Thurs. W. GUTMAN, BArclay 7-0100 or Box 1645, c/o The Nation.

PLEASE! Apartment for young editress, out-of-towner, good job, 1-3 rooms, Village, Manhattan. Furn., unfurn. SHARE, ANYTHING! Box 1647, c/o The Nation.

CLASSIFIED ADVERTISING RATES:

62c a line (six words)

Minimum 3 lines

▼

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY ADVERTISING:

$6.16 an inch

▼

DISPLAY ADVERTISING:

Base rate, $250 per page.

Rates by classification, on request.

▼

THE NATION
20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y.
BA 7-1066

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • SEPTEMBER 14, 1946 NUMBER 11

The Shape of Things

THE TINY ATOM HAD A BIG WEEK, WITH three major news stories to its credit. In rising order of importance they were the indefinite postponement of the projected third bomb test at Bikini, the announcement that the navy was designing its new ships for service in an "atomic-age" fleet, and publication of a report on the costs of nuclear power production made to the United Nations Atomic Energy Commission. "Test Charlie," which was to have been the explosion of an atomic bomb two miles beneath the surface of Bikini Lagoon, is well abandoned. It would have cost more than $30,000,000 in money and rather more than that in what is left of international good-will, while adding little to what has already been learned. The redesigning of capital ships, so far as the announcement is not the usual navy bombast, is an ominous but inevitable reflection of failures in Paris and at Lake Success. But both these items shrivel into insignificance when compared with the U. N. survey, which merely states that even now the atom can be put to work producing electrical energy at an operating cost only 26 per cent higher than coal. The implications are too vast to be discussed here, but they raise certain obvious and far-reaching questions: First, if atomic energy can be produced by small powers as well as great, what will become of imperialism, lifelines, and the whole military-diplomatic pattern of struggle for dependent markets? Second, if such energy can be produced in areas now useless for lack of oil, coal, or water power, what barren stretches of the world may not be opened up to settlement? Third, if one pound of uranium can yield the power equivalent of 2,000,000 pounds of gasoline, what oil fields, in the Middle East or elsewhere, are worth a war? And finally, won't this peaceful atom make possible that very decentralization of industry which is a nation's only defense against paralysis by atomic bombs?

✶

CHESTER BOWLES IS BEING VINDICATED—but too late. The crux of his battle with Congress was the foolish question of whether a dike against inflation could be breached just a little bit and still be a dike. The maritime strike that strangled the ports of all three coasts last week proved more conclusively than any walkout so far that dikes are solid or they are meaningless. Other walkouts have demonstrated the inevitability with which labor will seek to compensate for higher prices by demands for higher wages, but it remained for the shipping strike to drive home to the government the complete folly of its equivocal position. For in this instance the wage demands were so clearly justified that the shippers agreed to meet them in full, only to have the Wage Stabilization Board rule against the increase. The board's ruling may have been well reasoned—as an isolated decision. But that is precisely the difficulty: no case is isolated. Having given the green light to indiscriminate price rises and having allowed corresponding wage increases elsewhere, why stop short with these particular employees? More particularly, why should a union that followed the prescribed course of collective bargaining be denied a hard-won gain? And why should an employer who has conformed to the Wagner Act, not to mention the unfortunate public, be penalized by a drastic strike? Yet if these A. F. of L. seamen are granted their demands, nothing will stop the C. I. O. maritime unions from making a similar request. And so the spiral will continue to mount. The crying need is not for a stern and arbitrary decision at the expense of this or that union or employer, but for a fundamental overhauling of the stabilization program, based on the long view, enforced by determined administrators, and unhampered by Congressmen who can see no farther than the next election.

✶

ALTHOUGH THE CONFERENCE ON PALESTINE has opened in London under gloomy auspices, close observers insist that a small possibility of success remains. At least the chief interested parties have taken care to provide themselves with pathways of retreat from positions which would rule out all hope of agreement. The Palestinian Arabs stayed away in protest against Britain's refusal to accept the Mufti, but the leaders of the Arab League have arrived; and if they came to London only to repeat their old formulas, why did they come at all? The Jewish Agency has declined to join in discussions based on the federation plan put forward by the British, but it has taken a long step in the direction of compromise by agreeing to consider the establishment of a Jewish state "in an adequate area" of Palestine—in other words, partition, with full rights of self-government. As for the British, they are said to be willing to modify

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things 281
Propping Up Chiang Kai-shek 284
The Byrnes Speech by Freda Kirchwey 285

ARTICLES

Shadows by Gaslight by Tris Coffin 286
Europe, Russia, and America by Reinhold Niebuhr 288
Depression Round the Corner? by Seymour Harris 290
Counter-Revolution in China by Hugh Deane 292
Placebos in Medicine—and Elsewhere by Martin Gumpert 294
The Voice of America—Who Listens? by J. Q. Riznik 295
Nehru Takes Control by Shiva Rao 297
In the Wind 298

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

The Dilemma of the Churches by Albert Guérard 299
No Longer and Not Yet by Hannah Arendt 300
Similes and Satire by Arthur Mizener 302
Dissonant Fanfare by Rolfe Humphries 303
Films by James Agee 305

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 306

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 178 by Jack Barrett 307

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon — Washington Editor I. F. Stone — Literary Editor Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editor: Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

their own plan if they can win the Arab League over. Since the Arab leaders undoubtedly share Britain's growing apprehensions about Russian pressure in the Middle East, some observers believe they may prove more amenable than in the past, especially if their feelings are salved by the promise of financial compensation. (But where is the money to come from? Mr. Truman cannot risk any commitments that require Congressional action.) Apparently the hopes expressed in London are based on the possibility that the Arabs will retreat far enough to permit the Jewish Agency to join the conference, and that all three interested parties will then agree upon a modified partition plan with broader provisions for self-government by both Arabs and Jews. The chance looks slim from this side of the Atlantic. It would be greatly improved if the British government would buttress its own efforts by calling off the system of raids and repressions and arrests that takes the place of government in Palestine.

✶

THERE IS NOT THE SLIGHTEST DOUBT AS TO who won the Chilean election. Gabriel Gonzalez Videla, candidate of the Radical Party, who had the support of almost the entire left, polled nearly 50,000 more votes than his nearest opponent, the rightist candidate, Eduardo Cruz Coke. However, the Chilean constitution provides that in the event no candidate obtains an absolute majority, Congress shall decide, within fifty days after the election, which of the two leading contestants is to become President. This leaves plenty of time for political intrigues and realignments. One possibility, for example, is that the Conservatives and Liberals, who ran separate slates in the election but now, in defeat, are drawing closer together, may join forces; then Congress might conceivably find an a posteriori argument for an absolute majority—though one unworthy of Chile's democratic record—by lumping the Conservative and Liberal votes. But if the President-makers try skullduggery of that sort, they will find themselves up against a real fighter. Though virtually unknown in the United States, Gonzalez Videla is one of the most courageous progressives of the Western Hemisphere. He received support from the Communists, but he is above all the leader of the Radical Party, and he does not intend to allow his opponents to turn their resounding defeat into a rigged victory. Without losing a moment's time he has called for a mass-meeting on September 8 of "all [his] supporters and all industrial, mining, agricultural, and other workers to reaffirm the leftist triumph at the polls." Gonzalez Videla will be remembered as the Chilean ambassador who during the occupation of France defied Vichy and the Germans in protecting Spanish Republicans who were in danger of being delivered over to Franco.

CHOOSING BETWEEN DEWEY AND MEAD FOR Governor and between Lehman and Ives for the Senate, New York voters will probably keep their emotions well under control. If the election were purely one of contending personalities, the campaign would be one of the least stimulating on record. Dewey's performance as Governor is not highly vulnerable, Mead has put in twenty-eight years as a ploddingly capable and consistently liberal legislator; and both Lehman and Ives would wear the Senatorial toga, if not with dash, at least with quiet distinction. But as the campaign develops, New Yorkers will doubtless have thrust upon them the knowledge that the ballot they cast in November will in a sense be a preliminary vote for 1948. A sweeping victory for Dewey would put him in a strong position for another try at the Presidency, and while he has administered the governorship with at least the competence of an able bookkeeper, Albany is a far cry from Washington. The picture of Dewey on the international stage—or the national stage for that matter—is almost enough to give President Truman, by comparison, the stature of a major statesman. This impression is in no way diminished by a reading of Mr. Dewey's acceptance speech. Unavoidably, he has taken over, almost in its entirety, the social program that Smith, Roosevelt, and Lehman made an integral part of the state's tradition in spite of bitter and prolonged Republican opposition. Yet, taking a full measure of credit for a program he did not initiate, he assails the Democrats for having, through such legislation, taken the country "step by step into a controlled and regimented society."

✶

THE BEST OF THE CONVENTION ORATORY, which is not as a rule intended for serious consumption, came from a Democrat who unfortunately is not a candidate for office. We refer to Mrs. Roosevelt's challenging keynote address, which neatly disposed of the standard Republican claim that the G. O. P. not only dotes on the progressive measures which it has been fighting fiercely for twelve years but would enforce them with far greater efficiency than the party that fathered them. "Administration is a question of choosing good administrators," Mrs. Roosevelt concluded, "but it is far more important in times such as these to put in office men who have the creative spirit and can accept unknown conditions and find solutions without always harking back to the security they knew in the past." A similar contrast between hollowness and substance is apparent in the platforms adopted by the two parties. The Republican document promises that the party will continue to give the state "the most humane, progressive, and truly liberal government in its history" and sedulously avoids details. The Democratic platform, on the other hand, takes on major issues with abandon—state, national, and international. It is for the Baruch plan and a system of reciprocal trade treaties; it "condemns the policy and acts of the British government in Palestine" and calls for "a just and not a punitive peace for a democratic Italy." With a frankness and courage rarely displayed in intra-party relations, it breaks sharply with the Southern Democrats. Dissolution of the Rankin committee is called for, as well as an anti-lynching law and abolition of the poll tax. And its Senatorial nominee is pledged by the platform to "support measures legally to eliminate Bilbo from federal office and influence." We have yet to hear an unkind word from Mr. Dewey about comparable afflictions in the Republican camp.

✶

TWO INCONSPICUOUS ITEMS APPEARING IN the last few days raise questions which almost certainly will not be answered. One was A. J. Liebling's story in last week's New Yorker about the death of a friend of his, a radio correspondent, who was machine-gunned back in 1943 while traveling in an American transport plane flying off its course over "friendly" territory—namely, Spanish Morocco. The plane, full of bullet holes, managed to get to French Morocco, but Mr. Liebling, then in Africa, assumed that the shooting had aroused great indignation in the United States. When he looked through the Times files on his return home, he found only the following notice under the smallest possible head:

> Mrs. Eduard Baudry has been advised of the death of her husband, thirty-three-year-old Canadian Broadcasting Company correspondent in North Africa. It was learned here today that Mr. Baudry was killed by anti-aircraft fire when the plane in which he was a passenger flew off its course and appeared over Spanish Morocco.

It would be pleasant to attribute this almost excessive restraint to the fact that, with the war still going on, an occasional small incident like a shot-at transport plane was bound to get overlooked. It would be more realistic to suppose that the United States wanted, at that moment, to keep Franco in a relatively friendly mood, while it sees no similar urgency about placating Yugoslavia.

✶

WE WERE EVEN MORE INTERESTED IN AN editorial note appearing in the New Statesman and Nation of August 31. After taking up in detail Tito's charge of frequent violations of Yugoslav sovereignty by United States planes (and ignoring, rather unaccountably, his earlier complaints about British violations), the London weekly reports almost casually, "The Yugoslavs state that a third plane was brought down, but that the evidence was so incriminating that no American protest was made about it. . . . " Do the Yugoslavs state this? If so, newspapers and radio in this country have conspired to conceal, or the government has censored, a most important piece of news—so important, in fact, that we cannot believe the Yugoslavs would tolerate its suppression. But the charge alone is enough to confirm our belief that the Yugoslav-American dispute should be laid before the Security Council or submitted to the new International Court of Justice. The events leading up to the attacks on our army transport planes represent an issue of fact, not to be disposed of by charges and denials or even by apologies and indemnities.

Propping Up Chiang Kai-shek

HUGH DEANE'S article on another page provides Nation readers with a comprehensive survey of the political situation in China and gives special significance to recent developments in United States policy toward the National Government of Chiang Kai-shek.

A fortnight or so ago there seemed to be a bare chance that General Marshall might achieve a last-minute miracle in China by persuading the Kuomintang and Communists to set up the coalition regime to which they committed themselves last January. A five-man committee consisting of two representatives from the Kuomintang and two from the Communists was formed under the chairmanship of Ambassador Stuart. But the committee has never met and probably never will. For while these negotiations were under way it was suddenly announced that arrangements had been completed for the transfer of $800,000,000 worth of surplus United States army property to the Chiang Kai-shek government. Thus in a single day the United States threw away the only effective weapon available to General Marshall in his effort to prevent China from being devastated by civil war.

President Truman's directive to General Marshall last December held a promise that if China would set up a democratic unified government, the United States would assist substantially in the country's reconstruction. Armed with this promise, General Marshall was able to beat down the military ambitions of the reactionary wing of the Kuomintang and force Chiang to agree, in principle, to a coalition regime. But while waiting for the new agreement to become operative, the United States made the inexcusable mistake of providing large-scale aid to Kuomintang forces fighting the Communists. This assistance has now been overshadowed by the virtually outright gift of 1,500,000 tons of American surplus goods in Okinawa. With such a huge volume of supplies assured—dwarfing the total amount of aid provided during the war—the Kuomintang is in a position to thumb its nose at Marshall's mediation efforts—which is precisely what it is doing. It is true that the surplus material is supposed to be of a civilian character and that the transfer of war planes and military supplies has been held up. But the power to distribute the goods rests with the Kuomintang, and such power is of immense military as well as political significance in a country like China, where the loyalty of the local military leaders is a salable commodity. Besides, a large proportion of the surplus material consists of trucks, road-building machinery, radio equipment, and other supplies which are adaptable to military as well as civilian uses.

Supposedly these goods were sold to China in exchange for a cancelation of the obligation which the United States incurred during the war for housing, airfields, and services to American troops. Actually the debts are largely fictitious. They were calculated on the basis of an artificial exchange rate which, in some instances, forced the United States to pay from ten to twenty times the market rate for the services rendered.

In support of this betrayal of the President's directive the American people are being treated to a high-pressure campaign picturing Chiang Kai-shek as a bulwark against Soviet encroachment in Asia. Representative Sikes of Florida, spokesman for a House Military Affairs subcommittee, is quoted as saying that Russia is making a bid for the control of all China. Life contains an article by a noted church leader, Dr. Henry P. Van Dusen of Union Theological Seminary, which declares that "China in Communist hands would be the most probably . . . prelude to World War III." He concludes "the United States must lend every practicable support" to the Kuomintang.

As is usual with such deductions, the fault lies not so much in the reasoning as in the premise upon which the reasoning is supposed to be based. So far there has been no evidence that Russia is seeking to dominate China. Reports from responsible newspaper correspondents agree that Russia is not only behaving with technical correctness in its dealings with China but that it has been leaning over backward even where Russian interests are involved. True, its activities in Manchuria—particularly the wholesale removal of machinery—showed little concern for the needs of its war-time ally, but on the other hand it has permitted the Chinese Eastern Railway, in which it has a half-interest, to be disrupted by Kuomintang military movements without taking action. It made only verbal protests against the murder of Soviet citizens by anti-Soviet mobs in Mukden and Changchun. Despite its sympathy with Chinese Communists, it has made no effort to help them with either personnel or supplies.

Put the shoe on the other foot, and it would be difficult indeed to deny that the United States is actively intervening in the internal affairs of China. We still maintain 50,000 marines in the country, although the pretext for sending them there has long since vanished. We have propped up a decrepit and corrupt anti-democratic regime and supplied it with sufficient arms to crush the liberal and Communist forces within the country. We are rapidly forcing all Chinese who want a better life to turn to Russia for assistance. We may build up Chiang Kai-shek as a bulwark against Russia, but in doing so we shall forfeit the support of 450,000,000 Chinese and sow the seeds of World War III.

The Byrnes Speech

BY FREDA KIRCHWEY

THE chief value of Mr. Byrnes's Stuttgart speech was its positive tone. A coherent policy took shape as he spoke: his plain language carried the conviction that muddle and ambiguity have given way to decision. Briefly, he announced the intention of the United States to stay in Germany as long as any occupation continues, to oppose "vengeful measures" which will obstruct an effective peace, to oppose also reparation levies greater than those agreed on at Potsdam, to support the continued separation of Austria and Germany. He advocated again the administration of Germany as an economic unit and urged the early establishment of a central provisional German government to administer the country, under the Allied Control Council, and prepare a constitution for the "United States of Germany." He proposed that the Allies tell the German people promptly the essential terms of the coming peace treaty and define the boundaries of the new Germany. In this connection he announced that the United States would support the transfer of Königsberg to Russia and a revision of Poland's northern and western frontiers, while reserving the right to modify these territorial changes, as agreed at Potsdam. He accepted the French claim to the Saar but refused to support further "encroachment on territory which is indisputably German," that is, the Ruhr and the Rhineland. He attempted to dispel the fears of those who look upon this great industrial area as a potential war danger by advocating sufficient control over "the whole of Germany, including the Ruhr and the Rhineland, as may be necessary for security purposes." And he added what is undoubtedly one of the most significant comments in the speech: "It [the United States] will not favor any controls that would subject the Ruhr and the Rhineland to the political domination or manipulation of outside powers."

Here at least we have a policy. Leaving behind the sterile controversies about a hard or soft peace, Mr. Byrnes accepts the challenge of the Molotov speech and defines American aims even at the risk of aggravating tension in the East and disappointing our French ally in the West. Clearly, America is now committed to the effort to save Germany from the temptations and pressures of Soviet policy. Or, as Joseph Alsop put it in the New York Herald Tribune, Byrnes's speech marks "the formal initiation of the struggle between the United States and the Soviet Union which will decide whether this unhappy country [Germany] is to join the free world of the West or become one of the slave states of the Soviet system." One may discount the violent terminology of the right without dismissing the basic truth Mr. Alsop states. Mr. Byrnes has offered Germany an alternative to Russian policy as applied to the eastern zone.

The question which immediately asks itself is what Mr. Byrnes proposes as a substitute for the social and economic plans which Molotov outlined. Unfortunately the answer is not available. Just as the Secretary of State explicitly repudiated the idea of foreign, even international, control of the Ruhr and the Rhineland, so he implicitly rejects or seems to reject any attempt to alter the economic structure of Germany as a whole. He never says so expressly. He does say, however, that "our only job" is to lay down the rules under which Germany can govern itself. He does not specify those rules; but in stating the broad principle that "Germany must be enabled to use her skills and her energies to increase her industrial production and to organize the most effective use of her raw materials," and that the chief "purposes of the military occupation were and are to demilitarize and de-Nazify Germany but not to raise artificial barriers to the efforts of the German people to resume their peace-time economic life," he sets fairly definite boundaries around our intentions.

One may as well admit that a nation so religiously committed to the dogma of private enterprise as is ours is unlikely to abandon its basic creed in a country where it wields temporary power. To expect this would be unrealistic. But it would be just as unrealistic to doubt that our devotion to capitalism presents an immense, perhaps an insuperable, obstacle to Mr. Byrnes's aim of winning Germany for the West.

American business was strongly established in the Reich up to the war. Even Hitler's coordination policy had done little to impair the values represented by the corporations and cartels in which American money was invested. The security of those values depended upon the stability of the entire economic structure. Today their recovery depends upon the rebuilding of German private industry; they will be permanently lost if German industry is socialized.

After the last war the United States, despite its aloof and irresponsible attitude toward Europe, threw powerful weight behind the safe, conservative elements that survived the pseudo-revolution of 1918. Our government supported the Weimar Republic and its exemplary

Last Notice to West Coast Readers!

On Saturday and Sunday, September 21 and 22, The Nation Associates will hold a conference, culminating in a public dinner at the Ambassador Hotel, Los Angeles.

The subject: The Challenge of the Post-War World to the Liberal Movement.

The dinner speakers will be Hon. Thurman W. Arnold, Senator Wayne L. Morse, Dore Schary, Bartley C. Crum, Freda Kirchwey.

Apply for tickets and dinner reservations at the office of The Nation Associates, Room 1114, Taft Building, Hollywood 28.

constitution—then as now we wanted a "democratic Germany"—but we favored in every way those reactionary elements that made a travesty of the mild social democracy of Ebert and his colleagues. Hitler was not entirely mistaken when he condemned the men of Weimar as puppets of the Allies. Then as today, but not nearly so desperately as today, Germany needed a thorough revolution: the division of its big estates, the demolition of its ruling class, the smashing of its trusts, an end to the whole structure of power—industrial, agrarian, military—that degenerated during the bitter inter-war years into fascism.

In the Byrnes policy one finds no assurance that the cycle may not be about to begin again. The Nation has never favored the destruction of German industrial capacity as represented in the Ruhr and the Rhineland; we have urged that it be internationally controlled—for some years at least, socially owned, and exploited for the rebuilding of Europe. Factories and mines are as useful or as dangerous as the power that controls them. You can combine democracy with a prosperous industrial economy in Germany; you cannot combine it with cartels and the private exploitation of steel and coal. When General McNarney accused the Russians of smashing free enterprise and establishing socialism in the Soviet zone of Germany, he attacked them for their one great achievement there. And if Mr. Brynes's speech presents, as I am afraid it does, the reverse shield of the McNarney report, his effort to bring Germany into "the free world of the West" will surely fail.

I do not exclude the possibility that the economic coordination of the British and American zones may modify to some extent the capitalist method applied by our authorities. It cannot be said the British government has gone far toward carrying its socialist ideas into effect in Germany, but it has nationalized coal in the Ruhr and has put steel under the British military administration. Left opinion in England is openly fearful lest union of the zones may wipe out these progressive measures and tie British to American policy, since we are clearly the dominant economic partner. But one thing is certain: the Western powers must go beyond even the best efforts of the British so far, if they are to get the support of the only Germans we have any reason to trust.

The prospect of restoring private enterprise in Germany will appeal only to the class which financed the Nazi movement and will provide the respectable backing for the fascism of tomorrow. It will not win the millions of German workers who today sit idle waiting for a shattered system to get on its feet, or to the millions of refugees from the east who do not own a tin can in which to get a ladleful of free soup at the relief station.

Three possible prospects lie ahead for Germany. One: a new fascism, more Catholic than pagan, supported economically by the trusts (refinanced with American capital), and politically by the United States. Two: a planned, socialist economy, resting upon democratic institutions and following the broad leftward tendencies of Western Europe. Three: a planned economy integrated with that of Russia and controlled by the German Socialist Unity Party. Nothing in Mr. Byrnes's speech suggests that America will encourage the second course; our record in Germany so far, our own economic position and beliefs, our immediate economic interests all argue against that hope.

Shadows by Gaslight

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, September 5

THE shadow of things to come falls over a small, shabby hearing room two blocks down the street from the White House. The dry, technical words of gray-haired lawyers mask a powerful struggle over a revolutionary economic development. A new fuel, natural gas, is trying to invade the established market of coal, oil, and artificial gas. The prize is Detroit and Detroit's great automobile industry.

Two lusty young giants, Panhandle Eastern Pipelines Company and United Light and Railways Company, are scrapping for the market. Grimly lined up against both of them are the established fuel interests, the businesses dependent on them, and their workers. They are wailing, "Economic displacement."

This hearing before the Federal Power Commission foreshadows an even greater struggle which will take place when atomic power can be economically used as industrial power: the Federation of Atomic Scientists estimates that within two years an experimental pile will be generating power economically.

The atmosphere in the hearing room is drowsy. The FPC examiner, looking like a country judge, stares at the two long tables of lawyers through half-closed eyes. Three bored reporters sit listlessly at a little table. Forty-five lawyers are involved in this case, but only a fraction attend all the hearings. The lawyers patiently take their turn asking repetitious questions of the witnesses. What is the coal displacement of natural gas? What are the proposed rates? What are the costs?

TRIS COFFIN is a Columbia Broadcasting System commentator. He writes a weekly Washington report for The Nation.

Two separate struggles are going on. One is an old-fashioned economic slugging match between two $100,000,000 corporations. Panhandle wants to expand its pipeline from Texas to supply industries in Michigan directly. United owns and operates the distributing company which buys natural gas from Panhandle under a contract expiring in 1951. United wants to build its own pipeline to serve Michigan and Wisconsin.

Panhandle gets its natural gas from fields in the Southwest and distributes it to industrial users throughout the Middle West. It already has one big customer lined up among the automobile makers—Ford, at Dearborn, Michigan. Joined with Panhandle in the conflict is another economic empire, the Commonwealth and Southern Company, which has contracted to buy unlimited gas from Panhandle. The two corporations plan to store gas jointly in Michigan in the off seasons. United is trying to prevent Panhandle from invading its territory and taking its customers, and wants to expand its own service in the Middle West.

The big prize is Detroit's potential consumption of 27,000,000,000 cubic feet of industrial gas a year, and the even larger market of 90,000,000,000 cubic feet that all of Michigan offers.

The city of Detroit is interested in the outcome of the fight. It wants cheap natural gas for both house heating and business use, and does not particularly care where it comes from. The states where the natural gas fields are located are worried about the steady outflow of a rich natural resource. States along the pipelines crawling up from the Southwest are afraid that the pipeline companies will forget customers within their borders when the big Detroit industrial market can be served. They have asked the Federal Power Commission to order the pipelines to share their fuel with all points on the system.

The army and navy have not yet appeared at the hearing, but the Federal Power Commission has word of their interest. Natural gas is a source of synthetic gasoline. It may be needed if the clash of power politics in the Near and Middle East slows the flow of oil from those areas.

Natural gas is the youngster in the fuel field. Pipelines transport it cheaply from fields in the Southwest to the industrial centers of the Middle West. Ninety million people and twenty thousand factories now use this fuel. Pipelines stretch as far as Philadelphia. Plans are down on paper for bringing natural gas to the East Coast and New York by utilizing the Big Inch and Little Inch pipelines. Hence the second struggle complicating the hearings.

The railroads which haul coal and oil are objecting. Forty-six lines have intervened in the case. Another petition lists the railways unions, the conductors, engineers, firemen, and switchmen. The National Coal Association and John Lewis's United Mine Workers are together on a joint intervening petition. Among other unions mixed up in this economic conflict are the Associated Coke Plant Employees, the International Chemical Workers, the Coal Yard Employees, the International Association of Machinists, and locals of teamsters, painters, boilermakers, firemen, oilers, electrical workers, and operating engineers. The Lake Michigan docks are worried. Their revenue from coal barges might be cut off.

The hearings are one of the last stages of the battle. It has been fought in full-page newspaper advertisements, in state courts and utility-commission hearings, by lobbyists and politicians. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been tossed into public relations. After the Federal Power Commission makes its decision, which will probably be in December, the case may go on to the Supreme Court.

The FPC attorneys regard the issue as a fundamental one. They are aware that it may be the faint handwriting on the wall prefiguring the struggle to come when atomic power threatens all the conventional fuels, including natural gas. That is why they are asking the painstaking, minute questions that jam the record with figures and apparently obscure facts. As the Power Commission officials see it, there are several basic questions that must be answered. Shall an economic development be allowed to proceed without restraint? Or are all facets of our economy so closely interrelated that the evolution must be checked and slowed down? Should government protect the workers and officials and bondholders of an economic group threatened by the use of a new kind of power? Should the benefit to consumers be considered first? Is there a compensating factor? Would natural gas —or atomic power—offer as many jobs as coal and oil?

The answers to these questions will serve as guides to the new Atomic Control Commission, which President Truman has not named thus far. When atomic power invades the industrial field, the question of government monopoly of power will be argued in Congress, on the political stump, and in hearing rooms. And this invasion is not far off: scientists are working on several different approaches, any one of which may suddenly lead to cheap, controllable atomic power.

Plans for use of atomic power are misted over with official secrecy. But according to the best information, the government will experiment with atomic power in out-of-the-way places not now served by any reliable power system. There is talk of using atomic piles to provide a source of power for Alaska. Officials of the Manhattan District have testified before the Senate Atomic Committee that Oak Ridge, which took so much power out of TVA, is now ready to put power back in that giant, government-operated power system.

Europe, Russia, and America

BY REINHOLD NIEBUHR

London, August

THERE is very considerable difference in the climate of opinion on Russia between Europe and America. Attending a worldwide Protestant conference on international relations here in Britain, I had assumed that the Continental fear of communism would be strongly expressed and might be similar to Roman Catholic sentiment. I found this far from being the case. The fear is present, but there is no hysteria. On the other hand, many suspicions were expressed by both the British and the Continentals that Catholicism or "big business" or preoccupation with the atomic bomb had made America hysterical.

If the difference between European and American opinion on the Russian issue were to be defined succinctly I should say that Europe is less certain than we are that the United Nations has much value, but is more certain than we are that it neither desires another war—this time with Russia—nor holds it inevitable. Several times I heard the suggestion that Europe must bend all its efforts to avoid a Soviet-American conflict, which, some fear, will be touched off by our friction with Russia in China. The British discount our enthusiasm for the United Nations as similar to their devotion to the League of Nations two decades ago and rather hint that the one will prove as irrelevant as the other. They would maintain the U. N. as a bridge with Russia, but they believe that if Russia refuses to cooperate in an international atomic authority, the United Nations can serve only very minimal ends.

Despite this skepticism there is a much stronger disposition in Europe to leave no stone unturned to avoid conflict with Russia. At the international conference I attended, the thesis propounded by a Swiss delegate that Nazism and communism were identical was rejected. The moral implications of this thesis were rejected because many delegates insisted that communism possessed creative aspects and no purely nihilistic ones, like Nazism. It was not denied, of course, that the Russian system is totalitarian or that one of the hazards to peace lies in the fact that the Russian leaders are giving the Russian people a very false picture of the West and completely obscuring the almost pathetic desire for peace of the Western world.

The political implications of the thesis were rejected on the ground that Nazi dynamism, with its narrow geographic base, was driven by a demonry and by political necessities almost completely absent from the situation in the Soviet Union. I found a general disposition to attribute Russian truculence to Russian fears; a good deal of evidence was adduced by delegates from nations contiguous to Russia that this is the case. Some delegates were certain that Russian policy shifted after our dropping of the bomb without making them privy to the secret —that is, to the secret of our having the bomb and not the secret of the bomb itself. This opinion is also held in informed circles in Britain. It should be added, however, that Russian fears and mistrust expressed themselves secretly during the war in almost fantastic terms and that some of our dubious policies, such as the insistence upon "unconditional surrender," were designed to allay that mistrust. To Russian fears one must add Russian stupidities, for it is quite apparent that the Russian leadership has a distorted conception of democracy, partly due to the fact that all things are viewed through the spectacles of an inflexible Marxist dogmatism.

The great dangers which arise from these fears and stupidities and from Western stupidities which feed them are not denied; one could not detect great optimism about the possibility of avoiding catastrophe. There is, on the other hand, a minimal hope that if the Western world remains patient, it may be possible in time to change Russia's attitude. It is believed at least that the stakes are so high that every resource must be exhausted. After innumerable talks in both religious and political circles I have come to the conclusion that this European opinion has much to commend it and is, on the whole, superior to the general American approach both among our conservatives and among our non-Communist left.

One element in the strategy of patience would be to stop futile efforts to change what cannot be changed in Eastern Europe, regarded by Russia as its strategic security belt. It will do things there which will disturb the conscience of democrats. It will do some things, such as breaking up big landed estates, which will arouse the prejudices, rather than the conscience, of conservatives. But Western efforts to change conditions in Poland, or in Bulgaria, for instance, will prove futile in any event, partly because the Russians are there and we aren't, and partly because such slogans as "free elections" and "free enterprise" are irrelevant in that part of the world. Our copybook versions of democracy are frequently as obtuse as Russian dogmatism. If we left Russia alone in the part of the world it has staked out, we might actually help, rather than hinder, the indigenous forces which resist its heavy hand. There are indications, for instance, that while Polish foreign policy is completely controlled, Russia is forced to yield on many points to Polish opinion. This is even more true in Czechoslovakia.

REINHOLD NIEBUHR, one of The Nation's staff contributors, is professor of Christian ethics at Union Theological Seminary and author of "The Children of Light and the Children of Darkness: A Vindication of Democracy and a Critique of its Traditional Defense." He went to England this summer as a delegate to the World Council of Churches held at Cambridge.

It is generally recognized, of course, that a policy of laissez faire in Eastern Europe cannot apply to the West, for it is apparent that a strong Russian drive into the West would ultimately lead to war. Talk of letting Russia organize the whole of Europe is nonsense. For however ambiguous may be what we call "Western culture" or "Western civilization," expressed chiefly by democratic socialism on the political level and by the humanist and the Christian tradition culturally, it is both strong enough and will have a strong enough survival impulse to resist capitulation to Russia. Europe itself could not resist Russian expansion, if it should develop; but Britain and America certainly could. Whether one regards the will to resist as wise or unwise, one must regard it as inevitable.

European criticisms of America, in so far as they are non-Communist, are not directed against this will to resist. They spring rather from a fear that it will express itself unwisely, impatiently, and with too much emphasis upon capitalism or free enterprise as one of the resources of the West, both as a means of survival and as a reason for survival.

It must be clear that, while further encroachments of Russia in Western Europe, or in China, for that matter, might mean war, it is also apparent that the effort to keep Russian power in bounds must not be primarily military. The way to save Western Europe is to give it a sound economic basis for a sound political life. While it cannot be said that Britain has seen this fact too clearly in the past, the Labor Party is increasingly aware of the necessity of supporting the German Social Democrats and also of socializing property in western Germany, as part of a program of creating a viable economy. Many Europeans fear that America will resist or oppose this process of socialization—with how much justice I do not know, though obviously American opinion has never come to grips with the issue.

A policy of socialized property in western Germany is, of course, not enough by itself to restore health in Europe. No clear sense of direction is apparent in any Western political or social policy, apart from a gradual resistance to stubborn Soviet bargaining on every borderline issue. Although no one suggests that we should yield to Russia on the bargaining front, it is obvious that we shall not gain our ends by following only a negative course of action. Progressive opinion in America must recognize that the West will have to develop a positive social strategy and not merely a military and negative one. If western Germany remains an economic desert and Western Europe an economic chaos, communism will spread despite the present unpopularity of Communist parties.

Molotov's recent about-face on the German issue undoubtedly sprang from the conviction that Germany is ultimately more important to Russia than is France. For Molotov was not afraid to alienate French opinion by insisting on the need of German unity. No equally bold comprehension of the situation has been shown on our side. Incidentally, the extreme fear of Russia in Germany is being gradually dissipated, not only because the Russian army has been brought under discipline and the plundering stopped, but also because the Russians have decided to harness rather than to destroy the industrial power under their control. They will, of course, not join Britain and America in uniting Germany economically today, preferring rather to exploit German industry for their own purposes and relying on their promise of ultimate unity to win German support. These Russian objectives may not be too plausible, but they make more sense than anything projected from the Western zones.

I think that on the whole the British left is correct in feeling that American labor and liberal opinion is too much preoccupied with strategic issues concerning Russia, and too little aware of the kind of social policy which must be applied if we are to save Western Europe. Perhaps America is not quite the wilderness of laissez faire political thought which the British left imagines it to be. There is more power in our progressive movements than is understood in Europe, though it is rather difficult to prove that after the recent costly "victorious defeat" on the OPA issue. But on foreign policy Europe is right in discounting us. American progressives and labor have no foreign policy. The C. I. O. cannot have one because the Communists are able to veto any policy which is more concrete than an expression of a fervent desire for Big Three unity. The A. F. of L. and many liberals are too filled with a simple Russian phobia to develop a constructive policy.

The sentiment in democratic Europe has convinced me that nothing is more important than the elaboration of a creative, progressive foreign policy for America which will neither play the militarist game of preaching war against Russia nor repeat the slogans of the fellow-travelers. It must above all help the nation to contribute to an economically healthy and politically sane Europe; and it must resist a policy in China which gives the reactionary elements in the Chinese government a new lease on power under the guise of American and Chinese partnership against communism.

Depression Round the Corner?

BY SEYMOUR HARRIS

THE United States has had a hundred years of alternating economic booms and depressions. We are now in the midst of a boom—and the depression is not far behind. Moreover, history shows that the greater the boom the greater the depression—which is an extremely discouraging thought, since the present boom has exceeded all others in duration and magnitude. Congress and the public must be awakened to the dangers that lie ahead, for only less complacency and more preparation to avert the crash will save us from another experience like that of the thirties. Economists now know much more about the causes of depressions—and the ways to prevent them—than they did two decades ago, but theirs, unfortunately, is once again the vain role of Cassandra. Congress and the public pay little attention.

What has the Administration done to avoid economic collapse? What to invite it?

Against the most immediate danger, inflation, the obvious defense is to keep demand down and increase supply. A powerful factor in creating demand is our $300,000,000,000 of liquid assets—in 1939 we had only $85,000,000,000. The correct policy would be to try to immobilize these assets for the present, to delay their use until the fifties and sixties, when there will almost certainly be inadequate demand. What is spent now stimulates inflation; what is used later will help stave off deflation.

Yet by weakening price control, prematurely removing control of demand (by relaxing priorities and the like), and cutting taxes, the government is encouraging spending now. Such measures make people increasingly aware that prices are rising and increasingly anxious to exchange liquid for illiquid assets. Various surveys have assured us that the fortunate holders of liquid assets will keep them as insurance against future distress, or to buy a home or a farm with later, or for the children's education, and that they will not use them for buying goods today. But history and common sense both tell us that as prices begin to rise 2 or 3 per cent a month, the public will realize that to buy now is to conserve the goods value of money and to buy tomorrow is to lose.

The results of a mistaken policy or of no policy at all are already apparent in inflated demand. Investment is now running at the rate of $25,000,000,000 a year. The country needs consumer goods but is getting an excess of capital goods, including rises in inventories. (I recall that at a WPB meeting in the fall of 1945 where the possibility of dropping inventory controls was being discussed, one of the country's leading bankers said that business would never again build up inventories recklessly. Business and bankers, he said, had learned their lesson in 1919-20—he had apparently forgotten about 1937.) This excess of investment could have been prevented if top officials in the WPB had not been disposed to turn our economy back to private enterprise prematurely. Free bidding for labor and materials to expand plants that are not greatly needed at the moment could have been averted.

Veterans want homes and should have them. Yet it is estimated that all residential construction will amount to only $4,000,000,000 in 1946 and to $6,600,000,000 in 1947—the total construction for those years is put at $15,000,000,000 and $20,000,000,000. The large unfilled demand for houses is bound to send the price up. We need housing, but we get department stores, office buildings, and hotels. One important reason for this is the suicidal and irresponsible lifting, in 1945, of L-41, the WPB order which allocated the use of building materials. In March, 1946, control was reestablished by Order No. 1 of the Veterans' Housing Program, but much damage had been done by then. In many cases, if excavation had begun, non-housing projects costly in the use of essential materials were allowed to proceed.

So long as demand greatly exceeds supply at reasonable prices, recourse must be had primarily to controls. Budgetary surpluses, however welcome now, can make only a minor contribution to the anti-inflation fight. But something might be accomplished through monetary controls. Why not, for example, sterilize the excess liquid assets—that is, government securities—held by banks? The Committee on Economic Development, Marriner Eccles of the Federal Reserve Board, and others have made suggestions along these lines, but the men responsible for policy have not acted on them.

Bank profits have risen disproportionately: from 1940 to 1945, according to the National City Bank, member banks' profits as a percentage of invested capital rose from 6.2 to 11 per cent, while all business showed a decline of from 7.8 to 7.6 per cent. Banks perform a simple function and take little risk: they manufacture money as the agent of the government. Why is it necessary to pay them an average rate of 1½ per cent on government securities and allow them to exchange these assets for cash, thus further increasing their abnormal earnings and further strengthening the inflationary forces? Why not issue to them securities yielding one-half or one per cent and require them to hold these securities largely against deposits? In this way further expansion of money and demand could be prevented.

PROFESSOR HARRIS (Department of Economics, Harvard) was formerly director of the Office of Export-Import Price Control. He is the author of "Inflation and the American Economy" and "The National Debt."

Another solution for the problem of large security holdings by banks is also being urged upon the Administration: this is to raise instead of reduce the rate of interest. The theory is that the banks will then be able to dispose of securities to genuine savers, with a resulting contraction of monetary supplies. This seems a most unwise suggestion since the cost of the debt would be greatly increased and large profits would ultimately accrue to its holders (two-thirds of the securities are held by financial institutions and 10 per cent by corporations).

Not only should demand be curtailed, but much should and might be done to increase supplies. Speeding up the tempo of government sales would help. As late as April, 1945, the government had sold only $271,000,000 worth of the plants in which it had invested some $15,000,000,000. Only one-third of the surplus to be disposed of had been acquired by the government disposal agencies; only a small fraction had been sold.

More important is wage policy. Somehow or other the Administration will have to work out a way to prevent major strikes in industries affecting the whole economy. Such interruptions to work are a threat to any stabilization policy. They keep output low and unit costs correspondingly high and create an element of uncertainty which further reduces output and encourages price-spiraling.

The government's long-term policy is even more censurable than its failure to cope with inflation. Virtually nothing has been done to prevent the large collapse which now seems inevitable or to prepare the country to meet it. Congress is much more to blame than the Administration, which, if it has not urged appropriate measures with adequate vigor, has at least proposed them. Most of these measures would presumably raise demand in the coming decades of deficient demand. An adequate social-security program would raise demand by providing low-income groups with more purchasing power. More adequate coverage, liberalization of benefits, extension of federal aid, health and sickness insurance—these are the more important proposals. So far little has been done; and so long as action hinges on the approval of the House Ways and Means and the Senate Finance Committee as at present constituted, little can be expected.

After seven years of extremely favorable business conditions the Unemployment Compensation Fund has reserves of about $7,000,000,000. A ten-year depression on the scale of that of the thirties would wipe out wages totaling $250,000,000,000, or thirty-five times the reserves. And we assume a war will not pull us out this time. Even a depression only one-half as severe as the previous one would wipe out $125,000,000,000 of wages. Obviously unemployment compensation alone cannot make up for the losses resulting from unemployment; it can, however, make a much more substantial contribution than it promises to now. Benefits are geared in many respects to the wage scales and prices of the thirties, when money wages were about half as high as they are now. Again, it is scandalous that under merit rating—based on a thoroughly repudiated theory that each firm controls the amount of unemployment—employers have been allowed to reduce their payments from 3 to 2 per cent of wages.

The program is meager indeed. How can one reconcile benefit payments of $10 weekly for sixteen weeks—as provided in many states—with the current wage rates and the present distribution of liquid assets? (One survey indicates that the bottom 50 per cent had 3 per cent of these assets in 1945.)

Public works are another way of increasing demand when employment falls off. Yet despite the valiant efforts of the Roosevelt Administration, we have scarcely started to plan them. The federal government is prepared today to undertake public works of but several billion dollars, and state and local projects in the design stage amount to only $6,000,000,000. Plans should be fully worked out on such a scale that once a serious decline sets in the government can spend from $5,000,000,000 to $10,000,000,000 a year. If these plans are not available when needed, the government will spend too little, too late, and too uneconomically.

For the present, public investment should be kept at a minimum. The mistake made in the prosperous twenties of spending too much and in the depressed thirties of spending too little should not be repeated in the forties and fifties.

Other ways of stimulating demand are open to us. Wages should be high enough to assure sales—sales at sufficiently high prices to make business profitable. In the twenties the rise in wage rates and the fall in prices did not keep up with declining costs; as a result profits piled up, and ultimately goods also. This is one of the great dangers of our impending inflation. Trade unions, on the other hand, must not misinterpret the Keynesian theory of high wages—a theory that recognizes the relation of wages to demand and hence to productivity but does not by any means dissociate wages from productivity.

Many of the policies which are to raise future demand invite attention to the financial repercussions of these policies and particularly to the rising public debt. In a capitalist society financial arrangements quite properly have to be taken into account. Public works, social security, international loans, and similar measures are closely scrutinized to determine their effect on the public debt. The inadequacy of these programs stems from exaggerated fears of a rising public debt and a mistaken emphasis on financial considerations.

Those who are disposed to object to every proposal that increases the public debt should be reminded of the following: Public debt is financed out of income. Income depends on demand; a measure that raises demand also increases income. A total tax bill amounting to 30 per cent of the nation's income, plus a servicing charge on the debt requiring 3 per cent of the nation's income, is less burdensome when the national income is between $150,000,000,000 and $160,000,000,000, as it is today, than a tax bill of 6 per cent, plus a debt-servicing charge of one-half of 1 per cent, was for the 1913 income of $35,000,000,000. Let us note that in 1913 only $33,000,000,000 remained for the private economy; now from $130,000,000,000 to $140,000,000,000 of disposable income remains.

In summary, we have a right to expect more vigorous leadership from the White House and an increasing awareness of the issues on the part of Congress. For the next year or two the objective of all policies should be to contain demand and expand supply. For 1948 and later years the government should be prepared with a sheaf of plans for supporting demand. Is it too much to expect that Congress should plan for the future at least as far ahead as squirrels? If Congress wants to save capitalism, now is the time; improvisations a few years from now will not be very effective.

Counter-Revolution in China

BY HUGH DEANE

THE civil war in China is essentially a counter-revolution. It is being waged because the reactionary factions of the Kuomintang, with which Chiang Kai-shek must be identified, understand that for them a real compromise with the Communists and liberals is out of the question, since a compromise would crack their political monopoly. Hence, like the émigrés of 1792, like the South in 1861, like the czarist and Spanish officers in 1918 and 1936, these defenders of the status quo are playing the traditional trump card of war.

During the eight years of struggle against the Japanese a shift in power took place in China which only armed force can reverse. In the vast social effort made possible by the war the Communist-led agrarian movement spread from a score of counties in the northwest over a third of China: across North China to the coast, into Inner Mongolia and Manchuria, into parts of the rich provinces of central China. Agrarian reforms, democracy, and peasant unions—backed by peasant armies—have shifted the balance of political power in these areas from the landlords to the peasants. This new power is the greatest challenge to the semi-feudal status quo in the long, tortured history of the Chinese Revolution.

Even in the areas policed by the Kuomintang, as the fascist-like assassinations and censorship testify, a substantial middle-class and intellectual opinion opposes the Kuomintang's cramping dictatorship. The Kuomintang has even felt obliged to move against the mild Chinese Association of Labor, which grew out of the "white" unions organized by the Kuomintang after the left-right split in 1927.

In China the Communists and liberals are in firm alliance, a unique phenomenon. The simplest explanation is that the Kuomintang has demonstrated repeatedly that it will not tolerate even a liberal opposition. The assassination of Li Kung-po, a leader of the Democratic League, and Professor Wen I-to, head of the School of Chinese Studies at the Southwest Associated University, and the recent arrests, beatings, and killings of scores of other well-known and unknown democrats have precedents extending back through the two decades of Kuomintang rule. Liberals understand that alone, without an army, they have no more future than did the Japanese liberals of the 1920's. The Communists, on the other hand, have given them freedom to work and a real share of the leadership in the rural governments of northern and central China.

Underlying this reason for Communist-liberal cooperation is the fact that communism is not an immediate issue in China. This is so not just because the Communists are willing to make temporary concessions in order to win the support of liberals; it has a solid basis in the primitive, semi-feudal character of the Chinese economy. The peasants are obviously interested not in socialism but in more land and lower rents and taxes; and the needs and desires of the peasants must be the major de-

HUGH DEANE was formerly correspondent in China for the Christian Science Monitor. During the war he served in the navy in the Pacific, and he has now gone to Japan as correspondent for the Allied Labor News.

terminants of the Communist program. The aggregate of new power in China is primarily against feudalism and against the quasi-fascist institutions with which the Kuomintang has tried to bolster feudalism. It is being used to effect what the Communists call the bourgeois-democratic revolution, and what the Communists think this revolution should achieve approximates closely what liberals are working for. This does not mean, of course, that the Communists are just agrarian democrats, as some people still insist; they believe that eventually socialism will appear on the political agenda. To sum up, in China today, as in all revolutionary situations, there is no effective "third choice."

Against the broad coalition of Communists and liberals the Kuomintang is executing two offensives. In its own areas it is using all the familiar instruments of coercion and terror in an effort to destroy all opposition, almost entirely non-Communist. Almost the whole liberal press and many liberal voices have been silenced.

Concurrently, major concentrations of Kuomintang troops are seeking to surround, blockade, and annihilate Communist forces in particular key or vulnerable areas. Just as the Japanese in 1937 did not want war but only an incident, so the Kuomintang does not want an official civil war. It would prefer an undeclared, localized civil war while negotiations go on and on. While its troops attack in one area, it would like the truce maintained in others. Thus the Communists could be destroyed piecemeal, and the United States with less embarrassment could continue to give military aid.

But since this was obvious to the Communists, they have counteracted the Kuomintang offensives with offensives of their own, and so the fighting has spread. At the same time, especially after Chiang Kai-shek's six-point program of August 14, which was virtually a demand for surrender cloaked in the threadbare promise of "constitutional" government, the Communist press and radio became more militant, saying that civil war was an actuality and demanding with new sharpness that the United States cease its intervention. As might be expected, this enabled part of the American press to claim that the Communists had rejected Chiang's conciliatory offer and that the new party line was all-out civil war. A New York Times editorial on August 18, for example, declared that the Communists were "in revolt" and "burning their bridges behind them and inviting chaos."

Chiang apparently believes that the worst that can happen to him is not to win. If he destroys or decisively weakens the Communists, only the Soviet Union will be unhappy, and General Marshall can go home, a gallant and patient soldier who did his best. But if the Kuomintang armies should suffer defeats, Chiang thinks that American power will be used to prevent the Communists from exploiting them.

The cornerstone of Kuomintang policy is the conviction that the United States will not tolerate a revolution in China, even the sort of revolution called for in Mao Tse-tung's "New Democracy." In truth, the grounds for this conviction are ample. In the Philippines, Korea, and Japan the United States obviously is supporting conservative and reactionary forces. In China, while purporting to act as an honest mediator, the United States has given vast military and economic aid to the Kuomintang. The most compelling motive of American policy seems to be restriction of Soviet influence in Asia, which means that the United States must play a counter-revolutionary role. There are no indications that the United States will change its policy in China, even if full-scale civil war strips away the pretenses used to conceal intervention. In the editorial referred to above, the New York Times implied plainly that the prime issue in China is "Soviet imperialism," which requires "a firm attitude" on the part of the United States—that is, continued intervention. The Times must consider it truly fortunate that by chance the United States has been maintaining troops in China to assist in the repatriation of the Japanese forces.

Results of the fighting thus far, however, bear out the conclusion that despite the Kuomintang's sixty American-trained and American-equipped divisions, its substantial air force of American planes, its small American-built navy, and its supply base in the United States, the position of the Communists is by no means weak. As the Japanese learned the hard way, military power is difficult to apply in China. In an industrial society the rural areas tend to be dependent on the urban areas, and when a city falls, the nearby countryside falls with it. The economic attraction of the urban commercial market, plus the existence of good roads which permit a city garrison to fan out over the countryside, makes military control relatively simple. In semi-feudal, non-industrialized China, however, with its subsistence agriculture and lack of communications, the countryside can exist independent of the towns and the capture of the county seat does not entail the capture of the county.

The Japanese never held much of the countryside of North China for any length of time. They were obliged to maintain large garrisons in every city and town and to defend constantly every mile of road and railway. They could not prevent the Communists from building armies and organizing almost self-sufficient governments in the rural areas. At least half a million Japanese troops were always tied down in "conquered" North China.

The Kuomintang has now inherited the Japanese military problem, which is essentially how to hold too much hostile territory with too few men. If the Kuomintang puts a company in every village, the companies will be destroyed separately; if it puts in a battalion—even if a battalion were adequate—there are not enough of them to go around. The Kuomintang will certainly use large-scale terror, but a fair presumption is that it will prove no more effective for Chiang than for the Japanese.

The situation is different from the old days in Kiangsi, where the Communists could be contained and slowly squeezed. Now the large Communist armies have the breadth of China in which to fight their particular type of mobile warfare. Now the Communists are intrenched in what may be a decisive number of villages. Now they have well-tested political, economic, and military institutions with which to counteract the traditional weaknesses of peasant rebellions. Perhaps most important of all, in the dynamics of revolution power often is created in an incredibly short time, and armies are born in a fortnight.

Every American will be a factor in the bitter struggle ahead, for American-made arms are adding thousands of new names to the long roster of Chinese revolutionary dead: the United States is intervening in China to the same effect that it non-intervened in Spain—the frustration of a revolution.

Placebos in Medicine—and Elsewhere

BY MARTIN GUMPERT

THERE was an interesting but disturbing report in the New York Journal of Medicine for August 1, 1946. It dealt with a round-table discussion by the members of the Department of Pharmacology and of Medicine of Cornell University Medical College and the New York Hospital. The subject was the use of placebos in therapy.

The Latin word placebo means "I will please"; as a medical term it is defined as "a medicine adapted rather to pacify than to benefit the patient." A pure placebo is something like a bread pill or a sugar pellet. And according to Dr. DuBois of Cornell, "sugar pills have been found to be more effective if they are colored either pink or blue, or better still, mottled."

The power of placebos seems to be tremendous: "For example, we found recently that placebos have a marked effect in preventing seasickness." "In a recent study Seidel and Abrams found that hypodermics of saline were just as effective as vaccines against chronic rheumatoid arthritis." During the discussion Dr. Harold G. Wolff reported to his audience on the power of suggestion in influencing the action of drugs as shown by pain-threshold experiments—tests in which an area of skin blackened with india ink is exposed to heat from a 1,000-watt bulb; the sensation of pain from the heat of the bulb can then be exactly measured. Analgesic properties have been conferred by suggestion on sugar of milk and removed from typical analgesic drugs such as aspirin.

Dr. Mark Lipkin treated patients with Raynaud's syndrome with the help of an electrical apparatus in which the current was not turned on. He simply let the dials click. "Some improvement was reported in every case, and the results were excellent in six cases." A study of the effect of aminophylline and theobromine on cardiac pain in ambulant patients with coronary disease showed that sugar brought improvement in 25 per cent of the cases and the potent theobromine in 22 per cent. The doctors were so much puzzled by the patients' unshakable devotion to the sugar medicine that they went back to check on whether an active agent of some sort might not have been put into the prescription by mistake.

Typical reactions of patients to sugar pills are: I sleep better. My appetite is improved. My breathing is better. It makes me stronger. My bowels are better. I can walk farther without pain in my chest.

Now such findings are not entirely new, but the attitude of these distinguished doctors to the ethical implications of prescribing sugar as medicine is somewhat surprising: "I think we all agree that placebos are useful and should be used. . . ." This explanation was given: "Any pill, whether it be sugar or medication, is in part placebo because it is a symbol of the doctor. . . . When the patient has a little pillbox with tablets to take, that is an interpolation of the doctor. He can carry that much of the doctor with him, and it is effective. The pill is the symbol of the doctor's unspoken or spoken words, 'I will take care of you.' The pill also fulfils the patient's need to feel dependent. . . . A bitter or even nauseating placebo fills a need for punishment. Everyone feels the need for punishment some time. Last of all, the pill supports the desire to get well."

These psychological defenses for the prescription of placebos are probably sound. But if we have to decide whether to call the use of placebos a legitimate and "high-grade" therapeutic method—as these physicians termed it—or a fraud, I vote passionately for "fraud."

Placebos are an indication of the ignorance of physicians, a proof that medicine is not yet a true science

DR. GUMPERT practices medicine in New York City and writes regularly on medical subjects for The Nation. He is the author of "Hahnemann, the Adventurous Career of a Medical Rebel" and of "You Are Younger than You Think."

but still deeply overshadowed by magic, taboos, anxieties, and primitive rituals. There can be no choice in the medicine of the future between complete truthfulness and the continuation of deception. Suggestion and superstition ought to be the privilege of quacks, and quacks only. Any kind of alliance with fraud breeds more fraud. The end does not justify the means. As one of the speakers—Dr. C. H. Wheeler—rightly remarked, "I would like to call attention to the fact that many of the placebos which are used are dangerous to the patient, and that many doctors, when they want to give a patient something, instead of giving him something harmless, like to inject something into the veins or muscles, as calcium, or vitamins, or sodium cacodylate. I think that it is a practice which cannot be sufficiently condemned. It is horrifying to find how commonly that is done."

Not only medicine but our whole social and political life is infested by placebos ("pacifying rather than benefiting"). The assumption that the lower the patient's intelligence the more completely he may be satisfied by a placebo is entirely false. Dr. H. Gold said, "I have made it a rule to distrust the so-called 'intelligent people.'" Such persons crave placebos more than the less intelligent. Medicine is increasingly infiltrated—like life in general—by dishonesties, hiding behind pseudo-scientific and psychological techniques. Placebos are a dangerous weapon in the age-old love-hate relationship between doctor and patient. Having practiced as a doctor for many years and, just recently, having been a patient myself, I resolve that I will not treat patients who expect placebos from their doctor, and I will not use the services of a doctor who prescribes placebos. Once one agrees to the principle of pacifying rather than benefiting there can be no limit to fraud and deception. In my opinion the use of placebos should be stamped out in every sphere of life.

The Voice of America—Who Listens?

BY J. Q. RIZNIK

THE United States Department of State has won the right to stay in the short-wave propaganda business for another year and, deftly covering up a key weakness of the operation, has for the first time revealed that it considers short-wave radio a political weapon of prime importance and a competitive necessity. Now the department is confronted with the jobs of justifying the expenditure of some ten million dollars for radio and proving the effectiveness of its short-wave theory.

In getting from Congress the funds to continue international broadcasting, Secretary of State James F. Byrnes for the first time put into the record a realistic appraisal of the intent and purpose of the short-wave operations. In one of the most forthright declarations on international radio ever made by a high government official, Byrnes said:

> Radio is our one means of projecting information about America across frontiers blocked by political censorship. Such frontier censorship, I regret to say, obtains in varying degrees of severity throughout a substantial portion of the earth. . . . Today forty-nine countries or their dependencies are engaged in international broadcasting. The British are operating at a level considerably above their pre-war effort, and considerably higher than we contemplate. The Soviet Union is already very active in this field and has recently ordered thirty high-powered transmitters from this country. . . .
>
> The undergirding of our international negotiations . . . consists of popular understanding abroad of America and its policies. . . . I am convinced that an international information program can contribute to our security just as can an army or navy or an air force. . . . If you agree that peace—like war—must be waged, and I do believe it is so, then we must have instruments appropriate for the waging of peace.

Byrnes disclosed that the State Department is preparing to broadcast in Russian and went on to say:

> Radio is the best available means for reaching large populations which are deprived of information from America for lack of other communications facilities, or by inability to pay for information from commercial agencies, and by illiteracy.
>
> Throughout great regions our radio transmitters have come to be known as the Voice of America. I would regard it as little less than tragic for us to abandon now this remarkable instrument, with all its potentialities for advancing understanding, and thus advancing the cause of peace.

During the next six months the United States government's short-wave operations will be closely studied by United Nations radio experts, who are working on a proposal for a United Nations worldwide broadcasting project. At the same time commercial radio executives in this country have put their finger on what they believe is a key weakness in the case for international broadcasting.

J. Q. RIZNIK is a Public Service consultant in New York City. During the war he was Coordinator of Media in the Foreign News Bureau of the Office of War Information.

They say that the Secretary of State has unrealistically glossed over that weakness and failed to face the facts.

The complaint of those who have appraised United States short-wave transmissions and questioned the effectiveness of the government information program can, in essence, be presented in this two-line paraphrase:

> They shoot an arrow into the air;
> It falls to earth, they know not where!

If you shoot a short-wave program into the air, say the realistic radio men, and you don't know who is listening —how many and what kind of people—then the money spent for such broadcasting is, literally, thrown away.

Because the United Nations radio project, even in the discussion stage, needs facts on short-wave listening, this writer went after them. As a result, it can be unequivocally recorded that there is no one in the United States, in the government or out, who can authoritatively say how many persons listen to the radio Voice of America.

When Byrnes declared that "the Voice of America is the best available means for reaching large populations which are deprived of information from America by lack of other communications facilities, or by inability to pay for information from commercial agencies and by illiteracy," he either overlooked the facts available or was not informed that figures, gathered by his department, do not bear him out. State Department information specialists and statisticians say they are at a loss to explain why their facts and figures have until now been kept from public examination.

More eloquent than many words are the figures which are presented graphically below. They deal with some of the areas chosen for our government's short-wave transmissions (known technically as "target areas"), but similar data are available for every part of the world. For each "target" there is a series of State Department directives which control the type and frequency of programs aimed at it.

While the figures tell a startling story, the story is not complete unless it is stated, and stated emphatically, that 75 per cent of all short-wave sets everywhere in the world (a conservative estimate) are owned and operated by what can be described as the upper classes. The majority of the world's short-wave listeners are, in United States terms, members of the upper-bracket income and intellectual class. Thus when our government leaders—and there have been many besides the Secretary of State—speak inspirationally of the radio Voice of America reaching "the ordinary people" and "illiterates" of foreign countries, they either overlook or are ignorant of the facts.

The figures, here presented for public examination for the first time, suggest many questions usually ignored by those interested in our future international short-wave operations. Here are half a dozen which must eventually be answered:

If the United States must compete with forty-nine other countries for a radio audience abroad, is it not imperative that our short-wave transmissions equal or exceed those of competitor nations in scope?

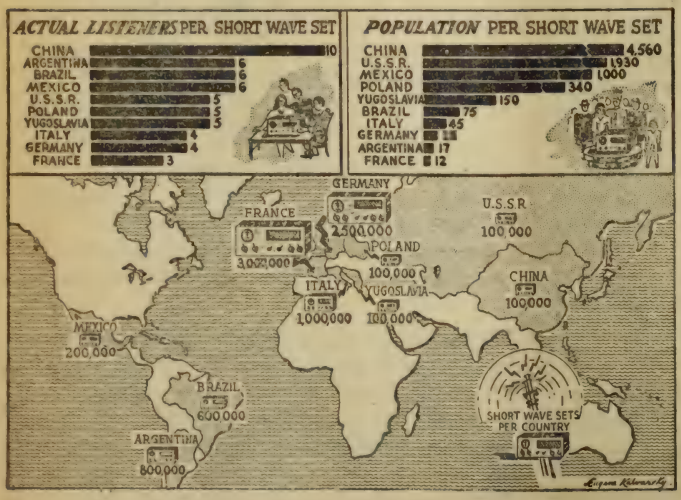
If the Voice of America is to be used as a political weapon, is it not mandatory that we reach the ears and minds of the common people of the world rather than the so-called upper classes, who, by their very position, already accept the tenets of free enterprise?

If the British, French, Russian, and other Socialist and semi-Socialist states surpass, in number of transmitters and programs, the output of our own government, which speaks for the American way of life, how effective can the Voice of America be as a competitive political weapon?

To increase the number of short-wave receivers in the world, should not the government inaugurate a priority plan for production of inexpensive radio receivers and make them available at little or no profit in those countries which are primary targets for the Voice of America?

If the United States is forced, by the nature of the competitive pattern set by other countries, into continued use of short-wave transmissions, is there not as much danger of a radio race developing among the big powers as there is of an atom-bomb and armament race?

Could the United Nations regulate, control, or possibly take over the use of radio words as weapons of peace among the nations of the world?



Nehru Takes Control

BY SHIVA RAO

New Delhi, September 3

YESTERDAY'S inauguration of the Indian interim government was a political event of immense significance. Nehru's "provisional national government"—to use his expression—is made up of twelve members: seven from the Congress Party, two nationalist Moslems not belonging to the Moslem League, a Sikh, a Parsee, and a Christian. Two seats are being kept vacant for the present. Unless Jinnah and Nehru reach a basic understanding, these will be filled by two more nationalist Moslems appointed by Nehru. But Congress leaders are standing by their assertion that they are willing to reconstitute the entire government on the basis set forth by the Cabinet mission and the Viceroy during the summer—namely, six Congress men, five Moslem Leaguers, and three representatives from other minorities.

Within a few hours of the government's taking office Gandhi made a statement that though this was not independence it opened the door to complete freedom. Whatever India's quarrel with Britain in the past, said Gandhi, the latter merited gratitude for its willingness to come to an understanding with the Indian leaders.

Nehru as Chief Minister outlined to a group of newspapermen the plans of his government and the urgent problems that call for its energetic attention. He emphasized that the government would function as a Cabinet pledged to carrying out a definite program and to working out its problems by joint consultation. The achievement of independence is naturally the primary objective of the new government. But while pressing for this it will tackle the vast and intricate tasks of feeding, clothing, housing, educating, and safeguarding the health of 400,000,000 Indians.

Within the limitations imposed by the existing constitution Nehru's Cabinet will try to establish precedents that will in effect introduce several features of responsible government. For instance, Nehru told the permanent secretaries of the several departments that the right of direct approach to the Viceroy which they had enjoyed in the past must cease as of today. The Cabinet mission and the Viceroy agreed, when the point was raised by Congress leaders, that there would be no interference with the government's administration of internal affairs and that its external status would be that of Canada or Australia. Only those who have observed the official machinery in operation can appreciate how great a change has taken place. Previously higher permanent officials, mostly British, dealt directly with the Viceroy and through him with the British Cabinet in London. Even during the perilous days of the war vital decisions were delayed because of the absense of sanction from London. The center of political influence has now shifted from London to Delhi, and the men who will make decisions are not the permanent officials but Nehru and his colleagues. How far these permanent officials, whom the Congress Party has bitterly opposed through the years, will succeed in making the necessary readjustments one cannot say. Senior men will probably retire; younger men may reconcile themselves to the new regime.

The installation of the Congress leaders in office is the beginning of a new era. But it is also the end of an old one—of collusion between the Moslem League and the British Tories. Last week there was published in London a sensational report of correspondence between Churchill and Jinnah, together with a denial by the latter which was not convincing. Apart from the correspondence, there was the assurance, first given in 1940 by Lord Linlithgow, then the Viceroy of India, that no fresh political advance would be made without the consent of all parties. This Jinnah interpreted as a veto over Congress conferred on the Moslem League, and he used it with considerable skill throughout the war.

Attlee's blunt statement in Parliament last March that a minority could not prevent the advance of the majority deeply disturbed the Moslem leader. Throughout the subsequent thirteen weeks of negotiations with the Labor Ministers and the Viceroy, Jinnah made his moves with canny precision. At last he blundered by publishing prematurely his correspondence with the Viceroy, the effects of which have been disastrous for the League. It was clear that the British government was determined to reach a settlement with the Congress leaders, preferably with Jinnah's cooperation, but if he remained intransigent, without it.

Since the end of June Jinnah has steadily pursued a policy of increasing recklessness and irresponsibility. First came the withdrawal of the Moslem League's support of British long-term plans for India. Then followed the first step in the "direct action" program. August 16 was fixed as the date for the celebration throughout India by the Moslems of "Direct Action Day." For weeks inflammatory speeches and broadcasts proclaimed a holy war against unbelievers. The culmination was an orgy of mass murder in Calcutta, with the Moslem League Ministry openly encouraging the campaign. The Hindus and Sikhs, infuriated by indiscriminate assaults, retaliated with equal fanaticism. Five thousand dead and fifteen thousand injured in three days of unrestrained gangsterism—this was the appalling total in Calcutta.

SHIVA RAO is an editorial writer for the Hindu of Madras and correspondent in India for the Manchester Guardian. His dispatches from India appear regularly in The Nation.

Had this disaster not occurred, Jinnah's direct-action program might have unfolded with impunity. Calcutta compelled him to revise his plans. His best friends, including some British business men, were unqualified in their criticisms. They begged him to return to the path of cooperation, to revise his latest decision rejecting the constitution, and to join the interim government on the terms still open to him. Lord Wavell, ignoring Calcutta's ghastly experience, repeated those terms on the day the announcement of the new government was made. Nehru, on behalf of the Congress Party, has expressed his willingness to reconstruct the government and distribute portfolios in a manner that would give the Moslem League an equitable share of power.

There is no indication that Jinnah will give these appeals serious consideration. Some of his lieutenants are frankly and openly apprehensive that direct action by the Moslems may lead to irretrievable disaster. They seem, however, to be in a minority. Yesterday was described by Moslem League papers and speakers as a "black day." Fiery speeches have been made in some centers suggesting a complete boycott—political, economic, and social—of both the British and the Hindus, and defiance of measures prohibiting demonstrations and the possession of dangerous weapons. The rioting in Bombay was insignificant in comparison with Calcutta's, but was sufficient to convey the warning that India's present atmosphere can easily be disturbed. Congress leaders are willing to be fair, even generous, toward the Moslems, but they are not prepared to indorse a policy of appeasement of the Moslem League. One of Nehru's Moslem colleagues was prevented from taking office yesterday by a murderous assault by fanatical terrorists. Jinnah's condemnation of the attack had little real effect, and threats are being made against other Moslems who have had the courage to differ with him.

The conventions which Nehru is determined to establish transforming the Viceroy's Executive Council into a Cabinet under his leadership will make it even more difficult for Jinnah to retrace his steps. Last June he began to lose the tactical advantage he had enjoyed during the war of exercising a veto power over Congress. His blunders have virtually isolated him and the Moslem League, driving him into a dangerously perverse mood.

Congress leaders have a most anxious time ahead. They have, however, one significant achievement to their credit: Jaiprakash Narain, leader of the Socialist group and a man of very considerable influence, has finally been persuaded to join the Congress executive. He will exercise some restraint on the radicals in his own group, who have been a source of great embarrassment to the Congress governments in the provinces. Also, as evidence of withdrawal of British control over the administration accumulates, these elements will rally around Nehru's government. Jinnah's challenge may prove formidable, but it will not be irresistible.

In the Wind

APPRECIATION IS DUE. From the Marshall, Missouri, Democrat-News: "To the people who voted for me, my sincere thanks. My wife thanks the ones who did not vote for me. She says I have so many friends, why get in that office and make a lot of enemies? (Signed) Felix Baker." Mr. Baker was a candidate for county judge and lost.

FURRINERS! DRAT 'EM. The Wall Street Journal reports that California orange growers say their future is menaced by "foreign competition." They mean Florida competition. These Californians have become used to thinking of their southeastern rivals as another country. No Florida oranges are ever admitted to California (bug danger, inspectors explain), and Florida won't let in any California oranges during its growing season.

WE SUSPECTED AS MUCH. A letter to the editor of the Pontiac, Michigan, Daily Press complained: "Of the quite large number of relatives and acquaintances of mine who do not think, gamble, or use tobacco, I am sure that there are few, if any, who lean to the left."

PLAIN TALK. The Toledo Blade, through circumstances involving the transposition of a line in a caption, reported that Supreme Court Justice Harold Burton "received the honorary degree of bickerings" at Western Reserve commencement.

OLD-TIME RELIGION. Want ad in the Bradentown, Florida, Herald: "Wanted—An elderly Christian couple to live in our apartment. No children or grandchildren or pets. Yours in Christ."

AMEN, BROTHER. Editor Frederick Sullens of the Jackson, Mississippi, News, believes folks in other states should get down on their knees and thank God that Bilbo "carried nothing but Mississippi." But pity the "pore folks" in Washington. Bilbo is chairman of the Senate District of Columbia Committee.

MAYBE HE KNEW THE BOSS. Reviews of the new book "An Honorable Titan: A Biographical Study of Adolph S. Ochs," by Gerald W. Johnson, revealed interesting and divergent opinions. Lewis Gannett of the New York Herald Tribune rather fancied the book, but Orville Prescott in the New York Times says the book about his late publisher lacks the qualities of notable biographies and doesn't put the reader on familiar terms with him.

[We invite our readers to submit material for In the Wind. One dollar will be paid for each item accepted.]

BOOKS and the ARTS

The Dilemma of the Churches

RELIGION IN THE STRUGGLE FOR POWER. A STUDY IN THE SOCIOLOGY OF RELIGION. By J. Milton Yinger. Duke University Press. $3.

CLEAR, cool Courage"—this advertisement of a London brewery should be the motto of all sociologists. Or, to quote another British authority, Matthew Arnold, the aim of culture is "turning a stream of fresh and free thought upon our stock notions and habits." Milton Yinger has courage and culture. I can think of no higher praise.

Courage is not incompatible with caution. A philosophe said: "Christianity is very strong. It is good for at least another two hundred years." Yinger says: "Those who have gone most deeply into the problem are in rather general agreement that religion will continue to be a powerful force during the foreseeable future." And clearness of thought may lead us to the candid admission that certain concepts of vital importance are not clear. Yinger refuses to define religion. He further refuses to discriminate between what he calls the traditional and the intrinsic in religion. This deliberate vagueness does not invalidate his study, for in spite of his title his subject is not religion at all; it is The Dilemma of the Churches.

A fundamental distinction. This is the third important book I have read within the last few weeks in which Hamlet is played without the Prince. The "religion" Yinger discusses is Christianity. And to Jesus Himself there are only two allusions. First: "Powderly, head of the Knights of Labor, made the statement that if the Sermon on the Mount were preached without reference to its author, the preacher would be warned not to repeat such Utopian ravings, and the fashionable pews would be emptied." And second: "We need not attempt to discover whether the founder of Christianity was a pacifist." This indifference can be justified only if we accept the author's theory that the origin of an institution does not much matter, that what concerns us is its development; here the church, not religion.

I believe the second half of the title is not accurate either. "The struggle for power"—reminiscent of John Strachey—evokes problems which are not discussed in this book. We are thinking of "power" as an element in world affairs: the Vatican is a "power," although not one of the Big Three. If we apply the term to the conflict of parties or classes, "power" means mastery, control; and religion's struggle for power would mean theocracy. Now theocracy is not a dead issue. It remains the basic doctrine of the Catholic church; it inspires Jehovah's Witnesses, the Mormons, the Covenanters, the Zionists, Jinnah, and Saudi Arabia. But what Yinger discusses is far more modest. It is "how to win friends and influence people." A radical religion attracts the cranks and repels the sane. In order to do good, one must not be a do-gooder or a perfectionist; one must be realistic.

This conflict between the ideal and its material instrument Yinger typifies (my summary has to be very crude) in the words "church" and "sect." The church is an institution; it has vested interests; it cannot afford to "empty the fashionable pews." The sect is filled with the spirit, and preaches the faith, ruat caelum. The church satisfies the haves, the sect the have-nots. Naturally, every church was once a sect, but it conquered the world on the worldly plane. The sect has a soul to save.

The distinction is important; the terms are ambiguous. The sect spirit (in Yinger's sense) is manifest in many churches—particularly among the mystics and the regulars of the Catholic church. Many "sects" (in the usual sense) are small churches strongly attached to theological niceties, ritual, and organization. I should prefer: "the ecclesiastical and the prophetic tendencies."

Yinger discusses next, in two very substantial chapters, Max Weber's famous thesis: The Protestant Ethic and the Spirit of Capitalism. His critique is a model of fearless moderation. Most of the facts adduced by Weber are incontrovertible and indeed obvious: there seems to be a pre-established harmony between Calvinism and the profit system, including the small number of the elect. But Yinger quotes Sombart to the effect that modern capitalism was born in 1202—half a millennium, by the way, ahead of the Industrial Revolution. It certainly was admirably developed in Florence, which did not turn Protestant; and the best descriptions of the profiteer are Lesage's "Turcaret" and Balzac, passim, with the background of a Catholic society. It is said that there were not a few disinterested, unworldly characters among the Puritans. Jewish, Catholic, Protestant, Chinese, Parsee, Japanese capitalists are in pretty thorough agreement about the eternal verities. "The body of historical evidence," says Yinger, "leads us to the conclusion that the description of social change requires the eschewing of all one-factor deterministic theories." There may be much truth in Bossuet's "providential" interpretation, in the Marxian conception of class conflict, in Mahan's doctrine of sea power, in Turner's emphasis on the frontier. The fallacy begins when we neglect "a careful analysis of the many interacting factors at work in every cultural setting." I might add, "of the unrelated factors." Coincidence, mere chance, plays an enormous part in history. Systems are the opiate of the learned: they assuage the malady of thought. When you are a good Marxian or a true Mohammedan, your mental worries are over; you may slumber in peace.

This clears the way for the two great examples of "the churches' dilemma"—The Economic Ethics of Contemporary Churches and The Churches and War. It seems pretty clear that the original Christian doctrine was communism, still practiced by the religious orders which attempt to lead the perfect Christian life. It is even clearer that for fifteen hundred years at least the church condemned interest, which is the essence of capitalism. And, to be as cautious as Yinger, there is a reasonable presumption that the spirit of Christianity is antagonistic to war. But it would be disastrous for the ideal if the church, its champion on earth, should systematically be on the losing side. If a profitable sin has to be committed—imperialistic conquest, or the grabbing of natural resources—it had better be committed by a virtuous man: why leave all the good things to Satan? The result is that, in their noble quest for influence, the churches become the auxiliaries of power—monarchy in the old days, nationalism and capitalism in ours. Says Arthur L. Swift Jr.: "It is, I believe, beyond question that organized religion in the United States, by virtue of its vastly increased wealth, is so closely interrelated with the whole capitalistic system, so committed to the sacredness of private property, and to the notion that financial success is in some vague way an indication of divine favor, that it cannot help but consider any real attack upon capitalism as a threat to its own security." The situation is changing. Labor is asserting its power, and the most conservative churches are "muscling in" on the program of labor: it is the recognition of a fait accompli.

Every writer, however careful, has his personal equation. Yinger presumably grew to full consciousness between the wars, when it was the fashion to flout and deride all "atrocity stories." The eagerness to believe them, on the scantiest evidence, was no doubt part of the war hysteria. But this does not dispose of all the stories. After all, war itself is "atrocity": the Germans called it Schrecklichkeit and Sherman called it hell. War means torturing your opponent into submission. The worst atrocity in world history was our use of the atomic bomb without first giving the Japanese a warning, a demonstration, and a choice. It was William II, not the Reverend Dwight Hillis, who gave currency to the term "Huns." Germany's crime was to put its faith in war as an instrument of foreign policy, with Frederick the Great, Clausewitz, and Bismarck. What is the meaning of "Durch Eisen und Blut," if not "atrocity"? And what is power politics but the threat of "giving 'em hell"?

Yinger's conclusion is, like the whole body of his book, extremely guarded: "In terms of the present study, it would seem to be an error to discount completely the influence of the purely religious idea working in history, and equally an error to fail to see the limitations of its power and the frequency with which it is dominated by other interests. The limitations are partly intrinsic: the religious interest is dominant in only a small minority of persons." This is true of everything above the humdrum plane. Genius, passion, the mystic experience are rare. We know them at second or third hand, and diluted. And yet, is it not they, and they alone, that make history? ALBERT GUÉRARD

No Longer and Not Yet

THE DEATH OF VIRGIL. By Hermann Broch. Translated by Jean Starr Untermeyer. Pantheon Books. $6.50.

HUME once remarked that the whole of human civilization depends upon the fact that "one generation does not go off the stage at once and another succeed, as is the case with silkworms and butterflies." At some turning-points of history, however, at some heights of crisis, a fate similar to that of silkworms and butterflies may befall a generation of men. For the decline of the old, the birth of the new, is not necessarily an affair of continuity; between the generations, between those who for some reason or other still belong to the old and those who either feel the catastrophe in their very bones or have already grown up with it, the chain is broken and an "empty space," a kind of historical no man's land, comes to the surface which can be described only in terms of "no longer and not yet." In Europe such an absolute interruption of continuity occurred during and after the First World War. All the loose talk of intellectuals about the necessary decline of Western civilization or the famous lost generation, as it is usually uttered by "reactionaries," has its basis of truth in this break, and consequently has proved much more attractive than the corresponding triviality of the "liberal" mind that puts before us the alternative between going ahead and going backward, an alternative which appears so devoid of sense precisely because it still presupposes an unbroken chain of continuity.

Speaking merely in terms of European literature, this gap, this opening of an abyss of empty space and empty time, is most clearly visible in the disparity between the two greatest masters of our time, Marcel Proust and Franz Kafka. Proust is the last and the most beautiful farewell to the world of the nineteenth century, and we return to his work, written in the key of the "no longer," again and again when the mood of farewell and of sorrow overwhelms us. Kafka, on the other hand, is our contemporary only to a limited extent. It is as though he wrote already from the vantage point of a distant future, as though he were or could have been at home only in a world which is "not yet." This puts us at a certain distance whenever we are to read and discuss his work, a distance which will not grow smaller, even though we may know that his art is the expression of some future world which is our future, too—if we are to have any future at all.

All other great European novelists and poets find their place and their standard of measurement somewhere in between these dead masters. But Hermann Broch's book falls in a different category from the rest. That he has in common with Proust the form of the inner monologue and with Kafka the utter and radical renunciation of entertainment, as well as a preoccupation with metaphysics, that he shares with Proust a deep fondness for the world as it is given to us, and that he shares with Kafka the belief that the "hero" of the novel is no longer a character with certain well-defined qualities but rather man as such (for the real life of the man and poet Virgil is no more than an occasion for Broch's philosophical speculations)—all this is true, and the histories of literature may say it later.

What is more important, at least at this moment, is that Broch's work—through its subject matter and through its entirely original and magnificent poetic diction—has become something like the missing link between Proust and Kafka, between a past which we have irretrievably lost and a future which is not yet at hand. In other words, this book is by itself the kind of bridge with which Virgil tries to span the abyss of empty space between the no longer and the not yet. And since this abyss is very real; since it has become deeper and more frightful every single year from the fateful year of 1914 onward, until the death factories erected in the heart of Europe definitely cut the already outworn thread with which we still might have been tied to a historical entity of more than two thousand years; since we are already living in the "empty space," confronted with a reality which no preconceived traditional idea of the world and man can possibly illuminate—dear as this tradition may have remained to our hearts—we must be profoundly grateful for the great work of poetry which clings so desperately to this one subject.

Curiously enough, very little in Broch's earlier work indicates the future author of the "Death of Virgil." "The Sleepwalkers," apart from its qualities as a novel, shows only that its author is fed up with story-telling, thoroughly impatient with his own work: he tells his readers that they had better find for themselves the end of the story, and neglects character and plot in order to squeeze into his book long speculations about the nature of history. Up to a certain date Broch was a good, playful, amusing story-teller, not a great poet.

The date which made of Broch a poet seems to have coincided with the last stage of darkening in Europe. When the night arrived, Broch woke up. He awoke to a reality which so overwhelmed him that he translated it immediately into a dream, as is fitting for a man roused in night. This dream is "The Death of Virgil."

Critics have said that the book is written in lyrical prose, but this is not quite correct. The style, unique in its concentrated tension, bears more of a resemblance to those invocations of the Homeric hymns in which the God is summoned over and over again, each time with another residence, another mythological setting, another place of worship—as though the worshiper had to make sure, absolutely sure, that he could not miss the God. In the same way Broch invokes Life, or Death, or Love, or Time, or Space, as if he wanted to make sure, absolutely sure, that he would not miss the mark. This gives the monologue its passionate urgency, and brings out the tense, concentrated action of all true speculation.

In the "O's" of the invocations are imbedded the exciting descriptions, the extensive landscape painting in which the work is so very rich. These read like a long and tender song of farewell to all Western painters, and they transcend through their form of invocation these described objects, as though they embraced all that is beautiful or all that is ugly, all that is green or all earthly dustiness, all nobility or all vulgarity.

The subject of Broch's book, as the title indicates, is the last twenty-four hours of Virgil's life. But death is treated not merely as an event but as the ultimate achievement of man—whether in the sense that moments of dying are one's last and only chance for knowing what life was all about or in the sense that it is then one passes judgment upon one's own life. This judgment is not self-accusation, for it is too late for that, nor self-justification, for it is, in a way, too early for that; it is the ultimate effort to find the truth, the last definitive word for the whole story. This makes of the last judgment a human affair, to be settled by man himself, though at the limits of his forces and possibilities—as if he wanted to spare God this whole trouble. The "no longer and not yet" on this level means the no longer alive and the not yet dead; and the task is the conscious achievement of judgment and truth.

This grandiose concept of death as an ultimate task instead

Writing in prison in 1941, France's Socialist ex-premier put down his statement of democratic faith for a new generation. Here, unchanged, are those amazingly prophetic words—a shrewd analysis of French politics and a democratic program which must affect the world's future. "This is a high-minded book... and it comes like a breath of fresh air."

—The New Yorker. $2.50

LEON BLUM'S

FOR ALL MANKIND

Published by VIKING

Available at all booksellers

THOSE unknown North Americans—living in our midst yet separated from us by language, history, and religion—are here interpreted by an American observer and historian. "He has rendered this brief incisive account of the cooperation and conflicts between two races, politically united, but otherwise vastly unlike, with lucidity, coolness and, I believe, fairness."—EDWARD ANGLY, N. Y. Herald Tribune $2.00

Mason Wade's

THE FRENCH-CANADIAN

OUTLOOK

of as an ultimate calamity prevents Broch's speculations from falling into the trap of modern death-philosophy, for which life has in itself the germ of death and for which, consequently, the moment of death appears as the "goal of life." If death is the last task of the living man, then life has been given, not as a death-infected gift, but rather under certain conditions—that we forever "stand on the bridge that is spanned between invisibility and invisibility and nevertheless . . . are caught in the stream."

The actual subject matter of the book is the position of the artist in the world and in history: of the man who does not "do" like human beings but "creates" like God—though in appearance only. The artist is forever excluded from reality, and banished into the "empty province of beauty." His playing at eternity—and this bewitching game that we call beauty—turns into the "laughter that destroys reality," the laughter that springs from the terrible intuition that the Creation itself, and not merely man's playing at creating, can be destroyed. With this laughter the poet "descends to the mob-patterns," to the cynical, debased vulgarity over which he had been carried on his litter through the slums of Brundisium. Mob and artist alike are greedy with self-idolatry, caring only for themselves, and excluded from all true community, which is based on helpfulness. "Intoxicated with loneliness," from which spring in equal part "the intoxication of blood, the intoxication of death, and . . . the intoxication of beauty," they are both equally treacherous, equally unconcerned with truth, therefore entirely unreliable and in need of forgetting reality, by means of beauty or circus games; both are intoxicated with "empty forms and empty words."

Because the "no longer and not yet" cannot be bridged with the rainbow of beauty, the poet is bound to fall "into vulgarity . . . where vulgarity is at its worst, into literarity." From this insight rises the decision which becomes the central plot of the story, the decision to burn the "Aeneid," to have the work "consumed by the fire of reality." This deed, this sacrifice, suddenly appears as the only escape left from the "empty province of beauty," the only door through which, even when dying and in the very last moment, the poet may still perceive the promised land of reality and human fellowship.

It is at this moment that the friends enter the scene, trying to prevent what clearly are mere fever delusions of the dying man. There follows the long dialogue between Virgil and Octavian—one of the most truthful and impressive pieces of writing in all historical fiction—which ends with the abandonment of this sacrifice. The sacrifice, after all, would have been made only for the salvation of soul, out of anxiety about the self, for the sake of the symbol—while the abandonment of the plan and the gift of the manuscript win from the face of the imperial friend a last happy smile.

Then comes death, the boat ride down to the depths of the elements when gently, one after another, the friends disappear, and man returns in peace from the long voyage of freedom into the quiet waiting of an inarticulate universe. His death seemed to him a happy death: for he had found the bridge with which to span the abyss that yawns between the "no longer and not yet" of history, between the "no longer" of the old laws and the "not yet" of the new saving word, between life and death: "Not quite here but yet at hand; that is how it has sounded and how it would sound."

The book is written in a very beautiful and extremely complicated German; the achievement of the translator is beyond praise.

HANNAH ARENDT

Similes and Satire

THE SPECTRE IMAGE. By John Nerber. Simon and Schuster. $2.

SELECTED VERSE. By John Manifold. The John Day Company. $2.50.

AMONG poets under thirty there appears to be a widespread notion that poetry consists of a wild flurry of striking comparisons ("The rune of creeping frost/Cracks on the tomb its lips"), strained puns ("Atlantean forces converging to a charter/Far out upon my sea"), and giving the wrong name to everything ("boys who riding Venus-cars/ Drop from aloft the gap-teeth of their flight"). Doubtless a good deal of wildness is the prerogative of young poets, but this business is beginning to look less like superabundance of spirits than like a carefully cultivated vice. Somehow or other poets like Mr. Nerber, who provided the illustrations above, have got the idea that they must give their best energies to producing things of this kind; so that they have very little left for the serious business of being poets, and it is difficult to judge what they might accomplish in this way were they really to try. For what it is worth, I would guess that Mr. Nerber is quite honestly sensitive to the small, characteristic experiences. The most successful poems in this book are those which, beneath the exploding clocks and the by-play with Bulfinch, are speaking of a family dinner, working in a factory, a hospital ward.

Mr. Manifold's verse is a great relief after all this earnest miscalculation. Perhaps it is because he is an Australian, perhaps because he is a Socialist; but whatever the cause, he seems to have managed to escape into being quite unaffectedly what he is, a writer of boisterous directness with strong opinions about everything and a real respect for his craft. Nothing in this volume is great poetry, and nobody knows it better than Mr. Manifold; but there is nothing in it, either, which is not thought and felt and written cleanly. The lyrics remind you of early MacNeice; but the satires show Mr. Manifold's unpretentious virtues most clearly:

> Here simple Spender in a place apart
> Bares on his sleeve his haemophilic heart;
> Dribble by drip the pinkish flow proceeds—
> Oh, squeeze it, Mister Spender! Thar she bleeds!

"Change names and places," he says of his ideal poet, > such a man by turns

> Is Henry Lawson, Lorca, Brecht, or Burns
> Or becomes part of him the critics call
> "Anon," the greatest poet of them all.

Mr. Manifold is not yet such a man, but I would not lay too much money that when he grows up there may not be a family resemblance.

ARTHUR MIZENER

Dissonant Fanfare

FANFARE FOR ELIZABETH. By Edith Sitwell. The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

ROYAL pride, anger, and lust; royal guilt and vengeance, suspicion and intrigue; plots, counterplots, marriages, rapes, divorces, treasons, beheadings, excommunications—a fine dissonant fanfare indeed for that daughter of Henry VIII who was proclaimed princess and heir to the throne and renounced as bastard before she was ten years old. The story is a little hard to follow, partly because it was long ago, partly because, like the time's language, it was involved with complication: no one knew all that was happening, and many, who knew a part, were crafty dissemblers and liars. And in this account it is a little hard to follow, also, because Miss Sitwell's sentences come by in such caparison and panoply that their gorgeousness distracts the reader's attention from the direction in which the procession is going. Item—"The green light glittered faintly upon gowns of such hues as ruby, crane, drake, 'flybert', 'goselinge', horseflesh, Isabella (a pale yellow), turtle, and willow. . . ." Item—"In the gardens of Westminster, and those that surrounded the Palace of Hampton, to whose walls, the colour of a bullfinch's rosy feathers, plaited rosemary was nailed, the roots of sweet-williams, violets, primroses, 'gillyvor slips,' and mints, lay hidden under the manure of strawberry-rot." Rich prose, spirited prose, delightful because delighted, fine, not always fancy, writing, with just now and then a human instance where the baroque lapses into bathos. ROLFE HUMPHRIES

MOTION PICTURE

NEVER BEFORE SUCH LUXURIOUS... RIOTOUS... LOVING AND LIVING!

G. C. F. presents

VIVIEN LEIGH • CLAUDE RAINS

in Bernard Shaw's

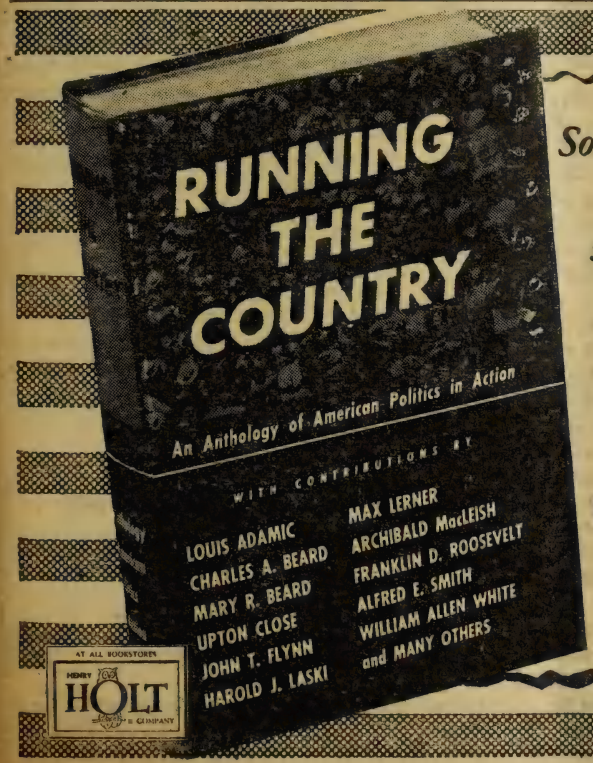
"CAESAR AND CLEOPATRA"

PRODUCED AND DIRECTED BY Gabriel Pascal

*By Arrangement with DAVID O. SELZNICK

NOW ASTOR B'WAY & 45th ST.

POPULAR PRICES



Some of the best writing about the American system of government

● Here is how the American government works—a stimulating, comprehensive collection of articles on the many facets of our democracy in action. There are enough points of view, presented by experts, to confirm or collapse any loosely-held theories. A brief biographical note about each of the noted authors is included. $3.95

RUNNING THE COUNTRY

An Anthology of American Politics in Action

Edited by A. N. CHRISTENSEN and E. M. KIRKPATRICK

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST.
near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"Romantic Comedy Drama"—N. Y. Times

MYRNA LOY
DON AMECHE
'SO GOES MY LOVE'

Based on HIRAM PERCY MAXIM'S "A Genius in the Family"

—AND—

'SHE WROTE THE BOOK'
JOAN DAVIS • JACK OAKIE

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL B'way & 62 St.

W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM'S
'OF HUMAN BONDAGE'

STARRING

Eleanor PARKER • Paul HENREID • Alexis SMITH

-AND-

'JANIE GETS MARRIED' Joan LESLIE Robert HUTTON

BOB HOPE
and Joan Caulfield
IN
"MONSIEUR BEAUCAIRE"
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

—IN PERSON—
CHARLIE SPIVAK
AND HIS ORCHESTRA
—Plus—
BOB EVANS
—Plus—
JOHN and RENE
ARNAUT
Extra Added Attraction
PEGGY LEE

NOW PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

NOW! AIR-CONDITIONED

The THEATRE GUILD presents
LAURENCE OLIVIER
in William Shakespeare's
"HENRY V"

IN TECHNICOLOR • Released Thru United Artists

PRICES: Evgs. (at 8:30) $2.40, $1.80 Mats. daily (at 2:30) $1.80, $1.20

ALL SEATS RESERVED

NOW! GOLDEN THEATRE 252 West 45th St.

MOTION PICTURE

CRAIG RICE'S
HOME SWEET HOMICIDE
with
Peggy Ann Garner • Randolph Scott
Lynn Bari • Dean Stockwell
Connie Marshall
A 20th CENTURY-FOX PICTURE

— ON STAGE —
HILDEGARDE
In Her Own Penguin Room Show

PATSY KELLY FEATURING JAN MURRAY

Now Playing COOL ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

STAGE PLAYS

THEATRE GUILD'S PRODUCTIONS
THE MUSICAL HIT
CAROUSEL
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
with John Raitt — Iva Withers
Jean Darling • Eric Mattson • Norma Howard • Jean Casto
AIR-COND. MAJESTIC Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway, Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT
OKLAHOMA!
Based on Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs"
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
Jack Kilty • David Burns • Betty Jane Watson • Ruth Weston
AIR-COND. ST. JAMES Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway, Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." — Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents
BORN YESTERDAY
The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40. AIR-COND.

"MERMAN'S A WOW!"—Chapman, News
RICHARD RODGERS and OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN Present
ETHEL MERMAN in
"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"
Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON
Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN
IMPERIAL THEA., 45th St. W. of Bway. Mats. Wed. & Sat. Air-Cond.

Next Week in The Nation

BOOKS ON MUSIC

In the September 21st issue, The Books and The Arts section of The Nation will contain:

"NEWMAN AS MAN AND CRITIC"
by B. H. Haggin

"SLOW MOVEMENT"
a poem by Louis MacNeice

"POST-WAR RADIO-PHONOGRAPHS"
by B. H. Haggin

Reviews, by Charles Farrell, Morton Dauwen Zabel, Wylie Sypher, Ralph Bates and George Henry, of some of the season's books on music.

Films

JAMES AGEE

THE idea keeps nagging at me that more and more people who think of themselves as serious-minded, and progressive, thoroughly disapprove of crime melodramas. They feel that movies should be devoted, rather, to more elevated themes such as a biography of George Washington Carver, omitting nothing down to the last peanut, or a good faithful adaptation of "Adam Bede" in sepia, with the entire text read off-screen by Herbert Marshall, or the story of how the way to atomic control and the brotherhood of man has been pointed out by egg cooperatives. They seem not to remember or not to care that in Germany, a few years ago, movies had to be constructive; stories of crime, and of troubled marriage, for instance, were strictly forbidden. For many years so much has been forbidden or otherwise made impossible in Hollywood that crime has offered one of the few chances for getting any sort of vitality on the screen. The three following movies are crime melodramas, factory-made. I can't say much for them, except that they are better to watch than most other factory products and, I suspect, better still to watch than the bracing, informative, constructive films which are the only kind these progressives would allow, if they were given half a chance.

"The Killers" starts off with Ernest Hemingway's brilliant, frightening story, then spends the next hour or so highlighting all that the story so much more powerfully left in the dark. The results aren't quite what might be expected. The story is well presented, but Hemingway's talk, which on the page used to seem so nearly magical and is still so very good, sounds, on the screen, as cooked-up and formal as an eclogue. From there on out the dialogue, though generally skilful and talented, isn't within miles of Hemingway's in quality, but it is made to be seen as well as heard, so, coming out of pictures, it sounds more nearly real. The story, from where Hemingway leaves off, is also a comparative letdown, but it too is better movie—good bars, fierce boxing, nice stuff for several minor players, and the kind of calculated violence and atmosphere in the filming of a robbery and of the last two sequences which was commonplace in old gangster films and is now so rare that in a good sense as well as a bad it is almost museum material. There is a good strident journalistic feeling for tension, noise, sentiment, and jazzed-up realism, all well manipulated by Robert Siodmak, which is probably chiefly to the credit of the producer, Mark Hellinger. There is nothing unique or even valuable about the picture, but energy combined with attention to form and detail doesn't turn up every day; neither does good entertainment.

"Black Angel" is pretty good entertainment too, on a humbler level. Taken casually, it is about like a better-than-average mystery reprint; pleasant to read yourself to sleep with. Taken as it deserves, it is better than that. Most movies of this inconspicuous, limited kind are made on a level of pure hack competence, or practically sleepwalking. Most of the people who wrote, directed, photographed, and played in this one have worked as if they believed that no job is so trivial but what it deserves the best you have. I particularly liked Dan Duryea's performance.

I finally caught up with "The Dark Corner"—not, I must confess, so badly out of breath as duty tells me I should have been. I enjoyed seeing it. I think everyone was right who pointed out that it is a shameless combination of formulas—of the murder-in-aspic, "Laura" sort of thing with the deep-city, Chandler kind which the existentialists will probably start discovering, and explaining, and imitating, almost any year now. But once in a while slickness and derivativeness persist so far in their folly that they develop a kind of vitality of their own—not to mention the fact that in movies, especially, people of real talent have sometimes either to succumb wholly to those vices or to use them as still another kind of leverage for surreptitious quality. There is no point in recommending "The Dark Corner" at all highly; but a great deal of intelligence and a fair amount of talent not only went into it, as they do into most movies, but manage—as they do in few—to remain visible. This, I thought, kept the show alive and fairly interesting.

A better show than any of these, and the funniest thing I have seen since the decline of sociological dancing, is "Rhapsody Rabbit." It is incredibly simple-minded: Bugs Bunny, interrupted by carrots and a mouse, gives a cut yet definitive performance of the most familiar of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies—I forget which number. Some of it is as flatly brutal as Spike Jones, but I have never heard Jones within light-years of it except in parts of "You Always Hurt the One You Love." The best of it goes two ways: one, very observant parody of concert-pianistic affectations, elegantly thought out and synchronized; the other, brutality keyed into the spirit of the music to reach greater subtlety than I have ever seen brutality reach before. I could hardly illustrate without musical quotation; but there is a passage in which the music goes up with an arrogant wrenching of slammed chords—Ronk, Ronk, RONK (G-B-E)—then prisses downward on a broken scale—which Bugs takes (a) with all four feet, charging madly, scowling like a rocking-horse late for a date at stud, (b) friskily tiptoe, proudly smirking, like a dog toe-dancing through his own misdemeanor or the return of an I-Was-There journalist, a man above fear or favor who knows precisely which sleeping dogs to lie about. It killed me; and when they had the wonderful brass to repeat it exactly, a few bars later, I knew what killed really meant. Perhaps I should warn you, however, not to expect too much—not to expect anything, if possible. I usually loathe these hearty burlesques of good ham art; chiefly because most of them are made in hatred of all art, and in a total lack of understanding of the thing they are burlesquing. But a good musician must have worked on this art. Barring Beatrice Lillie I have never seen anything done from so deep inside the ham; I also had the great advantage of seeing it without warning. Perhaps I can put it this way. I have always very much liked this particular eruption of Liszt's, and though it made me laugh, the laughter was without patronage, far less scorn. After seeing its guts torn out in this movie short I knew more about it, and liked it better, than ever.

[This week and last week Mr. Haggin has been taking a vacation; next week's issue will contain an article by him and his regular column.]

"Beautifully blended singing . . ."
B. H. Haggin in The Nation
Albanese and Merrill
DITE ALLA GIOVINE
La Traviata, Act II
Vic 11-9175 — $1.05 plus postage
Many other records of this calibre can be shipped to you by
SUPREME RADIO SERVICE
42 South Ocean Avenue, Patchogue, Long Island

THE AMERICAN FREEMAN
Monthly Magazine, edited by E. Haldeman-Julius. Each issue contains about 50,000 words. Contributors: Bertrand Russell, Joseph McCabe, Paul Eldridge, E. Haldeman-Julius, and others. Always on the side of libertarianism and freethought. $1 per year (Canada and other Foreign, $1.25). Sample copy 10c. The most outspoken publication in the U. S. It is a fearless and uncompromising truth-seeker. It pulls no punches. It hits hard. It is well-written and appeals to intelligent readers who aren't afraid of candor. Mail subscription to: The American Freeman, Box 4029, Girard, Kansas.

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST.
near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"Romantic Comedy Drama"—N. Y. Times

MYRNA LOY
DON AMECHE
'SO GOES MY LOVE'

Based on HIRAM PERCY MAXIM'S "A Genius in the Family"

—AND—

'SHE WROTE THE BOOK'
JOAN DAVIS • JACK OAKIE

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL B'way & 62 St.

W. SOMERSET MAUGHAM'S
'OF HUMAN BONDAGE'

STARRING

Eleanor PARKER • Paul HENREID • Alexis SMITH

-AND-

'JANIE GETS MARRIED' Joan LESLIE Robert HUTTON

BOB HOPE
and Joan Caulfield
IN
"MONSIEUR BEAUCAIRE"
A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

—IN PERSON—
CHARLIE SPIVAK
AND HIS ORCHESTRA
—Plus—
BOB EVANS
—Plus—
JOHN and RENE ARNAUT
Extra Added Attraction
PEGGY LEE

NOW PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

NOW! AIR-CONDITIONED

The THEATRE GUILD presents
LAURENCE OLIVIER
in William Shakespeare's
"HENRY V"

IN TECHNICOLOR • Released Thru United Artists

PRICES: Evgs. (at 8:30) $2.40, $1.80 Mats. daily (at 2:30) $1.80, $1.20

ALL SEATS RESERVED

NOW! GOLDEN THEATRE 45th West 45th St.

MOTION PICTURE

CRAIG RICE'S
HOME SWEET HOMICIDE
with
Peggy Ann Garner • Randolph Scott
Lynn Bari • Dean Stockwell
Connie Marshall
A 20th CENTURY-FOX PICTURE

— ON STAGE —
HILDEGARDE
In Her Own Penguin Room Show

PATSY KELLY FEATURING JAN MURRAY

Now Playing COOL ROXY 7th Ave. at 50th Street

STAGE PLAYS

THEATRE GUILD'S PRODUCTIONS
THE MUSICAL HIT
CAROUSEL

Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille

with John Raitt — Iva Withers
Jean Darling • Eric Mattson • Norma Howard • Jean Casto

AIR-COND. MAJESTIC Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT
OKLAHOMA!

Based on Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs"

Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille

Jack Kilty • David Burns • Betty Jane Watson • Ruth Weston

AIR-COND. ST. JAMES Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." — Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents
BORN YESTERDAY
The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN
LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40. AIR-COND.

"MERMAN'S A WOW!"—Chapman, News
RICHARD RODGERS and OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd Present
ETHEL MERMAN in
"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"
Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON
Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN
IMPERIAL THEA., 45th St. W. of Bway. Mats. Wed. & Sat. Air-Cond.

Next Week in The Nation

BOOKS ON MUSIC

In the September 21st issue, The Books and The Arts section of The Nation will contain:

"NEWMAN AS MAN AND CRITIC"
by B. H. Haggin

"SLOW MOVEMENT"
a poem by Louis MacNeice

"POST-WAR RADIO-PHONOGRAPHS"
by B. H. Haggin

Reviews, by Charles Farrell, Morton Dauwen Zabel, Wylie Sypher, Ralph Bates and George Henry, of some of the season's books on music.

Films

JAMES AGEE

THE idea keeps nagging at me that more and more people who think of themselves as serious-minded, and progressive, thoroughly disapprove of crime melodramas. They feel that movies should be devoted, rather, to more elevated themes such as a biography of George Washington Carver, omitting nothing down to the last peanut, or a good faithful adaptation of "Adam Bede" in sepia, with the entire text read off-screen by Herbert Marshall, or the story of how the way to atomic control and the brotherhood of man has been pointed out by egg cooperatives. They seem not to remember or not to care that in Germany, a few years ago, movies had to be constructive; stories of crime, and of troubled marriage, for instance, were strictly forbidden. For many years so much has been forbidden or otherwise made impossible in Hollywood that crime has offered one of the few chances for getting any sort of vitality on the screen. The three following movies are crime melodramas, factory-made. I can't say much for them, except that they are better to watch than most other factory products and, I suspect, better still to watch than the bracing, informative, constructive films which are the only kind these progressives would allow, if they were given half a chance.

"The Killers" starts off with Ernest Hemingway's brilliant, frightening story, then spends the next hour or so highlighting all that the story so much more powerfully left in the dark. The results aren't quite what might be expected. The story is well presented, but Hemingway's talk, which on the page used to seem so nearly magical and is still so very good, sounds, on the screen, as cooked-up and formal as an eclogue. From there on out the dialogue, though generally skilful and talented, isn't within miles of Hemingway's in quality, but it is made to be seen as well as heard, so, coming out of pictures, it sounds more nearly real. The story, from where Hemingway leaves off, is also a comparative letdown, but it too is better movie—good bars, fierce boxing, nice stuff for several minor players, and the kind of calculated violence and atmosphere in the filming of a robbery and of the last two sequences which was commonplace in old gangster films and is now so rare that in a good sense as well as a bad it is almost museum material. There is a good strident journalistic feeling for tension, noise, sentiment, and jazzed-up realism, all well manipulated by Robert Siodmak, which is probably chiefly to the credit of the producer, Mark Hellinger. There is nothing unique or even valuable about the picture, but energy combined with attention to form and detail doesn't turn up every day; neither does good entertainment.

"Black Angel" is pretty good entertainment too, on a humbler level. Taken casually, it is about like a better-than-average mystery reprint; pleasant to read yourself to sleep with. Taken as it deserves, it is better than that. Most movies of this inconspicuous, limited kind are made on a level of pure hack competence, or practically sleepwalking. Most of the people who wrote, directed, photographed, and played in this one have worked as if they believed that no job is so trivial but what it deserves the best you have. I particularly liked Dan Duryea's performance.

I finally caught up with "The Dark Corner"—not, I must confess, so badly out of breath as duty tells me I should have been. I enjoyed seeing it. I think everyone was right who pointed out that it is a shameless combination of formulas—of the murder-in-aspic, "Laura" sort of thing with the deep-city, Chandler kind which the existentialists will probably start discovering, and explaining, and imitating, almost any year now. But once in a while slickness and derivativeness persist so far in their folly that they develop a kind of vitality of their own—not to mention the fact that in movies, especially, people of real talent have sometimes either to succumb wholly to those vices or to use them as still another kind of leverage for surreptitious quality. There is no point in recommending "The Dark Corner" at all highly; but a great deal of intelligence and a fair amount of talent not only went into it, as they do into most movies, but manage—as they do in few—to remain visible. This, I thought, kept the show alive and fairly interesting.

A better show than any of these, and the funniest thing I have seen since the decline of sociological dancing, is "Rhapsody Rabbit." It is incredibly simple-minded: Bugs Bunny, interrupted by carrots and a mouse, gives a cut yet definitive performance of the most familiar of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies—I forget which number. Some of it is as flatly brutal as Spike Jones, but I have never heard Jones within light-years of it except in parts of "You Always Hurt the One You Love." The best of it goes two ways: one, very observant parody of concert-pianistic affectations, elegantly thought out and synchronized; the other, brutality keyed into the spirit of the music to reach greater subtlety than I have ever seen brutality reach before. I could hardly illustrate without musical quotation; but there is a passage in which the music goes up with an arrogant wrenching of slammed chords—Ronk, Ronk, RONK (G-B-E)—then prisses downward on a broken scale—which Bugs takes (a) with all four feet, charging madly, scowling like a rocking-horse late for a date at stud, (b) friskily tiptoe, proudly smirking, like a dog toe-dancing through his own misdemeanor or the return of an I-Was-There journalist, a man above fear or favor who knows precisely which sleeping dogs to lie about. It killed me; and when they had the wonderful brass to repeat it exactly, a few bars later, I knew what killed really meant. Perhaps I should warn you, however, not to expect too much—not to expect anything, if possible. I usually loathe these hearty burlesques of good ham art; chiefly because most of them are made in hatred of all art, and in a total lack of understanding of the thing they are burlesquing. But a good musician must have worked on this art. Barring Beatrice Lillie I have never seen anything done from so deep inside the ham; I also had the great advantage of seeing it without warning. Perhaps I can put it this way. I have always very much liked this particular eruption of Liszt's, and though it made me laugh, the laughter was without patronage, far less scorn. After seeing its guts torn out in this movie short I knew more about it, and liked it better, than ever.

[This week and last week Mr. Haggin has been taking a vacation; next week's issue will contain an article by him and his regular column.]

"Beautifully blended singing . . ."
B. H. Haggin in The Nation
Albanese and Merrill
DITE ALLA GIOVINE
La Traviata, Act II
Vic 11-9175 — $1.05 plus postage
Many other records of this calibre can be shipped to you by
SUPREME RADIO SERVICE
42 South Ocean Avenue, Patchogue, Long Island

THE AMERICAN FREEMAN
Monthly Magazine, edited by E. Haldeman-Julius. Each issue contains about 50,000 words. Contributors: Bertrand Russell, Joseph McCabe, Paul Eldridge, E. Haldeman-Julius, and others. Always on the side of libertarianism and freethought. $1 per year (Canada and other Foreign, $1.25). Sample copy 10c. The most outspoken publication in the U. S. It is a fearless and uncompromising truth-seeker. It pulls no punches. It hits hard. It is well-written and appeals to intelligent readers who aren't afraid of candor. Mail subscription to: The American Freeman, Box 4020, Girard, Kansas.

Letters to the Editors

Views on Hungary

Dear Sirs: Miss Spiel in Hungarian Holocaust (The Nation, August 24) gave a fairly exact picture of the economic situation. There is but a slight error in the statement that the United States "only very recently" promised to return Hungary's gold reserve from the American occupation zone to the National Bank. This promise was made to the Committee for a New Democratic Hungary more than a year ago and more definitely to the members of the Hungarian government visiting Washington. At the time of Miss Spiel's article the gold reserve had already been returned. Less complete is her account of political troubles in Hungary. The Smallholders' Party represented others than "the conservative democratic interests." In spite of having some reactionary members, its program stood for a thorough land reform. It is true that big financiers and industrialists attempted to sabotage industrial stabilization, but to suggest that Allied missions were influenced "by their undeniable charm" is, I am afraid, overrating the sex appeal of the captains of industry. In picturing the political situation Miss Spiel omits to point to the growing tension which, as it appears from a detailed report in the Christian Science Monitor of August 23, "fanned anti-Semitism to white heat." This shows that Magyaro-Nazis are more numerous than is generally assumed.

RUSTEM VAMBERY

Rockport, Mass., August 24

Third Party Need

Dear Sirs: The second instalment of Mr. Mr. Gordon's Prairie Socialism (The Nation, August 24) pointed up what many American progressives have long considered the great fallacy in the thinking of The Nation's editors, as well as many other American liberals.

Mr. Gordon speaks of the past victories of the CCF; he tells us how it has been a force for progress in Canada, even though it has not gained power; he tells us that the future of the socialist movement in the Dominion is bright because of the CCF. Yet where does The Nation stand on the proposition of creating a similar movement in the United States? It seems content to hang on to P. A. C.'s choosing "the better" of "worst" candidates, to ally itself with committees for this and that.

We will not get a progressive political movement in this country by making American liberalism the tail of Democracy's Jim-Crow, poll-tax, fraudulent-machine kite! The arguments are: (1) Don't split the movement; you'll elect even worse people. (2) America isn't mature enough for such a party. (3) We can do what we want in one of the old parties.

Look around us. Would it have made a difference, really, if Dewey had not been elected and a Democrat had been in New York? Would Jim Farley not still have been the party dictator there? Has not Dewey actually done as much as would have been asked of a Democrat, even though he were supported by the liberals and the A. L. P? Look at the record of the last Congress—elected in no small way, P. A. C.'ers say, by the C. I. O. Yet it was the most ardently anti-labor national legislature in years.

If the U. S. A. is not mature enough for a real labor party now, will it ever be? Maturity is far more important in the minds of those who write for the liberal and radical press and for those who handle the affairs of our trade unions. Politics are an enigma to the average worker and farmer. He looks to these people to lead him. They can lead him after the mirage of the two old parties, or on to a new movement.

As to the third argument, does it actually need refutation? Can good come out of alliances that force us to cheer at the ousting of an old tried-and-true friend of labor like La Follette? that force us to join hands with the Pendergast machine? that throw us into allegiance to the Hagues, the Crumps, the Kellys? that support men who go to Congress determined to help big business against little citizens? (Examine the list of those who voted for OPA's crippling admendments. You'll find P. A. C.-supported candidates in there with the best of them!)

We need a new movement in this country to win our battles in Washington. . . . The time for our decision as to whether liberalism in America gets up on its feet or grovels to bossism, racism, and expedience is upon us. We must make the choice by 1948.

SOL W. SANDERS

Franklin, N. C., August 27

Challenge to Chisholm

Dear Sirs: General Chisholm, looking at the civilization that has produced the atomic bomb and may destroy itself, offers a diagnosis (The Nation, July 27): "Man is prevented from progressing peacefully . . . by distortions of his power to think clearly . . . which are imposed on him while he is still a small child. . . ." The consequent prescription: "Stop giving children final answers . . . local or any other kinds of certainties . . . encourage them to prepare to do their own thinking. . . ."

The remedy, I suppose, is the word "prepare." But imagine the state of mind into which advice like this must precipitate a loving, sensitive, thoughtful, harassed parent. Shall he not tell Johnny that the fire is hot till the boy has singed his fingers? Shall he not warn him aginst promiscuity in adolescence but let him shape his taste, unaided, as best he can? There are ways of guarding children without the use of whips or blinders, but General Chisholm hardly suggests them; nor that parents in all ages have discovered them through taste and imagination.

Neither denying the truth of what General Chisholm says about distortions, nor belittling the achievement of Marx and Freud in propagating the truths about society that wise men have always known, and often left records of, the notion nevertheless comes that man's irrationality is due, perhaps, less to the nature of that abstraction, society, than to the nature of concrete, bewildered man. Or, supposing that General Chisholm's liberal prescription, the faith of thousands of modern liberals, is intended for the use of a future Utopia: has Utopian man no greater problem than how to manage the technique of forging, intellectually, straight ahead? That is, have all bodily inconveniences been mitigated and the uncertainties of personal relationships made fast?

Yes. The rise of appetite is now instantly met with a satisfying form of ice cream, your intellect in the meantime

9th Art Exhibition
VAN GOGH
Arles Period — Rare Reproductions
TRIBUNE SUBWAY ART GALLERY
100 WEST 42 ST. 6th Ave. Subway Arcade, downstairs progressing uninterrupted. Friends and lovers enjoy each other as much as they are inclined and, moreover, simultaneously; and children are reared knowing that they can both eat their cake and have it, too. But this is the happy world. Shaw described it in "Back to Methuselah"; it has come about through deliberate evolution. Poor twentieth-century man! One pictures him sitting on his porch of a summer evening, maybe, wondering why he cannot be everything and trying to dream up some proportion to his life; all the while dreading those twentieth-century periodicals which were preparing the future because they denied his sense of liberty. This was the reason —one relishes the irony in retrospect— why those liberal publications, so justly critical of social abuse, did not enjoy the popularity which their benevolent inspiration deserved.

JETHRO ROBINSON

New York City, July 26

Back Talk

Dear Sirs: Permit me to give voice to several minor irritations I find in The Nation. First, I resent Keith Hutchison's articles being set in smaller type than the rest of the journal. Second, I too frequently find Agee's film reviews replete with paradoxes and equivocations, or vacuous in their labored attempts at being profound and intellectual. Third, I don't like Barrett's puzzles: the words are not completely crossed and the definitions have a subjective quality that one might be able to fathom only if the puzzle were really crossed. Last, I am provoked with the advertisement for handwriting analysis; I don't know whether the provocation is with The Nation for carrying such ads, or with the possibility that the advertiser finds it profitable to seek a clientele among the kind of people I thought read The Nation. Believe me, I am not a dyspeptic, and I like The Nation, or I wouldn't take the trouble to get this off my chest.

D. L. C.

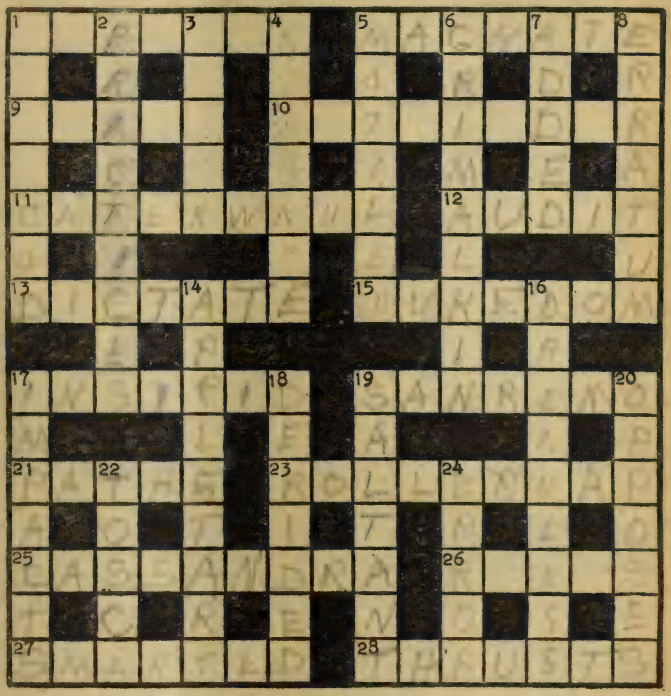
Newark, N. J., August 12

English Dependence

Dear Sirs: I believe you have been unfair to the Labor Party's foreign policy. The attitude of most of The Nation's contributors toward our policy in Greece, Palestine, Spain, and Indonesia has been one of shocked surprise and strong moral condemnation. This policy does not go uncriticized here. It must be recognized that critics of Mr. Bevin are

Crossword Puzzle No. 178

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Ginger beer with pastries makes you see red
5 Mae has swallowed a gnat
9 Violently
10 This shopkeeper might give advice to the ailing one indoors
11 Kilkenny serenade
12 A calling to account
13 Tell another what to say
15 English and Portuguese men of title meet in the former's estate
17 Tasteless
19 Where winds the Marne so? (3 and 4)
21 Famous "Freres" of the motion picture world
23 Mountains are even less than molehills here (6 and 3)
25 She had the gift of prophecy, but not of being believed 26 If you hear them whispering it may be of current topics
27 Red mats (anag.)
28 Squeezes in

DOWN

1 Fish accompaniment of duck accompaniment
2 In which doctors exercise their art
3 Less thinner and less dinner
4 Rat goes in safekeeping
5 Spotted
6 How forbidding nearly all relatives are — especially that old cat!
7 Carried on
8 There is a rat in this that requires correction
14 You need little more than fruit and the art to make it (5 and 4)
16 Male dress (anag.)
17 Collisions
18 Mocked
19 Dancing
20 Makes objection
22 Opera in which a great conductor begins to make his name
24 Fault

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 177

ACROSS:—1 ACROSTIC; 6 ASTI; 10 APRIL; 11 PEN; 12 TABOO; 13 KHYBER; 16 BLOCUS; 17 RIVIERA; 18 STAG; 20 PRAM; 22 PULLMAN; 23 ROMP; 24 LIFE; 25 SET OVER; 27 WRIGHT; 29 RAVINE; 34 AVIAN; 35 ICY; 36 SKIER; 37 EDDY; 38 EXTERIOR.

DOWN:—2 CURRY; 3 OILIER; 4 TOPS; 5 CONY; 6 ATTILA; 7 TABAC; 8 BARK; 9 CONSOMME; 14 RIVULET; 15 KILLJOY; 16 BREAKER; 18 STRAW HAT; 19 AIM; 21 ROI; 25 SHINDY; 26 RAISER; 28 IVIED; 30 INIGO; 31 EZRA; 32 HIVE; 33 RYOT.

RESORTS

The Glenmere

Your private country estate while you are our guest.

In the Ramapos

CHESTER, N. Y.

51 Miles from New York City

Your private lake with beautiful white sand beach. Your private golf course. We offer you excellent accommodations, superb cuisine and every facility for your entertainment. Glenmere is a glorious place for your vacation.

N. Y. Office: RE. 2-5047

TOBACCO

CIGARETTES

Popular brands, $1.40 per carton postpaid. Minimum order, 3 cartons.

CIGARS

Natural Bloom Dandies: bx. of 50 ..... $6.00
Ingersoll, Havana Blend; bx. of 50 ..... $4.49

PIPES

Medico, $1.00 • Also Yello Bole, Kaywoodie, Weber, Milano, etc.

Our policy—everything postpaid; satisfaction or full refund; amazingly fast delivery service.

Ask for complete price literature or send your check or money order today to:

ACE MAIL ORDER COMPANY
EAST ORANGE 1, N. J.

HELP WANTED

UNIQUE SCHOLASTIC OPPORTUNITY

PROMINENT educational project affiliated with major university offers minimum of 14 months full-time work in Chicago at excellent salary on stimulating, broadening research job under direct supervision of well-known scholar, to several qualified persons. Must be alert, analytical, well-read, have some graduate background, willing to work intensively. Write for interview giving full particulars.
Box 1646, c/o The Nation.

SITUATIONS WANTED

SOUTHERN COLORED DOMESTIC and hotel workers desire jobs. Write for list today (stamps). QUALITY EMPLOYMENT ASSN., 214 East Clay Street, Richmond 19, Va.

APARTMENT WANTED

APARTMENT needed for painter's studio, New York or suburbs. Jean Malaquain, c/o The Nation, or phone WAdsworth 7-6684.

REAL ESTATE FOR SALE

IN JERSEY CITY—Former Hudson Tubes powerhouse at Bay & Greene Sts. Brick, steel, fireproof building, 91 feet high, size 143 x 123, with 136 feet land adjoining. Railroad sidings. Buyer must erect 2 inner walls and condition for use. About 70,000 square feet as is, but can be increased to 140,000 square feet with additional floors. Assessed over $250,000. Worth a million to the right people, and looks it, too! Price $135,000. A marvelous buy for cold storage, furs, warehouse, etc. Owner, Room 820, No. 9 East 46th St., New York. PLaza 3-7510.

SCHOOLS

LAKEWOOD
MODERN SCHOOL

A residential school for boys and girls from 7 to 12 years of age. Small group. Personal supervision.
Write:
JAMES and NELLIE DICK
115 Carey Street • Lakewood, N. J.
Phone: Lakewood 6-1007

LECTURE SERIES

by ELI SIEGEL

Children as Selves—Sept. 12th, and Aesthetic Analysis Doesn't Mind Being Philosophic—Sept. 19th.

Under the Auspices of:
COMMITTEE FOR AESTHETIC ANALYSIS
STEINWAY HALL, 113 West 57th Street, N. Y. C.
Room 718, 8:30 P.M.
Admission $1.00 (incl. tax) each lecture.

LANGUAGES

ALL LANGUAGES. Phonograph Courses. Linguaphone, other makes. Sold, bought, rented. A. Alin, 475 5th Avenue, New York 17. MU. 3-1093.

MAGAZINES

SOON TO BE RELEASED!
Issue Number One of the
AMERICAN LIBERAL QUARTERLY
Significant News—Up-to-date Features
All Packed in One Easy-to-read Volume
25¢ Per Copy—Year's Subscription, $1.00
AMERICAN LIBERAL QUARTERLY
3619 N. Paris Avenue • Chicago 34, Ill.

PUBLICATIONS

CONTROVERSY Magazine publishes ALL articles and letters submitted. Write CONTROVERSY Magazine, 516 N. St. Clair St., Pittsburgh, Pa.

Read Longinus on style but Savell's LOVE SONNETS for sensitiveness. Evocative of five beautiful women. Only $1.00. Grand Print Publishers, Box 542, Brookline Village, Mass.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

CENTRAL hallway colonial; 8 rooms; electric and running water; view; ski run; small creek; orchard, asphalt road; privacy; 16 miles from Tanglewood Festival; splendid barn with 30 stanchions and drinking cups. 100 acres. $7,000. Berkshire Farm Agency, East Chatham, N. Y.

Buy Your Books Through THE Nation

• Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book at the regular publisher's price, post-free if payment is received with the order, or at the publisher's price plus postage if the book is sent C. O. D. When ordering, please give name of author and publisher, if possible.

Please address your orders to
THE READERS' SERVICE DIVISION
THE NATION
20 VESEY STREET
New York 7, N. Y.

disturbed at the growing affinity between American capitalism and British socialism, and the simultaneous estrangement from the European left. Labor's broken promises are seen as a submission to American policy.

Possibly we are behaving more outrageously than America—though when one sees American actions in China, Japan, Germany, and the Pacific Islands, there is some doubt of it—but America is seen as the cat which dirties its paw.

The Nation would be following a more consistent policy if it recognized that the treacheries of British Labor have been the fulfilment of its subjection to America. That the subjection exists cannot be denied in the face of our growing dependence on American economy and our independence of European economy. That the Labor leadership has chosen to attach our first experiments in socialism to the American boom-and-slump bandwagon is an unpleasant straw in the wind, which The Nation should have the courage to recognize.

JULIAN TUDOR-HART

London, August 18

The CCF's Strength

Dear Sirs: J. King Gordon's article on the Canadian Cooperative Commonwealth Federation overlooks one of the main reasons for its effective strength and unity, namely its policy of excluding Communists, who in Canada travel under the camouflage of "Labor Progressives." Two of the leading "liberal" organizations in the United States, the Independent Citizens Committee of the Arts, Sciences, and Professions, and the National Citizens' Political Action Committee, scare away many genuine progressives, including most of those with the longest experience in progressive work, by their failure to exclude Communists. This is all the more surprising since Communists are obviously not liberals but fanatical supporters and defenders of the Russian totalitarian dictatorship and its foreign policy, whatever that policy may be. Their unreliability from a progressive point of view may be illustrated by the fact that they viciously opposed Roosevelt in two of his four campaigns, denouncing him as a "social fascist" in 1932 and as a "war monger" in 1940, because of his opposition to the Nazis, who at that time had a friendship pact with Russia.

ALFRED BAKER LEWIS

New York, August 26

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

VOLUME 163 NEW YORK • SATURDAY • SEPTEMBER 21, 1946 NUMBER 12

The Shape of Things

THE REPUBLICAN STRATEGY FOR 1948 WAS unveiled by Senator Taft in his Ohio keynote speech. Abandoning the isolationism which weakened the party in the last four Presidential elections, Senator Taft denounced "appeasement" of Russia and urged that the United States take a strong hand in advancing its interests throughout the world. The 1946 and 1948 campaigns apparently are to be fought on the Russian issue, with the Republicans pressing the offensive into the domestic field by implying that all New Deal reforms, together with price-control and full-employment legislation, are the result of Communist influence within the Democratic Party. While there is nothing new about the domestic part of the program, Republican advocacy of a "strong" foreign policy may seem inconsistent with the party's pre-Pearl Harbor position. The inconsistency, however, is largely superficial. The step from isolationism to imperialism is a natural one in the light of atomic explosives and guided projectiles, and the Republican policy of 1946 is directly in line with that of 1920 and 1940 in its refusal to accept the obligations of world citizenship and work for a system of world security.

✶

THE U. N. FACES SHIPWRECK ON LAKE SUCCESS unless it repents the errors of its recent ways and gets back on the course originally plotted for it by its chartmakers. For the United Nations was not intended to be a debating society for power politicians or a sounding board for ideological conflict. It was intended as an organization of peace-loving peoples concerned in preserving and promoting peace. The tragi-comic bickerings surrounding the Greek issue have no relationship to these ends. Mr. Manuilski's two suitcases of "facts" had the familiar stale smell of propaganda. Liberal Americans deplore the fate of the Greek people who, unlike some of their neighbors, showed democratic courage in fighting the Axis from the very beginning but in the end had no chance to vote for democracy. They think it highly improper that British bayonets and American naval vessels should constitute an election argument. But they find it difficult to believe that Mr. Manuilski's memories do not extend as far back as the elections in Bulgaria, Hungary, Rumania, and Poland. They think there are far too many troops beyond Britain's borders in Greece and in Palestine. But they cannot bring themselves to believe that the Red Army battalions beyond the bounds of Russia are there simply to assist local police in arresting black marketeers or directing traffic. But why raise these issues when the real one stares us in the face: that Greece is on the cross-lines of conflict between East and West—a key to the Adriatic, the Aegean, the Dardanelles. The basic problem in the present war of nerves is not how to wage it but how to end it. It is said that the success of the wartime conferences of the Big Three was due to a technique of discussing first those issues where agreement was broad and placing far down on the agenda the issues where controversy was sharp. It is not too late to apply this technique in the U. N. Were Russia and the Western powers to call a truce in the zonal frontier struggle, there would be a chance for all the nations to give their attention to those matters of peaceful reconstruction in which there is wider agreement and on which the security and freedom of all depend.

✶

IN THE PUBLIC MIND CHESTER BOWLES IS synonymous with price regulation. Regardless of what other issues develop as his campaign for the governorship of Connecticut progresses, he will go before the voters as the man who ran the OPA. Inevitably the country will interpret the result as a plebiscite on government controls. The stakes are high, with the course of Administration policy for the next two years perhaps hanging in the balance—not to mention the possibly interesting political future of Chester Bowles. And the fight will be uphill all the way. Senator Brien McMahon, the state's Democratic boss, was late and grudging in giving Bowles his indorsement, and there is some question as to how enthusiastically he will deploy his forces in support of the former stabilization director. Why McMahon yielded at all is a matter of lively speculation among Connecticut political observers. Some point to the private Roper poll, said to have convinced McMahon of widespread Bowles sentiment; while the more cynical think that the party leaders, seeing Bowles's determination—and believing the political climate this year to favor the Republicans anyway—preferred to give him their nominal blessing rather than disrupt the party in a bitter convention fight. Connecticut Democrats are well aware that it will be no easy matter to defeat a Republican ticket headed by Governor Baldwin. It was Baldwin, now

• IN THIS ISSUE •

EDITORIALS

The Shape of Things 309
The Wallace Speech 311
Spain Off-Stage 312

ARTICLES

Labor at the White House by Tris Coffin 313
Clash of Two Systems by Vera Micheles Dean 315
The Horn of Plenty by James Hearst 318
Fascism, Philippine Style by R. F. Millon 320
The Shakeout by Arnold Beichman 322

BOOKS AND THE ARTS

Slow Movement A poem by Louis MacNeice 324
Newman as Man and Critic by B. H. Haggin 324
Mahler by Morton Dauwen Zabel 326
A Misguiding History by Charles B. Farrell 328
The Words and the Measure by Wylie Sypher 330
Music by Formula by George Henry 332
Records by B. H. Haggin 334

LETTERS TO THE EDITORS 335

CROSSWORD PUZZLE No. 179 by Jack Barrett 335

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon — Washington Editor I. F. Stone — Literary Editor Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors

Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart

Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors

Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editor: Robert Harvey

Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx

Advertising Manager: William B. Brown

Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U. S. A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Index to Labor Articles, Public Affairs Information Service, Dramatic Index.

running for the Senate, who stood out above the Roosevelt landslide in 1944, when most of his running-mates were buried—and this year there is no Roosevelt. But Bowles is a big enough figure to require neither the coat tails of Roosevelt nor the indulgence of McMahon. We hope Connecticut voters will feel, with us, that his courage and capacity for applied idealism are badly needed in a world of diminishing political leadership.

⁎

SAGGING STOCK-MARKET PRICES SEEM TO have hit at least a temporary bottom, but the unprecedented wagging of tongues over causes and effects continues both here and abroad. Never before has the rest of the world watched our business barometers as it does today, and with good reason: never before has the business weather of other nations been so dependent on that of the United States. Especially in Britain, whose economy is most closely tied with ours, fear of a depression here is almost pathological. For this reason some of the most anxious ticker-watchers during the days of the break were in our own State Department. They well know the staggering effect a serious economic setback here would have on the multilateral trade program they hope to sell to the world in the coming international meetings. As usual there is an explanation to fit almost every point of view: the next to the longest bull market in history was bound to break if only of its own weight; high prices were beginning to slow up buying, while labor costs have risen so far that profits can be had only at peak production; the rapid degeneration of American-Russian relations; bear raids on the market by big operators who wanted to unload their holdings to pick them up later at lower prices. You can take your choice. But whatever the causes, the stock-market prophets, as usual, failed to detect them in advance. An analysis of the predictions of eight leading Wall Street services shows that not one warned its clients that a serious break was at hand.

⁎

DURING THE FOUR YEARS OF WAR, THE writers of the U. S. S. R. had no interest that was not the state's. The intensity of their devotion was plain both to Russia and to the outside world; certainly Generalissimo Stalin, whose favorite writer is Chekov, must have appreciated the sacrifice they made when they neglected for the temporary demands of propaganda and patriotism, the final demands of truth, of sympathetic understanding, and of justice. But even peace has not put the Soviet Union in a position where it can afford the luxury of allowing its artists to satisfy these demands: the new Five Year Plan has been more onerous for Soviet writers than the war itself. In the Soviet Union today the only permissible book—or play, or movie, or poem—is one that directly serves the state. The long series of measures against any work of art that is not a party weapon of the bluntest sort has culminated in the banning of most foreign plays, in attacks upon some of the better-known Russian literary magazines, in the expulsion from the Union of Soviet Writers of two hitherto respected authors, and in the dismissal of its president, Nikolai Tikhonov, a writer of enough cultivation and intelligence to remind one of the days when, for half a century, the greatest literature of modern Europe somehow managed to survive the censorship of a reactionary but mercifully inefficient dictatorship. The official denunciation of the "apolitical and idealless" poetry of Boris Pasternak is a symbolic gesture of the utmost significance. Pasternak is universally regarded as the greatest living Russian poet: Ehrenbourg, during his recent visit to the United States, talked at length about Pasternak, and plainly felt for him a respect and devotion that he otherwise, rather surprisingly, extended only to those "giants" Hemingway, Faulkner, Caldwell, and Steinbeck; one remembers that Ehrenbourg spoke of the enthusiastic acceptance of Pasternak's work by the most select Soviet audience as proving that art is free in Russia.

✶

WHEN TWO OF THEIR NUMBER WERE recently transferred to the punishment center at Minersville, without trial or hearing, fifty-six conscientious objectors at the Glendora, California, civilian public-service camp stopped work in protest. In addition to objecting to the seemingly arbitrary assignment of the two C. O.'s to a punishment center, the strikers have raised certain basic issues. They contend that the release of conscientious objectors from public-service centers has been vindictively delayed, that their wives and children have been denied dependency allotments, and that they have been forced to work at important and often perilous wartime jobs without compensation. That eight of the men recently arrested have been working as "packers" in the polio ward of the Los Angeles General Hospital throughout the present polio epidemic certainly confirms the sincerity of their position and should entitle them to a careful review of their cases, preferably a public hearing. Moreover, there should be no further delay in releasing conscientious objectors from public-service centers in a ratio consistent with the release of drafted personnel from the armed forces.

✶

ALTHOUGH THE WORLD FOOD CRISIS MAY be somewhat alleviated in the next twelve months as compared with last year, the latest crop reports indicate that serious shortages will continue until at least this time in 1947. The 1946 European wheat crop is estimated at 830,000,000 bushels as against 647,000,000 in 1945 and a pre-war average of 1,115,000,000. Russia's crops, while better than in the past few years, are below pre-war figures. Britain's bumper grain crop has been seriously damaged by prolonged rains during the harvest season. China's rice yield is expected to be better than last year's but not comparable to that of normal years. While the United States has had an excellent harvest, as James Hearst points out on another page, and Canada has also produced a surplus, both together fall far short of world needs. The U. N. Food and Agriculture Organization, now meeting in Copenhagen, estimates that the world requires 28,000,000 tons of food grains, while production will not exceed 20,000,000. In an effort to encourage greater production and to stabilize prices the FAO is considering a plan for a world food board introduced by Sir John Boyd Orr, FAO's director general. Unfortunately, the American delegation succeeded in sidetracking this admirable proposal on the plea that the subject needed more "study." Instead of immediate action it was decided to invite Russia and Argentina, neither of which is a member of the FAO, to participate in a fifteen-nation commission to survey plans for a food board and stabilization program. While there is logic behind the attempt to involve both nations in the planning stage, the American proposal might easily result in delay which would endanger the whole project—even if it could be conveniently attributed to Soviet "obstruction."

✶

ON SEPTEMBER 12 IN THE FRENCH EMBASSY at Washington Ambassador Henri Bonnet presented to Freda Kirchwey, editor of The Nation, the order of Chevalier of the Legion of Honor. Others who received decorations on the same occasion were (Grand Officier) Henry Morgenthau, Jr., former Secretary of the Treasury; (Commandeur) Archibald MacLeish, former Assistant Secretary of State; (Officier) Oscar Cox, former administrator of the Foreign Economic Administration; (Chevalier) Elliott H. Lee, executive vice-president of American Relief for France; Waverly Root, newspaperman; Raymond Swing, radio correspondent; and Reginald Townsend, president of the French Institute in the United States.

The Wallace Speech

WHAT Henry Wallace said in Madison Square Garden last week was completely blanketed by the fantastic consequences of his words. Mr. Truman's unqualified approval of the speech, followed in rapid succession by protests from Senators Vandenberg and Connally in Paris, by Secretary Byrnes's eloquent silence, by a storm of attack and speculation in the press of the world, and finally by Mr. Truman's ignominious retreat, have seized the spotlight. The specific criticism of American foreign policy made by Mr. Wallace will have to wait for the consideration it deserves until the effects of the President's action have subsided. For this latest demonstration of Mr. Truman's talent for inept and hasty comment has startled the whole world. Nor was he able to mend matters by publicly eating his ill-considered words; in fact, this performance, however necessary to set matters straight, only heightened the general impression of fumbling irresponsibility.

Like the stock-market break, Mr. Truman's break has been variously explained: he never read the Wallace speech through; he read it but did not understand its implications; he did not read it carefully before the Garden meeting, but afterward, when called to account by the reporters, he thought they were trying to goad him into a disagreement with Mr. Wallace and so insisted he had read it all before okaying it; and so on. Just one thing these explanations have in common: they reflect equally upon the capacity and good sense of the President. This latest episode, so typical, so dismaying, only strengthens our conviction that President Roosevelt's choice of Mr. Truman as his running-mate in 1944 was one of the worst political blunders of his career.

But it would be unfair to exonerate Mr. Wallace of all blame. Perhaps he believed he was going to the extreme of correctness in getting the President's approval for his Garden speech. But since the speech was in large part an attack on the Administration's foreign policy, he should have known that Mr. Truman's indorsement turned it into a bombshell. It did not turn it into policy. In the end Secretary Byrnes's position had to be sustained, as it has been, however clumsily, by Mr. Truman's repudiation of his own words. So all that has been accomplished is to present to the world a spectacle of Cabinet disunity and Presidential inadequacy. It would have been far better, in our opinion, if Mr. Wallace had spoken in his own person and explained that he was doing just that, with or without the express permission of Mr. Truman. Even this degree of open difference within the Cabinet would have astonished persons accustomed to the rigid discipline of the Soviet system or to the system of ministerial responsibility in a parliamentary state. But at least there would have been no risk of serious misunderstanding among other nations and no need of a Presidential crawl. And the many excellent things Mr. Wallace had to say would have been considered on their merits and not merely as items in an international cause célèbre.

The speech was, in fact, a most interesting and controversial analysis of the world situation. Not only did Mr. Wallace propose an independent American policy designed to relieve Russia's worries, while demanding of Moscow a similar effort at conciliation; more specifically he elaborated a program based on the frank acceptance of existing spheres of influence, together with areas where neutrality must be maintained. This is a bold departure from the principles laid down in the Atlantic Charter and still accorded lip-service in Paris and at Lake Success. Since spheres of influence inescapably imply the continuance of balance-of-power politics in international affairs, Mr. Wallace's position can hardly be dismissed, in the words of the New York Herald Tribune, as "starry-eyed." It is, on the contrary, a brutally realistic position, demanding a new orientation on the part of most liberal thinkers. Nation readers will find in it interesting parallels with the ideas expressed in last week's issue by Dr. Niebuhr. This point in particular requires serious thought. A division of the world into "zones" dominated by great powers has so many obvious dangers that it must be accepted, if at all, reluctantly and as a bad second best.

Wallace's broad approach to the question of America's foreign relations will, however, have the support of all who believe that peace must be constructed on the foundation of a positive democratic policy rather than on mere resistance to Russian pressures. The anxiety, reflected in dispatches from Paris, lest the Wallace attitude imply a withdrawal of American interest from Europe, is not justified by a careful reading of the speech. On the contrary, Mr. Wallace proposes increased participation by America in building a stable and democratic world. In fact, he openly advocates competition between American economic methods and the socialist concepts of Russia while urging each power to refrain from political intervention in countries within the other's established area of interest. As an example of what he would have the United States avoid, he cites our close support of Britain's position, particularly in the Middle East. Without doubt, this policy has involved the United States in reactionary commitments which have weakened our prestige in the countries concerned and have aroused unnecessary suspicions in Moscow. Mr. Wallace's insistence that we develop and follow a policy of our own is not equivalent to a proposal that we pull out. Where some of us would differ with him is in his assumption that an independent American policy will automatically be a democratic one. The situation in China and in the Philippines does not justify this view. Our policy will be democratic when men like Wallace are able to influence the making of policy; freeing ourselves from British apron strings is not enough.

Spain Off-Stage

EVEN though the Spanish issue has not yet been scheduled for formal discussion by either the Security Council or the General Assembly, it has risen again to plague the members of the United Nations. Speaking on the new Opium Convention, now being prepared by a special committee of the Economic and Social Council, the Soviet delegate, Nikolai Feonov, last week asked whether the proposed invitation to signatories of the 1925 and 1931 conventions to join the committee would be extended to the government of General Franco. Upon receiving an affirmative answer, Mr. Feonov declared that the Russian government would reserve the right to reopen this question when the convention comes before the Economic Council for debate.

The Russian delegate's statement should put an end to rumors circulated this summer about a change in the U. S. S. R.'s attitude toward Spain: obviously the Soviet Union continues to be unequivocally opposed to any contact, direct or indirect, between the United Nations and the present Spanish regime. At the same time it shows how futile are the hopes of those who expect the Spanish issue to "die by itself." The Security Council had scarcely finished its heated debate last June, when the World Federation of Trade Unions issued a call for a general boycott of Spain which touched off a new explosion of anti-Franco sentiment throughout Europe and Latin America. Hardly had the month of meetings and demonstrations initiated by the W. F. T. U. come to a close, when representatives of all the European Socialist parties, in answer to an invitation of the French Socialists, met in Paris on August 27 and 28 to discuss the Spanish issue. The conference was attended by a group of specially invited Spanish Socialists. The delegates adopted a resolution stating that "the survival of the Franco regime constitutes a defeat for international democracy and a danger to the peace." They called on the Socialist parties to intensify international action aimed at the early overthrow of the Spanish dictatorship and set up a permanent committee whose task it will be to bring pressure on the United Nations to adopt an attitude on Spain consonant with the principles enunciated at San Francisco and Potsdam.

For a brief time officials in London and Washington clung to the possibility of replacing the Madrid regime "quickly and painlessly" by another government, monarchist or semi-fascist. Unfortunately for the promoters of this scheme, the chief protagonist reneged. So far Franco has refused to step out. Gambling, as he has done since the war's end, on the differences between the Western powers and Russia, the Spanish dictator sees no reason to throw in his hand just when the cards are coming his way. Encouraged by recent developments, he returned from his Galician tour saying that he had thought matters over and decided to stay put.

Now the British Foreign Office finds itself back where it started last spring. A monarchist restoration is impossible: Lopez Oliván, the former ambassador to London who favored a monarchy along British lines, has lost his fight against the medieval, clerical, anti-labor clique surrounding the Pretender in Lisbon. Some of the generals on whom the British were counting to carry off a coup last July have beat a hasty retreat now that Franco has made it clear he will not budge. There remains only the Republic, but recent events in Greece and elsewhere suggest that, in the Mediterranean at least, Mr. Bevin prefers democracy in very small doses. So the only alternative for Britain is to return to its former position of backing Franco.

This presents the United States with a difficult decision. If the Administration continues to follow the British lead, it will be obliged to support the tottering Franco regime not only diplomatically but financially. Since a direct loan would be politically impossible, there has been talk lately of a loan negotiated through private banks to rescue Franco from his multiplying economic difficulties. But no rescue operation will prevent another Spanish conflict in the U. N. when the Assembly finally meets in October.

Labor at the White House

BY TRIS COFFIN

Washington, September 12

JOHN STEELMAN, the professionally optimistic director of Mobilization and Reconversion, let out a feeble toot as the White House answer to the economic crisis that has been building up for ten days.

The maritime strike had piled up the pressure to amend the government's outdated stabilization policy. In Cabinet meetings and in White House conferences Secretary of Labor Schwellenbach gloomily warned that inequities between earnings and prices must be settled decisively or the maritime strike might spread to other industries. He pointed to some hitherto unpublished statistics: Real wages in July reached a post-war low—10 per cent below July of last year. The price index rose 7.8 points from June to August 15, 1946.

Last night crowds pouring out of Washington theaters were greeted by newsboys shouting, "Wage Board turns down sailors' pay raise." This morning the atmosphere in the Labor Department was hushed, almost frightened. Ed Warren, the director of conciliation, and some of his assistants stood in the hall outside the Secretary's office talking quietly. Where was this thing going? How could it be stopped? All day long reporters sat impatiently in the White House press room. They stormed into the office of Charlie Ross, press secretary. When was the break coming in the maritime strike? Ross patiently assured them sometime today.

Over in the east wing of the White House government executives hurried in and out—members of the TRIS COFFIN is a commentator for the Columbia Broadcasting System. He writes a weekly Washington report for The Nation.

Wage Stabilization Board and the Maritime Commission, Labor Department officials. Dr. Steelman was holding emergency councils.

By four o'clock, the time for President Truman's regular news conference, the long White House lobby was crowded. The correspondents jammed and pushed into the Presidential office, filling every inch of space. The President galloped off merrily and in one breath announced the appointment of Frances Perkins to the Civil Service Commission and the opening of West Executive Avenue to traffic soon. He rambled on about a White House carpenter shop and a proclamation for Physically Handicapped Week.

The crowded room was getting warm and the reporters impatient. Several voices broke out, and the loudest asked, "What will the President do to stop a wave of strikes?" Mr. Truman said firmly he had already taken action in the Executive Order of last February. Then he nodded to the next person with a question. The talk drifted over to politics and Henry Wallace's New York speech.

A reporter almost pleaded, "Will there be a break from the White House today on the maritime strike?" The President said Steelman would have a statement. "Will the Steelman announcement be the basis for a settlement?" Mr. Truman said it would. Would the statement modify the stabilization policy? It would not. "Can we talk to Steelman?" a reporter asked. The President replied cheerfully that sure we could, but Steelman was busy now. Someone in the back of the room drawled, "Is he sitting on the statement?" Mr. Truman thought this was funny and he laughed. That ended the conference.

The great document that was going to end the maritime strike created confusion in the press room. Irritated correspondents demanded to see Steelman. What the hell did all this mean? The word came back that Dr. Steelman was not seeing the gentlemen: the statement spoke for itself.

Conflicting judgments about it are still expressed, but it appears to be a simple device buried in purposely obscure legal phrases. Dr. Steelman just removed the maritime industry from the board's jurisdiction and added a little teaser for the ship operators to figure out. If owners of privately operated ships will pay increases, the government may authorize similar raises for government-owned ships. Very few officials in Washington have any real hope that this obtuse statement will settle the maritime strike or satisfy labor generally.

The strike started out as a lusty thumb-to-nose gesture at the Wage Stabilization Board by Harry Lundeberg, the husky president of the A. F. of L. West Coast Sailors' Union, but it has developed into a general defiance of the futile stabilization program. It was originally called because the WSB refused to allow a pay increase giving $22.50 a month to able-bodied seamen of the A. F. of L. The board gave $17.50 to Joe Curran's C. I. O. sailors, and that was as far as it was going. Lundeberg complained that the board had stalled for weeks on his petition, though they approved Curran's in a matter of hours. He said the agreement was arrived at by collective bargaining, and it was none of the government's business. Besides, the Maritime Commission had no objection; so why were these board members blocking it?

The Wage Board was torn between two decisions. It could grant the $5 increase, labeling it correction of inequity. Not much money was involved. The total labor cost of operating a Liberty ship, $10,700 a month, would be increased $30. This decision would end the A. F. of L. strike, but it would open a very breezy back door to other demands. Or the board could turn down the raise—as it did—and point lamely to restrictions placed on it. Under the White House Executive Order dated March 11 and never amended, the WSB is not authorized to recognize any increase in the cost of living other than that occurring in the period January, 1941, to September, 1945. It is further restricted by the order to eliminating "gross inequities" within industries or plants or job classifications and to correcting substandard wages.

Secretary Schwellenbach looked more mournful than usual at his news conference last week. He is a big man with shaggy gray eyebrows and long lips that droop downward. President Truman said it was up to the Labor Department to settle the strike, but Schwellenbach had nothing to arbitrate. The strike was against the WSB, and he could not touch the board. In the White House consultations Schwellenbach advocated a "unified approach": that is, the government should make up its mind on a wage policy for the entire industry and settle shipping once and for a long while. Curran was flexing his muscles and talking about a strike; a contract for Harry Bridges's longshoremen was coming up on September 30. In these sessions the idea of removing the shipping industry from Wage Board controls was tossed around.

On the long-term policy for all labor the White House seemed indifferent. Steelman took the attitude: "It will all blow over in two or three months of good production."

The maritime strike came at the precise moment when it would cause the most trouble. Both Philip Murray of the C. I. O. and William Green of the A. F. of L. have their hands full keeping the unions quiet. The cost-of-living increase has given ammunition to all who want to kick over the stabilization traces. Harry Lundeberg is a lusty, irrepressible character, and he was egged on by A. F. of L. leaders looking for a chance to throw the Truman Administration into more turmoil. John Lewis rumbled that he was backing Lundberg to the limit. On the left Harry Bridges and Joe Curran put their heads together.

The effect of strikes and wage boosts on the elections is worrying the Democrats and liberals, who do not want voters boiling over with anger at organized labor on November 7. The C. I. O. officially says there is no danger of mass strikes in its affiliated unions. However, Murray is scheduled to speak frankly on wage stabilization at a meeting in Chicago on September 28 and 29.

The statistics Schwellenbach took to the White House show the seriousness of the economic crisis. While the hourly wage rate of factory workers reached a record high of $1.09 in July, weekly earnings slumped to $43 with the average work week only 39.4 hours. From July to September last year real wages slid down 8 per cent. Rising wage rates granted in the so-called "first round" had made up over half this loss by June of this year, but the recovery of earnings was completely erased by price advances after June 30. Moreover, only one-fourth of factory workers received the 18½ cents an hour increase; one-fifth did not get any raise. In the textile industry chiseling employers who did not grant increases boldly asked the OPA for price raises because of the "first round." Workers in trades and services and white-collar classifications benefited little by the 18½-cent increase. The decline in real earnings has been the most marked in the durable-goods industries, where reduction of hours and down-grading has been most drastic. Real wages of durable-goods workers two months ago were 13 per cent less than in July, 1945, and at the lowest level since 1941.

The top economists in the government believe these statistics point to a succession of minor crises, each one eating away public confidence. They do not expect a severe depression in the next few years, because employment is high, demand is great, and both industry and the middle class have a backlog of savings. But they are afraid that indefinable thing called "public confidence" may fall off so sharply that the United States will tumble into a selling spree.

Through it all President Truman remains cheerful and undisturbed. A week ago today he told his news conference there was no emergency facing the nation, and he saw no need to call Congress back. The boys were entitled to some time campaigning and resting.

Clash of Two Systems

BY VERA MICHELES DEAN

WHATEVER defects may be attributed to the Paris Peace Conference by contemporary commentators and future historians, it has already made a signal contribution to the universal debate on the problems of our times. For in Paris, to an extent seldom approached in the past, some of the fundamental issues that divide Russia and the Western world have been squarely joined—not in the rarefied atmosphere of discussions among an academic élite, but in the full glare of publicity, around the diplomatic green table, where the stakes are the life and death of nations.

Outwardly the conference of the "twenty-one" may not seem to differ very markedly from the many conclaves—from Westphalia through Vienna and Berlin to Paris and the Treaty of Versailles—which have sought to reweave the broken and tangled threads of the Holy Roman Empire into some new pattern of stability and peace. Press dispatches are studded with the all too familiar names of problems which have plagued diplomats for centuries—Venezia Giulia, Macedonia, Bulgaria's demand for an outlet on the Aegean, Transylvania, control of the Dardanelles. But underlying the ancient struggle for strategic bases and allegedly defensible frontiers, the starkness of which has been not one whit diminished by the atomic bomb, is the clash, no longer concealed, between two main forms of economic enterprise—what we call free enterprise (and the Russians "monopoly capitalism") on one side, and what the Russians call socialism (and we communism) on the other.

True, the barely finished war between the United Nations and the Axis powers was also fraught with far-reaching political-economic implications. But that war, except for the participation of Russia, was waged by more or less industrialized countries which basically accepted the concept of private capital, even though in Germany and Japan private production was harnessed by the state to its machinery of military expansion. The social structure made familiar in the Western world by the development of large-scale industry built on investments by individuals at their own risk, with all its legal connotations, had not been materially altered by the totalitarian regimes of the Axis powers.

At the Paris Peace Conference, by contrast, we see emerging the outlines of a new economic struggle—this time not between relatively equal industrial giants, but between Russia and its eastern satellites, all still backward industrially, and the highly industrialized countries of the West, led by the United States—countries whose combined power of production far exceeds that of the U. S. S. R. at the present time. In this struggle the ultimate weapons may prove to be rockets and atomic bombs. But at this stage the weapons are, on the side of the West, capital resources needed for the development of backward areas, technical "know-how," command of means of transportation and communication — notably civil aviation, merchant shipping, and cable systems—and the persisting belief that economic freedom is a prerequisite for political democracy. On the side of Russia, technically the weaker side, the weapons are exaction of reparations from the former enemy countries under the vigilant supervision of Russian armed forces, participation by the Russian state in some of the key enterprises of these countries—usually on a fifty-fifty basis—the proffer by Russia of a huge, barely tapped market for the manufactured goods of its neighbors, and a strong appeal to the nationalist pride of industrially backward peoples who have long resented Western "exploitation" of their resources.

VERA MICHELES DEAN is research director of the Foreign Policy Association. Her most recent book is "The Four Cornerstones of Peace."

Foreign Minister Molotov gave the key to this conflict in his remarks to the Paris Peace Conference on August 15, when he sarcastically discussed the principle of economic "equality of opportunity" advocated by the United States, especially as applied to navigation of the Danube and trade in the countries of Eastern Europe and the Balkans occupied by Russia. Molotov's remarks revealed the deep-seated, well-nigh neurotic anxiety that the Russian leaders feel when they compare the war-shattered condition of their economy, only partially developed during the past quarter of a century at a high cost in human suffering, with the untouched and war-expanded industrial resources of the United States, which they regard both as their principal model and their principal menace. From the point of view of the Russians—and, it must be said in fairness, of many others, including the British—economic "equality of opportunity" for the United States really means inequality for countries less well equipped by talent or good fortune to compete for world trade. In the race for economic power, as they see it, the United States should be made to accept a handicap—otherwise the race will hardly be equal.

For the Soviet government is confronted with the stupendous task of economic reconstruction, starting practically from scratch. It has the advantage that since 1917 thousands of its citizens have learned at least the rudiments of machine civilization, but it has also a major liability. The population, while desperately weary after years of peace-time deprivation and war, has gained an inkling of the amenities of life available to many peoples outside Russia's borders. Even if the Soviet leaders were genuinely convinced that they have nothing to fear from the Western world in the years it will take them to rebuild the country's economy to the 1941 level, not to speak of further advances, they would be reluctant to permit psychological demobilization of the Russian people, who might thus succumb to the mood of slow-down experienced by other nations that participated in the war.

In theory, it might be argued that the Kremlin could greatly ease its task of reconstruction and cut the cost to the Russian people by seeking abroad the type of long-term loans and investments that made possible the early development of other industrial nations, notably the United States. And in the first flush of enthusiasm for Russia during the war it seemed probable that this country would be ready to extend a large loan or credit to facilitate Russian reconstruction. For political reasons, however, the Soviet leaders have always been loath to accept loans or permit foreign investments, regarding these as an entering wedge for foreign intervention. And in the present atmosphere of mutual distrust it is highly improbable that the American Congress would authorize a loan intended to strengthen Russia.

Yet the Russians are determined to build up their economic strength, and in the absence of loans they are doing so by their own methods. First, they tried to recoup some of their losses in machinery and tools and to fill their most urgent needs for consumers' goods by taking what they wanted from Germany and the Axis satellites as the reparations specified in the Potsdam declaration and the various armistice agreements—unfortunately for the Western powers specified in ambiguous language and without provision for United Nations supervision. The Russians regard reparations as their due compensation for the economic losses they suffered during the war. That is why any attempt to check up on reparations, such as was undertaken by the Australian delegation, or to scale them down to "capacity to pay," or to substitute payments in currency for payments in kind is regarded in Moscow as a sinister maneuver to balk Russia's legitimate replenishment of its war-depleted resources.

The Russians themselves, however, have been prompt to see that reparations are at best a stop-gap, and have therefore laid down the main lines of an economic program that would permanently funnel machinery, tools, and manufactured goods into Russia, supplementing its own production without perpetuating the antagonism aroused by Russian levies in ex-enemy and even in friendly countries. This program takes several forms. The Russians are encouraging the resumption of full production in factories within their orbit, often under pre-war management, on condition that they obtain a share of control over these enterprises and receive a specified amount of their production. The effect of such arrangements is that the factories of neighboring countries—and this practice is to be extended to Italy by the proposed terms of the peace treaty—work for the Russian market and in some cases obtain their raw materials from Russia. The economy of these countries is thus being gradually made dependent on that of the U. S. S. R. —with the political corollary that it becomes less and less in their interest to join in any attack on their chief customer and supplier. This policy would of course reach the acme of success if the industrial know-how of the Germans could be joined with the man-power of the Russians in a huge pool of production that would challenge, if it did not ultimately outmatch, that of the United States and other Western countries together. To prevent the economic junction of Germany and Russia has been one of the main objectives of recent American policy.

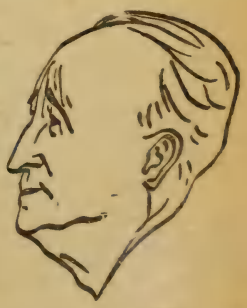
The Soviet government, however, has not completely dispensed with the machinery of trade arrangements familiar to the Western world. For example, it has concluded an agreement with Swiss enterprises for the distribution of Rumanian oil—some of which is the property of private interests in Western countries which are now seeking compensation in Paris—and has been negotiating a long-term credit from Sweden for the purchase of certain types of machinery, some of which it might otherwise have bought here or in Britain. While thus consolidating its economic position in Eastern Europe, Russia has been aspersing the Western powers for their attempts to dominate civil aviation in certain European countries, notably Italy, and to form trade combinations of their own.

The immediate result of Russia's collection of reparations in kind from countries whose economy had already been disorganized by war has been to deplete their resources to a dangerous extent and to reduce their standard of living, which in most cases had been higher than that of Russia. A cynic might contend that this is the principal purpose of the Soviet government, which may hope that growing economic stringency will bring about full-fledged communism. Russia, however, genuinely needs some of the products of neighboring countries. While its program of requirements may seem to endanger the economies of these nations, it may, under favorable circumstances, hasten their industrialization. For unlike Germany, which, being itself highly industrialized, looked upon Eastern Europe and the Balkans as a market and a source of raw materials, Russia with its rich storehouse of raw materials and its lack of manufactured goods, looks to Hungary, Poland, and even Rumania, not to speak of Finland and Czechoslovakia, for goods its cannot currently produce in adequate quantities.

Russia's economic program abroad, conceived out of scarcity and not out of plenty, directly challenges the foreign-trade policy the United States has been evolving since the war. In sharp contrast to Russia, this country, if producing to capacity, has a surplus of goods for export, and therefore favors liberalization of world trade through the conclusion of multilateral arrangements and the abandonment of restrictions and discriminations. It is in support of this policy that Washington has protested to Stockholm and Moscow against the impending Swedish credit to Russia. Yet admittedly one of the most serious restrictions on world trade is the American tariff, one of whose main objectives is to protect American industry from the competition of products made by cheaply paid labor in less advanced countries. Now Moscow is turning the tables on us, and seeking to shut out our highly competitive goods, which Russian industry cannot match, from what is, in essence, the protected market it has fenced off at the Oder. Time was when we might have helped to industrialize the countries now in Russia's orbit, thus aiding them to become both good customers for our exports and fertile ground for democratic ideas. If we want to do this now, we can do it only through some form of partnership with Russia, which has staked out "squatters' rights" in that area. And a partnership would imply that investments in the eastern countries would have to be made with relatively little hope of obtaining financial advantages—which means that they would probably have to be made by or with the aid of the American government, rather than by private investors. Such a program would reopen some markets for American goods, but at the same time it would restrict still further the scope of private enterprise.



If, however, Russia remains wedded to its present course of playing a lone hand in Eastern Europe and the Balkans, then our remaining alternative is to foster as wide an area of liberalized trade as we can among the United States, Britain, the British Dominions, and Western Europe. But even this limited program will depend for its success upon confidence in the long-term stability of our economy on the part of these nations and upon their own chance of successful competition. Their confidence cannot but be shaken by the oscillations and internal conflicts from which our economy has suffered since the war. It is our own uncertainty about the future of the economic system symbolized by the United States which lends such grim significance to the clashes in Paris between Russia and the West.

The Horn of Plenty

BY JAMES HEARST

THE war emergency is over, but the lack of food still torments the world. The world is hungry for peace too. The men who speak for international goodwill say there is some connection between these two needs. The farmer hopes they are right, for he is ending the current crop year under the same constant pressure for high production as during the war years. He finds, though, that his land and his machinery have depreciated.

It is an item that the farmer will willingly cross off his books if the job of feeding people has been well done. The stories of hunger and starvation that came out of Europe and Asia made him sick at heart. No decent person was unmoved by them; no one with any regard for his neighbor failed to give some aid. But it was a problem which only the farmer could deal with practically and directly; he was the man on whom the solution finally depended. Now, at the end of the growing season, I think the farmer may make some comment on what he has done.

Perhaps it is only fair to say that the farmer was suspicious last spring when the sudden and peremptory demand for food rang out on all the networks. It was not credible to him that the men who gather statistics had not known long before this what the food shortage would be. Questions crowded into his mind which he would like answered some day. Why didn't this country start saving food the year before at harvest time, when it was readily available? Are there interests in this country which wanted to lay in their annual supply of grain before the hungry people got theirs? Was it thought that food might be used to support political strategy?

The farmer himself takes his sights for the year farther back than most people think. For example, he must determine the approximate size of his spring pig crop some time during the previous fall. A sow won't be hurried: she expects to have at least 115 days to produce a litter of pigs. Plans for a dairy herd must be laid even farther back: a cow takes nine months to produce a calf, and usually it is just one calf. The man who feeds cattle or sheep—the corn-belt finisher—juggles so many factors in making up his mind that it is a wonder he ever arrives at a decision. The kind of crop and the size of each crop must be determined long before planting time. Seed and fertilizer must be obtained, soil-conservation measures planned, labor hired, machinery bought or repaired. The farm year starts long before spring, and once the whole organization of a farm is in motion it gathers its own momentum which carries it along to the end of the year. All the last-minute orders, suggestions, and advice can't hold back the old sow's pigs or make the cornfield grow up to clover.

If suggestions were reciprocal, or alternating like an electric current, I think most farmers would like to say to Mr. LaGuardia, or whoever speaks for UNRRA: When people are starving, don't wait until the last minute to tell the farmers.

Three of the things that motivate a farmer are these, and I think that they are important in this order—the demands of his job, good prices, public demand. I put the demands of his job first because most farmers like to farm—if they didn't they wouldn't be doing it—and farming means growing crops and livestock. Regardless of prices and their relationship to costs, a farmer wants to make his farm productive. He likes to grow things. On this single impulse the public depends for its bread. Prices before the end of OPA last June seemed high enough to most farmers—to 70 per cent of them according to the public-opinion polls. This was especially true of farmers old enough to remember the price slump in 1921. But during the war the government gave the farmers and the food processors subsidies to stimulate production. The subsidies were mainly to protect the consumer and were scarcely a drop in the bucket compared to the subsidies in the cost-plus contracts given to industry—though food was as important as airplanes—but the manufacturers hated them bitterly. The government knew the farmer would plant, cultivate, and harvest whether there was a war or not. It knew the farmer didn't have to be bribed. All the government did, in the name of the people, was to hustle him along a little. He is still hustling, but he has time to stop for a glance at the record.

In the first part of August the United States Department of Agriculture issued a small pamphlet which was probably read by comparatively few people, mostly farmers, editors, and statisticians. Yet it was of utmost importance to 140,000,000 Americans, and it should give comforting news to the underfed people of the world. A crop forecast as of August 1, it showed that the present corn crop is estimated at 3,340,000,000 bushels. This may be compared with the ten-year average of a little over two and a half billion bushels. In Iowa alone the 1946 corn crop is estimated at 650,000 bushels, worth in dollars and cents more than the amount received for the entire citrus fruit crop. (This statement is addressed particularly to Iowans who have migrated to California.)

JAMES HEARST of Maplehearst Farm, Cedar Falls, Iowa, has contributed articles to various magazines presenting a reflective farmer's views on problems close to his work and life.

The present wheat crop will amount to slightly more than one billion bushels—the fourth billion-bushel crop—as compared with a ten-year average of about 800,000,000. The total oat crop amounted to 1,400,000,000 bushels, or about 300,000,000 above the 1935-44 average. The flaxseed total is less than one-half that average. It is too early to forecast the soy-bean yield, but the acreage is down two million acres below last year. Thus the yield of cereal grains is at an all-time high, while the yield of oil-producing seeds is somewhat curtailed.

The Department of Agriculture reports that total food supplies for civilians in 1946 are somewhat larger than they were last year. Even meat supplies, which seem to bear the burden of consumer complaint these days, are several pounds greater per capita than ever before.

These statistics may not be entertaining, but they should be very reassuring. They mean that our own citizens will have an ample supply of food and that we can help feed people in other countries not yet on a self-sustaining basis. It is the plan of the Department of Agriculture to export 250,000,000 bushels of wheat during the 1946-47 marketing year, a figure that would have seemed pretty wishful last spring, when the carry-over of old grain was the lowest in years.

Grain supplies were presented in the farm programs as of predominant importance. Prices and goals were weighted so as to increase grain production and distribution at the expense of livestock. It was well advertised, for example, that one acre of corn fed as cereal will support ten times as many people as it would if it were converted into beef. What success this program had was achieved by raising grain prices and holding down livestock prices. The intent and purpose was to raise the food that would feed the greatest number of people. The cost of the program was hardly taken into account.

But I think the cost should be mentioned briefly to show the American people how to control their appetites. Here are a few items from the Department of Agriculture livestock report which belong in this cost accounting: Beef cattle on feed are the lowest on record; the number of lambs is sharply below a year ago—the spring crop is reduced 13 per cent; dairy cattle numbers are down, with 3 per cent fewer cows than last year and 7 per cent fewer one- and two-year-old heifers; turkey numbers are 15 per cent below a year ago; poultry numbers are declining, with 20 per cent fewer chicks hatched since January 1; the fall pig crop is 16 per cent below last year's—but the total pig crop amounts to almost 52,000,000 head, which is about the same as the total last year.

Then there is a cost which the department and the OPA may not have expected. This is a cost in hard feelings which may take several years to be fully amortized. The Middle Western farmer, who had loyally supported the OPA, was faithlessly ignored when a rapid increase in corn prices were allowed after most of the corn was out of the farmer's hands. And after the hold-the-line policy had been solemnly sworn to before the public.

Is the farmer proud of his remarkable success in producing another huge supply of food just at the right time to do the most good? Does he enjoy his present prestige as one of the most important figures in world history?

The farmers in my community are just thankful that everything went as well as it did. They are inclined to give the weather most of the credit. They take for granted the adjustment and readjustment of their plans, the sacrifice of livestock, their own hard work. It was what had to be done.

Drawings by Shane

Instead of feeling proud, I think farmers are feeling a little fearful these days. There are some ominous signs in the sky. The farmer sees that our military forces are gradually shrinking and that their need for food is consequently falling off. He sees UNRRA getting ready to wind up its affairs and leave the market. He sees labor's purchasing power diminished by loss of overtime pay and rising prices. Thoughtfully he considers his own business, running with the governor wide open, and he sees—or imagines he sees—the specter of his own efforts come back to mock him in the form of too much food at too low a price.

The horn of plenty may turn out to be one of the horns of his dilemma. Already he is being deserted by his allies. Certain labor groups, his best customers, are vigorously protesting any rise in prices to farmers, while their own efforts in the direction of higher wages simply increase the cost of the things he buys. Management ignores his distressing need for new machines and machine repairs, and sits in its counting-house reckoning tax refunds. Next year, he thinks gloomily, when the public finds itself short of meat, it will not be slow to criticize the farmer. The fact that he gave up his livestock program so that people might have bread will be forgotten by then.

But the farmer has only odd moments in which to worry. The year isn't over yet. He still has 91,000,000 acres of corn to husk; 11,000,000 acres of soy beans to thresh; 52,000,000 pigs to feed; 27,000,000 cows to milk; and 2,300,000,000 dozen eggs to gather. We all should be thankful for that.

Fascism, Philippine Style

BY R. F. MILLON

THE newly created Philippine Republic is today rocketing toward fascism under the leadership of its President, Manuel Acuna Roxas. That part of the island economy which is not in ruins is dominated by American capitalists, Filipino and Spanish fascists, or Filipinos who collaborated with the Japanese in the war against the United States. Philippine imports and exports, present and potential, are irretrievably tied to the United States for the next twenty-eight years under conditions most unfair to the Philippines. The Filipino people are still suffering grievously from the devastation wrought by war and the vicious inflation that followed it. President Roxas is savagely crushing all opposition to his administration. His methods range from arbitrarily excluding members of the opposition party from the new Philippine Congress to using the army to murder the peasants of central Luzon—peasants who have organized to fight for emancipation from a feudal slavery which still exists almost fifty years after Spain relinquished the islands to the benevolent custody of the United States.

The responsibility for this sad state of affairs rests squarely with the United States, for our government, in the persons of General MacArthur and High Commissioner McNutt, helped Roxas win his present high position. The American colonial regime in the Philippines has ended, but it has ended, not in a spirit of good-will and of pride in a job well done, but in such a shameful manner that we can no longer pretend our policy there was other than one of partly disguised imperialism.

The central figure in any discussion of the Philippines today is Manuel Roxas. His record must be exposed clearly if the causes of the present economic and political turmoil in the infant republic are to be understood.

R. F. MILLON spent eighteen months in the Philippines as an officer at General MacArthur's headquarters. His job for the greater part of that time was the detection and exposure of collaborators in the Philippine army. In the course of his work he collected much material on the political situation and became acquainted with many persons prominent in the Islands.

Many attempts have been made in the American press to whitewash Roxas. The facts, without whitewash, damn him. Briefly, Roxas served in a highly important, policy-making post in the "Cabinet" of José P. Laurel, whom the Japanese installed as puppet President. His more detailed record follows:

Before the war Roxas (pronounced roe-haas) was the third most important politician in the Philippines, ranking behind Manuel Quezon—dynamic, vigorous, dictatorial—the first President of the Philippine Commonwealth, and Sergio Osmeña—quiet, capable, self-effacing—the Commonwealth's Vice-President who became President in 1944 upon the death of Quezon. At the outbreak of the war Roxas's personal popularity with the people was very great. He had just been elected to the Philippine Senate by an overwhelming vote, and he was regarded by many as the logical successor to President Quezon. When the Japanese invasion began, Roxas left the government service and became General MacArthur's liaison officer with President Quezon. In Mindanao, after the departure of MacArthur and Quezon for Australia, Roxas was offered the leadership of the resistance movement on that southern island, but refused. Instead he chose to surrender to the Japanese, who held him in prison until February, 1943, when he was suddenly released and brought to Manila.

Shortly thereafter Roxas was asked to become a member of the Preparatory Commission for Philippine Independence, which was being used as a front by the Japanese to make the people feel that the "independence" they would soon be granted would be the real thing. Roxas agreed and worked with the commission in creating a constitution for the new "republic." Of his part in this enterprise he states: "I wanted to prevent a dictatorial government which would give the Japanese even greater power." Actually, the puppet government's constitution as prepared, written, and signed by Roxas was modeled after the fascist constitution of Japan, even though it preserved the outward form of the Commonwealth constitution. Gone were civil liberties. The National Assembly was to be composed of appointive members. The President was to be granted dictatorial powers.

Roxas, though committed to the idea of a democratic regime, supported the new government and constitution, and publicly posed with the drafters and signers of the document. Shortly after the inauguration of José P. Laurel as President, Roxas accepted an important post in the Laurel government—the post of chairman of the Economic Planning Board. By thus formally joining the puppet government, Roxas, whether he realized it or not, whether he intended it or not, capitalized on his popularity with the Philippine people to give material aid to the Japanese. The essential truth about his sort of collaboration was ably put by Solicitor General Lorenzo Tanada, chief prosecutor of the People's Court in Manila, in his memorandum for the prosecution in the treason trial of Teofilo Sison, a fellow "Cabinet" member of Roxas's, on February 9 of this year:

> . . . In choosing as their collaborators well-known, able, and respected leaders of the Philippines, the Japanese knew that they could accomplish a purpose, perform a service, no other group of men could. And the reasons for the choice are plain and damning. Japan's long-range policy, as already stated, was to alienate the Filipinos from the United States and thus exploit them and their resources more efficiently in the war against the United Nations. . . . What Filipinos were most likely to influence their countrymen with advice and counsel along the lines of Japanese policy?
>
> Best qualified, best fitted for this purpose were the men called. . . . Of the Filipino leaders left behind, they were the most popular and powerful figures in politics and government, whose long and brilliant record of service it is superfluous to mention here. The fact that not one of them had ever been accused openly of pro-Japanese sympathies increased their persuasive effectiveness. If the Japanese had made the mistake of inviting . . . avowed pro-Japanese . . . to form the constitution, the Filipino people would never have been deceived, they would have recognized them at once and acted accordingly. And there would never have been any question in the mind of the rest of the world as to whom such men represented. . . .
>
> The truth is, the people of the occupied districts, stunned by continuous enemy success, were all waiting for their trusted leaders to point the way. Presenting a solid front, they might have refused to yield anything that the enemy could not have taken by force, they might have offered passive resistance. Instead they were told to cooperate. Setting an example, their leaders showed them how, and they also told them why.

Nor should it be forgotten that collaboration with the enemy meant collaboration with fascism. In the occupied countries of Europe it was demonstrated that the line between collaborator and fascist was at best a faint one.

On September 21, 1944, Roxas gave his assent to a declaration of war against the United States and Great Britain. He was quoted to this effect at the time by "President" Laurel, and the statement was recorded in the official minutes of the meeting in question.

In April, 1945, six weeks after the liberation of Manila, when the Americans were nearing Baguio, summer capital of the Philippines, to which Laurel and his Cabinet had fled when Manila was threatened, Roxas made his way through the Japanese lines, along with the other puppet ministers who did not go to Japan with Laurel, and reached the American forces. All the members of the party except Roxas were imprisoned. Roxas was freed by General MacArthur on the ground that he had aided the guerrillas throughout the occupation.

WHAT MAKES A TRAITOR?

Even granting, as General MacArthur claims, that Roxas aided the resistance movement, though there is little evidence of any such activity, that would not of itself absolve the man of the charge of treasonable collaboration with the enemy. Whatever he may have done to help the guerrillas privately, he did considerably more publicly toward destroying them. His very presence in the government, which lent it the air of independence the Japanese wanted, his actions as chairman of the Economic Planning Board, his example in preparing and signing the constitution—all these things served the cause he pretended to oppose. Pompeyo Diaz, presiding judge in the division of the People's Court which convicted Teofilo Sison of treason last March, used words which would apply equally well to Roxas:

> . . . One may style himself a guerrilla or protector of guerrillas and yet be a traitor to his country if he has sought to serve two masters at a time.
>
> The position of the accused, if we grant his connection with the underground movement, can be no better than that of the vultures in human form, the merchants of death, who amassed huge fortunes during the war by selling materials to the enemy but, loving themselves as much as the money that flowed into their hands, gave away substantial sums to guerrilla units. It certainly can be said of them that they sought to serve both God and the devil.

In the same decision Judge Diaz said:

> . . . The act of accepting and holding any policy-making or directing position in any of the puppet governments and discharging the duties and functions of these positions is treasonable in itself. . . .

Roxas is therefore clearly guilty of treason. Yet today he is President of the Philippines.

General MacArthur indorsed Roxas. So did General Tomoyuki Yamashita, former Japanese commander-in-chief in the Philippines. In an interview in his cell shortly before his execution, General Yamashita, when asked whether Roxas had been a secret guerrilla while pretending to aid the Japanese, "laughed loudly."

Looking at Roxas's record objectively then, it may be wondered why the United States army directly, and the Truman Administration by default, cleared him of treasonable activities during the Japanese occupation. Somewhere along the line strong pressure in his behalf must have been exerted. At any rate, armed with the clearance from General MacArthur which so greatly influenced the people of the Philippines, Roxas and powerful money-eyed interests—such as those headed by the notorious prewar fascist Andres Soriano, one of MacArthur's staff officers, and the Elizalde and de Leon families, and including certain powerful American interests—launched the campaign to elect Roxas to the Presidency. This group also had the full support of the remainder of the collaborators, men still influential because of their great wealth, who naturally backed Roxas as the only man who could save them. Conversely, President Osmeña was supported by all the progressive, democratic, and left-wing elements, including the Democratic Alliance, the only progressive political party in the Philippines, and the still powerful guerrilla group, the Hukbalahap.

The real issues, however, were hidden from the people by the Roxas-controlled press. The familiar attacks on minorities were made. José Zulueta, pro-Roxas Speaker of the House of Representatives, called the turn when he said: "The Chinese, Indians, and Jews are the ones who are enriching themselves." "General MacArthur cleared him," was the answer to charges of collaboration leveled against Roxas. High Commissioner Paul V. McNutt, by publicly stating last March that it did not matter to the government of the United States who won the election, gave the green light to Roxas. President Osmeña, who lacked the vigor and personal magnetism of his predecessor, Manuel Quezon, was attacked as "tired, aging, slow-moving." In spite of the efforts of the Democratic Alliance to bring out the facts, the Roxas machine won. On April 23 the self-styled "Man of Destiny" was elected by a slim majority.

[This is the first of two articles by Mr. Millon on the situation in the Philippines.]

The Shakeout

BY ARNOLD BEICHMAN

IN CASE you don't get around, a new contribution to the language is making rapid headway in "intellectual" business circles. It is a contribution which should interest the student of semantics. It consists of a single word—"shakeout." Webster's Unabridged makes no mention of this word, either by itself or under the verb "to shake." So we must assume that "shakeout" is a word which the editors of the United States News coined and are now popularizing on the management level.

The earliest use of "shakeout," I believe, was noted in United States News back in July, when intelligent business "opinioneers" began to feel some concern about the nation's economic well-being—living costs, slackening production, strikes, international friction, poor production scheduling, possible overrating of the consumer market, overextension of loans and credit, speculation in inventories. To these theoreticians the business cycle seemed to be sliding along to what might ordinarily be termed "bust." The ideologists of the right, imbued with a firm belief that America must not be sold short, seem to feel that one must be sensitive to the nuances of words used to describe economic regression. A panic chain-reaction might be set off if their warnings contained such image and total-recall words as "depression" (1929) or "collapse" (1932) or "recession" (1937). Fearful of making the business man's flesh creep, they have emerged with the word "shakeout."

The September 6 issue of United States News predicts a shakeout within twelve months or less. (This issue was printed before the recent "shakeout" in the stock market.) United States News says a shakeout is inevitable before the country can arrange its economic affairs on a more efficient basis, but it consoles the brow-furrowed business man with the prediction that the shakeout will not mean a long depression.

If you examine the word in context, you feel with the business weekly that this shakeout is probably a good idea, like the medieval surgeon's view of a phlebotomy. Shaking out clothes to get rid of the dust, shaking out a tablecloth to get rid of bread crumbs, shaking out weak speculators in a commodity market—all are minor operations and don't hurt. It is possible that a better word for this delicate economic concept might have been "shakedown"—there is the shakedown cruise of newly launched battleships, during which, as Frank Sullivan's Mr. Arbuthnot might say, "the bugs are ironed out." But the word "shakedown" has such ugly connotations that it patently had to be eschewed for "shakeout." (I notice that C. F. Hughes in the New York Times prefers the word "shakedown.")

ARNOLD BEICHMAN is publicity director of the joint board of the New York Dress and Waistmakers' Union.

Informed magazines like Business Week are plainly concerned about the future, the immediate future. The increase of almost $2,500,000,000 in business loans over a year ago is the subject of the lead story in a recent issue of Business Week which warns that rising prices and inventory speculation may mean a smash.

Among the news-letter writers who cater to business men and management planners, there is an air of realism which is far healthier in some respects than the serenity which enveloped their predecessors during the Hoover depression. But the realism is actually confined to sober warnings of shoals ahead. The warnings lack constructive suggestions on what the economy must do to save itself, even from a shakeout of small duration. For constructive suggestions might necessitate a revaluation of present-day business thinking on, for example, how to broaden the purchasing power of the masses of consumers.

Here the business theoreticians fall back on that ancient human technique, demonology. We know what's coming; who's to blame? That is easy. The scapegoats are those old debbils labor and government. Labor wants more money, government helps labor, government besets business with all kinds of controls; so what do you expect? A shakeout. Hold your hats, boys, the wind is rising.

On prognosis, the ideologists of the right know what they're talking about. On diagnosis, they are like aborigines beating the drums to exorcise the evil spirits, except that they know better. They know better because they have source material which tells them what the trouble is, and it's not in the stock market, where the argument rages whether the Exchange follows business or business follows the Exchange. They know the results of a National Survey of Liquid Asset Holdings, Spending, and Saving conducted for the Federal Reserve Board by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, a survey which showed business writers like C. F. Hughes of the New York Times that "the pent-up demand represented by bank deposits and government securities is largely in the hands of the top 10 per cent [of the nation's spending units, or families], who own the 60 per cent. The other 90 per cent own 40 per cent, and it is here that industry expects to draw upon savings for its millions of sales of appliances and what not." This report, characterized by the Times business editor as "highly significant," disclosed that the top 30 per cent of American families hold 87 per cent of liquid assets owned in 1945; the next 30 per cent hold 12 per cent; and the remaining 40 per cent of American families own only 1 per cent of the nation's liquid-asset holdings. It was analyzed and quoted in great detail by the business magazines, which understood its importance but failed to relate it to the prevailing view of American business—that if government would go away and if labor would go away, business could descend from Mt. Pisgah and lead us into Canaan.

Our business theoreticians were also acquainted with the report on economic concentration and World War II made by the Smaller War Plants Corporation to the Senate Special Committee to Study Problems of American Small Business. This study showed the extent of concentration with the disclosure that the "facility holdings of the 250 largest corporations in 1945 approximately equaled those of all [report's italics] corporations in 1939." It showed that "by the middle of 1945 the sixty-three largest listed manufacturing corporations, with assets of over $100,000,000, had increased their net working capital to $8,400,000,000, more than that of all listed manufacturing corporations in 1939, and . . . at the end of 1945 they will hold nearly $10,000,000,000 of highly liquid net working capital." It showed that "the facilities of corporations controlled by five great financial interest groups—Morgan, Rockefeller, Mellon, du Pont, and the Cleveland group—would be equal to nearly half that of all manufacturing corporations in 1939."

If business thinking is to make its contribution to solving the growing-old pangs of our economy, it will not be by a frenetic search for euphemisms for the word "depression." It will not be by working up a good case-history on the sick patient and then retreating from a recommendation for surgical procedures. You cannot be an economic sophisticate on the one hand and a laissez faire primitive on the other.

The inner contradictions within the capitalist system are personalized in the inner-soul contradictions of the business-magazine writers, who have a powerful influence on business men. But the economic well-being of our nation will not be furthered by the use of shibboleths like free enterprise, business competition, laissez faire, no government interference, control of trade unions. There is little point in criticizing Britain's revolution by consent and arguing that democratic processes will "have a better chance to survive and thrive in association with a genuinely competitive system of private enterprise than they will in association with any system of economic collectivism," as Business Week said on August 31. The Senate Small Business Committee report washes up that myth of "a genuinely competitive system of private enterprise."

Over and above all this is the appalling fatalism with which the business ideologists, who know better, accept, as the grim visitation of some impersonal destiny, the ineluctable "shakeout." This fatalism ignores the fact that shakeout means unhappy people, joblessness, not enough to eat, further weakening of private enterprise. It is possible that Americans, having experienced the long and bitter shakeout starting in 1929, may be unwilling to sit by for another to blow itself away.

BOOKS and the ARTS

Slow Movement

Waking, he found himself in a train, andante,
With wafers of early sunlight blessing the unknown fields
And yesterday canceled out, except for yesterday's papers
Huddling under the seat.

It is still very early, this is a slow movement;
The viola-player's hand like a fish in a glass tank
Rises, remains quivering, darts away
To nibble invisible weeds.

Great white nebulae lurch against the window
To deploy across the valley, the children are not yet up
To wave us on—we pass without spectators,
Braiding a voiceless creed.

And the girl opposite, name unknown, is still Asleep and the color of her eyes unknown
Which might be wells of sun or moons of wish
But it is still very early.

The movement ends, the train has come to a stop
In buttercup fields, the fiddles are silent, the whole
Shoal of silver tessellates the aquarium
Floor, not a bubble rises . . .

And what happens next on the program we do not know,
If, the red line topped on the gauge, the fish will go mad in the tank
Accelerando con forza, the sleeper open her eyes
And, so doing, open ours.

LOUIS MACNEICE

Newman as Man and Critic

ERNEST NEWMAN has completed his gigantic "Life of Richard Wagner" with a fourth volume of more than seven hundred pages (Knopf; $7.50), filled with the laborious piecing together and interpreting of documentary evidence concerning the happenings in Wagner's life from 1866 to his death in 1883. The matters with which those seven hundred pages deal—including as they do the relations between Wagner and Nietzsche, the building of Bayreuth, the completion of "Die Meistersinger," the "Ring," and "Parsifal"—are important and interesting (though the laboriously arrived-at detail is sometimes wearying); but more interesting, for me, is the nine-page appendix with which the volume—and the entire work—ends.

This appendix, entitled Bombastes Furioso, is concerned with the review of the third volume by the late Carl Engel in the April, 1941, issue of the Musical Quarterly (a footnote tells us that the appendix, written in the summer of 1941, is printed "precisely as it was then, though Dr. Engel died in 1944"). "Dr. Engel," writes Newman, "has so often honored me with his disapproval of myself and all my works that from sheer repetition I have long since ceased to be flattered by the compliment." But this time Engel included Newman and Wagner in one denunciation: "Having persuaded himself . . . that Wagnerism and Nazism are identical in root, flower, and fruit, he now suggests that if only we realized that to give up Wagner's music would merely be to give up 'the music of Klingsor who for one hundred years has numbed our senses with his witchcraft' and 'allowed to grow up round us a garden of gorgeous flowers that at last have revealed themselves as poisonous and death-dealing,' then 'we should retaliate, then we should ban and burn every scrap of Wagner's music and writings, and every book written about the amazing wizard, beginning with the books of the Anglo-Wagnerian Ernest Newman.' "

"If," Newman continues, "I have not made a practice of replying to Dr. Engel's ill-tempered comments on myself and my work during the last dozen years or so it is because I would as soon have thought of going round with an antiseptic cloth wiping up the slaver of a rabid dog. But I feel that I ought not to bring the present biography to a close without some exposure of the manners and the methods of this gentleman." For this purpose he proposes to discuss in detail a paragraph from Engel's review; "and the proof that Dr. Engel has in this case provided a perfect exposure of the bombastic ignoramus he mostly is may perhaps throw a side-light on some of his achievements in other fields."

Thereupon he quotes the paragraph:

> Appendix II [of the third volume] professes to deal with "the 'madness' of King Ludwig." If anything were needed to show the author's peculiar standpoint it is these three pages of print wherein, among other wild shots, the author accuses the "alienists" of having done "so obligingly" the Bavarian politicians' "dirty work" for them in 1886. Verily, one does not have to be an alienist or a psychiatrist to recognize the symptoms of Ludwig's mental malady. One has but to read the fragments of the King's own diaries . . . to gain an appalling glimpse into the suffering of that poor, perverted soul. Mr. Newman, with all his casuistry, cannot change the case-history of the royal patient and make him out a normal man, fit to reign over a kingdom.

Though Newman still insists that Ludwig was not insane it is not in order to "make him out a normal man, fit to reign over a kingdom." In the third volume Newman not only discussed Ludwig's sexual abnormality but described the excessive shyness and other behavior of an emotionally maladjusted person who nevertheless showed himself to be, in many situations, intelligent and "sane." And Newman is able to point out that "I have expressly said, in the eleventh line of the Appendix, that 'he had, of course, become quite impossible as a king'; not, however, because he was mad, but because he would not give proper attention to what he had come to regard as the tiresome and futile business of kingship." Not only did Engel ignore this statement, but Newman contends that the paragraph betrays Engel's ignorance of the published evidence "that Ludwig had never been anyone's 'patient' for his 'mental malady,' and least of all the 'patient' of the four doctors who certified his incurable derangement in 1886"; that "not one of these men had ever examined him in any way, ever been in his presence, exchanged a single word with him"; and that they were the willing tools of a group of political conspirators who "wanted, and set about obtaining, a medical voucher only to give their coup d'état an appearance of legality afterwards." And at the end he says: "I have gone into this matter at such length because this one paragraph of Dr. Engel's provides in concentrated form a perfect sample of all the defects, congenital and acquired, of his mind. . . . He is a case for the pathologists."

Now to me this appendix of Newman's is a very curious episode. Authors reply to their critics; but they do it in a letter or an article published at the time of the criticism; they don't give the reply—and the criticism—the status of an appendix in the book itself several years later—certainly not when they liken the criticism to "the slaver of a rabid dog." Newman's explanations why he hasn't answered Engel in the past dozen years and why, after all, he does answer him now are, to me, unconvincing—each throwing doubt on the other: a man who had felt as indifferent to the criticism as to "the slaver of a rabid dog" would, it seems to me, be able to complete his work untroubled by the feeling that he "ought not" to complete it without exposing the criticism; and if he is not indifferent to it now one wonders whether he was indifferent before. In that connection I am struck by his intemperate language, which is not that of indifference—the indifference he would feel toward mere vicious stupidity; and so the question arises whether in those dozen years there wasn't something else that he was not indifferent to. And the answer is that there was something else, which he doesn't mention.

There was, in 1935, Engel's review of "The Man Liszt." This book was similar to the Wagner biography in purpose, method, and results: it offered, said Newman, the truth about Liszt—the truth, in particular, about his relation with the Countess d'Agoult—that he had derived from documentary source material, in place of the legend that other writers had been content to take from the official Ramann "Life" inspired by Liszt and the Princess Sayn-Wittgenstein. And Engel, in his review, contended that Newman's "truth" about the Liszt-d'Agoult relation was as colored and partial in favor of the Countess as the Ramann-Liszt-Wittgenstein "legend" had been in favor of Liszt; moreover he demonstrated that Newman had not derived that "truth" from the documentary source material, but had mistranslated, misinterpreted, and otherwise mishandled the material to make it fit the ideas he had regarded as the "truth."

Thus, in his account of the beginning of the relation, in 1833, the "legend" Newman attacked was that the Countess ensnared Liszt; the "truth" he offered in its place was that it was she who was reserved and Liszt who was the ardent wooer and seducer; and the documents he cited as evidence were their letters of that year. In his review Engel pointed out that in the volume in which they are published (which I have taken the trouble to look up) all of Liszt's letters of the year 1833—many undated, others with dates from August through December—are given first, then the

NORTON "Books That Live"
IN MUSIC

MUSIC IN OUR TIME

Trends in Music since the Romantic Era

By Adolfo Salazar. The distinguished Spanish musicologist and composer traces the sources of contemporary music and shows how that music parallels the social and artistic currents of our time. Illustrated with music examples. $5.00

Music in Western Civilization

By Paul Henry Lang. The art of music in its relation to historical development. "A tremendous achievement."—N. Y. Times. Illustrated. $6.50

The Bach Reader

Edited by Hans T. David and Arthur Mendel. A Life of Johann Sebastian Bach in Letters and Documents. "Truly monumental . . . indispensable to all serious students."—Musical America. Illustrated. $6.00

The Diaries of Tchaikovsky

Translated from the Russian and Annotated by Wladimir Lakond. Translated for the first time, complete and unabridged, these diaries disclose the man and musician in his own words. Illustrated. $5.00

Harmony

By Walter Piston. A concise discussion of the harmonic materials commonly used by composers and the way these materials have been used. $4.50

Composer and Critic

By Max Graf. Two Hundred Years of Musical Criticism. The development of musical criticism in relation to the over-all cultural development of Western Europe and the United States. $3.75

The History of Musical Instruments

By Curt Sachs. "A mine of fascinating information . . . scrupulous scholarship."—N. Y. Times Book Review. Illustrated. $6.00

Steps to Parnassus

By Johann Joseph Fux. The Study of Counterpoint. The first modern translation, by Alfred Mann, Ed. Illustrated. $3.00

From Bach to Stravinsky

Edited by David Ewen. A History of Music by its Foremost Critics. "The most convenient book we have for a survey of European music."—John Erskine. $4.00

The Rise of Music in the Ancient World

By Curt Sachs. A fascinating history of music from primitive times to the middle ages. Illustrated. $5.50

Music in the Middle Ages

By Gustave Reese. ". . . the most authoritative modern essay on medieval music published in any language."—Saturday Review of Literature. Illustrated. $6.00

From Madrigal to Modern Music

By Douglas Moore. A Guide to Musical Styles. "No more significant gift could be offered to the thoughtful reader about music."—Saturday Review. $3.75

• Coming This Fall •

HAYDN
A Creative Life in Music.
By Karl Geiringer.
October. $5.00

MUSIC OF TCHAIKOVSKY
Edited by Gerald Abraham.
November. $3.75

At all bookstores

W. W. NORTON & CO. • 101 Fifth Avenue, New York 3

four of the Countess—the first two undated, the others dated May 20 and 26; and he might have added that the editor describes this arrangement at the beginning of the chapter when he speaks of "the letters and notes of Liszt which follow" and says explicitly that "the few letters of Madame d'Agoult pertaining to this period are added to his ('y sont joints')"—that is, added in a group after his, not interpolated among his. Yet, said Engel,

> Mr. Newman—having taken the reader through the Liszt letters into December, 1833—writes: "At this stage [Engel's italics] we have apparently the first of Marie's letters to him that have been preserved. She addresses him as 'Monsieur,' and discusses points connected with literature and music." The intended inference is obvious. The reader is made to believe that after a correspondence that has lasted for more than six months, during which Liszt has supposedly grown more and more fervent in his epistolary style, the coy and shrinking Marie still talks only literature and music, and addresses him with a formal "Monsieur." Mr. Newman omits to say in his narrative that among the four letters from Marie the third one is dated as early as May 20. Mr. Newman omits to say that in this letter will be found the impassioned appeal: "A genoux, Franz, à genoux, priez pour moi, sauvez-moi." Mr. Newman translates this phrase: "On your knees, pray for me, save me." Mr. Newman suppresses "Franz." Why? This letter was written on a Sunday night; on Monday morning Marie added a postscript which reads: "Mais non, je suis absurde, vous avez raison de ne pas m'écrire davantage, mais c'est que, voyez-vous, je vous aime quelque fois bêtement et dans ces moments-là je ne comprends plus que je ne pourrais, ne saurais, et ne devrais pas être pour vous une pensée absorbante comme vous l'êtes pour moi." Mr. Newman translates the first phrase of this: "No, I am not absurd," when the sense of it is the exact opposite.

Now the omission of the date and of "Franz" is important because it conceals from the reader the fact that, in Engel's words, "already in May, 1833, Marie made a full-fledged declaration of love to Liszt, called him in her letters by his first name, upbraided him for not writing more often, and admitted that she had no power, no means, no right to ask that she be as absorbing a thought for him as he is for her." And the insertion of "not" is important—but not because of the difference in meaning, which in this instance is negligible: one means the same realization of the absurdity of one's previous contention whether one says, "No, I am absurd; you are right to act as you do" or "No, I am not absurd; you are right to act as you do." What is important is the mere fact of the insertion of the word: after Engel's demonstration of such facts in "The Man Liszt" one reads "The Life of Richard Wagner" without the assurance one should have that Newman hasn't omitted a date or inserted a "not" where it may have made a great difference. And one is anything but reassured by his method of dealing with Engel's demonstration, in the appendix which he has made the conclusion of his monumental work.

Newman's writing provides a striking illustration of the fact that criticism is not only personal—in the sense of involving a particular person's equipment of critical insight and intellect—but involves the whole person. Newman the man is in the writing with Newman the critic—a decidedly unpleasant man too, as he comes through the writing: obtrusively conscious of the eminence and brilliance of Ernest Newman, pompous, overbearing, ruthless in his determination to win an argument, and in the end guilty of tactics like those of "The Man Liszt" and Bombastes Furioso. And criticism, it turns out, is a moral activity: most often it fails from lack of competence; but the competence of a Newman can be defeated by faults of character.

I have thought it worth while to quote here the expanded statement of this point from my article on "The Man Liszt" episode in the Brooklyn Eagle years ago. The episode was for me an example of something common in criticism—the critic's failure in his obligation to deal with his material with rigorous justice; and the term "justice," I said, indicated the reason for the failure. It was not mere incompetence—though the justice I was concerned with included competence. It was something else that was not ordinarily thought of in connection with criticism.

> The amount of artistic talent in the world today is enormous; the amount of important art extremely small. The reason is that art is not the product of talent alone. It is an expression through talent—and represents the operation on talent—of personal character. And it is personal deficiencies and difficulties that are responsible for the failure of artists to realize the potentialities of their talent. Now criticism is usually thought of as merely a parasite on Art—which in fact most of it is. But important criticism has many of the characteristics of artistic expression. It involves the operation of sensibility and intellect on its material, the art it deals with, and on its medium, the words in which it formulates itself; and in the end it is a type of literary expression with stylistic and aesthetic characteristics that convey qualities of mind and feeling. In short, it is as much a personal expression as the art it deals with; and like this art it represents the operation of personal character as well as of talent. And while a music critic may fail through a deficiency of talent—that is, through a lack of mere competence in his field, or of mere ability to think straight—even a competent critic may fail through a deficiency of character. He may be diverted from rigorous justice to his material by personal ends; he may, for example, neglect the material and evade important responsibilities in the process of writing belles-lettres [this was a reference to Gilman]; or he may misuse the material to impress his readers as hard-boiled [a reference to Chotzinoff]; and so on. And in the present instance, certainly, it is not a deficiency in competence that causes Newman to pervert the Liszt-d'Agoult correspondence, but a deficiency in character. One accepts his writing for its value and despite its faults; but the faults sometimes deprive it of its value.

B. H. HAGGIN

Mahler

GUSTAV MAHLER: MEMORIES AND LETTERS. By Alma Mahler. Translated by Basil Creighton. The Viking Press. $5.

IF MUSIC is the hardest art to write about, musicians are evidently the hardest artists. To convey the quality and values of symphony or sonata by means of words, and to maintain in doing so a reasonable distance both from reckless impressionism and from the sterile methods of technical analysis or the dismal verbiage and genealogical conjurings of "musicology," require a skill no greater than that needed by the biographer who attempts to relate a musician's career to the elusive art he creates or interprets. If a Chorley, a Shaw, or a Tovey is rare in musical criticism, so, in musical biography, are Sullivan on Beethoven, Turner on Mozart, Toye on Verdi, Lockspeiser on Debussy. Nor are musical autobiography and memoirs in much better status: the exceptions of Berlioz, Wagner, and Rimsky-Korsakov (or recently Bruno Walter) make the general ineptitude more painful; to descend to the average books by opera singers or virtuosi —Melba's, Calvé's, Alda's, or Farrar's embarrassing "Such Sweet Compulsion"—is to suspect that there is little connection between the discipline and taste of music and any other standard of taste whatever. It is well enough to believe that "the more perfect the artist the more completely separate in him will be the man who suffers and the mind which creates," but to separate the musical intelligence from the typical record of conceit and vulgarity which the professional musical life induces—"a most unholy trade" rivaling the theater's, with its spectacles of professional jealousy, dressing-room squabbles, champagne parties, and cockpit careerism—puts a strain on even the most willing sympathizer with the exactions of temperament.

In Mahler the suffering man and the creating mind are hardly separable; neither his career as conductor nor his quality as a composer can be disengaged from the strenuous temper which he imposed on the musical world of his time and by which his achievement in a disintegrating tradition can best be measured. Mme Mahler (later Mme Franz Werfel) has hardly written the book Mahler deserves or an adequate supplement to the rather sketchy essays by Stefan and Walter. The strains and endurances she suffered—an ambitious musical Backfisch of Vienna, forced to sacrifice her hopes as a composer to the stormy career and excitable temperament of an aesthetic autocrat—get very much in the way of any clear view of Mahler's mind or his music. Her account covers the last ten years of Mahler's life, from 1902 when, a girl of twenty, she married the composer of forty-one, to his death in 1911. She lived with Mahler during the writing of his last four symphonies and "Das Lied von der Erde," the harried and triumphant years when his conducting of the Philharmonic and the Opera in Vienna gave that city its greatest glories of musical interpretation, and when his journeys to Russia, Paris, and New York followed the established pattern of an uncompromising perfectionism at war with the egotisms, jealousies, and social pressures of the opera and orchestra worlds. But on two counts at least her book has value. It depicts the last great age of virtuosity and heroism in the music life of Europe, the excited artistic atmosphere of Vienna before 1914, when the interpretation of a symphony surpassed political crises in the public interest, and when the artist as culture-hero was not yet lost in the distractions of commercialism and mass production. Out of this scene Mahler's personality emerges with a kind of desperate heroism, imaged in the photographs of the thought-haggard Nietzschean face and cranium that once, in Italy, gave Mann his mask for Aschenbach in "Death in Venice," the artist at the edge of the abyss, strung up between the

OXFORD MUSIC BOOKS

MOZART
HIS CHARACTER, HIS WORK
by Alfred Einstein

". . . the clearest, most vivid and most credible picture of this most 'universal' of musical geniuses."—New York Times Book Review. "One of the great 'music books' of the decade."—New York Herald Tribune Book Review.
4th printing. Illus. $5.00

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS
THEIR HISTORY IN WESTERN CULTURE FROM THE STONE AGE TO THE PRESENT
by Karl Geiringer

". . . an excellent reference book describing the historical evolution of every type of musical instrument, from the most ancient to the most modern."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.
Profusely Illustrated. $4.00

ESSAYS and LECTURES
by H. C. Colles

Selections from the shorter writings of the late Music Critic of the London Times, revealing his deep musicianship, charm and urbane wit. The main headings include "The Opera," "Church Music," "General," and "Some English Musicians." Musical examples. $4.50

BEETHOVEN
by Sir Donald Tovey

A human and profound analysis of all aspects of Beethoven's music. " . . . a book of rare and sympathetic insight . . . this book must become a permanent part of all libraries of Beethoveniana."—Etude. Music examples. $3.00

AND THREE OTHER IMPORTANT VOLUMES BY Sir Donald Tovey
ESSAYS in MUSICAL ANALYSIS:
Chamber Music
Symphonies, Vol. I
Symphonies, Vol. II
With music examples Each $4.00

At all bookstores

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS
114 Fifth Avenue New York 11

claims of society and the irresistible perils of his idealism. The sheerly irascible, compulsive nature of Mahler came to its highest pitch of exacerbation during this decade of his marriage. On one side clamored the demands of impresarios and performers, of royal favor and patronage, of American social pressure groups, of the clashing egotisms that challenged his own. On the other side was the art he managed to wring out of himself in intervals of a secret ordeal hardly less unnerving —the yearning, strenuously exalted, and visionary emotion that permeates his style, giving it a quality of exhausting tension, cracking nervous struggle, and remote nobility that establishes it so much within its period; so much involved, with all its genuine grandeur and superb lyricism, in its historical and temperamental conditions. (There is a portrait of Mme Mahler, the Geliebte of Germanic inspiration, in an art-gown of the period, pose of conscious aesthetic winsomeness, and background of wooden balcony and misty forested mountains, that does much to convey the spirit of Mahler's erotic idealism and the delicate balance it struck between self-conscious exaltation and free harmonic fulfilment.)

Another fact that appears is the necessity of Mahler's autocratic authority in any musical enterprise that aims to rise above the ruck of compromised standards, trustee-ridden politics, and financial patronage that have come, since his day, to rule the musical world. Whatever social and popular assets the mass scale of music production in this century may boast, it has also its enormously increased liabilities of the success standard, with business men, shoddy impresarios, and box-office figures usurping the authority of the conductor and producing in our wealthiest cities (Chicago, for example, with New York and others not far behind it) makeshift slovenliness of presentation and third-rate slackness where once men like Muck and Mahler set an uncompromising standard. Mahler did not live to see the day of radio broadcasts, concert industrialization, and their attendant ignominies; his troubles never included the humiliation of having his programs interrupted by talks by Mr. Cameron or Mr. Kettering; he kept—at the cost of spent health and a premature death—his boards of trustees, ladies' committees, and impertinent socialites at a distance. He gave Europe and America some of the greatest performances they had ever known, and he succeeded in becoming the master of an intensely personal lyric and tragic utterance: last in the great tradition of German symphonists; creator, in the first, fourth, and eighth symphonies, in "Das Lied von der Erde" and the "Kindertotenlieder," of some of the greatest music of this century; the exponent of a musical integrity and dedication which serve today as a warning of what aesthetic honesty faces in an age of increasing careerism and mass standardization. His art, his personality, and his performances stand in danger of becoming legendary, a misfortune for music from which Mme Mahler's intimacies, Bruno Walter's loyal revival of his compositions, and a small number of worthily defiant successors may rescue him for the possible instruction of the men who today control the destiny of the opera house and concert hall, and through them the music which, more than any other art, must contend for its existence against all the forces which professional vanity, profit-making, and public incomprehension have devised.

MORTON DAUWEN ZABEL

A Misguiding History

COMPOSER AND CRITIC: TWO HUNDRED YEARS OF MUSICAL CRITICISM. By Max Graf. W. W. Norton and Company. $3.75.

MR. GRAF has written a history of the "development of musical criticism against a background of the struggles and battles of the seminal ideas of the great epochs of modern history." He has concluded that the modern critic is not functioning correctly: "The structure of an artistic society in which the critic is not the interpreter of the artist to the public, but the spokesman of the public against the artist, is faulty"; and that the best way to discover what is wrong is to turn to history, "clearly to see the position of criticism in the musical life of our time, and its proper function within musical society." He describes that function as "the use of human intelligence, vision, and application, to the end of discovering the lasting values in works of art"; and critics as "the born interpreters and intermediaries between the artists and the public."

Dr. Graf's first and chief failure is that he doesn't understand the function of criticism and consequently is unable to diagnose its ills; and he obviously has no idea when a critic is good or bad, as distinguished from his relation to a cultural background. Dr. Graf is one of many modern critics who, instead of facing the real issues of criticism, question its validity, reject its methods, and deny its values, because they are obsessed by a mythical philosopher's stone—a science of criticism, the results of which are to be impersonal and objective, the critic himself being reduced to a mere integer, a mouthpiece for dicta valid for all times and persons.

The fatal weakness of this position is that it ignores the actual basis of criticism, which is not the dicta, but the critic himself. The critic does not talk to the artist's audience about the artist's work; he talks to his own audience about the artist's work, which is an entirely different thing, and one which has been much misunderstood, not only by artists, but even by critics themselves. The only justification the critic can offer for his activity is, to quote Mr. Auden, that "I do this, whatever its effects, because I cannot help doing it." The only test for the validity of his criticism is his own personal sensitiveness to the art to which he is reacting; and this is a test which he himself cannot make—for he must believe in himself —but which his audience must make. The audience, that is, picks its critic in accordance with its own sensitiveness and response to sensitiveness; and the work of a particular critic can ultimately be valid only for persons who are to a degree more rather than a degree less like him. In the end, the critic writes of his own experience, and communicates its meaning to his audience, which presumably lacks the background, training, or discipline to have the experience by itself, and which has learned by verification of his statements the validity of his experience for itself.

Apart from his dubious critical position, Dr. Graf has written bad history and a bad book. It is a book obviously designed for popular consumption, in the worst sense of that word. Besides consistently writing down to his audience, he refrains from any documentation, any bibliography, and does not even name most of the works of the critics he discusses. There is a profusion of cultural background, most of which is irrelevant, including what Dr. Graf genially condescends to share with us poor benighted Americans of his own background of rich and superior Viennese culture in a stream of anecdote and chit-chat. We should be grateful, instead of unkindly noting that it has no connection with musical criticism or his pretense of historical method.

The history is inaccurate. For example, in the chapter devoted to the Bach-Scheibe dispute, which is incorrectly titled "the first conflict between critic and composer," Dr. Graf suppresses dates, ignores relevant facts, rearranges historical chronology, and throws in unwarranted insinuations of his own, for the sake of an irrelevant moral; and his method in this chapter is that of the remainder of the book, with wrongly cited dates and misquotation in addition.

The allocation of space is highly questionable. The Germanic bias of the book is so strong that in a total of eighteen chapters we hardly budge out of Germany until the fifteenth, entitled Paris, 1830, and even this one is devoted predominantly to Heine, Wagner, and Liszt! Much more space than is warranted is allotted to various composers —Debussy, Bizet (the author of a single article), Wolf, Weber, Smetana—who happened to have been music critics rather casually at some time in their careers. Telemann, who can only doubtfully be considered a critic, receives as much space as Berlioz, who gets half that of Weber; while important critics who had long and influential careers, such as Fetis and d'Ortigue in France, Chorley in England, and Lobe in Germany, are reduced to the merest stereotypes, or dismissed with a sneering anecdote.

Even when he devotes space to a critic, Dr. Graf is unable to describe or evaluate his accomplishments. Schumann, as may be expected, receives a shower of praise, much of it deserved, but there is no mention of his essential fault as a critic—that, as Yorke Bannard well states it, "his criticisms . . . reveal an ardent and enthusiastic nature, but they also show that, whereas he had little difficulty in recognizing good music when he found it, he frequently mistook inferior work for first-rate." Berlioz is treated to an effusion which not only fails to mention any of his writings, either his important journalistic work or his books, but appears to have been written without any reference to them at all. Berlioz, to Dr. Graf, is the arch-romanticist, the great emotionalist, playing on his literary organ with all the stops out. Berlioz could certainly be extravagant; but he had a strong streak of classicism in him, and the most immediately striking aspect of his critical work—when one turns to it from reading about it—is its general sobriety, sanity, and finely chiseled insights. And Dr. Graf relates the history of Wagner criticism with a partisan bias which, although it survives in a few old Wagnerians like Newman, is about as proper and relevant as continuing to fight the Civil War.

The chapter on "modern" criticism passes understanding. Dr. Graf's own admission that it is "in no sense exhaustive" is a rare understatement. He continues:

> That I have dealt with no living American critic and given considerable space to two living English ones may seem illogical. But there are two good reasons for it: first, musical criticism in America reached its classic heights a generation before it did in England; second, the work of

NEW REPUBLIC:

"An excellent political novel and a genuinely philosophical novel . . . All together it is the finest American novel in more years than one would like to have to remember." —George Mayberry

NATION:

"For sheer virtuosity, for the sustained drive of its prose, for the speed and evenness of its pacing, for its precision of language, its genius of colloquialism, I doubt indeed whether it can be matched in American fiction."—Diana Trilling

by Robert Penn Warren

ALL THE KING'S MEN

$3.00

HARCOURT, BRACE & COMPANY

The highly entertaining history of a revolution that went wrong

ANIMAL FARM

by GEORGE ORWELL

$1.75

Newman and Shaw is already embalmed in books, that of Olin Downes, Virgil Thomson, Oscar Thompson, and other American contemporaries still awaits that consummation, and the historian must wait too.

Actually, all the Americans he discusses belong either to Shaw's generation or to Newman's. More important, Downes published his first book in 1918, Thompson in 1934, and Thomson in 1939; and even if they had not appeared in books, any important library contains files of newspapers and periodicals. I can therefore only conclude that his stated reasons are not his real ones. But even by his own standards, he is inconsistent: there is no mention of H. T. Parker, who is both important and dead. And Dr. Graf ignores all the important modern English critics—dead, living, "embalmed"—outside of Shaw and Newman. He mentions a number of living Germans, but no Frenchmen later than Debussy. More extraordinary is his omission of Soviet Russian criticism, which offers the one example of critics functioning as he contends they should, as interpreters of the composer to the public, but which he nevertheless ducks with the excuses that it "has, with few exceptions, not been translated into any world language," and that the long concealment of Russian musical life prevents accurate knowledge of "what manner the Soviet Russian music critic has performed his task of spreading musical culture . . . and what degree of spiritual freedom has been permitted to the leaders of artistic taste"; when in fact there have been sufficient quotations in English to give a reasonably accurate idea of what is happening there.

As for what Dr. Graf says in this chapter, his treatment of Philip Hale is typical of the fulsome and "tactful" manner in which he handles the older Americans, among them Krehbiel, Aldrich, Gilman, and especially Huneker. He is obviously familiar with nothing beyond the one published volume of selections from Hale's Boston Symphony program notes, which displays Hale largely as an analyst and contains only small excerpts from his newspaper criticisms. And in the midst of the usual ecstatic list of composers whom Hale discussed masterfully—in "the French manner," we are reminded—we suddenly encounter this remark: "With fine sensitivity, Hale wrote about Brahms . . . Brahms's Fourth Symphony he calls 'a structure in granite.'" But Hale's dislike of Brahms was well known; and what he actually wrote about this symphony was: "The austerity with which the composer has been reproached—in many cases unjustly—is here pronounced. The solidity of the structure may be admired, but the structure itself is granitic and unrelieved."

Dr. Graf has read Shaw, but he has missed completely what was important in Shaw's attitudes toward criticism: that Shaw was too acute to misunderstand the personal nature of criticism, and that he was never more serious and in dead earnest than when he was being most outrageous. And Ernest Newman inspires Dr. Graf to a prolonged rhapsody, which culminates in the fulsomely inaccurate exclamation: "His seriousness is impressive, his grace captivates, his wit amuses, his irony enchants."

Nothing more worthless and more vicious could be offered in the name of authority to the lay public that doesn't know and would like to learn than the unreliable facts and judgments, the distorted mis-learning, in this book.

CHARLES B. FARRELL

The Words and the Measure

LETTERS OF COMPOSERS: AN ANTHOLOGY, 1603-1945. Edited by Gertrude Norman and Miriam Lubell Shrifte. Alfred A. Knopf. $5.

ONE refutation of the theory that all the arts approach the condition of music is the writings of the composers themselves, particularly those composers, like the ones represented in this book, who wrote "the most readable and informative letters." They are essentially non-literary—not unliterary. Indeed, allusions to Shakespeare, Goethe, Heine, or Plato are everywhere; but there is no talent for what Gerard Manley Hopkins calls inscape. For the musician the beginning is not the word. We expect those shrewd craftsman's remarks common among painters like Van Gogh or Masson; yet the explanations of orchestral effects do not illuminate the score itself. In vain Gustav Mahler sought the "liberating word" in which to formulate the last movement of his Second Symphony. Mendelssohn complained "there is so much talk about music, and yet so little is said. For my part, I believe that words do not suffice for such a purpose." Music, he goes on, "fills the soul with a thousand things better than words." If, then, as writing, this correspondence appears fragmentary or blunt, it is none the less an authentic and pertinent comment on modern music and its affiliations with the other arts.

Inarticulate as the composer may be, his letters are often temperamental. One feels, for example, the outgoing disposition of Schubert, the despair of the deafened Beethoven, and the titanism of Wagner, who explains that "a public performance of one of my operas is still an occasion of such boundless emotional turmoil that I have frequently tried to prevent performances when I have felt unequal to this interior conflict." It is Wagner, too, who cherishes his "long-repressed resentment about this Jew-business." His grudge against Meyerbeer ("as necessary to my nature as gall is to blood") feeds itself fat on the little "fright" he gives the bankers and philistines by printing "Das Judentum in der Musik." These temperamental grudges and anguishes have, essentially, nothing to do with Wagner the composer, whose letters are of most interest when he is infatuated with his literary or mythological thesis that in Love, the negation of the will, and the high tragedy of renunciation one finds the significance of "Die Walküre," "Der Fliegende Holländer," "Tannhäuser," or "Lohengrin." Nor is there anything distinctively musical in Wagner's announcement, "I am an artist and nothing but an artist—that is my blessing and my curse. . . .; and so I run hither and thither, poor fool, to find peace." It is as difficult to distinguish the Wagnerian temperament from the Wagnerian score as it is to determine what remains of the verse of Byron without the Byronic legend—an instance of the romantic fallacy, doubtless. Somehow, the temperament of Mozart does not thus obscure his compositions—Mozart who in high animal spirit writes how his concerts "went like oil": "Count Wolfegg and several other passionate admirers of Beecke publicly admitted at a concert the other day that I had wiped the floor with him. . . . I then played another solo, quite in the style of the organ, a fugue in C minor, and then all of a sudden a magnificent sonata in C major, out of my head, and a rondo to finish up with. There was a regular din of applause. Herr Stein was so amazed that he could only make faces and grimaces. As for Herr Demmler, he couldn't stop laughing. He is a quaint fellow, for when he likes anything very much, all he does is to burst into fits of laughter. In my case he even started to curse."

For one thing, Mozart is convinced that "passions, whether violent or not, must never be expressed in such a way as to invite disgust," and music, though the situation be terrible, "must never cease to be MUSIC." Here, in 1781, is one of the principles of academic literature. When Rameau inquires in 1762 why we prefer certain musical intervals to others he is simply posing the question of the laws of taste that occupied literary critics for the whole eighteenth century. At the end of that age Sir Joshua Reynolds was insisting before the Royal Academy that design is fundamental to painting. Rossini a few years later was distressed that in opera, "warblings, wild leaps and jumps, trills, misuse of semitones, notes all tangled up—this is the kind of singing that now holds sway. That is why the measure, the essential part of music, without which melody is unintelligible and harmony becomes disordered, is neglected and violated by singers." More remarkable, just as Coleridge was arriving at his most famous critical opinion that by a magical diffusion of tone the poetic imagination reconciles discords and oppositions, the "romantic" Carl Maria von Weber was writing Naegeli "that the aim of an artistic composition is to deduce the character of the whole from individual thoughts, and that, amid the greatest diversity, still unity, displayed by the first principle or theme, should always shine forth." Thus these letters bear upon the other arts, as in Debussy's claim to present "realities—what the idiots call 'impressionism,' a term used as badly as possible, particularly by the art critics, who don't hesitate to wrap up Turner in it." They illustrate the social and economic configurations: the subscriptions of the British nobility to Handel's oratorios; the conservative, religious, "anti-passionate" mood Berlioz senses in England; the disappointment of J. S. Bach when at Leipzig "the ordinary burial fees" were 100 thaler less than he expected.

The closing letters of Howard Hanson, Virgil Thomson, Randall Thompson, Aaron Copland, and others give a strong impression of the vitality of composition in the United States. MacDowell was, of course, the most belligerent on this issue, repudiating Dvorák's "desire to clothe American music in Negro costume," and insisting that American composers be played on programs with the Europeans "to stand or fall" by the comparison. George Antheil, it happens, raises for the American composer in particular (and for the American poet or painter?) the unpleasant but necessary question whether "the boys are primarily stylists," each concerned to fabricate his own unmistakable technique. The letters of this collection, however, emphasize that to compose is to experience; that musical composition cannot be intellectualized. As David Diamond puts it, "the musical art is an instinctive one" and "the intellectual approach to music, no matter how well modified for the layman who wants to know," will produce only windbags who can talk about the whole-tone scale. For the composer, it would appear, there is no liberating word; there is only the unambiguous measure.

WYLIE SYPHER

"Music lovers will relish these glimpses of the human side of a great composer-conductor . . . A wonderful, human account of his career."
—N. Y. World-Telegram

"The book is extremely candid, not only about Mahler but also about many other glittering figures here and in Europe . . . an account of a stormy love affair enduring for ten years . . . It is fascinating."—GERALD W. JOHNSON, N. Y. Herald Tribune

Ill. $5.00

GUSTAV Mahler
MEMORIES AND LETTERS
by ALMA MAHLER

At all booksellers THE VIKING PRESS

"The names of the contributors alone should make anyone want to own this book."—N.Y. TIMES BOOK REVIEW

THE PARTISAN READER

A TREASURY OF THE BEST CREATIVE AND CRITICAL WORK FROM PARTISAN REVIEW

Edited by WILLIAM PHILLIPS and PHILIP RAHV

■ Fiction, Criticism and Verse by SHERWOOD ANDERSON, W. H. AUDEN, E. E. CUMMINGS, JOHN DEWEY, JOHN DOS PASSOS, F. W. DUPEE, T. S. ELIOT, JAMES T. FARRELL, ANDRE GIDE, PAUL GOODMAN, SIDNEY HOOK, CHARLES JACKSON, RANDALL JARRELL, FRANZ KAFKA, LOUIS MACNEICE, MARY MCCARTHY, KATHERINE ANNE PORTER, ISAAC ROSENFELD, DELMORE SCHWARTZ, KARL SHAPIRO, IGNAZIO SILONE, STEPHEN SPENDER, GERTRUDE STEIN, DYLAN THOMAS, EDMUND WILSON, RICHARD WRIGHT, and others.

704 pages. Introduction by LIONEL TRILLING
Just published, $3.75 at all bookstores
THE DIAL PRESS, NEW YORK

Music by Formula

THE SCHILLINGER SYSTEM OF MUSICAL COMPOSITION. Edited by Lyle Dowling and Arnold Shaw. Carl Fischer. $30.

> The Schillinger System is a synthesis of musical theory and the most recent discoveries of modern physics, physiology, and mathematics. . . . In Schillinger we encounter for the first time a comprehensive application of scientific method to all components of the tonal art. . . . The Schillinger System establishes its creator as one of the great musical theorists of all times, for Schillinger achieved a synthesis as rare in cultural history as Leonardo da Vinci's —a synthesis of science and art.

THESE not exactly modest statements are from the introduction to "The Schillinger System of Musical Composition," a posthumous work prepared from manuscript by Lyle Dowling and Arnold Shaw. It is a textbook purporting to lay down principles of composition derived not from the observed practice of composers but from the sciences. As such, it would seem a supremely ambitious, not to say presumptuous, attack upon a profound philosophical problem. It is not surprising, nor would it be a reproach, that such an attempt should fail. But it is regrettable that there should turn out to be so little ammunition for the undertaking in the first place. It is not that the attempt fails: the challenge does not even materialize.

But the outward pretensions are all there. The language is pompous—except for conversational extraneities—and the development of special terms and symbols reaches exasperating proportions. Scientific terminology, puzzling to the layman, may be somewhat less than clear to the scientist:

> The projection of a melody is a mechanical trajectory. Its kinetic components are balance, impetus, and inertia. Resistance produces impetus, leading either toward the climax, which is a pt (pitch-time) maximum with respect to the primary axis, or toward balance. The impetus is caused by resistance, which results from rotation. The geometrical projection of rotation is a circle which extends itself in time projection into a cylindrical or spherical spiral, or ultimately (through time extension) into wave motion (plane projection).

On the same page:

> The leap of a human being over a fourteen-foot rod was the highest achievement in the International Olympics for 1936, and that with the aid of a pole. The mechanical efficiency of a flea is fifty times greater. The leap of a human being over a rod fifty feet high would seem supernatural, while the same kind of a leap by a flea would be far below the standards of flea efficiency—the flea leaps about one hundred times its own size.

Again and again, through the twelve books (on rhythm, scales, melody, variation, harmony, counterpoint, form, style, and orchestration), one comes upon tables of permutations, showing the ways in which a given set of musical elements may be assembled. But the evaluation of the various resultant groupings commonly brings out only what is already well known, causing wonder as to why the list should ever have been compiled. A favorite method of composing is to fit tones—chosen by a formula—into a preselected rhythmic pattern—also chosen by a formula. If the results were invariably as unappetizing as the ones quoted in the book, Schillinger would have few prophets today. But it is not always so: perhaps the secret of the partial success the method has enjoyed lies in the fact that the mechanistic procedures outlined do provide a means of stimulating a sluggish imagination. Once stimulation is accomplished, the imagination takes over, and the formulas go out the window until needed again. Reger used alcohol for the same purpose; Sacchini did it with cats and mistresses.

A reader wishing escape from formulas and jargon might turn to the final book, on orchestration. For here Schillinger is not much interested; he has a fine disdain for the "heterogeneous aggregation of antiquated tools" which compose today's orchestra—preferring, of course, the more "scientific" electronic instruments. But he condescends to treat our collection of relics for the sake of completeness. The errors of fact are appalling. Misinformation, recognizable as such by any intelligent amateur, is supplied on bowing, fingering, harmonics, and the construction and range of wind instruments. We learn, too, how kettledrums got into the orchestra: "It was J. Haydn who introduced them [Sinfonie mit Paukenschlag (Symphony with kettledrums)]."

Izaac Newton's
PRINCIPIA
• One of the world's great classics of science and philosophy; long out of stock, available now in the only up-to-date English translation.
716 pages. $6.50

CÉZANNE'S COMPOSITION
By ERLE LORAN
• Factual, authoritative. The paintings compared with photographs of the scenes painted. Explanatory text with numerous diagrams.
Fourth Printing
147 illustrations. $6.50

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA PRESS
BERKELEY 4, CALIFORNIA

No, it is difficult to see much future for the Schillinger System of Musical Composition. Some musicians don't like mathematics, and those who do will have brains enough to be discriminating and will demand content along with the externals.

GEORGE HENRY

MOTION PICTURE

NEVER BEFORE SUCH LUXURIOUS, RIOTOUS LOVING AND LIVING!

G. C. F. presents

VIVIEN LEIGH • CLAUDE RAINS

in Bernard Shaw's

"CAESAR AND CLEOPATRA"

PRODUCED AND DIRECTED BY Gabriel Pascal

"By Arrangement with DAVID O. SELZNICK"

NOW ASTOR B'WAY & 45th ST.

POPULAR PRICES

STAGE PLAYS

THEATRE GUILD'S PRODUCTIONS
THE MUSICAL HIT

CAROUSEL

Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
with John Raitt — Iva Withers
Jean Darling ■ Eric Mattson ■ Norma Howard ■ Jean Casto

AIR-COND. MAJESTIC Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

THE MUSICAL HIT

OKLAHOMA!

Based on Lynn Riggs' "Green Grow the Lilacs"
Music by Richard Rodgers • Book & Lyrics by Oscar Hammerstein 2d • Directed by Rouben Mamoulian • Dances by Agnes de Mille
Harold Keel ■ David Burns ■ Betty Jane Watson ■ Ruth Weston

AIR-COND. ST. JAMES Theatre 44th St. W. of Broadway. Evgs. 8:30 Mats. Thursday & Saturday at 2:30

"A smash hit of enormous proportions." — Ward Morehouse, Sun.

MAX GORDON presents

BORN YESTERDAY

The New Comedy Hit by GARSON KANIN

LYCEUM THEA., 45th Street East of B'way. CH. 4-4256
Evenings 8:40. Matinees Wed. & Sat. 2:40. AIR-COND.

"JUBILANT AND JOYFUL."—Brown, Sat. Rev. of Literature
RICHARD RODGERS and OSCAR HAMMERSTEIN 2nd Present

ETHEL MERMAN in

"ANNIE GET YOUR GUN"

Music & Lyrics by IRVING BERLIN • Book by HERBERT & DOROTHY FIELDS
with RAY MIDDLETON
Directed by JOSHUA LOGAN

IMPERIAL THEA., 45th St. W. of Bway. Evgs. 8:30. Mats. Wed & Sat. 2:30

MOTION PICTURES

Manhattan
ALHAMBRA
COLISEUM
81st ST.
86th ST.
58th ST. near Lex.
HAMILTON
125th ST.
REGENT
RIVERSIDE
23rd ST.

Bronx
CASTLE HILL
CHESTER
FORDHAM
FRANKLIN
MARBLE HILL
PELHAM
ROYAL

Westchester
MT. VERNON
NEW ROCH.
WH. PLAINS
YONKERS

RKO NOW

"UTTERLY BEGUILING TALE."—PM

IRENE DUNNE • REX HARRISON • LINDA DARNELL

'ANNA AND THE KING OF SIAM'

Based on MARGARET LANDON'S Biography

— AND —

'TRUTH ABOUT MURDER'

BONITA GRANVILLE • MORGAN CONWAY

Brooklyn
BUSHWICK
DYKER
GREENPOINT
KENMORE
MADISON
ORPHEUM
PROSPECT
REPUBLIC
TILYOU
Coney Island

Queens
Keith's FLUSHING
Keith's RICH. HILL
STRAND Far Rockaway

Manhattan
COLONIAL
B'way & 62 St.

"Romantic Comedy Drama"—N. Y. Times

MYRNA LOY
DON AMECHE

'SO GOES MY LOVE'

Based on HIRAM PERCY MAXIM'S "A Genius in the Family"

— AND —

'SHE WROTE THE BOOK'

JOAN DAVIS • JACK OAKIE

BOB HOPE and Joan Caulfield IN "MONSIEUR BEAUCAIRE"

A PARAMOUNT PICTURE

— IN PERSON —
CHARLIE SPIVAK
AND HIS ORCHESTRA
— Plus —
BOB EVANS
— Plus —
JOHN and RENE ARNAUT
Extra Added Attraction
PEGGY LEE

NOW PARAMOUNT TIMES SQUARE

NOW

The THEATRE GUILD presents

LAURENCE OLIVIER

in William Shakespeare's

"HENRY V"

In TECHNICOLOR • Released Thru United Artists

PRICES: Eves. (at 8:30) $2.40, $1.80 Mats. daily (at 2:30) $1.80, $1.20

ALL SEATS RESERVED

NOW! GOLDEN THEATRE 252 West 45th St.

Records

B. H. HAGGIN

EARLY in August an engineer who was in a position to know told me that with one exception the first post-war radio-phonographs—like the first post-war automobiles—would be somewhat modified versions of the last pre-war models, using no new principles such as he expected would be used in the machines of a year or two from now. By new principles he did not mean film or wire: the machines would still be designed for reproduction of the present type of record, but would incorporate one or another of the new pickups that have been invented and developed recently. And the one exception he referred to among the first post-war machines was the Zenith with the new Cobra pickup. He had been able to test this pickup, and had found it excellent; but his information was that the Zenith machines were not yet on the market; and so meanwhile I began to listen to what was available.

The new Magnavoxes turned out to be the pre-war machines modified to suit the tastes of the mass-public, which I discussed in this column several years ago. Most people, I said, would not tolerate needle-scratch; and to get rid of it they cut down the range of the machine, and were willing to sacrifice the sounds of high vibration-frequencies that give recorded sound its brilliance and fidelity to timbre. If they wanted the brilliance and "high-fidelity" they would have to take the needle-scratch with it; and they would find after a while that it had become dissociated from the music and they no longer noticed it as they listened. But many people did not like brilliance and high-fidelity, and wanted the "mellow" tone in which the highs were reduced and heavily outweighed by the bass. Now certainly a person who wants that is entitled to have it; but so is the person who wants the brilliance and high-fidelity. And it is possible to give both what they want: to produce a machine which will reproduce the full range of what is recorded, and to provide controls with which the highs can be cut down while the bass is emphasized. But Magnavox has decided against such flexibility, and has designed its machines to produce a sound in which, with the treble-control set at maximum, the highs are severely limited in range and reduced in intensity below the point of proper balance with the bass. This is true of both the 9-tube machine ($225 to $273 according to cabinet) and the 13-tube ($388 to $410)—the sound from the larger one being only more powerful and solid. There are good reasons against record-changers (the inferior reproduction by inferior pickups; the danger of the jewel-stylus being chipped as it falls onto the record, and the jagged surface damaging the grooves as it travels through them; the fact that as the records pile up the angle of the stylus changes, with increasing surface-chatter, distortion, and wear on the grooves); but most people want record-changers, and so the Magnavoxes come only with changers. I advise replacing the jewel-stylus after 1,000 record-sides; Steinway and Sons, where I heard the machines, thought that the charge for this would be somewhere around $3.

The large E. C. A. (Electronic Corporation of America) machines were not yet ready; and I was able to hear only the 7-tube chairside model No. 121 (approximately $150) and the 5-tube table model No. 106 ($86.40). Both have the flexibility I advocate: a single tone-control either cuts down highs until the sound is muffled or brings them in until the treble is bright and clear and well-balanced with the bass. In the table model the treble was a little harsh in both machines; also, the chassis is A. C.–D. C., but the record-changers have A. C. motors, so that the radio can be used on D. C. current without a converter, but the phonograph cannot. The changers use replaceable needles and I advise nothing more permanent than Victor chromium needles—one for each series of record-sides.

It was not until after the preceding report had been written that I heard the Zenith machines. The new Cobra pickup is part of a new record-changer that changes records in about three seconds; and the pickup is so constructed as to meet every one of the objections to record-changers that I mentioned earlier. It produces tone of beautiful quality; its lightness (2/3 of an ounce, according to Zenith), its flexibility ("vertical compliance"), the offsetting curvature of the arm that reduces tracking-error and its side-pressures—all these result in the sound being remarkably free of the usual noise; there is none of the usual chatter and distortion as the records pile up; and there are guards which make it impossible for the pickup—if it falls or is pressed onto the record or is pushed across it—to be damaged or do damage.

Listening to the 9-tube (9H) models ($209.55 to $213.65 according to cabinet) one hears a limitation of treble-range, presumably by the 10-inch speaker; but what treble there is is sufficiently strong for the sound to be bright and well-balanced when the tone-controls are set properly (more about that in a moment). Not only is the sound from the 12-tube (12H) models ($297 to $329.40) more powerful, but the larger baffle-area of the larger cabinets makes it more spacious, and the 14-inch speaker gives it additional richness by extending the treble-range to at least 7,000 cycles (judging by the reproduction of high-pitched percussion instruments). How much more the pickup is capable of with a wider-range speaker-system I don't know but hope to find out; as for the 7,000 cycles, it is a little limited for ears accustomed to 9,000, but most people will find it ample.

A word now about the setting of the tone-controls. These, on both machines, are not the usual knobs but six push-buttons: three for treble, marked "treble," "voice," and "normal"; and three for bass, marked "alto," "bass," and "low bass." Each attenuates, and in effect cuts out, a section of treble or bass when pushed down, and brings it back in when lifted up; and with both machines the proper balance of treble and bass, for my ears, is achieved when all three treble controls and "bass" are up, and "alto" and "low bass" are down.

And finally, Zenith claims that the pickup's lightness, flexibility, and low tracking-error reduce wear on the permanent metal-alloy stylus so much that it can be used for 6,000 record-sides. Since the tiny cartridge with the stylus can be removed and inserted more easily than the eraser of a pencil and costs only $2.50, the thing to do is to buy a spare and insert it to check the sound from the working cartridge after every hundred or two hundred sides.

I would say that right now these two Zenith machines are the ones to acquire—certainly in preference to other machines of the same price; certainly in preference to the Magnavoxes; and even, I suspect, in preference to most

SUPREME RADIO SERVICE

42 South Ocean Ave., Patchogue, Long Island

Offers the following records, recommended by Haggin, at list, plus postage:

The Abduction from The Seraglio (Mozart), Beecham, Vic. 11-9191	$1.05
Die Freischutz Overture (Von Weber), Toscanini, Vic. 11-9172	$1.06
Don Giovanni Batti, Batti, O Bel Masetto (Mozart), Stober, Vic. 11-9115	$1.05
Fidelio, Act 1 Abscheuilicher, Wo Eilst Du Hin (Beethoven), Toscanini & Bampton, Vic. 11-9110	$1.05
Rossini Overtures, Toscanini, DV2 in unbreakable vinylite, 4 records	$8.85
DM1037 in shellac	$4.85

machines of much higher price. If any of these are better for their $1,000 it may be possible to make the Venus 12H equal or sufficiently approximate them by spending a couple of hundred dollars on a wider-range speaker-system and a separate cabinet for the speakers; and even a separate cabinet for the present speaker should produce an astonishing improvement in the sound. That is an improvement one can achieve with any machine; and I will give the specifications of the cabinet in a later article.

Letters to the Editors

Entschuldigen Sie

Dear Sirs: I know the readers of your distinguished magazine prefer information from "on the spot." They also believe that reports which quote sentences in the local language are more authentic. Nevertheless, I have to protest against some errors in Mr. Del Vayo's excellent article Intermezzo in Berlin (August 31). My own followers have sufficiently spoiled the German language. No need to overdo them by writing "Erinneren Sie sich das Kapp Putsch" instead of "Erinnern Sie sich des Kapp Putsches," or "Fassanenstrasse," which is meant to be Pheasant Street and not the street of barrel ancestors.

My friend O. G. V. would not have tolerated such distortions, but what can I expect from Bolsheviks whom I forgot to extirpate.

HEIL! THE GHOST OF ADOLF HITLER

September 10

Wilsonian Observation

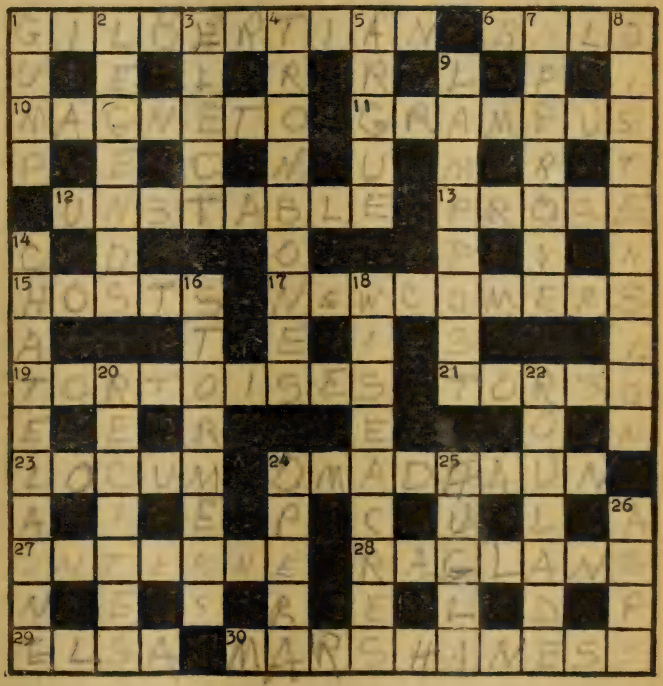
Dear Sirs: Woodrow Wilson in his Shadow Lawn speech of September 30, 1916, before the Young Men's Democratic Clubs spoke as follows concerning Republicans of progressive viewpoints: "They are engaged in the interesting enterprise of trying to capture a party which is fortified against them and refusing to enter a party which is already captured by those who believe in their principles. The intellectual processes by which they arrive at their conclusions are entirely obscured to my intelligence."

I send you this quotation because it ties in with what Henry A. Wallace says of the dilemma of progressive Republicans in his article How to Elect a Progressive Congress (The Nation, August 31). RICHARD PURDY

New York, September 15

Crossword Puzzle No. 179

By JACK BARRETT



ACROSS

1 Sort of humor a la Carte
6 Unvarnished — yet often shiny on top
10 The sparkplug superseded it
11 Whale, or perhaps a dolphin
12 Fetch out the horses?
13 Not the language of the poet
15 They entertain us, with or without reward
17 Late arrivals
19 Under shelling their advance is slow
21 Trunk with concealed roots
23 Sort of lieutenant in the medical service
24 Irish for "silly ass"
27 One of the hospital staff
28 Plenty of room in these overcoats
29 Acrobatic seal
30 Shines in Mars, and is a feature of low-lying ground

DOWN

1 Chinless Wonder of the Funnies
2 Marvelous stories
3 The chosen
4 Instruments that might form part of a skeleton band
5 Bandy words
7 It is father's turn to give proof
8 No tidiness (anag.)
9 Very little light is to be had on this in war time (4 and 4)
14 A talk with Lancelot's little lady shows where the lady kept her keys
16 Shock troops
18 Simpletons who are unconscious of being simpletons
20 Reads aloud
22 Melodic embellishment
24 Story of people in Sing-Sing
25 Branch of the Ganges
26 Saps in snakes' clothing

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 178

ACROSS:—1 POPPIES; 5 MAGNATE; 9 AMAIN; 10 OUTFITTER; 11 CATERWAUL; 12 AUDIT; 13 DICTATE; 15 DUKEDOM; 17 INSIPID; 19 SAN REMO; 21 PATHE; 23 RELIEF MAP; 25 CASSANDRA; 26 REEDS; 27 SMARTED; 28 THRUSTS.

DOWN:—1 PEASCOD; 2 PRACTICES; 3 INNER; 4 STORAGE; 5 MOTTLED; 6 GRIMALKIN; 7 ACTED; 8 ERRATUM; 14 APPLE TART; 16 DREAMLESS; 17 IMPACTS; 18 DERIDED; 19 SALTANT; 20 OPPOSES; 22 TOSCA; 24 ERROR.

RESORTS

42 MILES from N. Y.
RO-ZEE DUDE RANCH
OPEN ALL YEAR
Highland Mills 4451
Mother's cooking served in hotel manner. Informal dress, homelike atmosphere.

RESERVE NOW FOR HOLIDAYS
RATES WEEKLY, $35 up WEEK-ENDS, $20-22
CENTRAL WILLET
N. Y. C. Phone: LO 5-3715 • CH 4-5487

TOBACCO

CIGARETTES
Popular brands, $1.40 per carton postpaid. Minimum order, 3 cartons.
CIGARS
Natural Bloom Dandies; bx. of 50 ..... $6.00
Ingersoll, Havana Blend; bx. of 50 ..... $4.49
PIPES
Medico, $1.00 • Also Yello Bole, Kaywoodie, Weber, Milano, etc.
Our policy—everything postpaid; satisfaction or full refund; amazingly fast delivery service.
Ask for complete price literature or send your check or money order today to:
ACE MAIL ORDER COMPANY
EAST ORANGE 1, N. J.

HELP WANTED

UNIQUE SCHOLASTIC OPPORTUNITY
PROMINENT educational project affiliated with major university offers minimum of 14 months full-time work in Chicago at excellent salary on stimulating, broadening research job under direct supervision of well-known scholar, to several qualified persons. Must be alert, analytical, well-read, have some graduate background, willing to work intensively. Write for interview giving full particulars.
Box 1646, c/o The Nation.

CASEWORKERS. Three, and one Supervising Caseworker, professionally trained, for family casework agency. Salary range $2100-$3000. Write Director, Jewish Social Service Bureau, 127 N. W. Second Street, Miami, Fla.

SITUATIONS WANTED

SOUTHERN COLORED DOMESTIC and hotel workers desire jobs. Write for list today (stamps). QUALITY EMPLOYMENT ASSN., 214 East Clay Street, Richmond 19, Va.

ROOMS WANTED

UNITARIAN MINISTER working in New York, needs room near Columbia University. Box 1648, c/o The Nation.

HANDWRITING ANALYSIS

SCIENTIFIC HANDWRITING analysis. Alfred Kanfer, 62 Leroy St., N. Y. C. Tel. WA. 5-0956. Cooperating with doctors, psychologists, schools, firms, industries. Lessons. By appointment, evenings. Marital, educational, vocational psychological problems. Fee $3.00.

FARMS AND ACREAGE

CENTRAL hallway colonial; 8 rooms; electric and running water; view; ski run; small creek; orchard, asphalt road; privacy; 16 miles from Tanglewood Festival; splendid barn with 30 stanchions and drinking cups. 100 acres. $7,000. Berkshire Farm Agency, East Chatham, N. Y.

SCHOOLS

LAKEWOOD
MODERN SCHOOL
A residential school for boys and girls from 7 to 13 years of age. Small group. Personal supervision.
Write:
JAMES and NELLIE DICK
115 Carey Street • Lakewood, N. J.
Phone: Lakewood 6-1007

LECTURE SERIES

BY ELI SIEGEL. Aesthetic Analysis Doesn't Mind Being Philosophic—Sept 19, and Aesthetic Analysis Sees Dreams This Way—Sept. 26. Auspices of: COMMITTEE FOR AESTHETIC ANALYSIS. STEINWAY HALL, 113 W. 57th St., N. Y. C. Room 718—8:30 P. M. Admission $1.00 (incl. tax) each lecture.

INSTRUCTION

SONIA GORDON BROWN, sculptress, will take three or four students in her private studio. Communicate mornings, PLaza 8-2665.

REAL ESTATE FOR SALE

Jackson Avenue, Jersey City. 1) Large Corner, 102x82, Fine Future. 6 Stores & 12 Flats. $8,568 (low) Rents. Price $49,000. 2) A smaller corner, 5 Stores and 4 Flats. $5,668 Rents (low). $36,000. 3) 4 Stores and ▮ Flats, 50x90, ▮ real investment. Rents (very low) $5,280. Price $34,000. Owner, Room 820, No. 9 East 46th Street, New York 17. PLaza 3-7510.

LANGUAGES

LINGUAPHONE MAKES LANGUAGES EASY. At home learn to speak Spanish, French, German, Russian or any of 29 languages by quick, easy Linguaphone Conversational Method. You learn by listening. Save time, work, money. Send for FREE book. Linguaphone Institute, 81 RCA Bldg., New York 20, N. Y.

ALL LANGUAGES. Phonograph Courses. Linguaphone, other makes. Sold, bought, rented. A. Alin, 475 5th Avenue, New York 17. MU. 3-1093.

PUBLICATIONS

"HUMAN SIDE OF LIFE"—Streamlined Thinking, in Commentary & Poetry, by Radio's Arthur Knight. $1 brings you this unique new seller; 44 pp., paper, sent POSTPAID, FROM: The Bassett School, 350 East 17th St., New York 3, N. Y.

CONTROVERSY Magazine publishes ALL articles and letters submitted. Write CONTROVERSY Magazine, 516 N. St. Clair St., Pittsburgh, Pa.

MAGAZINE SUBSCRIPTIONS

SUBSCRIBE FOR PERIODICALS simply by asking me for them; any number in one order. Pay after I bill you at publishers' lowest prices. Catalog NA, Free. John Crehore, Walpole, N. H.

MONEY-SAVING MAGAZINE COMBINATIONS

For Your Convenience

The NATION

☐ with Harper's Magazine . $7.50 You Save $2.50
☐ with Consumers Union . $8.00 You Save $1.50
☐ with Harper's Magazine and Consumers Union . $10.00 You Save $3.50
☐ with Free World . . . . $8.50 You Save $1.50

All club combinations listed are for one year, and may be mailed to different individuals and addresses.

THE NATION by itself:

☐ One Year $6 ☐ Two Years $10 ☐ Three Years $14
☐ Servicemen's Rate $4 a Year
Canadian and Foreign Postage $1 a year extra

THE NATION
20 Vesey Street, New York 7, N. Y.
I want to subscribe to The Nation, or the following Nation magazine combinations as listed below:

☐ Remittance enclosed. ☐ Bill me.
NAME
STREET
CITY ZONE STATE
9-21-46

September 21, 1946

THE Nation

Special Western Supplement

for the Conference of The Nation Associates, Los Angeles, September 21-22, 1946

JOSEPH KINSEY HOWARD
DR. PAUL S. TAYLOR
STANLEY BAILEY
RICHARD BOKE
DR. MORRIS GARNSEY
PAUL RAVER
LAWRENCE I. HEWES, JR.
VARDEN FULLER
ROBERT C. BROWNELL
EMIL CORWIN
CHARLES A. GRAHAM
FRANK H. JONAS
HAROLD J. SALEMSON

EDITED BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

15 CENTS A COPY · EVERY WEEK SINCE 1865 · 6 DOLLARS A YEAR

THE CHALLENGE of the POST WAR WORLD to the LIBERAL MOVEMENT

Conference under the Auspices of The Nation Associates

SEPTEMBER 21-22, 1946 AMBASSADOR HOTEL, LOS ANGELES

Program

Saturday, September 21, 10:00 A.M.

I—THE 1946 ELECTIONS AND AMERICA'S FUTURE: Presiding: John B. Hughes

Address—Oscar L. Chapman, Under Secretary of the Department of Interior Panel: What We Hope For Labor: Irwin de Shetler, Regional Director of the C.I.O. for Southern California
Susan D. Adams, Business Representative I.L.G.W.U.
Negroes: Loren Miller
Minority Groups: Richard Ibanez
Discussion

Saturday, September 21, 2:00 P.M.

II—AMERICA'S FOREIGN POLICY AND ITS RELATION TO PEACE:

Presiding: Chet Huntley
Is Association With Britain and Opposition to the U.S.S.R. A Necessary Cornerstone of U. S. Foreign Policy?—Dr. Harold Fisher, Director of the Hoover Library, Leland Stanford University
What's Behind Our Foreign Policy In Palestine and the Middle East?
Freda Kirchwey, Editor of The Nation
Spain, Greece and Other Problems Endangering the Peace?—J. Alvarez del Vayo, Foreign Minister of the last Republican government in Spain
Discussion

Sunday, September 22, 10:00 A.M.

III–ECONOMIC SECURITY AS A FACTOR FOR PEACE:

How Can Full Employment Be Maintained?
Dr. Arthur Ross, Institute of Industrial Relations, University of California, Berkeley
How Can The War Veterans Be Reintegrated Into The Life of the Country?
Ronald Reagan, War Veteran and Movie Star
Western Industry As A Factor In Full Employment!
Richard Boke, Regional Director of Bureau of Reclamation
Paul Raver, Director, Bonneville Project
The Role of Atomic Energy in Assuring Economic St[illegible]ty
Dr. William Fowler, California Institute of Tec[illegible]ogy
Discussion

Sunday, September 22, 2:00 P.M.

IV—ORGANIZATION FOR DEMOCRACY: Presiding: M[illegible]y Maverick

Is Liberalism Capable of Dynamic Action?
Dr. L. L. Fisher, Institute of Industrial Relations, Univ. of California, Berkeley
Dr. Harry Girvetz, University of California, Santa Barbara Panel: The Role of
The Movies—Mary McCall, Screen Writer
The Press—Dr. Robert E. G. Harris, Chief Editorial Writer, L. A. Daily News
The Radio—True Boardman, Radio Writer
The Schools— Dr. Curtis Warren, Superintendent of Schools of San Francisco
Discussion

Sunday, September 22, 7:00 P.M.

V—DINNER FORUM: Presiding: Bartley C. Crum

Speakers: Judge Thurman W. Arnold; Freda Kirchwey; Senator Wayne L. Morse; Dore Schary

THE Nation

AMERICA'S LEADING LIBERAL WEEKLY SINCE 1865

Special Supplement, Los Angeles, September 21, 1946

Statement of The Editors

WHEN the first issue of The Nation was published in 1865, the west existed merely as a large area on the maps marked as "unknown." Illinois, Michigan, and Kansas were "west" in 1865 and Abraham Lincoln was known as a "westerner." In the past, the term "west" has had a constantly shifting geographical connotation with its real significance being social and psychological. It referred to the "unknown"; to the land on the far side of an advancing frontier. Today the west exists, not in this vaguely defined sense, but in regional actuality, in social fact. It is made up of the eleven "western" states of California, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, Colorado, Utah, Nevada, Arizona, and New Mexico, with the Rocky Mountains constituting the approximately accurate eastern boundary of the region. Eliminated from the western category today are the Great Plains states which are definitely within the orbit of the marketing and distributive centers of the Middle West. In the immediate past, the vast region of the eleven western states has been thought of most frequently as embracing a number of sub-regions: the Pacific Northwest; the Inter-Mountain West; the Southwest; and the Pacific Coast or West Coast. But post-war realism should dictate the practice of regarding the eleven western states as one region, a region that is rapidly falling within the economic orbit of the expanding industrial and financial leadership of the three dynamic west coast states of Washington, Oregon, and California. It is to certain of the immediate problems of the eleven western states that this special supplement of The Nation is devoted.

Readers of The Nation residing in the west will, I am sure, agree that the supplement is overdue. As west coast staff representative, I can testify that the task of covering some of the more significant developments in this vast region presents a host of special problems. It is often difficult to explain the special importance which the west attaches to certain of these developments to a national audience; the competition for space, in these troubled times, excludes many stories from The Nation that relate to important happenings in the west; and the difficulties of distance, and badly organized intercommunications within the west, are not to be minimized. As an initial effort, this supplement is a highly imperfect performance; but, if the performance is repeated, at least on an annual basis, the editors believe that a round-up technique can be developed that will serve to fix national attention upon some of the more significant developments and problems of this new, dynamic, and rapidly expanding region.

The appearance of the supplement at this time is itself a recognition of the emergence of a new regional social, economic, and political consciousness in the eleven western states, a development broadly outlined in Dr. Garnsey's contribution. By way of reassuring eastern and middle western readers, it should be said that this new regional consciousness in the west is not based upon the myth of self-sufficiency; nor is it aimed at sharpening sectional differences in an anachronistic manner. Rather it is based upon the assumption that the eleven western states face a number of basic problems general to the area, such as, the development of large-scale integrated development projects, water conservation, opposition to eastern-controlled patent pools and monopolistic practices, the need for industrialization; and that among these problems must be listed the task of freeing the west from its semi-colonial status as an economic dependency of eastern capital. Since the publication of Walter Prescott Webb's Divided We Stand and Joseph Kinsey Howard's Montana: High, Wide, and Handsome, this latter assumption has become axiomatic.

As Dr. Webb pointed out, one of the issues resolved by the Civil War was the question of whether the North or the South was to control the West, which, by 1865, had begun to loom large in the thinking of the American expansionists of the period. Not only did the North continue to dominate the South after the Civil War, but it staked out the West as a raw materials domain for its exclusive dominance and control. It is this underlying historical reality which has always given substance to the talk about the South and the West being natural political allies and it is this same reality which today points to the conclusion that the South and the West are the most likely sources of a new progressivism in American politics. In the case of both the South and the West, the North (or should one say the East?), has long utilized essentially the same techniques of control: playing one section against the other; cultivating the allegiance of a quisling-like group of special-interest representatives in both regions (for the most part, the managers or representatives of eastern capital); and paying-off regularly to certain dominant blocs,—the cotton bloc in the South; the silver, cattle, sheep, lumber, and copper blocs of the West. The Bourbon contingent from the South has always been matched by the Wheelers, the Smoots, the Reuben Clarks, and the Phipps from the West. In the past, the South and the West have shown a strong united front only on one issue: a nativistic racial chauvinism. From 1865 to 1940, most racial issues in Congress found the South and the West—the one fearing the Negro; the other the Oriental—closely allied in interest and bigotry. To what extent, one wonders, did this alignment represent a rationalization of the suppressed economic development of both regions? Today this tie of racial arrigance is dissolving. It is, indeed, signifiicant that the foremost advocates of a permanent Fair Employment Practices Commission in the Senate are Senator Wayne Morse, from Oregon, and Senator Dennis Chavez, from New Mexico. At the moment, both Senators from California, one a Republican and the other a Democrat, are sponsors of FEPC legislation. It is this development which gives special point to Mr. Laurence T. Hewes' article in this supplement. For the movement toward a free pattern of race relations on the west coast which he outlines could be paralleled by some recent developments in the South, notably by the emergency of such a leader as Governor Ellis Arnall. Racial arrogance never united the South and the West; its real effects were more often divisive than unifying; it has tended to obscure the basic similarity of economic interest which the two regions share.

Editor and Publisher: Freda Kirchwey

Managing Editor J. King Gordon — Washington Editor I. F. Stone — Literary Editor Randall Jarrell*

European Editor: J. Alvarez del Vayo

Associate Editors
Robert Bendiner, Keith Hutchison, Maxwell S. Stewart
Drama: Joseph Wood Krutch — Music: B. H. Haggin

Staff Contributors
Reinhold Niebuhr, Carey McWilliams, Aylmer Vallance

Assistant Managing Editor: Robert Harvey
Copy Editor: Gladys Whiteside. Assistant Literary Editor: Caroline Whiting. Research Editor: Doris W. Tanz.

Business Manager: Hugo Van Arx
Advertising Manager: William B. Brown
Director of Nation Associates: Lillie Shultz

* Margaret Marshall on leave of absence.

The Nation, published weekly and copyrighted, 1946, in the U.S.A. by The Nation Associates, Inc., 20 Vesey St., New York 7, N. Y. Entered as second-class matter, December 13, 1879, at the Post Office of New York, N. Y., under the act of March 3, 1879. Washington Editorial Bureau: 318 Kellogg Building. Advertising and Circulation Representative for Continental Europe: Publicitas, Lausanne, Switzerland.

Subscription Prices: Domestic—One year $6; Two years $10; Three years $14. Additional postage per year: Foreign and Canadian $1. Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new one.

In the article which he has contributed to this supplement, Dr. Garnsey has touched upon one of the most significant issues in the west today, namely, the unexplored, undefined, wholly tentative relationship between the three west coast states and the other eight western states, or, if I may be pardoned a chauvinistic flourish, the relation of California to the other western states. The giant of the west, California got off to a much earlier and more rapid development than its sister western provinces. It tended to develop, in relative isolation, a more independent culture and a more self-sufficiency economy. As a consequence, it failed to cultivate and often rudely ignored the crucial issues of good relations with the other western states. For example, on numerous occasions it has ridden rough shod over the water interests of Nevada and Arizona and Utah. But today the rapid wartime industrialization of the three west coast states has brought about a new willingness to think in regional terms and has raised to the level of a major issue the question of good relations with the states which constitute the west coast's hinterland. California could throw the weight of its great influence in national affairs behind a program for the development of the eleven western states. It could spearhead the fight of these states for a larger measure of control over their own destines. Some of the reasons why California has not exercised this leadership, or not exercised it effectively, are pointed out in the articles by Dr. Paul S. Taylor and Varden Fuller. In short the answer is that California is itself "controlled," by a clever twofold strategy of confusion and legislative gerrymandering. The special importance of Joseph Kinsey Howard's story in this supplement of the the defeat of the Wheeler-Anaconda machine in Montana,—aside from the fact that it was written by Mr. Howard, a major prophet of western regional consciousness,—is that Montana has long represented, in an aggravated manner, a case-history of the entire west. For here the colonial concept was first developed; most notoriously extended; most brazenly and uninhibitedly expressed; with the most sorrowful latter-day consequences. That the people of Montana have finally revolted against this concept may well foreshadow similar developments throughout the west.

The emergence of the West is not a metaphorical expression but a sociological reality. Nothing symbolizes this reality quite as graphically as the rapid upward movement of California in population rank, from the 21st most populous state in 1900 to 3rd place in 1944. Between April, 1940, and July, 1944, the state gained 1,839,602 population; three times the increase of any other state for the same period. Mr. Bailey's article in this issue points out the significant movement of in-migrant veterans to California since the end of the war. Current estimates indicate that 300,000 migrants have entered the state since January 1, 1946. Implicit in the rapid growth of this largest of western states is a gradual westward shift, not merely in population, but in industry and trade. Accompanying the shift in population and industry has been a similar westward focusing of national interest and concern from the Atlantic to the Pacific seaboard. Californians are notoriously boastful; but they are not always as bombastic as they sound. Occasionally there is reason in their madness. They believe that the West stands today on the threshold of a great expansion. Long quoted in western orations, the prophecy of Seward that "the Pacific Ocean, its shores, its islands, and the vast region beyond will become the chief theater of the world in the world's great hereafter" is nowadays in process of fulfillment.

CAREY MCWILLIAMS
For the editors of The Nation.

Aftermath of The Montana Miracle

BY JOSEPH KINSEY HOWARD

Great Falls, Montana, September 21

THE boys who stand around all afternoon in the M & M in downtown Butte, drinking beer and hopefully marking Chinese lottery tickets, have been chuckling ever since Montana's midsummer primary. They are not, they have discovered, the only suckers.

The story, as they tell it on the street, goes like this:

A few days before the election, one of the Anaconda Copper Mining Company's watchdogs came trotting by to determine what he could smell out about Burt Wheeler's prospects in his candidacy for renomination as United States Senator on the Democratic ticket—not, of course, that he had any really serious doubts. But he found that betting odds, which had been 2-1 or heavier on Wheeler, had begun to slump; a Senatorial campaign committee investigation in Helena, initiated by the Senator, had backfired. Not only was there considerable money posted on Leif Erickson, the bulky 40-year-old former State Supreme Court justice who was Wheeler's opponent, but one lunatic was even offering small odds against Wheeler.

The Company man was hastened to the ladies' bridge clubs on Butte's West Side, which is where the big bosses live and trees grow. It was a sure thing, he told them, and he wanted to cut them in. He neglected to tell them his real concern—that it was bad political medicine to leave "Erickson money" on the blackboard very long: some people might get the idea that the Old Master was slipping.

The girls giggled and chattered. They were familiar enough with bridge and bingo, but this was a new racket to most of them. Still, it would be just like finding the money. They put up the dough.

The wails of anguish which arose from some of Butte's nicest homes the morning of July 17 were louder and funnier—but sixty miles away, in the Capital at Helena, some who had had a lot more at stake than a few hundred dollars were really plumbing the depths of human misery. There, with Republican Governor Sam C. Ford in the middle of the mourners' bench, sat a stunned and silent company.

These were the men of both major parties whom Wheeler had put in office, elective or appointive, and had kept there regardless of shifts in the political winds. They had cynically repudiated campaign pledges, party platforms and even personal loyalties to help him build a virtual dictatorship in their state. It was a dictatorship which might have extended, in time, over much of the Northwest. If it could not have launched its master on another campaign for the Presidency (he'll be 66 in 1948 and only one President has been older upon inauguration), it certainly could have given him a most powerful voice in the national councils.

It had the support of the Anaconda Company's press—half of Montana's dailies and all but two of those which are published in the five principal cities. It had three radio stations in the state, reputedly owned by Wheeler; these were operated by Ed Craney, who accompanied Wheeler on his campaign tour and admitted visitors to the Senatorial suite. For the future, it had two radio stations in Washington state and had applications in for others in Montana. It had a statewide machine made up of politicians who owed their jobs to the patronage dispensed by Wheeler in his 24 years in the Senate. It had an informal but effective organization of stool-pigeons, including women, whose business it was to report gossip and ride herd on officeholders, their relatives and friends, and keep them in line with the whip of fear.

The hierarchy thought this state within a state also had a solid bloc of labor votes, especially among the traditionally friendly railroad unions; and they thought it had at least some remaining apologists among old-time liberals who could remember, and respect, the Senator's anti-Company crusade of a quarter of a century ago. And that was where they were wrong.

Let's get it straight. Wheeler was not "crucified" by PAC for his opposition to Roosevelt. He was not "smashed by the totalitarian liberals" for his suspicion of Russia. He was not "smeared" by anybody.

JOSEPH KINSEY HOWARD is the author of Montana: High, Wide and Handsome, published by Yale University Press in 1943—an indispensable guide to the New West. His first published article, an account of a strike in Butte, appeared in The Nation twelve years ago.

His defeat, much as eastern liberal spokesmen may want to find it so, was not primarily a repudiation of isolationism, though it did indicate that Montanans, traditionally indifferent to foreign policy, now hoped something could be done toward international cooperation. Wheeler said he hoped so, too, and few analyzed his statement. Isolationism was only one of many issues, many factors—and an indirect factor at that. True, without the veterans' vote which went overwhelmingly against him, Wheeler could not have been beaten, this time. True, this vote was born of the resentment of G.I.'s who had had Burt Wheeler thrown in their faces all over the world. But it was just resentment; it was not the result of any campaign, any reasoned discussions of foreign policy. Nobody has been discussing it much, in Montana.

Marquis Childs, who reported that "Potomac fever" was one factor in Wheeler's downfall, was much nearer right than the metropolitan editorial writers who leaped to their typewriters with whoops about the triumph of internationalism in the wide open spaces. "The chief characteristic of Potomac fever," wrote Mr. Childs, "is an illusion of power and statesmanship fostered by a comfortable, padded existence in Washington. The victim tends to identify the sound of his own voice with the infallible voice of the people." Wheeler had done just that; too late, he realized it.

The Senator himself and the winner, Leif Erickson, sensed quickly what had happened. Both, in statements after the election, attributed the outcome chiefly to Wheeler's defiance of party responsibility, his confidence that the people shared his contempt for the party line. And up in Cut Bank, Montana, shrewd Dan Whetstone, who is Republican National Committeeman and a long-time foe of Wheeler, commented in his Cut Bank Pioneer Press:

> "I am more inclined to credit his defeat to a factor that is being discussed but little by those who are groping for a real reason: that was his cavalier disregard of party regularity and his very evident ambition to dominate both major parties in this state, employing as an instrumentality a group in the state capitol which included a subservient governor elected by Republicans."

Some, Mr. Whetstone acknowledged, would reject this theory because they are "cynical about the ability of the mass of the people to reason finely about such matters." But, he insisted, though there are degrees of political awareness, underneath "there is the instinctive feeling that it is good for the nation and the state to have a well-defined and healthy two-party system."

Toward the finish, Wheeler may have begun to doubt. Professing confidence, he nevertheless quizzed interviewers on their opinion of his chances. His campaign speeches were defensive; and this was unprecedented, for always before Wheeler had attacked. What had happened to the Wheeler whose "silent Cal" act, when he was running for Vice President on the LaFollette ticket in 1924, had rolled his audiences in the aisles—the stunt of addressing sardonic questions to an empty chair beside him on the stage? What had happened to the Wheeler who had shouted in 1922: "If you ever see my picture on the front page of the kept press, you'll know I've sold out!"? (What had happened there was that his picture was now on the front page of the kept press.) He still had his old platform stance: knees locked, his body weaving down toward the footlights, his hands outstretched to the crowd—but he had lost his punch. He was querulous. He was scared.

Montanans who have long regarded Burt Wheeler as the smartest politician the state ever turned out are still wondering how, this time, he could have done everything wrong. He sought, and obtained, President Truman's indorsement—and it probably cost him hundreds of thousands of votes. Truman's prestige was at low ebb in Montana, especially since the Trainmen's President Whitney had informed them that Wheeler had induced the Chief Executive to set aside the rules changes they sought as a condition of the strike settlement. Wheeler also, Whitney wrote the Montana locals, rushed Truman's "slave labor" bill through his committee without hearings. Even George E. Sokolsky, who shares columnist honors in the Company press with Pegler, admitted the Truman indorsement of Wheeler had been a grave mistake.

There were other incidents, of less importance. For the real reason Wheeler lost was simply that Montana was sick and tired of him and his whole outfit. All the other factors, though the votes they brought in were essential, were somehow bound up with that . . . But because no one could be sure about all the elements of such a campaign, Montana was as surprised as anyone when it awoke to find that it was free.

Aside from the Company, which had taken its worst political licking since 1920, the chief mourner was Governor Ford. He rode into office in the Wheeler machine six years ago, ostensibly a "progressive Republican." He was re-elected in an expensive 1944 campaign with the help of the Company, defeating by 25,000 votes the same Leif Erickson who came back in two years to whip the Old Master himself.

Ford's term ends in January, 1949. So does the term of James E. Murray, Montana's consistently liberal junior Senator whom Wheeler has fought at every step since Murray's election. Ford had let it be known that he was not interested in a third term as Governor; he was not so cold, Capitol gossip said, to the idea of becoming United States Senator.

But he has been a political liability for Wheeler. Few among all the inept executives the state has had to endure since the defeat of its one outstanding progressive, Joseph M. Dixon, in 1924, have shucked and reversed their coats with any more alacrity than has Ford. His administration has been remarkable only for timidity and temporizing, which is seldom remarkable in Montana. His voice has been raised but rarely, and then only to take the stump against a Missouri Valley Authority or to propose a state sales tax for education. Montana education is in a bad way financially, as a result of one of the most contemptible legislative maneuvers of recent times, which had Ford's blessing: five years ago the state assembly robbed the schools of their earmarked funds, diverted them into the general fund to help create a surplus, and enabled the Governor to suspend all state property levies for several of Montana's most prosperous years. In his re-election campaign, Governor Ford's big billboards reminded Montana taxpayers of this beneficience, while the state education department frantically consolidated rural schools, dashed off "emergency certificates" for unqualified teachers.

Wheeler's decision not to run as an independent in November cut the last ground out from under his collaborators in the statehouse and left them teetering alongside the abyss of political oblivion. They are unhappily aware that rebellion among the rank and file of the Wheeler legion throughout the state must have contributed to the chief's defeat, and there is no one in the group strong enough to seize control and hold the demoralized mercenaries in the line.

Ford's plight is the most pitiable. In high places in his official family he has two Wheeler cohorts, known to all the state as Democrats but comfortably in office for the past six years in a Republican administration. They have suddenly become weighty millstones about his neck. And what of his own political dreams? Dan Whetstone, the National Committeeman and thus officially party leader, is as conservative as they come, even in Montana—but he's a Republican, by God, and nobody's stooge: he despises Ford and has said as much frequently in his paper. Zales Ecton, the Republican candidate for Senator in November against Erickson, is a personal friend of Whetstone. No matter who wins the Senatorship, Ford loses.

An Ecton victory is most unlikely. The Democratic primary vote was more than 93,000 to the Republican's 36,000. Some of Wheeler's 44,000 votes will go to Ecton, but Erickson's 49,000 total was more than double Ecton's vote and well in excess of the G.O.P. total. Ecton, a prosperous rancher, is a colorless candidate with no political philosophy other than loyalty to "free enterprise." Some clue to his social philosophy may be found in the fact that in his keynote address to the Republican state convention he singled out for special mention two persons bearing Jewish names among the contributors to Erickson's campaign and demanded to know who they were. He also wanted to know "why a PAC organization in Detroit" contributed to his opponent's funds; no PAC organization, in Detroit or elsewhere, contributed a dime, and W. P. Wright, Great Falls Tribune Capitol correspondent, promptly nailed the charge as false.

The Republicans have budgeted $90,000 for the fall campaign, have raised about half of it and anticipate little difficulty in getting the rest. The Anaconda Company and its Siamese twin, Montana Power, have made no secret of their determination to drive Erickson out of public life, and every resource at their command will be available to Ecton. In the good old days Montana's dominant industrial interests were not averse to sending a troublemaker to Washington to get him out of their hair, but times have changed and that strategy is no longer good. Erickson's election, for instance, would immeasurably enhance the chances of a Missouri Valley Authority; next to Senator Murray, he has been MVA's outstanding advocate. And the Montana twins dread MVA above anything else on earth. It was not a major issue, but it figured in the campaign. Erickson proclaimed his support; Wheeler, on record in opposition to it, tried to avoid MVA in his speeches.

Fortunately Erickson won the nomination on his own merits and with a minimum of outside help. The investigation demanded by Wheeler proved, to its instigator's dismay, that Erickson had had no "radical" or even PAC assistance; the fire went out and the "communist" scare used against Erickson in the gubernatorial campaign couldn't be warmed up. Actually the nominee is a sane, middle-of-the-road liberal, with a background in the best rugged American tradition: of Norwegian descent, farm-bred, he worked his way through the University of North Dakota and University of Chicago to obtain his legal education, became a county attorney and, at 32, a state supreme court justice. He was a pioneer in the rural electrification movement; he was also director of a bank. He is married and has three children, and the family lives in an old Helena house which they remodeled.

SEYMOUR
NEBENZAL

The Company has been licked. The Wheeler machine is falling apart. The Republican leaders hate each other's guts. So here's a friendly tip to the girls of the West Side bridge clubs in Butte:

There's a veteran newspaperman in your town who has a closet full of hats which he has won on election bets, after asking Wheeler's advice. Go ask him to ask Wheeler who'll win in November.

But even if he tells you Ecton's in the bag, girls, don't bet on it. . . . You might burn your fingers.

"Territory" vs. People

BY DR. PAUL S. TAYLOR

Berkeley, September 21

GEORGIA startled the country recently by declaring that the candidate receiving the most votes for governor was defeated. We were told that a "county unit" rule, an anachronistic device tracing back to reconstruction days, made possible this strange result. Under this county unit rule Echols County, with under 3,000 population, cast two electoral votes while Fulton County, with nearly 400,000 population cast only six votes. By virtue of the rule, one person in Echols County is worth about 44 persons in Fulton County when it comes to electing a governor for Georgia.

California has no "county unit" rule, but every two years it elects members of the upper house of its legislature by a device no less startling. California's plan gives 11,000 people in Inyo and Mono counties equal representation in the State Senate with 3,584,000 people of Los Angeles County. It gives to one person in Inyo and Mono counties about 326 times the political power of a person in Los Angeles, for purposes of electing a State Senator. The results of this arrangement are less spectacular than Gene Talmadge's 1946 minority victory in Georgia and have never made national headlines, but they are not less important. They are recorded, not in the rarely changed outcome of an election for governor, but in the acts of every succeeding session of the legislature.

Comparison of Senate representation of Inyo-Mono with Los Angeles is simply the dramatic extreme. Inequality runs throughout the State, and gives power to an extraordinary degree to a sparse population living in wide expanses of territory. Three metropolitan counties — Alameda, Los Angeles and San Francisco — in which 56 percent of the 1945 population of the State reside, have only 3 Senators, or 8 percent of the members of the upper house. In this way representatives from areas with a very minor portion of California's population have been given unchallengable control of the State Senate, together with that additional power which derives from a veto which the Senate can exercise over any and every bill before it becomes law.

Three examples from the 1945 session of the California legislature serve to show the difficulty of enacting progressive legislation under this arrangement. (1) The Assembly passed unanimously a bill to place additional safeguards around child labor. Senators representing 69 percent of the State's population went on record to take up the bill, but other senators, representing districts with only 20 percent of the State-s population, killed the measure easily by voting to postpone it indefinitely. (2) The Assembly passed by vote of 66 to 3 a bill to add three weeks to the present maximum period for drawing unemployment compensation benefits. Senators representing 63 percent of the population voteed "aye," but when senators representing districts with only 36 percent of the people of California voted "nay," they were sufficiently numerous to kill the bill decisively. (3) Another bill, passed by the Assembly 64 to 0, provided that where men and women are doing the same or equal work, they shall receive the same wages. Senators representing 62 percent of the population voted to pass the measure, but they were overwhelmed by the votes of senators representing districts with only 33 percent of the people of the State.

The people of California themselves were persuaded twenty years ago to adopt this plan to use "territory" rather than "population" as the basis for representation in the State Senate. They were persuaded despite the fact that in voting for it most of them thereby were reducing sharply their own influence as citizens. To help accomplish this curious result, those who advocated the plan stirred vigorously the prejudices of the rest of the State against Los Angeles, and fanned into flame the latent hostility of country districts against cities. The unpalatable fact that representation of more than half the voters of the State in the Senate would be reduced to but 3 out of 40 senators, was sugar-coated to those about to lose, by use of a title with prestige value—by calling it the "federal plan." As a special appeal to metropolitan voters around San Francisco Bay it was suggested that they could derive more than compensating satisfaction for their own losses from the fact that the losses of Los Angeles voters would be even greater. The virtues of "territory" as a basis of apportionment for one house of the legislature were extolled, and the injustice of apportionment by population was proclaimed with indignation. The voters were told that apportionment by population would "place the great centers of population, comprising about 3 percent of the State's area, in complete control of the State legislature, thus depriving the great rural sections of the State, comprising 97 percent of the State's area, of any effective voice in the State's lawmaking body . . . and permitting a part of the population [i.e., a majority] to control the entire State, which is an intolerable situation." Under the influence of this cross-fire and enveloping attack the voters voted for apportionment of the Senate by "territory," producing by 1945 the result that 97 percent of the territory—with only 44 percent of the population—has 92 percent of the senators.

DR. PAUL S. TAYLOR, long a member of the faculty of the University of California, author of An American Exodus and many other books, is the West's outstanding rural sociologist.

In the twenties, farm organizations favored the "federal plan" and the State Federation of Labor stood against it; but there was more to the line-up than that. When reports of the financing of the campaign were filed, it appeared—so the veteran political observer Franklin Hichborn later told the Commonwealth Club—that "While the dirt farmers had done the shouting, the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, without knowledge of the dirt farmers, had financed the campaign for the 'federal plan'." Los Angeles County voters, alone among those of the State's 58 counties, voted against the "federal plan" in 1926.

In 1926 the President of the Los Angeles Chamber of Commerce stood publicly against this plan which the San Francisco Chamber was pushing through. In the pages of Southern California Business he denounced its plainly obstructive character, and its deprivation of the political influence of metropolitan voters. He prophesied that the "federal plan" would align Senate against Assembly, and "made it difficult for needed legislation of a State-wide character to pass with such a class deadlock established." "If the voters blindly cast their ballots for the Federal plan," he warned, "they will be disfranchising themselves and will be creating a condition that would cause havoc in State legislation."

Two years later, however, when the "federal plan" went before the voters of the State a second time, the official organs of the metropolitan chambers of commerce were silent. The Los Angeles Times, which had opposed the plan in 1926 now turned about to counsel its readers to vote in favor of it. In this way the Times joined two other great metropolitan Republican dailies—San Francisco Chronicle and Oakland Tribune—to advocate senate apportionment by "territory." Across the countryside the Pacific Rural Press spread the news that "the chambers of commerce of every country have endorsed" the plan. Supported by these forces and by these tactics the "federal plan" carried again.

Naturally, to concentrate the power to block bills in the hands of a minority is to expose that minority to special pressures, for the very possession of power provides an incentive to influence the political opinions of those who possess it. It requires very little perspicacity of those who know they have substantial stakes in the outcome of state legislation—whether they happen to live in rural or in metropolitan areas—to arrive at a realization that a vote in thinly settled areas is worth many times a vote in metropolitan areas. Possibly this was in the mind of conservative metropolitan interests which were willing twenty years ago to let at least the appearance of control of the State Senate slip from their own districts—indeed, even to advocate it. Possibly they had in mind also that, given the traditional lack of progressivism found in rural areas, this might be a convenient way to place a brake upon progressive movements such as that which swept Hiram Johnson and the Progressives into effective control of the State in 1910. Progressive measures have had hard sledding in the Senate since the "federal plan" was adopted.

As recently as 1940 the Los Angeles Times, whose readers lose more direct influence at each session of the legislature from continuance of the "federal plan" than do any other voters in the State, made this disparaging remark about proposals for a change: "California's Senate is dominated by representatives of her agricultural areas; the assembly by men from urban and industrial communities. This establishes a balance for the compromise of conflicting interests for which, in the light of experience, it would be hard to find a satisfactory substitute." Whether the people of Los Angeles gain as much as they lose by this arrangement, on balance, would be worth their looking into.

Whether the balance really is between rural interests on one hand, and urban-industrial interests on the other, as the Times says, and as the supporters of the "federal plan" have repeated over and over, or whether the significant balance is between progressives and conservatives will bear some serious investigation by all citizens of California. Evidently farmers are giving this question scrutiny now. Of the two major farm organizations in California, both of which supported the "federal plan" twenty years ago, the Grange is more progressive in its policies than the Farm Bureau. And there are signs that the more progressive farmers have serious doubts that the "federal plan" gave them the kind of Senate to represent farmers' interests which they had thought they were getting. Some years ago Franklin Hichborn told the Commonwealth Club that the "federal plan" has not worked out as the dirt farmers had anticipated. Far from controlling the Senate, they have found themselves without influence with that body. Instead of Senators economically-minded with themselves, the dirt farmers have found as Senators, country lawyers, country insurance agents and the like, economically minded with financial, commercial and corporation interests that direct things out of Los Angeles and San Francisco. When the dirt farmers want action from the Legislature, they go to the urban-elected Assembly, not the rural-elected Senate for it. It is significant that today the State Grange assumes leadership on Central Valley issues such as public power, unified water resource development, and defeat of the Elliott rider to repeal the 160-acre water limitation, and that both wings of the labor movement together with progressive opinion generally, cooperate to give support.

Over the years dissatisfaction with the results of Senate apportionment by "territory" has been on the increase in California. Continued growth of metropolitan population has made the disparity between the effectiveness of city votes and of rural votes ever more glaring. Session after session the discomfiture of those who seek progressive legislation accumulates, as the blocking power of the Senate asserts and reasserts itself. Dissatisfaction grows whether the incumbent governor is Democrat or Republican, progressive or conservative, for party controls are not sufficiently strong to effect material alteration in the situation.

Today the State Federation of Labor is preparing to lead a campaign to reapportion the Senate Senate. Its June convention gave instructions to the Executive Committee "to renew their efforts to correct this inequality." Probably this will mean preparation of a bill establishing a basis for apportionment upon which most metropolitan and rural people can agree, then a drive to secure enough signatures to place it as an initiative measure on the ballot at the general election in November, 1948, and finally a campaign to win voters' approval of a new basis for apportionment.

It the Federation goes through with its announced plan, the voters of California are likely to be in a different frame of mind than they were in 1926 and 1928. For one thing, they have seen senate apportionment by "territory" in operation. For another, labor is much more extensively organized than ever before. It may not be so easy to whip up the prejudices of farm against city, and section against section. The "immigrants" who have been flocking to the metropolitan centers have had little indoctrination in old California prejudices. Voters around San Francisco Bay are hardly likely now, as they were before, to be willing to cut off their own political noses to spite their faces, simply because they may prefer the Bay region to Los Angeles. And in rural areas progressive groups are finding that the power which the "federal plan" promised to confer on them is apparent rather than real, and that cooperation with progressive city groups can be very effective. The clearer it becomes that senate apportoinment by "territory" is a check upon the passage of progressive legislation, the sharper will be the issue when it reaches the ballot again.

West Coast Labor

BY STANLEY BAILEY

San Francisco, September 21

THE West Coast labor situation, not unlike the national and international scenes, is marked by confusion.

There are certain definite factors in the shifting patterns, and there are many more that are indefinite. Some are encouraging. Many are discouraging.

Organized labor during the war made tremendous strides in the matter of membership and, in many instances, in the nature of contracts.

Already however, the Washington State Federation of Labor reports its membership back to approximately the pre-war level of 420,000 members, because of the curtailment of shipbuilding and other wartime activities.

On the other hand, the AFL in California and Oregon report material gains, which have largely been held. In California the AFL membership is reported at more than 1,000,000, with 600,000 members of AFL unions that are directly affiliated with the State federation. That compares to a 1941 affiliated membership of 332,000. Officials say that losses of membership in shipbuilding, aircraft and other wartime industries have been made up by growth of membership in other activities, particularly the building trades.

The Oregon Federation similarly reports a 1946 membership of 200,000, compared to 135,000 in 1940.

The CIO claims heavy gains in all three coastal states since the start of the war.

California CIO membership is now placed at 200,000, compared to 68,000 in 1942. In Oregon the membership has grown from an estimated 35,000 in 1940 to approximately 55,000 in 1946 and Washington reported a growth of from about 25,000 in 1940 to approximately 60,000 workers under CIO contracts.

STANLEY BAILEY is the veteran labor reporter for the San Francisco Chronicle, whose reporting of the Salinas strike in 1936 is gratefully remembered by all California progressives.

That, in brief, is something of the statistical picture of organized labor, but the picture of organized labor cannot be isolated from the over-all employment picture and when we look at that scene, we see certain forboding aspects.

One, and a very important factor, is the in-migration of veterans to the West Coast.

In January, 1945, the Army issued a survey which indicated that about 7 percent of all persons in the armed forces planned to settle in sections other than their former residence, and of that number, 52 percent planned to settle on the Pacific Coast, as compared to 10 percent who planned to leave the coastal region.

Professor Samuel C. May of the University of California, on the basis of that survey, estimated that from 200,000 to 350,000 out-of-state veterans could be expected. That has happened. Estimates now place the number of in-migrant veterans in California at 300,000 and more are coming.

Indications are that the vast percentage of those veterans are youths with little or no history of private employment, no union backgrounds or union conditioning. Daniel Del Carlos of the San Francisco Building Trades Council reports vast numbers of youths from out of the state seeking to become apprentices, and says that 85 percent of the present apprentices are from out of the area. Few of the in-migrants are skilled journeymen.

The employment service reports that more than 30 percent of all veterans who come into the office are from out of the state, and the number is increasing weekly.

About 1½ percent of the in-migrant veterans are skilled. Offsetting that picture, but not completely changing it, is the fact that most skilled journeymen would go to their union offices in search of employment—and the Building Trades, for instance, is not getting them.

Many of the veterans, although not qualified as skilled workers, have received training in the services which would serve them in good stead—auto mechanics, electronics—but USES officials report a reluctance and slowness on the part of employers to set up training programs to utilize those partial skills. Also, there is the question of apprenticeships under union regulations which often limit the number being trained.

The in-migrant veterans, that vast army of wandering youths, without training, without roots, seeking a new and better way of life, looking for a place where they can establish roots and become part of some community, are one of the factors that must be considered as we attempt to look into the months ahead.

It is a part of the picture that refuses to drop neatly into place in any form of the jigsaw puzzle.

Superimpose it on anticipated mass unemployment in the late fall and winter, and the result is not pretty, from whatever angle you view the scene.

Professor May and Alfred G. Norris also of the University research staff, estimated last spring that California alone could expect unemployment to reach between 800,000 and 1,200,000 this year. Although reductions in federal employment have not been as great as anticipated, with major reductions just getting underway, Norris believes that unemployment will reach the 800,000 figure about mid-November. That month will see the end of California's great seasonal agricultural and canning employment and curtailment of lumbering and other activities.

And, the projected unemployment figures, on nearly any basis the statisticians adopt, usually comes out about equal to the numbers of veterans in this state. It is pointed out that that does not mean that if unemployment reached 800,000 that 800,000 veterans will be unemployed. The state's veteran population is about 1,000,000, including those from other states.

That fact of great numbers of restless veterans and the forecasts of unemployment cast definite shadows over the coast labor scene.

There are other facts and portents in the realms of organized labor that contribute to the impossibility of saying what is going to happen, but close observers see considerable strife in the not too distant future.

There are other facts and portents in the realm of employers, but unless the situation greatly changes there will be an increase of jurisdictional controversies.

Mervyn Rathborne, secretary of the California CIO Council, sees "great and growing unrest in the ranks of labor" due to the current inflationary situation, uncertainty about the future, fears of a depression and loss of jobs. That unrest, he believes, is bound to lead to an outbreak of industrial disturbances and he cited the AFL Sailors' Union strike which was at the moment tying up the ports of the nation, and the then apparently imminent strike of the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union on the docks of the Pacific Coast.

On the other hand there has been growing organization of employer groups in the state, created for the purpose of doing business with the unions. Such groups, often modeled after the San Francisco Employers Council, are, in effect, unions of employers, created for the purpose of bargaining collectively. Where such groups exist and function with the view of getting along with the unions instead of making constant attempts to destroy unionism, they contribute to industrial harmony. San Francisco has recently seen major controversies settled because of the machinery that has been set up both in employer and union circles.

Wartime governmental controls also have affected the situation. Employers, unable to grant increased wages, and seeking to obtain then scarce workers, accepted various contractual provisions contributing to job security, year around employment, increased vacations and other so-called fringe issues that make for stability.

Many students of the labor scene are wondering what effect the death of Paul Shoup will have on the Merchants' and Manufacturers' Association of Los Angeles, historically the spearhead in the drive to keep Los Angeles the "open shop citadel."

Many employer spokesmen and some labor leaders have voiced the possibility that the "M. & M. line" may be modified. Some who are close to the employer picture in the southern California metropolis insist there is a growing tendency on the part of management to "get along with the unions" and that it was only the personal prestige and the ardor of the late Mr. Shoup, head of the organization, that kept the association to its anti-union policy. None anticipate an immediate about face, but the growth in councils of employers on an industrial basis is cited to illustrate the trend toward setting up machinery to function in accord with the national laws for collective bargaining.

However, union leaders generally see an increasing "toughness" on the part of employers, but are reluctant to forecast just where that will lead. It is anticipated that there will be strife in certain major industries—shipping is cited and there is mentioned conflict in steel, oil, electrical equipment production, lumber and others.

The inflationary trend will be a factor. Also unemployment. Historically labor dosen't strike during times of decreasing labor markets, but in the instances of well organized, union-shop industries, such as on the waterfront, unemployment may not be a determining factor. In fact it wasn't in 1934 when the longshoremen struck with only skeletal organization.

One of the most definite parts of the labor picture seems to be increased controversy between AFL and CIO. Both major branches of labor are engaged in intensive organizational activities and in most sections of the coast the AFL is setting up groups to combat "CIO raiding."

In most parts of California in the past there has been accepted a historical pattern for jurisdiction—certain fields which were mutually understood to belong to one or the other. That is being broken down.

The CIO, on a national basis, is attempting to organize the non-operating employes of the railroads, the AFL Sailors Union is attempting to broaden its jurisdiction, the AFL warehousemen are becoming more and more active in a northern California field that has been preponderantly CIO, the CIO challenged the right of the AFL to represent the thousands of California cannery workers and has organized plants where AFL had contracts.

The more youthful CIO, aggressive and generally

WILLIAM WYLER

Director

THE BEST YEARS OF OUR LIVES

combatting the status quo, while some AFL unions seek only to maintain things as they are, or were, has inspired intensive activity in its rival.

In Los Angeles, San Francisco and elsewhere special AFL strategy committees have been set up to challenge CIO activities

C. J. Haggerty, secretary of the California Federation of Labor, summarized the situation in a statement dealing with the San Francisco strategy committee. He was quoted as saying:

"Oldtime methods are no longer effective. The CIO has been using industrial engineering methods, with a planned program of action. A higher degree of coordination and integration of AFL efforts is essential."

James Carey, national CIO secretary, was quoted at the same time as saying "This will probably result in the AFL taking over some good methods from the CIO and thereby help the whole labor movement."

Haggerty said the "AFL must organize the unorganized." Both labor organizations face big jobs, and if they bog down in jurisdictional controversies they will suffer.

The lines are being drawn. Many AFL leaders who have not been antagonistic toward CIO are in the position of having to choose sides as the jurisdictional disputes become more acute. The forward looking ones of both groups don't like it, but they don't see that it can be avoided.

An incident that may be trivial or may come to have major importance is the fact that when the AFL Sailors announced strike plans, the CIO National Maritime Union, headed by Harry Bridges of the Longshoremen, and Joseph Curran of the CIO Sailors, pledged full support.

And another:

The California CIO newspaper the "Labor Herald" said in a front page editorial September 6:

"Along the coast of northern California in seven company-dominated towns, 5,000 AFL lumber and sawmill workers since January have struck nine lumber companies.

"The Redwood Operators Association, the tightly knit group of employers that controls the nine companies, are importing strikbreakers, evicting the strikers' families from the company owned houses and using every possible means to smash the strike.

"It is time for organized labor to become as united as the employers.

"The California CIO Council has called on all CIO unions to support the AFL lumber strike with organizational and financial aid."

All in all this perhaps represents a gloomy picture. However, there are too many intangibles, too many unknown factors, the scene is shifting too rapidly for anyone to attempt to say with any degree of exactness what is going to happen.

During the hectic days when the writer was with the War Manpower Commission I picked up the telephone and asked our labor market analyst what he knew about a certain situation. He paused. Then, "Did you hear that crash?" "No, what was it?" He answered, "The crystal ball just fell off my desk."

And that's the way it is today.

A Citizen's Guide to Central Valley

BY RICHARD L. BOKE

Sacramento, September 21

CONVENTION has an iron grip on most public descriptions of vast engineering enterprises. They are commonly presented as the eighth, ninth, or tenth wonder of the world, as either larger or only first smaller than the Pyramids, the Empire State, or the Pentagon Building. They are, in truth, remarkable enough as proof of man's technical genius. But by now we know that these engineering skills are on order. We can even divide, subcontract, and put them together again. It is not here that the special challenge lies.

RICHARD L. BOKE is the new Regional Director of the Bureau of Reclamation in California. His forthright leadership has brought new hope to the friends of the Central Valley project in California.

Suffice it to say that the Central Valley Project as presently authorized is a gigantic engineering undertaking involving the storage of very large quantities of irrigation water, the addition of 450,000 kilowatts generating capacity of hydro-electric power for Northern California, the transfer of water, directly and by a series of exchanges from Shasta Dam to points almost 500 miles distant, the control of ravaging floods, the improvement of navigation, the repulsion of salt water encroachment and the development of much needed municipal and industrial water supplies. The project will bring supplementary water to 500,000 acres of very valuable land and a new and complete supply to an additional 500,000 acres.

But this is the project only as now authorized. Congress has called for a comprehensive plan for California's interior basin. The Bureau of Reclamation has submitted a program which, if approved by the Congress, will produce 1,700,000 kw. of hydroelectric energy where the presently authorized project produces only 450,000; will bring water to about 3,000,000 acres of new land compared with the 500,000 of the present project. The resources thus developed and preserved will have a decisive effect upon the future of California. With the wise use of this water and this power the ends of a democratic society can be furthered. If they are allowed to reinforce present monopolies, democracy can be thwarted by the very techniques that ought to serve it.

California is a well-settled state and its agriculture is highly developed. Part of the project water stored for irrigation is destined for use upon lands already farmed. These lands, over-developed, pumping much of their water from rapidly dwindling underground supplies face serious drought with the first extended series of dry years. A major purpose of the project was to bring new water supplies to these highly developed farms. But there is a condition which the Congress first enacted in 1902 and has frequently reenacted since—no land owner shall be entitled to draw Federally-developed water for more than 160 acres. In a community property state such as California this has been construed as entitling a man and wife to water for 320 acres. The condition for the delivery of water to land in excess of 320 acres is an agreement by the landowner to sell the excess portions at appraised prices within ten years after water is delivered.

This limitation on delivery of water has become an issue of the first importance. The Kern County Land Company, a single owner under the law, holds some 400,000 acres in California. Russell Giffen, who testified before a Congressional Committee that he operated a family-sized farm of 42,000 acres, has sold his family farm to Anderson-Clayton, the world's largest cotton factors. With the entry of the large distillers into California's wine industry new land baronies have come into being. In all, some 50 percent of all the land to be benefited is held by 5 to 10 percent of the owners. The delivery of publicly developed water to the present and developing pattern of privately-owned land would deepen, confirm and for many years fix this pattern of ownership by pledging California's limited unused water resources and the Federal Treasury to its maintenance and support.

The Bureau of Reclamation occupied a generally noncontroversial position in California public life during much of the early period of Central Valley construction. In this phase the Bureau was viewed largely as an agency of master builders, preeminent in its engineering skill, erecting functional edifices that would grace any landscape. It appealed to the deepest and most constructive impulses of the citizenry.

But the Bureau is more than a construction agency. It is a custodian of a national land policy with more than 100 years of American history behind it. When the time came to apply this land policy, with its frank objective of protecting the benefits of reclamation for working farmers; of promoting healthy rural communities of independent land owners; and of denying speculative profits, the Bureau moved rapidly into the center of controversy. The large landowners of the valley, with certain exceptions, made it perfectly clear that they did not subscribe and had no intention of submitting to the limitations of Federal law.

The sides have formed rapidly. Demanding either waiver or repeal of acreage limitation were the California Chamber of Commerce, the Farm Bureau Federation, the Irrigation Districts Association of California, and the California Water Project Authority. To the support of acreage limitations came the California Grange, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the American Legion, the American Veterans Committees, the AFL, the CIO, the several Catholic welfare organizations, together with many individual small farmers.

Many tactical maneuvers have already taken place. There are undoubtedly many more to come. The major ones are worth a brief description.

Direct assult. In 1944, an amendment was introduced to the Rivers and Harbors Bill to repeal the excess-land provisions of Reclamation law as they migh apply to the Central Valley Project. The amendment passed the House of Representatives but was defeated in the Senate.

The flood control approach. The Federal Government has long assumed responsibility for the control of damaging floods. The construction of works for the control of flood waters is a function of the U. S. Corps of Engineers. The identical structure may be equally suitable for flood control and irrigation purposes. From one point of view, flood control and irrigation are merely prior and subsequent phases of the same system of water management. There is one school of thought which holds that where irrigation is incidental to flood control as the object for which a Federal appropriation is made, reclamation law does not apply. There is considerable evidence to the contrary and in the resent joint venture of the Bureau of Reclamation and the Engineers in the planning of the Pine Flat Project, it is settled issue. The Army will construct and the Bureau will administer in accordance with Reclamation law. Nothwithstanding the weight of the law and more particularly of recent administrative agreements between the two agencies, the flood control tactic still enjoys some popularity.

The Doctrine of Unenforceability. Against the application of the excess-land provisions, it has been argued that these provisions are unenforceable as they relate to underground water and will therefore result in an inequitable burden of payment falling upon the small farmer. The reasoning goes like this—a substantial part of the project water will be delivered to underground water basins, there to be pumped to the surface by the individual farmer. Since water thus delivered pays no attention to property lines or the presence or absence of signed contracts, much of this water will replenish the underground supplies of excess land owners. If the excess-land provisions of the law are not waived the large land owners will refuse to execute repayment contracts and will simply pump water from wells sunk into their own lands without any payment therefor. The result will be the levying of the entire irrigation charge against the small and complying farmer.

Aside from certain unpleasant ethical aspects of this position, the argument is not weighty. Irrgiation districts under California law have many powers including the right to incorporate holdings into a district without the consent of individual owners as well as the right to make variable assessments against lands within the district. A careful policy in the sale of the limited supply of project water to irrigation districts—a policy desirable on many other grounds—will seriously limit the supply available to those who may propose to appropriate without payment. Finally, the demand for irrigation water is very much greater than the Project supply and the Bureau will certainly prefer to deliver the water supply to those areas where it will serve the public purposes for which it was developed.

The concern that small farmers be not overcharged for their water is one that the Congress and the Bureau share with the advocates of repeal of the excess-land provisions. Congress has expressly provided that charges for water shall be in accord with the farmers' ability to repay and the Bureau naturally will offer water at rates in direct conformity with congressional enactment.

States rights. The Central Valley Project as now authorized and as ultimately conceived, lies entirely within the boundaries of California. The State of California has always shown the liveliest interest in the development and construction of the Central Valley Project. For many years the initiative lay with the State. A Water and Power Act for purposes parelleling those of the C.V.P. was submitted by referendum to the people of California in 1922. The Pacific Gas and Electric Company with the aid of a citizens committee of its own creation and half a million dollars defeated the measure. In 1933, a Central Valley Project Act, passed by the California legislature, was forced to referendum by the same public utility. This time it received a popular majority. However, the revenue bonds authorized by the Act were never issued. Instead, there is a long record of application for Federal aid, commencing in 1931, vigorously pursued at the very time the referendum was before the people and successfully culminating in 1935 when the Central Valley Project, as a result of strenuous efforts by the State, became an official undertaking of the Bureau of Reclamation.

In 1939, the Governor of California, with the endorsement of President Roosevelt and Secretary of the Interior Ickes, sought to have the Project turned over to the State of California for operation and maintenance. The Governor's recommendations were embodied in a piece of legislation known as the Pierovich Bill, which, debated under a special rule in the closing days of the Legislature, failed by two votes of the necessary two-thirds majority. The Governor attributed its defeat to the "power trust representatives." The Central Valley Project is a Federal undertaking today largely because powerful private groups within California were unwilling to have it otherwise.

Many of the same groups who, in 1939, successfully opposed State operation are today in the forefront of the move for State control. It seems reasonably clear that State vs. Federal control is a subsidiary issue. The real issue lies with the policies by which and the objectives for which the Project is to be administered.

From one point of view the States Rights argument marks a broadening of the social horizon of those opposed to the provisions of Federal law. The much stricter position has often been taken that the sovereign body should not be the State at all but rather that group of Valley counties where the benefited lands lie, or more particularly the organized Irrigation Districts within those counties. The claims of other groups to an interest in the Project have been regarded as carpetbagging or worse.

This view neglects elementary financial, as well as political, rights. The price at which Central Valley farmers receive their water will be heavily subsidized and the subsidies will be from two sources. The Federal government assumes the cost of that part of the expenditure which might otherwise be justified for flood control and navigation. Since Shasta Dam serves all three purposes—flood control, navigation, and irrigation—the costs of irrigation are substantially reduced. Further, the Federal funds advanced for irrigation do not bear interest and the necessary capital is advanced to the water users without cost for its use. To this Federal subsidy the citizens of the State of New York make a substantially greater contribution than do the citizens of California.

The second major source of subsidy to the water users of the Valley comes from the users of electric power. The rates governing the sale of power, although substantially lower than those of the private utility, are still high enough to contribute nearly $100,000,000 to the subsidization of the users of irrigation water. The consumers of electric power, although often inarticulate, have a clear interest in the policies of the Project.

Attack upon the contract. The major instrument by which the Bureau of Reclamation applies Federal law is the water contract. This is an agreement entered into between the Secretary of the Interior and an Irrigation District which sets forth the amount of water to be delivered, the price, the obligation of the District to enforce the excess-land provisions of the law and other rights and mutual obligations. Contract negotiations have proceeded at a lively rate throughout the Valley and two contracts have been completed, with others in various stages of negotiations.

These are not the ordinary contracts which the Bureau offers because this is not the ordinary project. The contract offered to the Irrigation Districts contemplates neither the conferring of absolute water rights nor the transfer to the Districts of Shasta and Friant Dams, and the hundreds of miles of major canals, each the equivalent of a fair-sized river.

For this and other reasons (particularly their application of the excess-land law) the contracts have been vigorously attacked by representatives of the Irrigation Districts Association and others. Leaving aside for the moment the interesting question of what individual Irrigation Districts would propose to do with Shasta Dam if they owned it, it is worth looking briefly at the water management problems involved in a basin-wide operation of this magnitude.

The water stored at Shasta Dam is obligated to a large number of separate but intimately related purposes. The release of water from the Dam must be intricately regulated to meet the commitment to the Districts to deliver irrigation water at the appropriate time, maintain power delivery to its power customers, maintain the depth of the Sacramento River for navigtaion, and furnish the supply of municipal and industrial water which has been contracted for. In addition, the Project must be in a position to store water when flood hazards are present and release it when they are absent. The claimants to the same water and power supply may be in areas as widely separated as Redding in the North and Bakersfield 450 miles to the South, and the task of administration is the very complex one of using and reusing the same storage capacity and the same water supply for the many beneficial purposes and the numerous separate customers of the Project. It is readily apparent these purposes could be more efficiently achieved by a single agency than by a coalition of customers, if, in fact, such a coalition could ever be achieved.

The second objection to the current contract is more plausible. The individual water user does not acquire an absolute right to own water, although it is inconceivable that, after the forty years of use guaranteed by the present contract, the right to continuous beneficial use would be impaired.

Notwithstanding the substantial subsidy from power users and the Federal government, Central Valley water will not be cheap. If the conventional contract were executed requiring amortization in 50 years, a period incidentally which is much less than the useful life of the Project, the resulting water rates would quite probably exceed the long time capacity of the farmer to pay. A substantially lower rate can be offered under the present procedure. The point is widely understood among the working farmers of the Valley who would pay no great price for a small share in the physical possession of Shasta Dam.

This, then, is the outline of the land and water controversy. But this is only one of two major controversies. The second involves the no less important question of who shall have the benefits of the public power generated at Shasta and Keswick Dams.

Here, too, there is clear and unequivocal Federal policy. Congress has enacted and reenacted a policy of public preference in the sale of public power. According to this policy, municipalities, irrigation districts, cooperatives, and other public bodies shall have a prior right to purchase power. There are many muncipalities in California in a position to benefit. Some already own their distribution systems. Other undoubtedly would acquire them.

In theory, the Federal government and the State of California do not differ on this point. One of the stronger statements of public power policy is contained in California's Central Valley Project Act of 1933, which presumably governs the policies of the State and the California Water Project Authority which was created by the Act to give force to those policies.

Neither Federal nor State enactments, however, have proved sufficient to accomplish their purposes. All energy generated by the Project is being sold to the Pacific Gas and Electric Company for resale under such terms as it and the California Railroad Commission deem proper. The circumstances responsible for the present anomalous state of affairs are worth recording.

The situation today can be described simply. A large quantity of hydroelectric energy is generated at Shasta and Keswick Dams. Transmission lines are required to distribute that energy to the various consumers. Without transmission lines the energy is wasted, bottled up at a point where it can have no conceivable function or use. The Pacific Gas and Electric Company has a network of transmission lines. During the war, it would have been unthinkable to permit the waste of Project power. Consequently, a contract was signed with the private utility disposing of the entire output of Central Valley power.

The Project is still without the means to bring its power to those whom Congress and the State of California have declared the preferred beneficiaries. An appropriation has provided for a single transmission line which, at best, can carry only a portion of the energy generated. The Pacific Gas and Electric Company remains the principal beneficiary of this investment of public funds. As matters stand, even the large power requirements of the Project itself—power needed to operate the large pumps by which water will be transferred from the Sacramento to the San Joaquin Valley—must be secured through facilities of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company.

The principal opponent of public power in California is, of course, the Pacific Gas and Electric Company. Its opposition has been unremitting, resourceful, and well-adapted to the changing situation. Mention has already been made of the role of the Pacific Gas and Electric Company in earlier initiation and referendum measures. There has been a marked change in the tactics of the conflict but the objectives remain unaltered. A review of the major tactical positions may be useful as a guide through the contemporary phases of the struggle.

The doctrine of glut. During the years prior to 1936, the keystone of the argument against public power was the assertion that the supply of power in Northern and Central California was plentiful, that no market could possibly be found for any additional supply, that the delivery of power from Boulder Dam would make an already bad situation worse and that the generation of additional power by the Central Valley Project would simply glut a market that was already over-supplied. As late as 1941, a substantially similar position was urged by the Pacific Gas and Electric Company in testimony before an appropriations committee of Congress. At virtually the same moment, the same company was urging the Federal Power Commission to grant it permission to develop additional power at new sites within the area.

The Pacific Gas and Electric Company was in error on two counts. Even before the war it was perfectly apparent to most observers, as it should have been to the Pacific Gas and Electric Company, that far from a glut there was an impending shortage of power even at the rates then prevailing. The company's application for additional power generation facilities suggests that it was not irrevocably wedded to the doctrine of glut.

In addition, the economic preconceptions of the utility were questionable. One of the well established characteristics of the power market is the great increase in the use of power which accompanies a reduction in the rate at which it is sold. The public distribution of Shasta power would accomplish very substantial rate reductions.

The evidence points unmistakably to a market for power more than ample for both the present output of the private utility and the output of the Project.

The sophisticated phase. The arguments mentioned heretofore had for their object the prevention or impairment of public power generation. About 1936 the tactics changed. In this year and for every year thereafter the company announced itself as reconciled to the public generation of power and, as evidence of its desire to cooperate, offered to purchase the entire output of Project power and, as a further evidence of good faith, offered an attractive price for the lot.

Thus begins the second phase. The position of willing customer had much to recommend it. It lent itself to much more flexible use. To begin with it was pointed out that the Federal government would secure larger revenues by sale to the Pacific Gas and Electric Company than by sale to municipalities. A special appeal was made to farmers based on the erroneous supposition that the greater the sum that could be secured from power the less the charge for water. In this argument it was made to appear that the farmer of the Valley was the natural enemy of public power despite the fact that power is one of his major costs. Before Congress it was argued that publicly-owned transmission lines would be an indefensible duplication of existing facilities owned by the company. The while this argument was being pressed, the Pacific Gas and Electric Company announced the commencement of a large scale program for the construction of new transmission lines paralleling the proposed public lines. Having failed to maintain a monopoly in the generation of power, the company has retired to a second and so far partially successful position of exclusive ownership of the distribution facilities.

The situation has much of the Alice-in-Wonderland about it. The seller, the Federal government in this case, offers its power at a reasonable price, the buyer, the P. G. and E. prefers a high one. If the Federal government has entered the power field with the ordinary objectives of a private entrepreneur the Company's offer would have been irresistible. A public power program, however, exists for a wholly different purpose—to bring cheap and plentiful power to the people in the area it serves.

The record is not only one of obstacles. It is equally a record of obstacles surmounted. The final chapter has yet to be written but the present inventory is by no means discouraging. Public power is being generated. A portion of it can be transmitted over public power lines now being built. Contracts have been signed with Irrigation Districts providing not only for the sale of water but the enforcement of the excess-land provisions of Reclamation law. Most encouraging of all is the growing public understanding of the issues. For each advance in public understanding has been a period of growth for the project.

The struggle is an old one. Much of American history is written in its terms. It is the struggle to maintain economic opportunity, the struggle against concentrations of power. It is the struggle against the proletarianization of rural society, the struggle to keep alive in one large and important segment of our economy that fondest of American dreams—free access to economic opportunity, the right to choose an occupation and progress in the chosen field and finally, and perhaps most important, the right to be one's own master, secure in the possession of a share of the nation's resources.

There is undoubtedly much that is sentimental in this dream. The great expanses of arable land that once nourished it are now well settled. The new frontiers are opened only with the aid of gigantic structures of steel and concrete, mammoth dams and vast networks of expensive canal. But it is a dream with power to compel. It has deep meaning for millions of war workers and veterans. And it is a dream to the fulfillment of which the Central Valley Project is pledged.

For further information on Central Valley, consult History of Legislation and Policy Information of the Central Valley Project by Mary Montgomery and Marion Clawson, recently published by the Department of Agriculture, Bureau of Agricultural Economics.

The Rise of Regionalism in The Mountain States

BY DR. MORRIS E. GARNSEY

Boulder, Colorado, September 21

THERE are many signs today of the rise of a new and significant regional spirit in the Mountain West. This new spirit is evinced by a rapidly growing literature and by scattered, tentative movements toward programs of action designed to facilitate the development of the West. The emphasis of the new spirit is economic rather than cultural. It is not characterized by a nostalgia for the good old days of bonanzas and cattle kings, but by a forward-looking insistence upon the need for the industrialization of the West. As a corollary to its program of industrial development the new regionalism is stirring uneasily under the bonds of Eastern absenteeism, and seekings ways to recapture control over its own economic destinies.

The first significant landmark in the rise of the new spirit was Joseph Kinsey Howard's important book, Montana: High, Wide and Handsome. Published in 1943 by the Yale University Press, it was widely reviewed and acclaimed. More important, it has set many Westerners to thinking—a necessary and inescapable prelude to intelligent action.

Howard's book underlined and abundantly illustrated two important facts about the Mountain States. First of all he showed that from the coming of the white man to the end of the '30's, Montana's history has been one long series of careless, reckless exploitations of its natural wealth and the misuse and waste of its abundant resources. The second fact is equally important and packed with significance for the future. In recent years, and particularly since 1933, Montana has been the scene of several successful experiments in the conservation and integrated development of natural resources. These experiments have shown that the range, the forests, and the croplands of the West can be used productively and over long periods without the need of waste and destruction. They have shown too that indigenous, cooperative action by Westerners is possible and promising.

The Westerner who reads this book cannot fail to recognize that Montana's history has been closely paralled in his own backyard and that recent events in Montana offer significant parallels for his own future.

In general, however, the emphasis in Montana: High, Wide, and Handsome is historical, and although Mr. Howard has carried on his work in a series of notable articles it remained for another book to sound the new note in Western regional development. This is Mr. Wendell Berge's Economic Freedom for the West, published in May by the University of Nebraska Press.

Mr. Berge's purpose is clear. He urges upon the West in lucid argument the adoption of policies leading to its long-delayed industrialization. Mr. Berge sees a great future for the West. As a result of the war the West stands on the threshold of an era of industrial development of unprecedented proportions. Private enterprise has been stimulated and strengthened by prodigies of war production, and the region has been endowed with a capital equipment base of great potential value for the development of its resources. Whole industries in steel, aluminum, chemicals, and the processing of agricultural products have been created or greatly expanded. New techniques and new markets challenge the best in Western enterprise and Western capital, and hold the promise in the post-war era of a richer, better-balanced and more stable economy in the fifteen Western states.

Nevertheless, industrialization will be neither easy nor simple. By virtue of his position as Chief of the Anti-trust Division of the Department of Justice, Mr. Berge sees with particular clearness the obstacles raised by monopolies and cartels which threaten Western industrialization. From Nebraska to California the old perennial techniques are at work in full strength and vigor. The basing-point system threatens Western Steel. Price control devices endanger the stability of the aluminum industry. Patent control threatens to stifle the many new enterprises based on technological discoveries in chemicals and food processing; and towering above them all there looms the old regional freight-rate differential which discourages manufacturing in many directions. Economic Freedom for the West is noteworthy for the clear and concise way in which the effects on the West of these various monopolistic practices are analysed and assessed.

Mr. Berge's book also makes another important contribution. He is able to show his readers convincingly that Western prosperity is intimately related to American prosperity and to a healthy international economy. It is for this reason that the book is a truly valuable expression of the concept of regionalism. The philosophy of regionalism emphasizes the diversity of the various parts of our great nation, but it is no less insistent upon the essential unity of the whole and the necessity for the integrated and harmonious development of all of the parts. Mr. Berge recognizes this basic concept and in this his book is a bright contrast to the chauvinistic sectionalism so frequently encountered.

Two other 1946 books dealing with Western problems deserve notice: If the Prospect Pleases—the West the Guidebooks Never Mention by Ladd Haystead and The

DR. MORRIS E. GARNSEY, member of the faculty of the University of Colorado, is currently preparing a social-economic history of the mountain states.

Revolt of the South and Fest by A. G. Mezerik. Both recognize the major problems of the West and sense the growing unrest which is developing among Westerners.

Books such as these four are important evidences of the rise of a regional spirit in the West. Moreover, they serve to crystallize that spirit and to give it a firm theoretical and ideological basis. In consequence their significance should not be overlooked by liberal opinion in the United States.

Equally significant, perhaps, is the fact that Western politicians and other astute observers of Western life are aware of the trend toward regionalism and have found it worthwhile to associate themselves with the new movement. Among such observers none is keener than E. Palmer Hoyt, Editor of the Denver Post; and apparently he has set himself the extremely useful and interesting task of bringing to the people of the West the concept of a regional "Rocky Mountain Empire," and of informing them through the pages of the Denver Post of the problems and potentialities of their "Empire."

This is one of the most important aspects of the "Revolution in Denver" (The Nation, June 29, 1946) brought about by Hoyt's rejuvenation of the old Denver Post. It may well be that the new Post will serve the Mountain States as a nucleus for the development of a genuine regionalism. So far it has brought a great deal of information to a not-too-well-informed public. In recent months the Post has printed a series of articles on the TVA and a debate on the Missouri Valley Authority proposal between the former Colorado Governor, Ralph L. Carr and James A. Patton, President of the National Farmers Union. It has examined the threat of another Dust Bowl in the plains area of the West and has looked into Reclamation and Soil Conservation policies. Equally important it has opened its columns through a series of guest editorials to numerous Westerners, many of whom have discussed regional problems.

Noteworthy among the Post's guests are Senator Dennis Chavez of New Mexico and Governor Lester C. Hunt of Wyoming. The opinions of these two political leaders are worth quoting at some length because they express clearly the major themes of Western regionalism—the need for industrializiation, recognition of the artifical barriers to that goal and a demand for new programs of action to eliminate the obstacles and achieve the goal.

As Senator Chavez puts it:

> "We need in the west leadership of the type of Governor Arnall of Georgia. The organization of the southern states under his vigorous sponsorship and their concerted fight on the unfairness and inequity of the freight rates should make us ashamed that we in the west, who are penalized just as unfairly, have not provided leadership and organization to undertake a similar fight in our own behalf."
>
> "Public lands should be returned to the states, our immense natural resources should be developed and utilized by industries located within our own borders and close to these sources of supply. Products produced by these industries must reach the markets in other parts of the country without the penalizing burden of unjust freight rates."

Or listen to Governor Hunt:

> 'The strangle hold on industry by large corporations in a few states comprising a very small area in the east must be broken."
>
> "Producing, as we do in the west, over 70 per cent of the electric power, with most of the natural resources such as lumber, oil, and minerals and the greatest known deposits of coal in the nation, and producing a large portion of basic wealth—wool, cattle and wheat, it is ironic that we are content to furnish raw materials for eastern processing instead of producing the finished products ourselves here in the west. For all too long, values in taxes, labor and manufacturing have been allowed to go east when they rightfully belong to the west."
>
> "The west, with 21 per cent of the population, has been content with only 11 per cent of industry.—Manufacturing has become so concentrated in a few states in the east that an area comprising approximately 10 per cent of the United States boasts of over 70 per cent of the manufacturing of the entire country. Why this concentration? Could it be because eastern lobbies are closer to Washington and/or the ancient freight rate structure dividing the country into regions making region 1, the northeastern states, the favored region?"

At the same time Governor Hunt is not unaware of the essential unity of the United States. Like Berge, Mezerik, the historian Walter Prescott Webb and many others, his desire to see the West develop is not narrowly sectional.

> "This nation of ours will grow greater and greater, but to adequately fulfill its destiny, all sections must be developed. None can be neglected. There is no limit to our realization of tomorrow if we, the Rocky Mountain Empire States, work together, all for one and one for all, to bring and retain that development to which the west is justly entitled."

It is encouraging to see these expressions of opinion from two of the outstanding political leaders of the Mountain States. Such an enlightened attitude is rare in a group of congressmen and governors who on the whole are unimaginative, pedestrian and solidly conservative.

In the realm of ideas and opinions, then, there is evidence that the Mountain States are beginning to develop a regional consciousness comparable to that which has grown up in the South in recent decades. There also is evidence that these ideas are beginning to be translated into action, although, as might be expected, the implementation of the concept of regionalism has lagged behind the development of the concept itself.

By and large the idea of regional development has found its greatest support in the universities. At the University of New Mexico, Professor J. Ortega has organized a development program centering upon the economic and social problems of the Spanish-American cultural group which is the important minority group in the Mountain States. The University of Wyoming has a Natural Resources Research Institute which is engaged in research for the utilization of Wyoming's varied resources. Professor J. R. Mahoney of the Bureau of Business Research at Utah has developed much of the basic research on the economics of the western steel industry; and Utah's new president, A. R. Olpin has come from the University of Ohio with a wide experience in industrial research which no doubt will be utilized effectively here in the West.

In Colorado the State Legislature two years ago appropriated $100,000 for industrial research in the universities of the state. The sum is ludicrously small in comparison with expenditures in the same field in neighboring states to the East but it is at least a beginning; and it has been put to good use in the laboratories of the University of Colorado and the other state schools. In Colorado, also, Denver University recently has received a grant from the Sloan Foundation for a study of the economic problems of under-developed regions with special reference to the Mountain States.

Up to now, however, the most effective regional program has been that of "The Montana Study," which is being carried on by the University of Montana under a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation.

The Montana Study has been underway since September 1944. Its purpose is "to enrich the quality of living in the State of Montana." To achieve this purpose it has developed a program for bringing the intellectual stimulus of the university directly to the people of the state in their respective communities. This movement has led to extensive self-analysis by the typical Montana community; and self-analysis has led in most cases to programs of self-improvement. In several towns the economic base of the community has been analysed, often around the specific focus of providing jobs for returning veterans. The cultural and social resources of the community have been assessed; and as a result there has been an awakened interest in schools, libraries, drama societies and other forms of community life. In short, Montana is building an economic base and an indigenous culture capable of competing successfully with the more glittering attractions of the urban society beyond the borders of the state.

